Law enforcement officials, speaking on the condition of anonymity, said that when the drivers returned to the truck about 6:30 a.m. on Nov. 8, the locks had been broken and the painting was gone. Neither the two museums nor the investigators have identified the shipping company responsible for transporting the painting.

Federal investigators had first said they believed that thieves armed with detailed shipping information were behind the theft.

While that theory appears to have been wrong, other law enforcement officials cautioned that it was not yet known definitively that the thief or thieves had no information about the shipment of the painting.

While Mr. Siegel would not say exactly where the painting was recovered or provide details about how the agents had found it, he did say that it was recovered without a search warrant. He added that several people had been interviewed about the theft, but he provided no details.

Officials declined to identity the lawyer who alerted the investigators and would not say how he learned of the painting’s whereabouts. Nor would they say whether the lawyer was connected with anyone involved in the theft or whether he would be paid the $50,000 reward offered by an insurer.

It was not known whether the authorities had learned the identities of the thieves.

One law enforcement official, speaking on the condition of anonymity, said charges in the case could be filed as early as next week in United States District Court in Newark. Possible crimes could include interstate transportation of stolen property and theft of major artwork, each carrying a maximum penalty of 10 years in prison.

Goya Is Found After The FBI Is Tipped Off (NYS)

By Bradley Hope, Staff Reporter of the Sun

New York Sun, November 21, 2006

A $1 million Francisco de Goya y Lucientes painting has been recovered in central New Jersey less than two weeks after it was purloined from a parked truck, FBI officials said yesterday.

A spokesman for the Newark FBI office, Steven Siegel, said investigators now believe the theft was a "target of opportunity," not an inside job.

The work of art, "Children With a Cart," painted in 1778, was taken from an unmarked, locked truck in a hotel parking lot in Stroudsburg, Pa., on November 8. It was on its way from the Toledo Museum of Art in Ohio to the Solomon R. Guggenheim museum, where it was supposed to make its debut in a large Spanish art exhibit last Friday.

It didn't make it, and officials yesterday said it would now be whisked back to Toledo's permanent collection without making an appearance at the Guggenheim.

The two truck drivers were staying the night at the hotel, and when they saw the truck's locks had been broken and the painting was missing, they immediately called police, who contacted the FBI.

The FBI said the painting was found through tips that came about after extensive press coverage of the theft beginning early last week. Because the investigation is ongoing, FBI officials refused to provide specific information about where and how the painting was recovered.

A spokeswoman for the FBI's Philadelphia office, Jerri Williams, said no arrests had been made and no one is in custody for the theft.

"A tip came in that allowed us to recover the painting," she said.

The company that insured the painting for $1 million offered a reward of up to $50,000 when the theft was first announced. Ms. Williams said the decision to hand the money over to the tipster was up to the insurance company. A spokeswoman for the Toledo Museum of Art, Jordan Rundgren, refused to answer questions about the reward.

The FBI said the painting appeared to be in good condition, a fact that the executive director of the International Foundation for Art Research, Sharon Flescher, said was the biggest news.

"The most important thing today is that the painting was found, and found in good condition," she said. "Now we can start asking questions."

A spokeswoman for the Guggenheim, Betsy Ennis, said the directors of both museums decided the painting should be returned to the Toledo Museum of Art "for the benefit of the community."

"We are ecstatic that the painting has been recovered, and we look forward to bringing the Goya home and sharing it again with our community," the director of the Toledo Museum of Art, Don Bacigalupi, said in a statement.

The painting has been part of the museum's permanent collection since 1959, when it was purchased from Wildenstein & Co. gallery in New York.

"I'm so happy for the museum," a senior vice president at Wildenstein & Co., Joseph Baillio, said. "It's wonderful news. It's a lovely thing. It just shimmers. I think it was dramatically underinsured."

Goya created "Children with a Cart" early in his career when he was painting cartoons for tapestries at the Royal Tapestry Factory. The painting, one of about 60 cartoons, wouldn't have been displayed by itself when it first created, but as Goya's work began to attract more attention, it likely became an attraction on its own. Almost all of the other early Goya cartoons have remained in Madrid.

The painting depicts four children playing with a drum and a flute on a cart beneath a large tree, and a cloud rising from the horizon. The final tapestry was woven for the private quarters of the prince and princess of Asturias at the Pardo Palace, a professor of Spanish art at New York University's Institute of Fine Arts, Jonathan Brown, said.

The painting is 145.4 by 94 centimeters, according to the Guggenheim catalog.

The Guggenheim's exhibit, "Spanish Painting from El Greco to Picasso: Time, Truth, and History," opened Friday with work from a broad selection of Spanish artists including Diego Velázquez, Joan Miró, and Salvador Dalí.

Oil's Well That Ends Well For Stolen Goya (NYDN)

New York Daily News, November 21, 2006

A 1778 painting by iconic Spanish artist Francisco de Goya, stolen en route to an exhibition at the Guggenheim Museum in Manhattan, has been recovered by FBI agents in New Jersey.

Agency officials said yesterday that the painting, "Children With a Cart," is in good condition and appears unharmed.

The Goya, valued at $1.1 million, was stolen Nov. 8 from a transport truck parked overnight in a hotel parking lot in Stroudsburg, Pa. It was en route to the Guggenheim from a Toledo, Ohio, museum.

The FBI credited extensive media coverage for tips that led to the painting's recovery. But the agency would not reveal where or how the painting was recovered, citing a continuing investigation.

The image of four children at play was insured for about $1 million and was scheduled to be exhibited with about 135 paintings by Spanish masters.

The insurer had offered a reward of up to $50,000.

DOJ_NMG_0096668

Owen Moritz

Million-Dollar Painting Recovered (ABC)

By Vic Walter And Krista Kjellman

ABC News' The Blotter, November 21, 2006

Federal authorities believe the thieves who stole a million-dollar masterpiece got rid of it because the painting was too hot to handle.

The 18th century painting, "Children with a Cart," by Francisco de Goya y Lucientes, "was recovered in good condition and appears to be unharmed," according to a FBI press release today.

Federal investigators believe the thieves stumbled onto the painting during a routine truck robbery somewhere in the Scranton, Pa., area last week.

"At this time, it appears that the painting was stolen as a random target of opportunity," FBI spokesperson Jerri Williams told ABC News.

The painting was en route to New York's Guggenheim Museum for an upcoming Spanish art exhibit that opened last Friday.

Read the FBI's Press Release on the Goya Painting Recovery in the Dossier Section of Our Homepage.

The FBI credits the "extensive publicity" of the theft and the "reward of up to $50,000" for the artwork's recovery.

No arrests have yet been made in the case, and Williams says at this juncture of the investigation, there is no indication that anyone from the transport company or the museums was involved.

Stolen Goya Painting Recovered (CNN)

By Deborah Brunswick, CNN

CNN.com, November 21, 2006

NEWARK, New Jersey (CNN) -- FBI agents have recovered a 1778 painting by famed Spanish artist Francisco de Goya that was stolen en route to an exhibition earlier this month, according to FBI Special Agent Jerri Williams.

The painting was recovered in Newark, New Jersey, Williams said.

The painting, "Children with a Cart," which is estimated to be worth about $1.1 million, was stolen November 8 from a transport truck as it was parked overnight outside a hotel in Stroudsburg, Pennsylvania.

The truck was taking the painting from the Toledo Museum of Art in Toledo, Ohio, to the Solomon R. Guggenheim Museum in Manhattan.

According to Leslie Wiser, the special agent in charge of the Newark FBI office, the painting, recovered Monday morning, appears to be unharmed.

Wiser would not comment on when, where or how the painting was recovered, citing an ongoing investigation, but said "comprehensive media coverage of the theft assisted the investigative team and led to the recovery of the painting."

The painting had been scheduled to be displayed in the exhibition "Spanish Painting from El Greco to Picasso: Time, Truth, and History," which opened Friday at the Guggenheim.

The insurer had offered a reward of up to $50,000 for information leading to the recovery of the artwork.

Goya is best known for paintings, drawings and engravings of times of upheavals in Europe. Considered an early modernist, Goya was born in Spain in 1746 and died in France in 1828.

Alleged Agent's Confession Allowed At Trial (MH)

By Jay Weaver

The Miami Herald, November 21, 2006

A professor who acknowledged he was a Cuban government agent to the FBI has incurred a huge blow to his upcoming trial with a federal judge's ruling that his "confession" to agents was not obtained illegally.

DOJ_NMG_0096669

U.S. Magistrate Judge Barry Garber rejected Florida International University professor Carlos Alvarez's bid to throw out his statements on grounds that he only spoke with the FBI because of alleged promises not to prosecute if he cooperated as a ``double agent."

Garber said two FBI agents made no such promises during three days of interviews in a hotel last year, nor did they have that authority. The judge also found that the agents did not place him in custody, nor did Alvarez make his statements involuntarily.

"Moreover, the defendant never exercised the most basic method at his disposal for avoiding discussions with the agents -- not talking to them," Garber wrote in a 22-page opinion, rejecting Alvarez's other motion to dismiss the government's indictment.

``Despite what he was told, he stayed at the hotel and spoke with the agents. . . . He even called the agents to request a third day of interviews."

Either side has 10 days to object to the judge's ruling, issued last Wednesday.

Alvarez, 61, who is being detained at the Miami Federal Detention Center, and his wife, Elsa, an FIU counselor who was granted a bond, face trial Jan. 22 on a single charge of being unregistered agents for the communist government of Fidel Castro. The couple, if convicted, face up to 10 years in prison.

Alvarez's self-incriminating statements to FBI agents, which were recorded on audio and videotape, will be the U.S. government's main weapon against the couple -- accused of gathering information on the Cuban exile community, but not espionage.

The FBI, which had a bug in the couple's bedroom from at least 2001 to 2005, picked up the professor at a local Publix before taking him to an unidentified hotel for interviews during June and July of last year. During those interviews, Alvarez and FBI agents Alberto Alonso and Rosa Schureck went back and forth on sensitive questions about his family and his history as an agent for Castro's government -- hinting at the possibility of a cooperation deal.

During a recent court hearing, Schureck testified that "the objective of the interviews was not to gain a criminal prosecution, but to create a double agent," according to the magistrate judge's ruling.

In a transcript of the June 22, 2005, interviews, the agent said: ``We're here on a professional, not personal, level. Now, since you helped the Cuban government, we want you to help the United States now. OK? Do you understand?"

Alvarez's response: ``I want something else. I want peace."

Alvarez did not succumb to the double-agent offer, which is why he was eventually indicted along with his wife five months later. They were arrested last January.

At the August court hearing, Alvarez testified that he felt threatened when agents told him that his decision on whether to cooperate would be "the most important day of his life" -- citing their references to his FIU career, his wife and his five children -- including a school-age daughter.

"According to defendant, he believed that if he did not speak with the agents, he would be arrested and something would happen to his family," according to the magistrate's opinion.

Alvarez testified that he believed if he provided truthful information to the agents, he would not be prosecuted, the judge wrote.

"I was fearful, and I felt that the only way that I could get out of that situation, because I felt it had been promised to me, is by confessing to giving them everything -- all true statements," Alvarez testified.

His attorney, Steven Chaykin, argued that because his client truthfully answered the FBI's questions, prosecutors violated the agents' agreement to ``leave him alone."

But Garber, the magistrate judge, said the agents made no promises in the interviews.

Former Daley Aide Gets Almost 4 Years For Hiring Fraud (AP)

By Mike Robinson

AP, November 21, 2006

CHICAGO - A former high-ranking aide to Mayor Richard M. Daley was sentenced Monday to almost four years in prison for engineering a fraud scheme designed to cover up political patronage hiring at City Hall.

DOJ_NMG_0096670

Robert Sorich, 43, showed no emotion as federal Judge David H. Coar also fined him $10,000 for mail fraud and delivered a sharp tongue-lashing before imposing the minimum 46-month sentence federal guidelines prescribe.

"The offense is corruption - corruption with a capital C," Coar said. He said that "for people to owe their jobs to political advancement rather than performance on the job stinks."

"I don't give a hoot whether this has been going on for 200 years - it still stinks," Coar said. "You sat near the top of this corrupt operation."

Sorich co-defendant Timothy McCarthy, 35, a former personnel director in the city Department of Aviation and a one-time Sorich aide, was sentenced to 18 months for mail fraud. Coar said he gave McCarthy a break because he had provided prosecutors with important information.

John Sullivan, 38, a former deputy commissioner of streets and sanitation, was sentenced to two months in prison and four months of house arrest for lying to FBI agents. He also was fined $5,000.

Patrick Slattery, 42, a former streets and sanitation official, was sentenced to 27 months for mail fraud.

Coar sentenced Sorich at the bottom of the guideline range of 46 to 57 months, saying "good people sometimes do bad things."

Even so, defense attorney Thomas Anthony Durkin told reporters that Sorich was "sentenced as if he were public enemy No. 1." He said the prosecutors were trying to pressure the defendants into providing evidence against City Hall higher ups.

"This is one of the most devastating days I've ever seen because it means if you don't cooperate you're going to the penitentiary," he said.

Lead prosecutor Patrick M. Collins, however, said that if the government were "guilty of anything it's that we're not treating people who are politically powerful differently."

The case was part of a larger investigation of city corruption that began with bribes paid to city officials by trucking company operators and expanded into City Hall hiring practices. So far, 44 people have been charged and 41 convicted. Two are awaiting trial and one has died.

Witnesses said Sorich presided over the faking of scores received by applicants for city jobs. He also made certain that campaign workers who were members of so-called "patronage armies" were hired, while other applicants were frozen out, witnesses testified.

More than 200 of Sorich's supporters flooded the courtroom. The crowd was so large that Coar moved the sentencing to a larger courtroom.

After the sentencing, some of those in the audience wept openly while others threw their arms around Sorich to show support.

Sorich took the sentencing calmly and apologized for nothing.

"I stand before the court and my friends and family to let them know that I am not a broken man," Sorich said. "As I stand before them I am a lucky man because I have their support. I have tried to do my best and I have tried to be fair."

Plainly many of those on hand, far from viewing Sorich as a criminal, consider him a martyr to the cause of Chicago's time-honored patronage system in which those who help the mayor get elected get the city jobs.

The system, which dates back more than a century, largely was banned under a 30-year-old court order known as the Shakman Decree. But federal officials say that decree has been repeatedly violated. Another judge recently named a federal monitor to force the city to follow the order.

Federal prosecutors had hoped Sorich would be sentenced to a term that exceeded the federal guidelines.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Philip A. Guentert told Coar that under Sorich city jobs were doled out through "a covert, corrupt underground hiring system." He said taxpayers and honest job applicants were victims.

Witnesses at the trial testified that Sorich not only gave orders on who would be hired but also gave members of the "patronage armies" their marching orders, deploying them into parts of the city where the mayor and his allies wanted some extra push in getting out the vote on Election Day.

Former Patronage Chief Sentenced To 46 Months (CHIST)

DOJ_NMG_0096671

By NATASHA KORECKI And MAUREEN O'DONNELL, Federal Courts Reporters

Chicago Sun-Times, November 21, 2006

Although the sentence was lighter than it could have been, U.S. District Judge David Coar was sharply critical of Robert Sorich, saying Sorich sat at the top of a corrupt operation.

"It's corruption with a capital C," Coar told Sorich. "There's nothing good about what you did. I don't give a hoot if this is going on for 200 years. It stinks. It stinks."

Sorich's eyes welled up as Coar announced his prison sentence. Sorich's wife put her hands to her face and cried.

Moments before, Sorich — who was once a top Daley aide, in the Mayor's Office of Intergovernmental Affairs — gave a brief statement but didn't apologize.

"I am not a broken man here today," the soft-spoken Sorich told the packed courtroom. "I am a lucky man because of this support."

Codefendant Timothy McCarthy, who also worked at the intergovernmental affairs office, was sentenced to 18 months in prison. He got a break after meeting with the government eight times five times before his trial and three times after his conviction. McCarthy's lawyer, Patrick Deady, said that if McCarthy pleaded guilty he would lose a pension he built up after 20 years.

"Judge, I will regret this for the rest of my life," McCarthy told Coar.

Sorich lawyer Tom Durkin argued for no prison time, saying his client didn't take bribes or otherwise gain anything personally. Durkin criticized a legal system in which another corrupt former city official, former water czar Donald Tomczak, got a prison sentence just one month longer than what Sorich got, though Tomczak admitted taking $400,000 in bribes. Durkin criticized the U.S. Attorney's Office for its role in a system he said punishes those who fight charges and take their case to trial and rewards those who cooperate, even if they're more corrupt.

"This is 'play ball by our terms, or else you go to jail,' end of story," Durkin said.

But prosecutors said they wouldn't apologize for a system that allows wrongdoers to make amends and help fix a criminal system.

Coar gave Sorich a prison sentence in the low end of the range possible under federal sentencing guidelines. Sorich had faced up to 57 months in prison. Prosecutors had sought a sentence of up to 71 months. Coar also gave McCarthy a significant break, citing his cooperation with the government and his show of remorse.

Hundreds of friends and family showed up at this morning's sentencing, causing Coar to move the hearing from his own courtroom to the federal courthouse's largest.

A jury convicted Sorich, McCarthy and two others — who are still to be sentenced later this afternoon — in a scheme to award jobs and promotions to city applicants who were politically connected.

Witnesses testified they were given "blessed lists" from Sorich and others at IGA, with names of people who were to get jobs. Managers then rigged interviews and changed test scores so that the connected candidates won advancement no matter their qualifications, testimony showed. Prosecutors maintained that those who won jobs had done free political campaign work and received city jobs and promotions as their payback.

Bus Union Official Faces New Charges (NYT)

By William K. Rashbaum

The New York Times, November 21, 2006

Federal prosecutors announced racketeering, extortion and bribery charges yesterday against the president of the 15,000-member city school bus drivers' union, who is already facing trial on charges that he tried to hide Mafia involvement in the union.

The new charges against the president, Salvatore Battaglia, 60, of Local 1181 of the Amalgamated Transit Union, were contained in an indictment unsealed in United States District Court in Manhattan that says he is a member of the Genovese crime family. The new charges came just weeks after the union's longtime secretary-treasurer, Julius Bernstein, pleaded guilty to federal racketeering charges and began cooperating with prosecutors and the F.B.I., law enforcement officials said.

The new charges said that over at least two years, Mr. Battaglia and others agreed with the owners of a number of school bus companies not to organize their workers, in exchange for tens of thousands of dollars in payoffs from the owners.

DOJ_NMG_0096672

Dissidents in the local have complained that it has been awash in corruption. Matthew Ianniello, 86, who prosecutors have said is the acting boss of the Genovese crime family, pleaded guilty in September, admitting that he had helped arrange for bus companies to make payoffs to Local 1181 officials.

Mr. Ianniello, Mr. Battaglia and Mr. Bernstein were among 20 people charged together in the original indictment in the case in July 2005. Last week, a federal jury in Manhattan acquitted one of the men, Ciro Perrone, on an obstruction of justice charge but failed to reach a verdict on racketeering charges. A prosecutor plans to retry him.

Mr. Battaglia's lawyer, Charles G. Fiore, and a spokesman for the union did not return telephone messages late last night.

Mr. Battaglia would face a maximum of 168 years in prison if convicted on all the charges.

FBI Busts Union's Boss On School Bus Shakedown Rap (NYDN)

By Greg B. Smith, Daily News Staff Writer

New York Daily News, November 21, 2006

A corrupt union backed by the Genovese crime family extorted cash from numerous school bus companies, prosecutors charged yesterday.

The charges emerged in a new indictment unsealed yesterday against Salvatore Battaglia, president of Amalgamated Transit Workers Union Local 1181.

Battaglia was arrested at dawn by the FBI at his Staten Island home, officials said. The arrest came a day after the Daily News revealed the FBI's probe of the city school bus shakedown.

Prosecutors in Manhattan U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia's office sought to keep the longtime union figure behind bars, but Battaglia was released yesterday on $1.5 million bond after agreeing to temporarily step down from his union post.

The new indictment alleges Battaglia "and others" - identified as the Genovese crime family - "improperly received payments from numerous bus companies" who employed Local 1181 members.

Among other allegations, prosecutors alleged that some bus companies paid off Battaglia to back off on efforts to organize the firms' nonunion members.

The new indictment alleged that Battaglia continued extorting the bus companies into 2006, even after he and other union officials were arrested in July 2005.

The arrest comes two months after Matthew (Matty the Horse) Ianiello, a Genovese captain, pleaded guilty to charges of shaking down Local 1181. During his plea, Ianiello contended he'd arranged payments to the union from several city school bus companies.

Jeffs' Preaching Will Be Dissected Word By Word (SLT)

Salt Lake Tribune, November 21, 2006

As prosecution begins its case today, judge will look at evidence from life in the sect

GEORGE - Word by word, every lesson, sermon and pronouncement polygamous sect leader Warren S. Jeffs ever made is likely to be dissected and offered as evidence - both against him and in his favor - as his prosecution begins today.

In one typical lesson, recorded and distributed to faithful followers, Jeffs can be heard counseling young women to be submissive and obedient, to "keep sweet" and to avoid squabbling with sister-wives.

He also tells them that fathers and husbands are to "persuade through love" and act with kindness, not force.

Jeffs, 50, is to appear for a preliminary hearing in 5th District Court as the state of Utah makes its case that he should stand trial on two first-degree felony counts of being an accomplice to rape.

The charges stem from Jeffs' role in conducting a 2001 spiritual ceremony between a 19-year-old man and a 14-year-old girl who alleges she was coerced into the union and, later, sexual relations.

The judge then will rule on whether the evidence is sufficient to bind Jeffs over for trial.

Identified only as Jane Doe IV, the woman alleges Jeffs told her to submit "mind, body and soul" to her husband and that her salvation depended on sticking with the marriage.

He also counseled the couple to "multiply and replenish the earth."

Washington County Prosecutor Brock Belnap highlighted those statements in filing charges against Jeffs.

DOJ_NMG_0096673

But Wally Bugden, one of Jeffs' attorneys, said his client merely counseled the couple, both entering their first marriage, to love one another and build a family.

Each side is likely to cull comments made by Jeffs in recorded lessons and sermons he gave as a private school principal and then president and prophet of the Fundamentalist Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints.

Of particular interest will be the FLDS version of premarital advice Jeffs gave in home economics classes for junior-high age girls and in priesthood history classes for boys.

The teachings draw on the Bible and standard works of the mainstream Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, which publicly disavowed plural marriage in 1890.

Jeffs quotes fundamentalist Mormon leaders as well as 19th-century LDS Church leaders such as Brigham Young.

In a collection of lessons reviewed by The Salt Lake Tribune, Jeffs, considered by his followers to be their prophet, traces the history of plural marriage, discusses how marriages are arranged through revelations received by the prophet and how girls are to "keep the bars up" for all males except "the one man you are given to."

In a March 13, 1998, lesson Jeffs gave to a home economics class at Alta Academy, girls learn that wives should never seek to rule over their husbands.

"So I remind you of what the prophet said," Jeffs says. " 'It takes a man and a woman to make a man. It takes a man and many women to make a man.' And the only real way to be a woman and fulfill your calling as a woman is to be in oneness with the priesthood bearer you will become part of."

He refers to advice from LDS Church President Brigham Young and "the great Jehovah" about the need for a woman to desire only her husband and to let him rule over her.

Jeffs also makes this observation: "I remind you that Priesthood government is persuasion through love. It is not force. The father, the husband, his duty is to persuade through love. Chastening is part of love, and even that is done in kindness."

Jeffs Preliminary Hearing Today (DESERET)

By Ben Winslow, Deseret Morning News

Deseret Morning News, November 21, 2006

ST. GEORGE — A judge is expected to decide today whether there is enough evidence to make polygamist leader Warren Jeffs stand trial on charges he forced a 14-year-old girl into a marriage with a 19-year-old man who is also her first cousin.

People who live on UEP Trust land look over newly subdivided property lines after a meeting in Hildale, Utah. The young woman is expected to be the prosecution's star witness when she testifies against the Fundamentalist LDS Church leader today in 5th District Court.

In court papers obtained by the Deseret Morning News on Monday, prosecutors revealed the identity of the young woman and her purported husband. Until now, she has been identified only as "Jane Doe IV."

The Deseret Morning News does not name sexual assault victims, nor is the newspaper naming the alleged rapist because he has not been charged with a crime.

Washington County Attorney Brock Belnap said he intends to prove that Jeffs "enticed (the victim) into submitting to sexual intercourse" with the man she had just married.

"In this case, the defendant did not have sex with (the victim). However, (the victim) submitted to sex with her purported husband because of the undue influence and religious authority of the defendant," Belnap wrote in a memorandum.

Belnap said no marriage license was ever obtained for the wedding presided over by Jeffs. The quickie ceremony was conducted in secret at a Caliente, Nev., motel in 2001.

Even if she wasn't legally married, prosecutors said the victim believed she was married and had sex with her purported husband because "she believed it was her responsibility as a wife."

Jeffs, 50, is charged with two counts of rape as an accomplice, a first-degree felony. He faces up to life in prison if convicted.

Defense lawyers have fired back, asking a judge to dismiss the case against the Fundamentalist LDS Church leader. Defense attorney Walter Bugden Jr. says the state is confusing the culpability of the alleged rapist and Jeffs.

DOJ_NMG_0096674

"The state alleges that the victim did not consent to sexual intercourse with the principal and bases its allegations on the actions of the defendant (Jeffs) i.e., that he used psychological manipulation and his position as a religious leader to gain her consent," Bugden wrote in a motion to dismiss obtained by the Deseret Morning News.

Citing a series of case histories, he attacked the prosecution's claims by saying Jeffs did not "command, encourage or intentionally aid" the alleged rapist in having sex with his purported wife.

"Moreover, merely by acting as the community's religious leader, the Defendant (Jeffs) did not affirmatively act to request, command, encourage or intentionally aid the principal in enticing or coercing the alleged victim," Bugden wrote, concluding Jeffs was not an accomplice to a rape.

Washington County sheriff's deputies said security at the 5th District Courthouse today will be intense for both Jeffs and "Jane Doe IV." Outside the courthouse, the St. George Police Department plans to deploy its SWAT team.

"It's not for him," said St. George Police Sgt. Craig Harding. "It's his detractors, it's his supporters. It's who's going to try and spring him or kill him."

Police said they have received no threats on the victim or Jeffs, who continues to exercise his authority as FLDS leader from the Purgatory Jail. A law enforcement source told the Deseret Morning News that Jeffs makes phone calls from the jail to groups of followers, who sing to him, and he goes into his "prophetic utterances."

At least one edict that Jeffs has made could have a substantial impact on the people in the polygamous border towns of Hildale, Utah, and Colorado City, Ariz.

"Do not sign your name to any document for property that has already been consecrated to God," Jeffs reportedly told his followers concerning reforms to the FLDS Church's financial arm.

At a meeting in Hildale, dozens packed the tiny town hall to ask questions about the recent court-ordered reforms of the United Effort Plan Trust. The UEP controls homes, businesses and land in the towns.

Bruce Wisan, the court-appointed special fiduciary of the UEP, tried to explain how things would work under the new reforms, including the potential for private property ownership. Applications to petition the new UEP advisory board for property were handed out.

"I sincerely hope that the time will come, either through a change in leadership or a change in thinking of leadership, that the FLDS will participate in this process," he said.

So far they have not, even refusing to pay property taxes unless demand notices are posted on their doors.

Many of those attending the town hall meeting are ex-FLDS members with family still inside the polygamous sect. They also put their blood, sweat and tears into building up the community and objected to the idea of paying fees for the land.

"The property's already paid for," said one man. "Why do we have to pay if we already own it? We paid for it for 67 years."

In 2005, a judge in Salt Lake City's 3rd District Court took control of the UEP, after allegations were brought forward that Jeffs and other top FLDS leaders had been "fleecing" the trust.

Wisan said he plans to be in the courtroom today to hear the victim, "Jane Doe IV," testify against Jeffs. She has also filed a multimillion-dollar lawsuit against the UEP.

Polygamists Fight To Be Seen As Part Of Mainstream Society (WP)

By John Pomfret, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, November 21, 2006

SALT LAKE CITY -- In her battle to legalize polygamy, the only thing Valerie hasn't revealed is her last name. The mother of eight has been on national TV; her photo along with that of her two "sister-wives" has graced the front cover of a glossy magazine dedicated to "today's plural marriages."

She has been prodded about her sex life: "He rotates. It's easy -- just one, two, three." Quizzed about her decision to share a husband with two other women: "You really have a good frame of reference when you marry a man who already has two wives." Interrogated about what it's like to live in a house with 21 children: "Remodeling a kitchen, that's no small feat with three wives and a husband involved."

DOJ_NMG_0096675

All the while, the petite brunette with a smile as bright as Utah's sky has insisted that she's just like you and me: "I'm a soccer mom. My kids are in music lessons. They go to public school. I'm not under anyone's control."

Valerie and others among the estimated 40,000 men, women and children in polygamous communities are part of a new movement to decriminalize bigamy. Consciously taking tactics from the gay-rights movement, polygamists have reframed their struggle, choosing in interviews to de-emphasize their religious beliefs and focus on their desire to live "in freedom," according to Anne Wilde, director of community relations for Principle Voices, a pro-polygamy group based in Salt Lake.

In recent months, polygamy activists have held rallies, appeared on nationally televised news shows and lobbied legislators. Before the Nov. 7 elections, one pro-polygamy group issued a six-page analysis of all Utah's state and local candidates and their views on polygamy. "We can make a difference," the group told supporters.

The efforts of Valerie and scores of others like her are paying off. Utah's attorney general, Mark L. Shurtleff, no longer prosecutes bigamy between consenting adults, though it is a felony. Shurtleff and his staff have established an organization, Safety Net, to bring together at monthly meetings representatives from at least five polygamous communities and law enforcement officers. He has arranged to have representatives of polygamous groups address Utah police. And three years ago, he wrote legislation to reduce bigamy between adults from a felony to a misdemeanor, although pressure from Utah's county attorneys derailed that.

In an interview, Shurtleff, a tall man who favors roomy suits and dark green shirts, said his office now treats bigamy between consenting adults much like fornication or adultery, laws about which are still on Utah's books.

"The thinking is this: This is a big group of people. They are not going away. You can't incarcerate them all. You can't drive them out of the state. So they are here," Shurtleff said. "What do we do about it?"

In their quest to decriminalize bigamy, practitioners have had help from unlikely quarters. HBO's series "Big Love," about a Viagra-popping man with three wives, three sets of bills, three sets of chores and three sets of kids, marked a watershed because of its sympathetic portrayal of polygamists. The U.S. Supreme Court's 2003 decision in Lawrence v. Texas, which voided laws criminalizing sodomy, also aided polygamy's cause because it implied that the court disapproved of laws that reach into the bedroom.

Since then, liberal legal scholars, generally no friend of the polygamists' conservative-leaning politics, have championed decriminalization. One of them is Jonathan Turley, a law professor at George Washington University who has written two op-eds for USA Today calling for the legalization of bigamy -- and same-sex marriage.

"I find polygamy an offensive practice," said Turley, who has become something of a celebrity among polygamists in Utah. "But there is no way its practice among consenting adults should be a felony."

What Shurtleff has vowed to do in Utah, rather than enforcing the bigamy code, is go after members of polygamist groups who break other laws, especially involving children. In April, Washington County prosecutors in Utah charged Warren Jeffs, the 50-year-old head of the Fundamentalist Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, with two first-degree felony counts of rape as an accomplice on suspicion that he forced a 14-year-old girl to marry her first cousin, who was over 18. Jeffs, who was apprehended during a traffic stop in Las Vegas in August, is facing similar charges in Arizona. His next court appearance is Tuesday.

Shurtleff's office has also moved to dismantle a communal property trust owned by Jeffs's sect in Hildale, Utah, and Colorado City, Ariz. His office also is investigating the Kingston family, including seven brothers accused of incest who are thought to have fathered more than 600 children, informed sources said.

Shurtleff has secured commitments from four polygamist groups that they would abandon the practice of forcing underage girls into marriage, end the widespread practice of welfare fraud and create a more favorable environment for women in plural marriages to report domestic violence and child abuse.

"The things I am going after are crimes against children, rape and other types of abuse where there is a clear victim," he said. Shurtleff persuaded Utah's legislature to pass a specific law in 2003 on child bigamy, making it a second-degree felony punishable by one to 15 years in prison for a married adult to take as a second spouse anyone under 18.

DOJ_NMG_0096676

Polygamy has deep roots in Utah's history and in the history of the Church of the Latter-day Saints. Many mainstream Mormons once believed, and many fundamentalists still believe, that only men in plural marriages will get to heaven. But, to ensure Utah would get statehood, the Mormon Church swore off polygamy in the 1890s.

Even so, polygamous communities continued to exist through the American West and in Canada and Mexico. And in recent years, authorities in the state adopted a "don't ask, don't tell" stance, Shurtleff said.

One reason was that the politically powerful Mormon Church, while officially opposing polygamy, did not want the bad press strict enforcement might bring. Another reason was that law enforcement was worried that isolated polygamist communities would erupt in violence if raided. An internal memo at the Arizona attorney general's office in 2002 spoke of a "Waco-level problem" among the polygamous communities along the Utah state line.

Shurtleff said he decided to confront polygamy's darker side and leave the more mainstream communities alone. In 2001, one of Utah's best-known polygamists, Tom Green, was prosecuted for and convicted of child rape for having sex with his first wife when she was 13.

"That's what really started my focus on this," Shurtleff said. "We can't really allow crimes to be committed against children in the name of religion."

Some polygamists said they welcome Shurtleff's prosecutions.

"Jeffs needed to be stopped," said Bonnie, a 20-something in a polygamist marriage who, like Valerie, declined to give her last name. (She said she has lost three jobs because of her polygamous background.) "I am glad they are prosecuting him."

Bonnie, along with her husband, Nat, and his first wife and their three children, are members of the Apostolic United Brethren, which says it has 7,500 members across the West and in Mexico. Bonnie's family lives in a suburban subdivision containing about 50 houses -- all inhabited by members of the sect. Bonnie's family has been polygamous since the 1860s. Nat was raised in a monogamous household but converted to Mormonism and decided to become a fundamentalist and a polygamist.

Bonnie said that what attracted her to polygamy was the chance it gave her to bond with women as well as with her husband.

"I always had an inner feeling that I'd be a plural wife," she said. "I was very excited to join his family. I had a really good feeling with his first wife."

Nat said he needed to be convinced. Far from the stereotype of the patriarch, he appears bookish and perhaps a tad meek. "Usually the women tend to be the biggest advocates of this way of life and men enter it more timidly," he said. "If you are going to do it right, it's a huge responsibility."

Motel Room Was Often Site Of Polygamist Rites (AP)

By Jennifer Dobner, The Associated Press

AP, November 21, 2006

CALIENTE, Nev. — Room 15 at the Caliente Hot Springs Motel seems like an unlikely place for a wedding. There are no flower-covered arbors, pews or candles. It is an apartment-style room with a kitchenette, a bed, a dresser, a table and a couch.

But it was in Room 15 that dozens of weddings took place between underage girls and men from a polygamist sect, church insiders say.

The sect's charismatic leader, Warren Jeffs, has been charged with rape as an accomplice for his alleged role in arranging one of those marriages — that of a 14-year-old girl who says she was forced to wed her older first cousin in 2001.

Jeffs, the 50-year-old leader of the Fundamentalist Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, will be in a Utah court today for a hearing on whether prosecutors have enough evidence to try him. If he is tried and convicted, the man whom about 10,000 followers revere as a prophet could spend the rest of his life in prison.

Jeffs was captured in a traffic stop outside Las Vegas in August after nearly two years on the run. He was one of the nation's 10 most wanted fugitives.

DOJ_NMG_0096677

According to authorities, the bride, identified in court papers as Jane Doe No. 4, stood dressed in white in Room 15 and said, "I do," sealing the marriage with a secret handshake. Prosecutors say the marriage was then consummated in Hildale, Utah, where members of the sect live.

The girl told Jeffs she didn't want to marry and later begged to be released from the union, saying she did not like marital relations, authorities said. But Jeffs said the marriage was her religious duty and threatened her with the loss of salvation, according to authorities.

The FLDS claims to be a fundamentalist offshoot of the Mormon church. But the Mormons disavow any connection and renounced polygamy more than a century ago.

Jeffs' attorneys have not responded to requests for interviews. But at a hearing in September, attorney Walter Bugden said Jeffs believes he is being persecuted for his religious beliefs.

Carolyn Jessop, a former sect member who used to run the motel, said that once or twice a month, beginning in the spring of 1999, she would get a telephone call telling her to plan for a weekend of weddings. Some insiders say as many as 10 such weddings were held in a single day.

The drive to Caliente from Hildale is 160 miles, most of it on a two-lane road through the mountains and across the desert.

But sect leaders believed Caliente was a safe place — "a way to go under the radar screen" — because Utah and Arizona were passing legislation to address underage marriage and threatening prosecution, Jessop said.

Many sect members live in Hildale or in neighboring Colorado City, Ariz.

Many DNA Matches Aren't Acted On (USAT)

By Richard Willing

USA Today, November 21, 2006

In a March 2003 speech arguing for $1 billion in new spending on DNA-based crime fighting, then-attorney general John Ashcroft singled out the FBI's DNA database for its many successes.

In Virginia, for example, he said authorities “have been able to solve 90 homicides and 196 non-homicide sexual assaults” by matching the DNA left at crime scenes to the DNA of prior offenders.

What Ashcroft didn't explain was that a DNA match — a crime “solved” by the FBI's database — does not mean that an arrest was made, that a criminal was prosecuted or even that detectives considered a case closed. Just how many DNA matches lead to an arrest isn't known; no government agency keeps track.

But a USA TODAY investigation found almost three dozen cases during the past five years — including a rape in Virginia — in which investigators failed to pursue potential suspects whose DNA matched evidence found at crime scenes.

DNA matches that could have closed cases weren't pursued because of basic police foul-ups, such as overlooking a telephone message reporting the match. Backlogs of unsolved “cold cases” that threaten to overwhelm some big-city police departments caused matches to be ignored, the newspaper found. In some jurisdictions — Richmond, Va., Cincinnati, and DeKalb County, Ga. — police offered no explanations for why matches were not pursued.

The suspects in two such cases, one a rape and the other the attempted sexual assault of a child, were later charged with committing subsequent sex crimes that might have been prevented had the first DNA match been pursued.

In one of those cases, William Orlando Smith followed a 13-year-old girl home from a convenience store, dragged her into a wooded area beside a middle school and raped her — months after Virginia authorities matched Smith's DNA to a previously unsolved rape, and Richmond police failed to take action. Had the first match been pursued in 2002, Smith might have been in jail in October 2003 and unable to commit the second rape.

Smith was caught and convicted for raping the 13-year-old — by a DNA database match that police in Chesterfield County, Va., immediately pursued.

The FBI calls the DNA database CODIS, for Combined DNA Index System. It has cost the government hundreds of millions of dollars to build and has proved adept at making matches in “cold cases” in which police had no leads and little hope of finding a suspect. Its dozens of successes include clearing innocent suspects, bringing rapists to justice 30 years after their offenses, and linking burglars to murders, rapes and other violent crimes in which they never were suspects.

DOJ_NMG_0096678

USA TODAY reviewed hundreds of pages of court documents and local media reports and interviewed police, prosecutors, defense attorneys and lab officials to look for cases in which matches were made but police departments were slow to react.

Among the cases the newspaper found:

•In Oakland, Calif., in June 2004, the DNA of convicted child molester Kalonji Lee matched DNA from an attempted sexual assault of a 10-year-old Oakland girl the previous January. Police did not contact Lee until after he had molested another Oakland 10-year-old in December 2004, deputy chief Howard Jordan confirms. Lee was caught for the second assault after the victim's parents spotted his picture on California's "Megan's Law" website and alerted detectives.

•In September 2004, the DNA of career felon Gary Box matched DNA left at a December 2001 rape and abduction that Cincinnati police had been unable to solve. At the time of the match, Box was serving a prison sentence for assault. But police did not contact him until May 2005, after he had been released from prison and had returned to Cincinnati. Court files show that police acted after being alerted by Box's victim, who encountered him by chance while walking in a local park.

•In Georgia in March 2003, the DNA of convicted burglar and sex offender Floyd "Tony" Arnold matched DNA left at separate rapes in Fulton and DeKalb Counties. The rapes had taken place in 1993 and 1995. But neither Fulton nor DeKalb authorities contacted Arnold, according to both police departments, even though at the time of the matches he was in Georgia's prison system serving a five-year sentence for cruelty to children. The unpursued matches came to light last December, when Arnold was matched through a third DNA hit to a 1981 Cobb County rape for which another man had been wrongly convicted. That man, Robert Clark, Jr., had served almost 24 years in prison.

•In 2002, the Oregon state police crime lab used DNA to match 26 men to unsolved Portland burglaries. The names were reported to Portland police, department spokesman Detective Paul Dolbey acknowledges. None was followed until one of the 26 suspects was matched again to an additional burglary, and lab technicians pointed out the earlier matches.

The unpursued matches had this in common: All were recorded as "hits" by the CODIS system and added to the list of CODIS-aided investigations that the FBI makes public. Through September, the FBI counted 39,291 such matches since 1990.

No one is certain how many of those matches resulted in arrests or convictions, however.

In part that's because no law or regulation requires crime labs, the FBI or local law enforcement to follow through and determine what becomes of DNA matches after the CODIS system reports them to police.

Crime lab officials believe hundreds more matches have not been pursued by authorities. They say those matches might become evident only after a perpetrator is caught for a second crime.

"How many (CODIS matches) don't get pursued and we never find out about it? That's the part of the iceberg that's under water," says Roger Kahn, forensic biologist for the Harris County, Texas, medical examiner's office, and a former president of the American Society of Crime Laboratory Directors. "I've got to believe it's a pretty big iceberg."

Early on, the developers of CODIS realized that requiring labs to monitor what police do with the matches would be burdensome. The International Association of Chiefs of Police estimates that there are about 18,000 different local, state and federal law enforcement agencies in the U.S.

"That would have meant tracking information through hundreds of different local authorities and judicial systems, some of which might take years to resolve a case (based on a DNA match)," says John Hicks, director of the FBI's laboratory division when CODIS was developed in the early 1990s. "It didn't seem feasible."

Instead, the bureau decided to measure success by "investigations aided." These include cases in which DNA from a crime scene matches a potential suspect, as well as cases in which DNA matches one unsolved crime to another. Lab technicians, not detectives, determine whether a match has "aided" an investigation.

The FBI says it is unfair to hold CODIS accountable for what happens to the "investigative leads" after they are furnished to investigators.

Labs that make CODIS matches send written reports and sometimes follow up with telephone calls and e-mails.

CODIS "was not designed … to answer" whether matches actually solve crimes through arrests and prosecutions, says Thomas Callaghan, the leader of the FBI's CODIS unit. "What we can do is provide information to investigators that can lead to an arrest or a prosecution."

DOJ_NMG_0096679

Today, 16 years after CODIS began as a pilot project in the FBI laboratory, the lack of data on how many matches are pursued makes assessing the system impossible.

CODIS "is a black box," says Frederick Bieber, a geneticist at Brigham and Women's Hospital in Boston who wrote about unpursued DNA matches in The Journal of Law, Medicine and Ethics this year. "You can talk about DNA matches all you want, but the reality is no one really knows what's out there."

That uncertainty, however, hasn't stopped public officials from boasting of its successes or securing millions of taxpayer dollars to grow the system.

The original mission statement for CODIS, still carried on the FBI's website, describes it as "an effective tool for solving violent crime." CODIS' "underlying concept," then-FBI lab director Dwight Adams told a U.S. Senate hearing in May 2002, was to "solve crimes for which there are no suspects."

CODIS prospered. Both the Clinton administration in the 1990s and the Bush administration in this decade backed federal grants that expanded lab capacity, DNA research and testing designed to expand the number of offenders, and unsolved cases whose DNA profiles are included in CODIS.

Since fiscal year 2000, the Justice Department has made about $286 million in grants that have directly or indirectly benefited the system. Bieber, the Boston geneticist who has studied unpursued matches, estimates that state and federal governments have spent at least $1 billion building the system.

And CODIS has grown. In October 1998, when the FBI ended its pilot project and made CODIS a permanent program, the system held DNA profiles of about 1 million convicted offenders, according to bureau records. The database now includes more than 3.6 million samples, most added in the past five years. The number of "investigations aided" is growing with the database. In March 2001, CODIS had made about 2,200 such matches. The number doubled in the next year, quadrupled by April 2004, and has more than doubled again since then, to 39,291 such matches.

When pursued, such matches are "overwhelming, flabbergasting," says David Scoville, a Canandaigua, N.Y., man whose 28-year-old daughter Patty was raped and murdered on a Stowe, Vt., bike path in October 1991. More than 13 years later, a DNA profile from the crime scene matched Howard Godfrey, a 58-year-old Vermont man who had been forced to give a DNA sample after being convicted of assault. Godfrey is awaiting trial for the Scoville murder.

"Finding the man the authorities believe was Patty's killer was a huge relief," Scoville says. "Whether that makes it worth all the millions of dollars (spent building CODIS), I don't know. But it was to us."

Why do investigators fail to pursue a DNA match? In some cases, ineptitude is to blame.

In Fulton County, Ga., officers failed to retrieve a telephone message from the CODIS lab reporting the match that might have led to the arrest of sex offender Arnold, says Lyn Vaughn, spokeswoman for prosecutor Paul Howard, who investigated the foul-up. Ted Staples, DNA section chief at the Georgia Bureau of Investigation crime lab, says a written report also was sent but that no action was taken.

In Oakland, an overworked cold case investigator received the information that child molester Lee had been matched to an attempted sex assault but failed to give it priority, says Jordan, the deputy chief.

"He had over 100 cases (to work on), but that's not an excuse," Jordan says. "We dropped the ball."

In other instances, police were not prepared to handle the wealth of leads that CODIS sometimes supplies.

In Portland, Ore., police had no system for accounting for or tracking unsolved property crimes cases that were suddenly revived by DNA matches. Reports describing DNA matches in two dozen burglary cases simply "sat on a sergeant's desk," Dolbey says.

There also is evidence, however, that CODIS is making some matches that investigators can't use.

In Richmond this year, a police department review of its first 500 CODIS cases found more than a dozen instances in which crime scene evidence was matched to a person who was clearly not a suspect, such as the owner of a home that was robbed.

Last year, an internal study by the Virginia state crime lab found that 424 of the state's first 3,000 DNA matches were not prosecuted because victims could not be found or were reluctant to testify or the evidence submitted for testing did not solve the crime. An example: a cigarette butt from a stolen car that matched the car's owner.

Other DNA matches were not pursued because the time limit for filing prosecutions had expired.

DOJ_NMG_0096680

In Oakland, in at least 20% of the rape cases in which CODIS has identified a potential suspect, the victim had previously told police that she would not press charges, says Rockne Harmon, an assistant prosecutor who specializes in DNA cases.

The evidence was analyzed anyway, Harmon says, because crime labs received state and federal funding that paid for the analysis. Police and prosecutors were not consulted, Harmon says.

"All the money (to build CODIS) has gone to the lab side," Harmon says. "Nobody ever asked the cops what they wanted or how (CODIS matches) would affect what they do."

Unpursued matches, he says, are a "shame" but not a "surprise."

What can be done to improve accountability? Callaghan, the FBI's CODIS leader, says that tracking the results of DNA matches would present a "significant task" that the FBI is not geared to undertake. He says that accounting for CODIS matches should be the responsibility of local police and prosecutors who are given match information.

Some are taking action. In Portland, Fulton County, Ga., and Oakland, Calif., all jurisdictions in which authorities overlooked DNA matches, police have begun tracking CODIS leads that were reported to detectives.

In Georgia last December, state crime lab officials sent reminders to every police chief and prosecutor whose jurisdiction had received a match report since Georgia's first CODIS hit, in 1995. Previously, CODIS matches had been reported only to detectives.

But absent a law or other requirement, it is uncertain that many other departments will follow their example.

In 2005, Virginia CODIS officials found more than a dozen instances in which local detectives and prosecutors had lost track of DNA matches that had been reported to their departments.

This year, the California District Attorneys Association asked its members to account for all of the state's 1,509 DNA matches by searching police records and court files. Through August, fewer than half had been located.

In other nations with DNA databases, accountability isn't optional.

In the United Kingdom, which has had a national database since 1995, police are required to tell the Home Office whether matches actually prove useful to resolving cases.

From 1999 through 2005, about 43% of the U.K.'s matches were relevant to criminal investigations.

Beginning in November 2006, police in Canada will be required to report DNA match outcomes. The Canadian database runs on CODIS software donated by the FBI.

Some state CODIS officials think the laboratories themselves should take the lead in following up DNA matches.

Without better data on whether the matches really solve crimes, CODIS funding is vulnerable to cost cutting, says Michael Bourke, CODIS administrator in Connecticut's state police crime lab.

"At some point, the federal government is going to want some measure other than raw hits of what the real societal impact is," Bourke says.

Because of prodding by Bourke and other officials, the Connecticut chief state's attorney's office is attempting to account for 335 CODIS matches the state has made, dating back to 1995.

A report is expected before the end of the year.

In New Orleans, Rust In The Wheels Of Justice (NYT)

By Christopher Drew

The New York Times, November 21, 2006

NEW ORLEANS — Seventeen months ago, when Edward Augustine was arrested with what the police said were marijuana and crack cocaine in his pocket and a handgun in his waistband, he seemed like just another run-of-the-mill drug suspect: easy to prosecute, easy to lock up.

But two months later, the floodwaters rushed through the labyrinth of evidence rooms in the courthouse basement here, scattering tens of thousands of items and leaving a fetid mess. When Mr. Augustine finally came to trial in October, the authorities could no longer find the three things they needed most: the small bag of marijuana, the rocks of crack and the gun. The judge threw out the case, and Mr. Augustine walked free.

DOJ_NMG_0096681

As the judge, Lynda Van Davis, put it, Mr. Augustine, 18, had lucked out. But he is not the only lucky defendant in New Orleans. As the city's criminal justice system slowly gears back up after Hurricane Katrina, as many as 500 defendants, mostly in drug, theft and assault cases, have been freed because of problems with evidence, including difficulty in finding the witnesses who have moved away.

Law-enforcement officials say a few of those who were freed could potentially be violent, a cause for concern in a city battling a surge in drug-related killings. And some judges say that missing witnesses and damaged evidence, like spoiled DNA samples and rusted guns, will almost certainly lead to more acquittals, even in cases of murder, rape and armed robbery.

"It's amazing that for every case I've walked into lately, there's evidence missing," said Rick Tessier, a defense lawyer.

Several judges have jettisoned cases like Mr. Augustine's over the last few weeks. And in acquitting him, Judge Van Davis chastised prosecutors for going ahead without the drugs or the gun.

"This is ridiculous, absolutely ridiculous," she said from the bench.

But the district attorney, Eddie Jordan, responded in an interview, "We can't just tuck our tails between our legs and run just because it's difficult."

Mr. Jordan said that under state law, testimony from the arresting officer, and a laboratory report that confirmed Mr. Augustine had possessed illegal drugs, should have been enough to convict him. He added that although the evidence problems might seem to be "an Achilles' heel," he did not think "that the overwhelming problems that some of the critics have speculated about have materialized."

While 800 suspects have pleaded guilty to various crimes since the New Orleans courts reopened in June, only about 90 trials have been held, about a third the normal number. More than 2,000 people arrested before Hurricane Katrina are still waiting for their cases to be heard, and at least 400 of them remain in jail. And 1,500 cases have been temporarily set aside because the defendants, who were out on bond, apparently evacuated and never returned.

Court officials say other delays have come from a shortage of jurors and from limits on how many inmates can be brought to court each day. And the public defender's office is so overwhelmed that it is recruiting law students from across the country to conduct interviews with long-neglected clients who cannot afford a lawyer.

But a growing source of delays and acquittals has been the lack of witnesses and evidence.

After Hurricane Katrina hit in August 2005, the evidence rooms at the Orleans Parish Criminal District Court sat in chest-high water for two and a half weeks. Only recently have court officials begun to realize the extent of the evidence problems within the old Beaux-Arts courthouse, which was closed for nine months and is still not quite back to full operations.

Warren E. Spears, the clerk in charge of the evidence rooms, said in an interview that before the storm only about 10 percent of the hundreds of thousands of items had been sealed in plastic bags. The rest were in paper bags and scrap boxes holding clothes, guns and drugs, some of which disintegrated in the swirling waters, Mr. Spears said, dumping their contents into heaps on the floor.

Clothing from murder and assault cases took "a brutal beating," Mr. Spears said. Photo lineup cards used to identify suspects stuck together and could not be separated. Stacks of assault weapons turned to rust, he said, and holes had to be punched in duffel bags filled with rotting marijuana to let the water out.

The court hired a cleanup contractor to gather the evidence, clean off the mold and place it in plastic bags and fresh boxes. Court officials have estimated that 8 percent to 10 percent of the evidence was a total loss.

Mr. Spears added that a number of the workers spoke little English, and that he could only gesture to them as they guessed which items should be packaged together.

Water also seeped into safes, he said, rotting a great deal of paper money that had to be freeze-dried to remove the moisture.

At separate police evidence rooms nearby, some DNA samples for rape and murder cases were held for months without refrigeration, possibly ruining their usefulness, other officials said.

Given shortages in staffing, the condition of the evidence comes to light only as each case approaches trial.

The problems are starting to make life easier for the city's defense lawyers.

DOJ_NMG_0096682

Pamela R. Metzger, a member of a state board that oversees the public defender's office, said she had learned about the evidence problems after asking Mr. Spears about a suspected crack pipe that was missing in one of her cases. Ms. Metzger, who is also a law professor at Tulane University, said she was urging the public defense lawyers, who handle the vast majority of the court's cases, to raise more challenges about the condition of the evidence and how it had been handled.

"I think you'll see more and more and more of that," she said.

Mr. Jordan, the district attorney, said his office had taken the lead in dismissing 400 to 500 cases recently, mainly because crucial witnesses, like the victims or the arresting officers, had moved away.

"Many of my prosecutors had held on to those cases until the last minute in hopes that we'd be able to go to trial," he said. "But I thought that if we had not been able to contact the victim since before the storm, then it was unlikely we'd be able to reach them now."

Mr. Jordan also said his office had won about 60 percent of the roughly 90 trials since the courts reopened. While several judges have been tough, others recently convicted suspects on cocaine and burglary charges even though the physical evidence had been lost, he said.

Of one recent jury case, he said: "We weren't certain we had the same gun from the crime scene. But we were able to find a gun that fit the description. And we found a photo of the original gun, and the jury found the defendant guilty as charged."

Still, Mr. Jordan said he had recently hired a former federal prosecutor to assess the strength of the 2,000 pre-hurricane cases to see how many more should be dropped.

Mr. Tessier, the private defense lawyer, said he had recently taken on a widely publicized murder case in which his client and another man were charged with stabbing a Tulane student in 2002.

The lawyer said the files had indicated that an important piece of evidence was a shirt stained with a drop of his client's blood. But Mr. Tessier said that neither Mr. Spears nor the New Orleans Police Department, which is temporarily storing evidence in rental trucks, had been able to find the shirt.

Katherine Mattes, another Tulane law professor, said the lost or damaged evidence could also make it harder for innocent people to shake off charges filed against them. She said, for instance, that a rusted gun might no longer fire, making it impossible to conduct new ballistic tests that might show it could not have been used in a murder.

"What people say when you describe all the evidence problems is how terrible it will be if we have people who committed crimes and can't be prosecuted," she said. "But it also can work the other way."

A Good Chief Goes (WP)

The Washington Post, November 21, 2006

NEWS THAT Mayor-elect Adrian M. Fenty has decided to turn to someone else to head the D.C. police department comes as no surprise. For some time, Mr. Fenty and D.C. Police Chief Charles H. Ramsey have not seen eye to eye on the department's performance, a fact that Mr. Fenty never kept secret. Under the circumstances, and given the incoming mayor's determination to be hands-on with the police force and other city agencies, it probably is best that he have a person of his choice leading the department when the Fenty administration gets started on Jan. 2.

The departure of Chief Ramsey is, however, a development that many District residents and this page receive with regret. The D.C. police force that the chief bequeaths to his successor is in far better shape than the one Mr. Ramsey inherited upon his arrival in Washington eight years ago. The credit goes to him. As the longest-serving police chief since the start of home rule three decades ago, Chief Ramsey, the record will show, made the best use of his time. In every major category of offense -- homicides, rapes, robberies, aggravated assaults, burglaries, larcenies and vehicle thefts -- rates are down. He took a department that was loosely run and staffed with poorly trained, quick-triggered officers and converted it into a better managed and more disciplined force. From scout cars to technology, police officers now do their jobs with 21st-century resources.

There have been bumps along the way, serious missteps that cost the city dearly. The September 2002 Pershing Park incident, in which large numbers of protesters were improperly arrested and detained, stained the reputation of a department renowned for its handling of mass demonstrations in the nation's capital. It also cost the city thousands of dollars to settle lawsuits. Chief Ramsey accepted responsibility for the misbehavior, as he should have, and apologized to the city.

DOJ_NMG_0096683

Mr. Fenty, in deciding to appoint police Cmdr. Cathy L. Lanier as the next chief, has drawn from within the ranks of the department. It is reassuring that Chief Ramsey spoke well of Ms. Lanier's appointment and that she also has the background and qualifications that Mr. Fenty seeks in a chief. They apparently agree on community policing, and she appears to be in sync with his leadership style. It will soon fall to the new leadership in the John A. Wilson Building and in police headquarters to maintain and expand on the advances achieved by Chief Ramsey. As for the departing chief, any police jurisdiction in the country would be fortunate to have him.

CIVIL LAW:

Lawyers Argue Validity Of '98 Online Law (AP-Y)

By Maryclaire Dale, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 21, 2006

Justice Department attorneys, defending a law aimed at keeping online pornography from minors, argued that software filters often block valid sites — on gay rights or sexual health, for example — that teens might seek out.

"Filters are hindering minors from learning about the world around them. That's a huge problem," government lawyer Joel McElvain said Monday. "There may be reasons the teenagers have problems speaking to their parents about these (issues)."

Under the 1998 Child Online Protection Act, commercial Web publishers who fail to keep material "harmful to minors" away from children could face fines and even prison time. The law has never taken effect, because of a long-running legal challenge filed by Salon.com, the Philadelphia Gay News and other groups represented by the American Civil Liberties Union.

Closing arguments concluded Monday before Senior U.S. District Judge Lowell Reed Jr., ending four weeks of testimony.

Justice attorneys evoked problems with the software filters even as they had defended their use in a 2000 law requiring schools and libraries to block porn if they receive certain federal funds. The high court upheld that law in 2003.

Opponents say the 1998 law is overly vague and would have a chilling effect on their work. They also say it would not apply to foreign Web operators or streaming video and audio. The ACLU argues that filters are more effective than legislation, because they let parents set limits based on their own values and their children's ages.

"If you're a parent who doesn't want sexually explicit material slipping through, then set it (the filter) strictly," ACLU lawyer Chris Hansen told the judge Monday.

The U.S. Supreme Court, indicating the government was unlikely to prevail, granted the ACLU a temporary injunction in 2004.

Technology experts not involved in the case have noted that many parents now have more pressing concerns about their children's use of the Internet, such as online predators and the popularity of social-networking sites.

The Justice Department raised eyebrows as it prepared for trial when it demanded reams of privately held information from Google Inc., Yahoo Inc. (Nasdaq:YHOO - news) and other Internet companies for a study on the prevalence of online pornography.

Google fought a subpoena to turn over 1 million sample queries and 1 million Web addresses in its database, citing trade secrets. A judge sharply limited the scope of the subpoena.

The resulting study, conducted by a University of California, Berkeley statistics professor, concluded that about 1 percent of Web sites indexed by Google and Microsoft Corp. are sexually explicit and that about 6 percent of searches yield at least one explicit Web site.

Hansen said filters can be as much as 98 percent effective in blocking explicit material, even if the most stringent filters also "overblock" a large number of acceptable sites.

Congress first tried to regulate online pornography in 1996 with a law that was largely struck down by the Supreme Court the following year.

The 1998 law narrows the restrictions to commercial Web sites and defines objectionable material as obscene or that which offends "contemporary community standards."

DOJ_NMG_0096684

The law, signed by then-President Clinton, requires Web site operators to prevent youngsters from seeing material harmful to children by demanding proof of age — such as a credit card number — from computer users. It would impose a $50,000 fine and six-month prison term on commercial Web site operators that allow minors to view such content.

Closing Arguments In Internet-porn Trial (PHI)

By Joseph A. Gambardello

The Philadelphia Inquirer, November 21, 2006

A never enforced federal law aimed at protecting children from Internet porn is vague, threatens free speech, and will not achieve its intended goal, opponents of the measure argued today.

But the federal government countered that the Children's Online Protection Act, known as COPA, is needed because Internet filters are not foolproof and parents cannot be expected to supervise their children's Web surfing at all times.

U.S. District Judge Lowell A. Reed Jr. heard those opposing positions as both sides made closing arguments at the end of a four-week trial in Philadelphia that had been ordered by the U.S. Supreme Court to determine whether technology developed since Congress passed COPA in 1998, such as commercially available filtering, offered effective ways to protect children.

The law would authorize jail time and heavy fines for online porn merchants who do not require adult-access codes, personal identification, or credit cards to access their Web sites.

Plaintiffs, including the American Civil Liberties Union and a group of Internet artists, merchants and magazines, maintain that having parents use Internet filters and personal control and educate children on Internet usage is the least restrictive way to protect youngsters from porn and ensure the free flow of speech online.

The government pointed to credit cards and emerging online identification services as ways to ensure that only adults - those 17 or older - are accessing Internet porn.

In his arguments today, the ACLU's Christopher Hansen said the law was confusing on what would be considered harmful to a child and that it limits enforcement to sites using the hypertext transfer protocol, or http, just one of the applications through which information is transmitted on the Internet.

Half the Internet's porn sites also are based outside the United States and therefore out of the law's reach, Hansen said.

He asked why the federal government was not enforcing existing obscenity laws, noting that the Justice Department had prosecuted "fewer than 30 cases in the last six years."

Joel McElvain, a government lawyer, countered that sexually explicit material for adults that does not violate obscenity laws would be considered harmful to children under COPA.

Another government lawyer, Tamara Ulrich, said it was "disingenuous" for Hansen to argue that the law singled out "http" sites because the ACLU had succeeded in overturning an earlier law that also targeted pornography in e-mails and chat rooms.

Both sides disagreed on who would be affected by COPA. Hansen said the plaintiffs would suffer if they had to set up age-verification systems, but the government lawyers said the law was aimed at "commercial pornography" - not sites such as those operated by the plaintiffs, which offer a range of content, including commentary, art, news and sexual advice.

And although Hansen said the case was not a question of COPA vs. filters, arguments from both sides focused on their effectiveness in blocking porn.

The government also argued that although filters can let some porn in, they can block so-called clean sites.

Reed gave both sides until Dec. 7 for final submissions.

Smokers Sue Tobacco Company For Lung Scans (LAW)

By Peter Geier, The National Law Journal

National Law Journal, November 21, 2006

A group of long-term Marlboro smokers has filed an action in federal court in New York to force Marlboro maker Philip Morris USA Inc. to give them regular low-dose CT scans to catch possible early signs of lung cancer.

The action is unusual because it seeks only medical screenings for people whose smoking habit has put them at increased risk of lung cancer, said plaintiffs attorney Jerome H. Block of Levy Phillips & Konigsberg in New York.

DOJ_NMG_0096685

"The sole relief we are seeking is that Philip Morris pay for a program of CT scans," Block said. The scans should be annual, or "more frequent if something looks suspicious." He noted that a recent article in the New England Journal of Medicine suggests that such a program would increase dramatically one's chances of surviving lung cancer.

Block represents Marcia L. Caronia and four other named plaintiffs on behalf of a class of New York residents 50 years of age or older who have smoked Marlboro-brand cigarettes for at least 20 "pack years" -- an average of a pack a day for 20 years. Caronia v. Philip Morris USA Inc., No. 06-224 (E.D.N.Y.).

Generally speaking, early diagnoses of lung cancer now occur by happenstance, when doctors administering CT scans to patients with pneumonia or a broken rib, for instance, discover lesions and nodules that could be lung cancer, he said.

"CT scans for people who might have cancer typically are not covered by medical insurance," Block said. "This is for all those people out there who don't have this covered and are at increased risk of lung cancer. It's a huge issue from a public health point of view."

VIABLE LEGAL THEORY?

Block said that this action stands a good chance of survival because the class is confined to long-term smokers of a brand of Philip Morris products. But lawsuits in the past seeking medical monitoring for smokers have not succeeded.

William S. Ohlemeyer, vice president and associate general counsel of Altria Group Inc., Philip Morris' parent company, said, "Nobody is opposed to medical monitoring as a public health tool. The question is whether this is a viable legal theory that can be pursued in a lawsuit."

Although plaintiffs counsel have coined "creative and innovative theories" in this instance, "most states don't recognize medical monitoring as a remedy or cause of action. ... We expect the case to be dismissed," Ohlemeyer said.

Smokers' medical-monitoring class actions have been rejected by the majority of trial and appellate courts since the first one was filed in New Orleans federal court in 1994, according to Altria spokesman John Sorrells.

The 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals decertified a class seeking medical monitoring over variations in state law and the particulars of how a case would be tried against numerous tobacco defendants. Castano v. American Tobacco Co., 84 F.3d 734 (5th Cir. 1996).

Juries returned defense verdicts on medical-monitoring claims in the only two cases that made it to trial. Blankenship v. Brown & Williamson (In re Tobacco Litigation), No. 02-31157 (W.Va. 2004), and Scott v. The American Tobacco Co. Inc., No. 96-8461 (Orleans Parish, La., Dist. Ct.). An appeal argued last April is pending before the Louisiana 4th Circuit Court of Appeal.

Billion-Dollar BofA Ruling Struck Down (LAW)

By Justin Scheck, The Recorder

California Recorder, November 21, 2006

Earlier this year, talk about the big class action against Bank of America was all about money -- the billion dollars or so in statutory damages, the $284 million in compensatory damages, and of course the correspondingly large contingency fee due the plaintiffs lawyers.

That all changed Monday when California's 1st District Court of Appeal struck down a trial court's ruling that the bank may not withdraw Social Security funds from customer accounts to pay for overdrafts and overdraft penalties.

In a trial presided over by San Francisco Superior Court Judge Anne Bouliane, plaintiffs lawyers James Sturdevant and Thomas Brandi had successfully argued that Bank of America's practice of debiting government benefit fees was illegal.

Central to their arguments -- and to Bouliane's jury instructions -- was a 1974 case that said a bank couldn't take public benefit money out of an account to cover a credit card debt. They said the case, Kruger v. Wells Fargo Bank, 11 Cal 3d 352, presented an analogous situation to that of lead plaintiff Paul Miller.

In 1998, after Miller had spent money that Bank of America mistakenly credited to his account, the bank withdrew money from Social Security benefits to cover the overdraft.

While the bank eventually returned the money, it repeated the pattern on two other occasions. Miller eventually sued, arguing that government-directed deposits shouldn't be subject to such seizures.

In a unanimous, 14-page opinion Monday, Justice Peter Siggins disagreed with verve.

DOJ_NMG_0096686

Siggins -- joined by Justices Joanne Parrilli and William McGuiness -- said the verdict in the case was based entirely on Kruger, an opinion that prohibits using government benefits to pay debts from a separate account. In Miller, he wrote, the issue was different because overdraft fees had to do with balancing a single account.

"This is a complex and heavily regulated area more suited to legislative than judicial action, so we conclude the trial court erred by finding Kruger governs this significantly different situation," Siggins wrote.

"I think the court absolutely got it wrong," Sturdevant said. He said Kruger clearly applies to overdraft fees, since they are treated as debts, and dismissed the notion that handling the fees was a legislative issue, since the Kruger court had no qualms about ruling on the matter.

Sturdevant also chafed at Siggins' reference to a defense expert's trial testimony on the consequences a plaintiff verdict would have for the banking industry.

"It's improper fact-finding," he said. "That's the province of the trial judge, not the province of the Court of Appeal."

Walter Dellinger, the O'Melveny & Myers partner who argued the appeal for Bank of America, couldn't be reached before press time. But judging by Sturdevant's plans, it seems likely that he'll have a chance to speak about the case in the future.

"The Supreme Court is the place where this case ultimately has to be decided, because Kruger is the basis of decision for both the trial court and the Court of Appeal," Sturdevant said.

Court Rules On Internet Defamation Liability (LAT)

By Maura Dolan

The Los Angeles Times, November 21, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO -- Internet users and providers cannot be held liable for posting defamatory material written by someone else, the California Supreme Court ruled unanimously Monday.

"The prospect of blanket immunity for those who intentionally redistribute defamatory statements on the Internet has disturbing implications," Justice Carol Corrigan wrote for the court. Immunity "serves to protect online freedom of expression and to encourage self-regulation."

Monday's decision was consistent with holdings by many federal appeals courts and one other state supreme court.

"The courts are now uniform," said Ann Brick, who represented the American Civil Liberties Union of Northern California in the case.

But attorneys on both sides of the case said the California Supreme Court went further than other courts by giving immunity to all Internet users except the original author.

"What you couldn't put in your print newspaper, you can put in your Internet newspaper, " said Christopher E. Grell, who represented two doctors who said they were defamed. "The notion of fact checking and verifying things doesn't apply to the Internet."

Mark Goldowitz, the lawyer for the defendant, cited a line in the ruling that the decision brought "the law of libel from the Gutenberg era to the cyberspace era."

Unlike hard-copy publications, the Internet allows users to "immediately respond and correct any harm," Goldowitz said. "Not everyone has a printing press, but everyone can start a blog or post on a news group."

Although the court did not specifically address media Web sites, lawyers on both sides said it would protect newspapers and other media that report defamatory remarks by third parties on their Web sites but not on their pages or on air.

The decision overturned a 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ruling and threw out a lawsuit that claimed Ilena Rosenthal, a San Diego activist for breast implant victims, defamed Dr. Stephen J. Barrett and Dr. Terry Polevoy on the Web sites of two news groups.

Barrett and Polevoy operated Web sites aimed at exposing health fraud in various kinds of alternative medicine. They said Rosenthal, a supporter of alternative medicine, made the postings even after she was told they were libelous.

Rosenthal wrote in one posting that Barrett, a retired psychiatrist in Philadelphia, was "arrogant, bizarre, closed minded; emotionally disturbed, professionally incompetent, intellectually dishonest ... a quack, a thug, a bully, a Nazi."

She similarly described Polevoy, who works in Canada, and accused him of making anti-Semitic remarks.

DOJ_NMG_0096687

An Alameda County Superior Court judge threw out the doctors' lawsuit against Rosenthal, ruling that her postings involved the public interest and for the most part contained no assertions that could be proven false.

But the court determined that one statement in an article Rosenthal received from Tim Bolen subtitled "Opinion by Tim Bolen" was problematic. The article accused Polevoy of stalking a Canadian radio producer.

The trial court decided nonetheless that Rosenthal could not be held liable because she had not written the original posting. A libel case against Bolen for first making the stalking allegation is pending. Bolen describes himself as a crisis-management consultant and health advocate.

In ruling for Rosenthal, the California Supreme Court interpreted a provision of the Communications Decency Act of 1996. Although many courts have ruled on the provision, the Rosenthal case was the first in which an Internet user with no responsibility for the site carrying the posting claimed federal immunity.

The court explained that Internet defamation law differs from that of other media.

"Book, newspaper or magazine publishers are liable for defamation on the same basis as authors," Corrigan wrote. "Book sellers, news vendors or other 'distributors' ... may only be held liable if they knew or had reason to know of a publication's defamatory content."

Congress "chose to protect even the most active Internet publishers, those who take an aggressive role in republishing third party content," she wrote.

She also cited practical reasons for ruling in favor of Internet freedom. If California permitted defamation suits against those who post others' work, the state could be inundated with lawsuits.

"Adopting a rule of liability ... would be an open invitation to forum shopping by defamation plaintiffs," Corrigan wrote.

She said the threat of liability also would reduce the flow of ideas on the Internet.

"The volume and range of Internet communications make the 'heckler's veto' a real threat," Corrigan said.

Grell, who represents the doctors, said he has not yet decided whether to appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court. Noting the court twice referred to "blanket immunity" as troubling, the lawyer said Congress should now amend the law to increase Internet accountability.

Times staff writer Chris Gaither contributed to this report.

California Court Reverses Internet Liability Case (WSJ)

By Kevin J. Delaney

The Wall Street Journal, November 21, 2006

The California Supreme Court today reversed an appeals court decision in a much-watched Internet case, ruling that individuals are generally immune from liability for transmitting over the Internet content that was authored by someone else.

Legal experts say the decision1 is in line with prior court rulings on immunity for transmitting content on line originating from someone else, who themselves may still be held liable for defamation or other claims.

The California court ruling came in the case of Stephen J. Barrett et al. v. Ilena Rosenthal. The case concerned an article Ms. Rosenthal received via email and posted on two Web newsgroups that the plaintiffs argued was defamatory.

"This opinion reinforces the broad reach of federal statutory immunization for content published by third-parties online," said Eric Goldman, Assistant Professor at Santa Clara University School of Law and Director of the school's High Technology Law Institute. "This case is significant because it shuts down all of the workarounds people have been trying to find."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Dems To Target Political 'Robo Calls' (USAT)

USA Today, November 21, 2006

WASHINGTON — Senate Democratic leaders say they'll push legislation next year to make it a federal crime, punishable by fines and jail time, to use automated "robo calls" and other tactics to mislead and discourage voters.

"We're going to find some way to stop this," says Sen. Harry Reid, D-Nev., the incoming majority leader.

DOJ_NMG_0096688

Civil rights and watchdog groups say some voters complained this year of being barraged by automated recorded campaign calls. Though many were only annoying, some gave misleading information, directing voters to the wrong polling site or raising questions about whether a voter was registered.

"We definitely think it's a good idea for Congress to investigate and hold hearings on these issues and to consider carefully targeted legislation focused on outright deception," said Elliot Mincberg of the liberal People for the American Way, which helped operate a national hotline for voter complaints.

Tova Wang of the Century Foundation says misinformation in flyers and calls, practices employed by Democrats and Republicans, aim to suppress voter turnout.

New York Sen. Charles Schumer, who is helping to draft Democratic legislation, plans to call for a separate division within the Justice Department to deal with such problems. Penalties could include up to 10 years in jail.

In a letter to Justice officials Thursday, Schumer said he was disappointed with the department's response to voter complaints.

Justice officials defended their record in a letter responding to Schumer, noting that investigations recently have been launched into alleged voter deception and intimidation in Arizona, Maryland, Virginia and elsewhere.

Rep. John Conyers, D-Mich., in line to be chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, also has called for federal officials to investigate complaints about "robo calls."

Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., has proposed a separate measure that would make it a crime to give voters misleading election information. Violators would be subject to fines of up to $100,000 or one-year's imprisonment or both. It would require the attorney general and federal election agencies to distribute accurate information in areas where deceptive practices were found.

Election experts say Schumer's proposal, which focuses on "robo calls," may raise concerns about freedom of speech, particularly if the calls are more annoying than misleading. "That's where you could potentially get into the First Amendment area," Mincberg said. "As irritating as 'robo calls' may be ... it raises a lot more difficult questions about the ability to regulate them."

Obama's bill focuses on cases in which there is a "clear intent for out-and-out deception."

Suburban Atlanta Police Ask DA's Office To Review Officer Shootings (AP)

By Harry R. Weber

AP, November 21, 2006

ATLANTA - Prosecutors in a suburban county will extensively review at the police chief's request 14 shootings by police, including eight that were fatal, this year following concern about the high number of killings compared to the nation's two largest cities.

Prosecutors also have received a request to investigate the death of another person who died in police custody but was not shot, and they expect to be asked later to look into four other fatal shootings by police in September and since then, Adora Andy, a spokeswoman for the DeKalb County District Attorney's Office, said Monday.

The review request comes as police released details of an internal probe into the shootings in which a police review board has found that an officer in one fatal shooting was unjustified in using deadly force. Officers involved in three nonfatal shootings were found to be unjustified. The officers in the remaining shootings through September were either found to be justified or no determination was made.

"We review all officer-involved shootings for criminal activity. He's asked us to do a more extensive review," Andy said of Police Chief Nick Marinelli.

The shootings and in-custody death review involves 15 incidents from Jan. 1 through Sept. 12, Andy said, adding that her office expects to get another request from the police department to review the police shootings since then. Police review board findings were not released about the shootings since September. A fatal police shooting that occurred Sept. 2 also was not included in the materials released Monday by police, though Andy assumed the material will be forwarded later.

Andy declined to say why the request was made. She also would not disclose what reports the chief has turned over, except to say, "We've been given everything the police review board has had."

DOJ_NMG_0096689

A police spokesman did not return several calls seeking comment beyond a Police Department statement that said the DA's office investigation had been requested.

Marinelli has defended the department's actions since an Associated Press investigation published Sept. 28 showed that the nine fatal shootings this year by DeKalb County police at that time was more than even New York City had recorded and was equal to what Los Angeles police had recorded. It also was three times the number of fatal shootings DeKalb police had recorded last year.

Records obtained by AP through open records request showed that some of the department's required in-service training in the use of deadly force had been reduced, along with instruction in the use of batons.

The toll led to an independent review of police training and use-of-force procedures by a consulting firm that found some deficiencies, including a lack of emphasis on de-escalation of tense situations. County CEO Vernon Jones said at the time that there were no widespread problems at the department.

But there have been three more fatal shootings by DeKalb police since September, and now the police chief has asked for a review by the prosecutor's office to remove any doubt that might exist in the public's mind.

"We will review the documents and we will determine the appropriate course of action," Andy said.

Action could range from doing nothing to bringing criminal charges. Andy declined to say what action will be taken.

Nationwide, justifiable killings by officers while on duty declined from 378 in 2001 to 341 last year, according to the FBI, which does not catalog fatal police shootings that are accidents or not justified.

Among the DeKalb killings this year: On Aug. 24, an officer with three years on the force shot a man who she says charged her in an apartment and tried to take her gun. The police review board has ruled that the use of deadly force in that incident was justified. On May 17, an officer with 11 years of experience shot a man inside a vehicle; the man's girlfriend said he had a gun and was suicidal. That shooting also was ruled justified by the police review board.

A young man also was killed Sept. 12 after officers went into an apartment building in search of a man wanted for questioning in an earlier shooting. There is no indication in the police report that the man, Lorenzo Matthews, was armed. One of the officers involved was determined unjustified in using deadly force, according to the police review board's findings released Monday.

One of the two officers who confronted Matthews was a 17-year department veteran who also had a role in a fatal shooting June 5. That shooting remained under review, but department policy did not prohibit the officer from returning to duty. The police statement Monday did not say if that officer was the same one who was found to be unjustified in the Sept. 12 shooting.

Officer In Taser Case Identified (LAT)

By Charles Proctor And Richard Winton, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, November 21, 2006

Terrence Duren, a 2001 UCLA officer of the year, has been the subject of two other use-of-force complaints.

The UCLA police officer videotaped last week using a Taser gun on a student also shot a homeless man at a campus study hall room three years ago and was earlier recommended for dismissal in connection with an alleged assault on fraternity row, authorities said.

UCLA police confirmed late Monday that the officer who fired the Taser gun was Terrence Duren, who has served in the university's Police Department for 18 years.

Duren, who was named officer of the year in 2001, also has been involved in several controversial incidents on campus.

In an interview with The Times on Monday night, Duren, 43, defended his record as a campus police officer and urged people to withhold judgment until the review of his Taser use is completed.

"I patrol this area the same way I would want someone to patrol the neighborhoods where I live," he said. "People make allegations against cops all the time. Saying one thing and proving it are two different things."

While he would not directly talk about why he used the Taser on the student, he said a videotape of any arrest doesn't necessarily tell the whole story.

DOJ_NMG_0096690

"If someone is resisting, sometimes it's not going to look pretty taking someone into custody," he said. "If you have to use some force, it's not going to look pretty. That's the nature of this job."

A student's cellphone video of the incident has been broadcast around the world and focused much criticism on the officer.

But Duren — who was back on duty at the UCLA campus Monday night — said he can roll with these punches and wants to explain himself to students critical of his actions.

"In this line of business, you have to have a thick skin," he added. "I am proud of my service as a cop."

The incident occurred about 11 p.m. Nov. 14 in a library filled with students studying for midterm examinations.

Senior Mostafa Tabatabainejad, 23, was asked by Duren and other university police officers for his ID as part of a routine nightly procedure to make sure that everyone using the library after 11 p.m. is a student or otherwise authorized to be there.

Authorities said Tabatabainejad refused repeated requests to provide identification or to leave. The officers decided to use the Taser to incapacitate Tabatabainejad after he went limp while they were escorting him out and after he urged other library patrons to join his resistance, according to the university's account.

The video shows portions of the incident, in which Tabatabainejad can be heard screaming in pain when the Taser shocks are administered.

The tape, which has been broadcast on the YouTube website and TV newscasts, prompted widespread criticism both on campus and from outsiders. On Friday, more than 200 students held a march to the police station, while acting Chancellor Norman Abrams tried to quell the critics by announcing an independent investigation of the Taser use. Abrams said UCLA had received numerous e-mails and calls from concerned alumni and parents.

Tabatabainejad's attorney, Stephen Yagman, said his client was shocked five times with the Taser after he refused to show his ID because he thought he was being singled out for his Middle Eastern appearance. Tabatabainejad is of Iranian descent but is a U.S. citizen by birth and a resident of Los Angeles.

Duren said Monday that he joined the UCLA police force after being fired from the Long Beach Police Department in the late 1980s. He said he was a probationary officer at the time and was let go because of poor report-writing skills and geographical knowledge.

In May 1990, he was accused of using his nightstick to choke someone who was hanging out on a Saturday in front of a UCLA fraternity. Kente S. Scott alleged that Duren confronted him while he was walking on the street outside the Theta Xi fraternity house.

Scott sued the university, and according to court records, UCLA officials moved to have Duren dismissed from the police force. But after an independent administrative hearing, officials overturned the dismissal, suspending him for 90 days.

Duren on Monday disputed the allegations made by Scott.

In October 2003, Duren shot and wounded a homeless man he encountered in Kerckhoff Hall. Duren chased the man into a bathroom, where they struggled and he fired two shots.

The homeless man, Willie Davis Frazier, was later convicted of assaulting an officer. Duren said Frasier had tried to grab his gun during the struggle. But Frazier's attorney, John Raphling, said his client was mentally ill and didn't do anything to provoke the shooting.

It remains unclear when the independent investigation of the Taser incident will be completed. It will be headed by Merrick Bobb, a veteran watchdog of both the Los Angeles Police and Los Angeles County Sheriff's departments.

UCLA police officials said in a short statement that Duren arrived at Powell Library with Officer Alexis Bicomong. Duren "discharged the Taser," the statement said. Officers Kevin Kilgore, Andrew Ikeda and Ricardo Bolanos, and Sgt. Philip Baguliao, a supervisor, were also at the scene.

"Let the independent watchdog run its course," Duren said.

The officer said that when the probe is complete, he'd like to sit down with students, particularly Muslim student groups, to explain his actions at the library.

"I have nothing to hide."

charles.proctor@latimes.com
richard.winton@latimes.com

DOJ_NMG_0096691

Federal Judge Rejects Las Vegas Ban On Feeding Homeless In Parks (AP)

By Ken Ritter, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 21, 2006

LAS VEGAS (AP) - A federal judge ruled Monday that the city cannot make it illegal to feed poor people in city parks.

U.S. District Court Judge Robert Jones issued an injunction prohibiting enforcement of a City Council ordinance passed in July that prohibits "providing food or meals to the indigent for free or for a nominal fee" in a city park and defines indigent as a person whom a reasonable ordinary person would believe to be entitled to public assistance.

Las Vegas Mayor Oscar Goodman said handouts discourage homeless people from seeking help from social service providers set up to handle mental health and substance abuse problems. Neighbors had complained of large numbers of homeless people congregating at downtown parks, drawn by groups providing meals.

Jones told lawyers for the city and the American Civil Liberties Union of Nevada that he intends to issue an order killing the measure. No date was set for final action.

"The judge said you can't just ban providing food to people who look poor," said Lee Rowland, the ACLU lawyer who argued the case. She said the key fault in the city ordinance was that it made distinctions among people based on their appearance.

Las Vegas officials vowed to rewrite the law to pass constitutional muster.

"The main thing is to make sure these people get professional care," Goodman said of homeless and indigent people he said "deserve to be in service centers and with faith-based groups."

"I know I'm right on this one," Goodman added. "We just have to get the law in shape."

City lawyer Brad Jerbic said "tweaking" the existing ordinance might be enough to help it pass judicial review.

"We didn't outlaw vagrancy, indigency or homelessness," Jerbic said, adding that the possible fine of up to $1,000 was designed to discourage behavior, not punish people.

"What we did is make it an offense to set up a mobile soup kitchen in a park, attracting large numbers of indigents and stranding them without any social services," Jerbic said.

Gary Peck, ACLU executive director in Las Vegas, said he was disturbed by city arguments that he said suggested homeless and indigent people constitute an unsightly problem that should be kept from public view.

"The city says, 'Poor people are different from the rest of us, we need to control them or we will be overrun by them and they will ruin things for the rest of us,'" Peck said. "That shows a profound misunderstanding of basic constitutional principles."

Since the ordinance took effect several summonses have been handed out by city marshals at parks in the downtown area, several miles from the Las Vegas Strip.

One municipal court judge tossed out a misdemeanor case against a California activist last month and called the ordinance unconstitutionally vague. That judge said the measure denied equal protection of the law to all citizens.

A final ruling by Jones in the case, Sacco vs. City of Las Vegas, is expected to affect several similar cases currently pending in municipal court.

An Opening On Abortion? (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, November 21, 2006

If both parties combine wisdom with shrewdness, the election of a new congressional majority should open the way for a better approach to the abortion question.

The bitter political brawling of the past three decades has created an unproductive stalemate that leaves abortion opponents frustrated, abortion rights supporters in a constant state of worry and the many Americans who hold middle-ground positions feeling that there is no one who speaks for them.

But the politics of abortion began to change even before this month's elections. In September, a group of 23 pro-choice and pro-life Democratic House members introduced what they called the Reducing the Need for Abortion and Supporting Parents Act.

DOJ_NMG_0096692

Okay, it's not the catchiest title, but you get the point. The bill -- its sponsor is Rep. Tim Ryan (D-Ohio), an abortion opponent, with Rep. Rosa DeLauro (D-Conn.), an abortion rights supporter, a leading co-sponsor -- took a lot of negotiation. Supporters of abortion rights tend to favor programs that encourage effective contraception, which some in the right-to-life movement oppose. Opponents of abortion emphasize helping women who want to carry their children to term.

The Ryan bill, one of several congressional initiatives to reduce the abortion rate, does both. It includes a remarkably broad set of programs aimed at reducing teen pregnancy, promoting contraception and encouraging parental responsibility. But it also includes strong measures to offer new mothers full access to health coverage, child care and nutrition assistance.

The public debate usually ignores the fact that abortion rates are closely tied to income. As the Guttmacher Institute has reported, "the abortion rate among women living below the federal poverty level . . . is more than four times that of women above 300 percent of the poverty level." The numbers are stark: 44 abortions per 1,000 women in the lower income group, 10 abortions per 1,000 women in the higher income group.

In other words: If you truly care about reducing the number of abortions, you have to care about the well-being of poor women.

There are moral and practical reasons for members of both parties, and combatants on both sides of the abortion question, to embrace this approach.

Liberal supporters of abortion rights should be eager to promote a measure that does not make abortion illegal but does embrace goals, including help for the poor, that liberals have long advocated.

In the meantime, the victories that opponents of abortion rights have won do little to reduce the number of abortions. As Rachel Laser, director of the Third Way Culture Project, points out, even those who would ban late-term or "partial-birth" abortions need to acknowledge that very few are performed, meaning that these laws do little to reduce the overall abortion rate. According to one study cited by Laser, only 0.08 percent of abortions are performed in the third trimester.

Parental consent laws affect fewer than a fifth of all abortions, those obtained by teenagers 17 or younger, and it is not clear how many abortions these measures stop, since studies suggest that many parents favor rather than oppose abortion in such circumstances.

Why shouldn't both sides embrace broader steps that, without coercion, could cut the abortion rate by much larger numbers? We know this is possible because it has already happened: Between 1994 and 2000, the abortion rate fell by 11 percent. An ambitious national effort could do more.

There is also the politics of the issue. In her study, Laser points to a group she calls the "abortion grays," i.e., the six voters in 10 who do not see the issue in black-and-white terms. This group tilts pro-choice but does not believe abortion should always be either legal or illegal.

For Democrats, this means taking into account that while most of the new members they elected this month favor abortion rights, the party's freshmen include strong opponents of abortion -- among them Sen.-elect Bob Casey (D-Pa.) and about a half-dozen new House members. Democrats are a party with a pro-choice majority, a significant pro-life minority and a lot of grays.

Republicans are the more antiabortion party but include many pro-choice voters and grays in their ranks. They face a broadly pro-choice country and now have to battle a right-wing image that drove so many independents and moderates to the Democrats.

Taking substantial steps to reduce the abortion rate will not settle the larger ethical argument over the practice. But it could show that politicians are capable of living up to their highest calling, which is to seek practical forms of moral seriousness.

ANTITRUST:

Muni Cloud Hovers Over Investors (WSJ)

By John Connor

The Wall Street Journal, November 21, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0096693

WASHINGTON -- The latest outcropping of suspected U.S. municipal-bond-related abuses, including bid-rigging on guaranteed investment contracts used in some muni transactions, has cast a cloud of potential taxability on billions of dollars of bonds sold to investors as tax-exempt securities.

One federal official familiar with the situation said the amount of bonds in question remains to be determined but that a conservative estimate could be between $10 billion to $15 billion. He added that the final tally likely will be far larger than that.

Wide-ranging criminal and civil probes of suspected muni-related illegality are now under way, with the U.S. Justice Department's Antitrust Division and the Securities and Exchange Commission investigating suspected violations unearthed initially by the Internal Revenue Service. A number of firms, including leading providers of guaranteed investment contracts, or GICs, have received federal subpoenas recently.

The IRS's probe of bid-rigging on GICs -- which are insurance contracts that pay a fixed interest rate over a set period of time, and are often used in retirement plans and in connection with certain muni deals -- has been under way for some time. In early 2005, Mark Scott, then head of the IRS's muni enforcement program, said that "we have a lot of evidence pointing to bid-rigging for GICs in municipal-bond transactions."

While the spotlight of the federal investigations has been on suspected antitrust violations, including price-fixing on bond insurance, the bond transactions under scrutiny also present tax issues by virtue of the suspected diversion of arbitrage profits away from the federal government to participants in the bond deals.

Arbitrage profits, which are earned in the muni market by investing tax-exempt bond proceeds in high-yielding obligations, are supposed to be rebated to the Treasury. Arbitrage abuses have erupted periodically. One of the most virulent outbreaks, which resulted in federal enforcement action against dozens of securities firms over six years ago, was known as "yield burning."

The IRS typically avoids taxing bondholders -- the tax code's penalty for muni noncompliance. But taxing bondholders isn't as rare as it used to be. About a dozen mutual funds with noncompliant munis in their portfolios have paid taxes over the last year on bonds purchased as tax-exempts, according to a federal official familiar with the matter.

Bondholder taxation usually is averted by settlements under which the IRS recoups some of the money lost on noncompliant bond deals and agrees to let the bonds in question remain tax-exempt.

Private Cash Fuels Boom In Takeovers (LAT)

By Tom Petruno And Josh Friedman, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, November 21, 2006

Elite private investors are buying up major companies at a record pace, in a wave of deals that is raining riches on Wall Street but also may be raising the risk of a financial bust.

Investors led by Blackstone Group announced late Sunday the biggest takeover ever by a so-called private equity fund, a $36-billion deal to buy Equity Office Properties Trust, the largest U.S. owner of office buildings.

The proposed purchase follows announcements in recent months of buyouts that would put firms including radio giant Clear Channel Communications Inc., casino titan Harrah's Entertainment Inc. and food-service company Aramark Corp. in private hands, taking their shares off the stock market.

Takeovers are nothing new in American business, but historically the largest deals have involved companies whose shares are publicly traded buying other companies.

This year, the buyers behind the biggest deals are private equity funds — run by generally secretive investment firms that raise money from pension funds, wealthy individuals and other investors who are hungry for double-digit returns on their capital.

"It's obviously a boom," said C. Kevin Landry, a managing director at TA Associates, a Boston-based private equity firm. "You can raise as much money as you want" to do deals.

A private equity fund typically buys a company using mostly borrowed money, then seeks to improve the firm's bottom line through measures that may include refocusing the business or forcing cost cuts. The goal is to eventually sell the firm to another company, or take it public again, at a fat profit.

DOJ_NMG_0096694

The buyout wave is enriching company shareholders because private equity investors usually pay more than a stock's current price to clinch a deal. That is helping to drive share prices higher overall, analysts say; the Dow Jones industrial average has been hitting record highs.

Yet the surge in buyouts this year is making some on Wall Street wonder whether they're witnessing a replay of other episodes when too many investors threw too much money in the same direction — the dot-com boom of the late 1990s, for example, or a late-1980s company buyout wave led by corporate raiders. Both of those booms gave way to painful busts.

"It's sort of feeding on itself now," said Edward Yardeni, investment strategist at money management firm Oak Associates in Akron, Ohio. "You could make a pretty good case that a bubble is building in private equity, and that it will burst."

Private equity buyers have announced about 1,000 U.S. takeovers this year worth a record $356 billion, according to data tracker Thomson Financial. That dwarfs the $138 billion in such deals announced last year.

Private-fund deals still account for a minority of U.S. takeover activity. In all, the value of announced corporate takeovers this year exceeds $1.2 trillion; most of those are company-to-company deals. But the rising clout of private equity buyers shows in the sizes of the deals they're behind, experts say.

"Five of the six top deals this year are private equity. That's never happened before," said Richard Peterson, an analyst at Thomson Financial in New York.

Most private equity firms aren't household names, but more may be on their way to that status as their corporate assets balloon. Big players include Blackstone, Bain Capital, Carlyle Group, Silver Lake Partners and Texas Pacific Group. One — Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co. — became famous for its massive deals in the 1980s.

More than any other factor, the ascendance of private equity buyers over the last few years reflects the willingness of well-heeled investors to pony up mountains of cash in search of better returns than they can earn in stocks or bonds.

"There is tremendous liquidity in the market," said Brad Freeman, a 23-year buyout fund veteran whose Los Angeles-based firm, Freeman Spogli & Co., has a $1-billion private equity fund it's putting to work. "Deals are being done because they can be."

Private equity firms have raised an unprecedented $178 billion in new capital from investors this year, about 10 times what they raised in 1995, according to data firm Dealogic.

The cash comes from investors such as the California Public Employees' Retirement System, or CalPERS, the nation's largest public pension fund.

CalPERS has about $6.3 billion invested in buyout funds, said Joncarlo Mark, a senior portfolio manager. The pension plan expects to earn an annual percentage return in the upper teens on that money, he said. By contrast, U.S. blue-chip stocks have generated a return of 11.4% a year over the last three years.

"There are a lot of investors out there looking for yield," said Josh Lerner, a finance professor at Harvard University.

But the success of buyout deals depends in large part on the purchased companies' ability to handle the debt loads they take on with their new owners.

With many private equity funds wielding huge war chests, competition to acquire companies has become fierce, said Stephen Presser, a partner at private equity firm Monomoy Capital Partners in New York.

"At the moment, private equity firms are paying almost historically high prices for businesses, and are depending on those businesses to continue to grow in order to pay down their debt," Presser said. "If the economy softens — and someday it will — those companies are going to have a tough time" managing their debt loads.

Some analysts also question whether companies that are targets of private equity buyers today can be substantially improved by their new owners.

"Companies already are under so much pressure to be lean and mean," Yardeni said. "It's not clear what they're [private equity owners] going to bring to the table to make these companies more profitable."

Still, corporate managers often are happy to attract private equity buyers. One reason is that top managers often participate as investors in buyouts, with the potential to reap hefty financial rewards if the company is eventually sold at a profit.

The costs and regulatory hassles of being a public company also are spurring corporate boards down the go-private road, said Scott Honour, a managing director at Gores Group, a private equity firm in Los Angeles.

DOJ_NMG_0096695

"Companies are bogged down by Sarbanes-Oxley requirements," he said, referring to the law Congress passed in 2002 tightening regulation of public companies after the financial scandals at Enron Corp. and other firms.

"Boards are saying, 'Geez, we're better off being private,' " Honour said.

That worries the Bush administration. In a speech Monday, Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. questioned whether the going-private trend might signal that U.S. regulation of shareholder-owned companies had become too severe, and was driving them out of the public market.

The deal wave also has attracted the attention of another branch of the government: The Justice Department reportedly is looking into the power wielded by private equity funds and whether the biggest players may be illegally colluding to increase their clout.

*

tom.petruno@latimes.com

josh.friedman@latimes.com

Times staff writer Walter Hamilton contributed to this report.

*

(INFOBOX BELOW)

The year's top 10 private buyouts

Here are the U.S. companies that have brought the highest purchase prices from private equity funds this year:

(In billions)

Equity Office Properties: $36

HCA: $32.2

Kinder Morgan: $27.4

Clear Channel Communications: $26.7

Harrah's Entertainment: $25.4

Freescale Semiconductor: $16.2

Univision Communications: $12.6

Merrill Lynch Investment Mngmt.: $8.5

Aramark: $8.0

GMAC: $7.4

*

Sources: Bloomberg News, Thomson Financial, companies listed

Note: Deal values include assumption of debt.

Ready To Deal: $60 Billion In Two Days (WSJ)

By Serena Ng, Gregory Zuckerman And Michael Hudson

The Wall Street Journal, November 21, 2006

Wall Street's cash spigots are turned wide open.

That means the recent deluge of merger and buyout deals could keep rising even though signs are emerging that some target companies are being loaded with increasingly risky levels of debt in the process.

More than $60 billion in deals were consummated in the past 48 hours of frantic merger and buyout activity, not including the debt assumed from target companies in these transactions, according to Dealogic, a research firm. The deals included a $20 billion private-equity bid for real-estate giant Equity Office Properties Trust and stretched from Europe to Canada to the U.S. More than 35 deals were announced globally, leaving bankers looking broadly to other sectors -- including health care, technology, gambling and home building -- for the next megatransactions.

BUYOUT BOOM

1

DOJ_NMG_0096696

Read about what is behind the buyout boom2 and see a breakdown of the busiest sectors for M&A3. WHO ARE THE LAWYERS?

View a list of the law firms and lawyers representing the principals on the 10 largest deals in 2006 with U.S.-based acquirers.

One important factor behind the year's takeover boom is a well-oiled financial machine: buyout firms searching out prey and raising cash with bonds and loans that are then sold off to investors around the world. Leveraged buyouts account for some 17% of the $3.4 trillion in transactions announced globally so far this year.

"It seems that each large deal is a stepping stone to the next bigger deal," says Edward Marrinan, a credit strategist at J.P. Morgan Chase, one of the big underwriters and lenders in the borrowing boom. Companies and their private equity buyers "are pushing the envelope in risk-taking and testing the outer boundaries of the market's tolerances," he adds.

The overall pace of deal making already surpasses the $3.3 trillion record set in 2000. Almost $1.3 trillion of mergers have been announced in the U.S. alone, though that is still off from the 2000 pace, which was driven by the tech boom and included many transactions in which companies were acquired in stock swaps.

The common denominator now is debt. In the U.S., corporations have sold $109 billion in "high yield," or junk, bonds and raised an additional $593 billion in junk-rated bank loans so far this year, according to Dealogic. Last year they raised $707 billion in bonds and loans in the U.S.

Earlier in the year some investors predicted the borrowing cycle could take a turn for the worse. Yet in recent weeks hospital operator HCA Inc. and Freescale Semiconductor Inc. easily found investors for more than $11 billion in bonds behind buyouts. Freescale raised money with few of the operating constraints -- known as covenants -- that often come with risky loans.

The surge in corporate profitability that followed the 2001 recession has left many companies well-positioned to pay off debt. So far this year, companies had defaulted on just 1.27% on outstanding U.S. speculative-grade bonds, a 24-year low. The long-term average default rate is 4.7%, according to Standard & Poor's. The default rate for junk-rated bank loans is 0.99%.

Because so few companies are defaulting, investors are willing to take chances on new debt. Investors also have a growing appetite for high-yielding assets, which has them turning to junk bonds and risky loans behind takeover deals. So far this year, junk bonds have returned a robust 10%.

While debt loads have been rising, interest rates remain relatively low, meaning some companies and buyout shops taking them over are betting they will be able to service their fast-rising debt loads. "The interest burden for companies is still manageable," says Gregory Stoeckle, managing director at Invesco Senior Secured Management.

"We've not seen any let-up in investor demand [for debt] and we don't see that changing anytime soon," says James Merli, managing director and head of debt syndication at Lehman Brothers.

Yet there are signs emerging that large debt loads could begin to weigh on companies involved in the deals. Some of the bonds issued by both HCA and Freescale were "toggle" bonds, which allow the companies to choose between paying interest in cash or in the form of additional bonds. That's a strategy companies adopt when they worry that they might be short of the cash flow needed to pay off interest in the short term.

"There's so much demand for yield in the marketplace that investors are willing to give companies that option. It seems pretty crazy to me, but it's a sign of the times," says Mark Kiesel, a portfolio manager at Allianz AG's Pacific Investment Management Co., or Pimco.

If economic conditions change or interest rates creep higher, some companies may have much less room to maneuver and could run into trouble, analysts say.

As it stands, HCA, which completed its takeover last week to take itself private, will incur over $2 billion a year in interest expenses, close to half its annual operating cash flow, according to research firm CreditSights. Freescale operates in a highly cyclical industry and its interest costs also are likely to represent roughly half its annual operating cash flow, says KDP Investment Advisors, Inc. HCA officials couldn't be reached to comment. Officials at Freescale declined to comment.

Also unlike the stock-driven tech-merger boom of the 1990s, this one is wide-ranging. A proposed acquisition of Harrah's Entertainment Inc. by Texas Pacific Group and Apollo Management is fueling speculation other casino companies will be bought. Blue chip names like Sprint Nextel Corp. -- with a stock market value of more than $50 billion -- and iconic brands like

DOJ_NMG_0096697

Hilton Hotels Corp. -- which has attracted interest from investor Carl Icahn -- are held out as reasonable targets. Home builders, in the midst of a worrisome housing bust, and commodities producers, facing a bust of their own, are turning up on buyout watch lists.

A spokesman for Sprint would not comment. An official for Hilton wasn't immediately available.

The leveraged-buyout boom of the late 1980s didn't turn until bankers felt losses. One turning point was a failed attempt by bankers to sell bonds to finance the buyout of Sealy, then known as Ohio Mattress Co.

First Boston, now part of Credit Suisse, had arranged a temporary loan to fund the $965 million buyout of the mattress maker by a firm called Gibbons Green van Amerongen.

The bank was unable to issue enough bonds to refinance the loan, and ended up holding most of the loan on its own books and took equity in the company.

The event sent a chill around the marketplace and became known on Wall Street as the "burning bed." The only things on fire on Wall Street right now are the phone lines of buyout shops.

Smaller Rival In Agreement To Acquire Copper Giant (NYT)

By Andrew Ross Sorkin And Ian Austen

The New York Times, November 20, 2006

Phelps Dodge, the world's second-largest copper producer, will be acquired by Freeport-McMoRan Copper and Gold, a smaller rival that has been embroiled in environmental and human rights controversies, in a cash and stock deal worth $25.9 billion, the companies said yesterday.

The transaction, if approved by shareholders, would create the world's largest copper producer and the largest mining company based in North America. It is the latest move in a series of mining and metals mergers. Like companies involved in other mining mergers, Freeport-McMoRan promoted the idea that increased size has become an important competitive factor.

"We have been watching the industry consolidation, fewer companies, larger companies, but we had not been playing a role in it," Freeport-McMoRan's president and chief executive, Richard C. Adkerson, said. "Now Freeport is a larger company that has a larger platform."

The chairman and chief executive of Phelps Dodge, J. Steven Whisler, said yesterday that the two companies have talked about a possible merger for about a decade. The premium of about 33 percent being offered by Freeport-McMoRan, Mr. Whisler said, was a decisive factor in Phelps Dodge's decision to end its 172-year history as an independent company.

The boards of both companies have approved the transaction. Under its terms, stockholders in Phelps Dodge will receive $88 a share in cash plus 0.67 of a Freeport-McMoRan share. Based on Friday's closing, the deal is offering Phelps Dodge shareholders a 33 percent premium.

Freeport-McMoRan, which has a market capitalization of $11.3 billion compared with Phelps Dodge's value of $19.4 billion, will finance the transactions by borrowing about $17.5 billion. Freeport said it expected the deal would be accretive to the combined company's earnings per share and cash flow immediately.

To a considerable extent, Phelps-Dodge now finds itself being acquired because of its failure earlier this year to bulk up with an acquisition of Inco, the large Toronto-based nickel miner.

Inco had approached Phelps Dodge in an attempt to help it with its bid for another Canadian nickel miner, Falconbridge. In exchange for financing for that transaction, Inco's board agreed to be acquired by Phelps Dodge in a deal cash and stock worth about $17 billion.

Ultimately, however, the three-way transaction fell apart. Phelps Dodge walked away from its Inco offer after Xstrata of Switzerland emerged as the winning bidder for Falconbridge. Companhia Vale do Rio Doce of Brazil acquired Inco after offering about $17 billion in cash.

Not only did the Phelps Dodge bid fail to impress Inco's shareholders, it was also criticized by some of the Phoenix-based company's own shareholders largely because it would have increased the company's debt levels from almost nothing to about $24 billion. Some critics said at the time that they would prefer Phelps Dodge to sell itself rather than become larger through acquisitions, a request that has now apparently been granted.

DOJ_NMG_0096698

Mr. Whisler will retire when the Freeport-McMoRan takeover is completed. The resulting company, which will retain Freeport-McMoRan name but move its head office from New Orleans to Phoenix, will be led by Mr. Adkerson and retain James R. Moffett, of Freeport-McMoRan, as chairman.

While Phelps Dodge has large mines in United States, Central and South America as well as Africa, Freeport-McMoRan's only significant asset is a mine in Indonesia.

Earlier this year, riots in the Indonesian province of Papua were directed at Freeport-McMoRan. In December 2005, The New York Times reported that Freeport had given more financial support to the Indonesian Army and police in Papua than the company had publicly reported, in some cases individual commanders received tens of thousands of dollars from the company.

Mr. Adkerson said the company was still responding to requests from regulators about the timing and level of disclosure to shareholders about those payments.

The Indonesian mine's operations have also come under criticism for their environmental practices. Mr. Adkerson said that Freeport-McMoRan now had its environmental measures assessed and tracked by independent auditors.

"We operate in an unusual place," he said. "Our mine is in a remarkable physical setting."

Freeport-McMoRan was advised in the deal by J. P. Morgan Securities and Merrill Lynch while legal advisers were Davis Polk & Wardwell and Jones, Walker, Waechter, Poitevent, Carrère & Denègre. Citigroup Corporate and Investment Banking and Morgan Stanley & Company worked with Phelps Dodge, and its legal counsel was Debevoise & Plimpton.

Mattel Says It Really Owns The Bratz That've Given Barbie Such A Bad Time (WSJ)

By Christina Binkley

The Wall Street Journal, November 21, 2006

Barbie has a new tactic in her battle against the rival Bratz doll clan: If you can't beat 'em, own 'em.

Mattel Inc., maker of Barbie, is attempting to lay legal claim to the Bratz fashion-doll empire created by its rival MGA Entertainment Inc. The El Segundo, Calif., toy maker yesterday filed documents with U.S. District Court in California arguing that the Bratz dolls rightfully belong to Mattel, whose Barbie franchise has been dented by competition from the saucy, big-headed dolls that appeared on the market in 2001.

The argument is based in part on Mattel's claim that the designer of Bratz was employed by Mattel when he did initial drawings for the dolls several years ago. Recently, Mattel's lawyers quietly applied for copyright protection on a number of early Bratz drawings, according to the documents.

Moreover, the documents claim that closely held MGA Entertainment hired away a number of key Mattel employees in Mexico, the U.S. and Canada. Mattel says those employees "stole" confidential sales information, documents, plans, and other Mattel secrets -- copying the information onto hard drives or using other means to transfer the intelligence to MGA over the past six years or so.

Among other sources of information, including depositions of witnesses, the documents cite emails that appear to have been recovered from the personal computers of several former employees.

"MGA intentionally stole not just specific Mattel property, such as Bratz designs, prototypes and related materials, but also a vast array of trade secrets and other confidential information that comprise Mattel's intellectual infrastructure. MGA's rapid growth was not organic, but rather was based upon its theft of Bratz," the lawsuit says.

Isaac Larian, MGA's chief executive, said he hadn't seen the legal documents, but that his lawyers had briefed him on the contents. "This is another fantasy on the part of a desperate company that doesn't have any leadership," Mr. Larian said in an interview. "It's just basically a desperate organization that has lost its way."

Mr. Larian said that Mattel's claims regarding employees in Mexico have been dismissed as invalid by the Mexican courts.

Mattel responded to requests for comment with a written statement confirming the legal documents and declining to comment further.

Specifically, Mattel sought permission from a federal judge to amend an existing lawsuit it filed against Carter Bryant, the designer who is credited with creating the Bratz. The proposed amendment, a 58-page document, accuses MGA, Mr. Larian, Mr. Bryant and other MGA divisions and former employees of abuses that include copyright infringement, violation of the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act (or RICO), misappropriation of trade secrets, aiding and abetting breach of duty of loyalty, and unfair competition. Mattel is demanding a jury trial.

DOJ_NMG_0096699

Mattel's new claims arise from legal discovery and separate investigations that the company conducted as part of several broader Barbie-Bratz related lawsuits.

In the documents, Mattel says that Van Nuys, Calif.-based MGA sells more than $500 million a year worth of Bratz items. Mr. Larian confirms that the sales are "more than $500 million" but declined to say how much more. The Bratz line has been a juggernaut since its inception five years ago. The Bratz dolls have a more hip-hop style and are more heavily made up than Barbie, who has been accused of being overly sexy herself, but appears positively demure in comparison with Bratz. In the late 1990s, Barbie had some of her best sales years ever. But the Bratz have eaten away at her kingdom, and world-wide Barbie sales fell 11% last year. Mattel has attempted to boost its fashion doll revenues with a series of hipper-looking dolls such as the Flavas, which came out in 2003 and have been discontinued.

Mattel doesn't disclose the value of its Barbie franchise. According to market researcher NPD Group, overall fashion-doll sales were $1.4 billion in 2005 -- roughly flat with the year before.

Mattel sued the Bratz designer Mr. Bryant in 2004. Mattel is now arguing that it has proof that Mr. Bryant was employed by Mattel when he drew the original drawings for the Bratz fashion dolls and sold them to MGA Entertainment. Mr. Bryant had signed an employment contract giving rights to his work to Mattel.

Mr. Bryant joined Mattel in 1995 and briefly left its employ in April 1998, according to Mattel. Mr. Larian says that Mr. Bryant conceived of Bratz during that time, when he was living with his parents in Missouri and working as a free-lancer. He says Mr. Bryant showed plans for a series of postcards -- not a doll -- to a mutual acquaintance who brought them to Mr. Larian's attention. "I said, OK, let's try it in 3-D," Mr. Larian says.

Mr. Bryant returned to Mattel's employ in January 1999, designing Barbie fashions.

Mattel claims in its filing that two third-party vendors have testified in depositions that they painted Bratz doll faces and worked on Bratz packaging between June and September 2000 -- before Mr. Bryant left Mattel in October 2000.

MGA began showing prototypes for the dolls around the toy industry within several weeks of Mr. Bryant's departure from Mattel. Mr. Bryant couldn't be reached for comment.

Mr. Bryant now earns royalties for Bratz and has become wealthy, according to Mr. Larian. The royalties are something he wouldn't have gotten at Mattel, where his contract required him to sign over all his ideas.

Cephalon Used Improper Tactics To Sell Drug, Probe Finds (WSJ)

By John Carreyrou

The Wall Street Journal, November 21, 2006

From setting unrealistically high sales quotas to pushing larger prescriptions at higher doses, drug maker Cephalon Inc. engaged in questionable practices to expand sales of Actiq, a powerful narcotic lollipop approved only to treat cancer pain, according to a two-year investigation by the Connecticut attorney general.

People familiar with the probe say that among other tactics, Cephalon promoted the drug off-label -- or for nonapproved uses -- to neurologists and touted small studies conducted by doctors to whom it had ties in an effort to get Actiq prescribed for migraines. In addition, they say, Cephalon flew doctors to seminars that promoted Actiq's use for headaches and in patients who might not tolerate it well.

Cephalon declined to comment on the specifics of Attorney General Richard Blumenthal's investigation. Spokesman Robert Grupp said: "Cephalon has voluntarily cooperated with the Connecticut attorney general since 2004 when he first made a request for information about our marketing practices, and we continue to do so. Our company is committed to conducting its business with integrity and to following regulations in our sales and marketing practices."

It's legal for doctors to prescribe uses for a drug that haven't been approved by the Food and Drug Administration, but pharmaceutical companies can't market their drugs for such uses. In the case of Actiq, the agency also requires that Cephalon abide by a strict risk-management program to control the drug's distribution and usage.

DOJ_NMG_0096700

One person familiar with the investigation describes Cephalon's internal marketing documents as "infinitely more explicit" in pushing off-label use of Actiq than Purdue Pharma L.P. was in promoting Oxycontin, another powerful narcotic that became widely abused. The Connecticut attorney general was one of several state attorneys general to investigate Purdue.

Mr. Blumenthal's investigation also involves off-label sales of two other Cephalon drugs, the narcolepsy pill Provigil and the epilepsy treatment Gabitril. Cephalon is also being investigated by the U.S. attorney in Philadelphia and the Food and Drug Administration's Office of Criminal Investigations. Like Mr. Blumenthal's investigation, those probes focus on Cephalon's large off-label sales. The U.S. attorney and the FDA declined to comment.

Mr. Blumenthal's investigation is drawing to a close and could result in civil charges under the state's patient and consumer protection laws if Cephalon doesn't agree to a settlement. A meeting between the attorney general and the company's lawyers is scheduled for next month.

If Cephalon opts to settle the case out of court, Mr. Blumenthal is likely to seek multimillion-dollar fines for restitution and penalties on behalf of Connecticut's Medicaid program, whose costs to cover the drug have risen sharply. The attorney general would also likely force the company to adopt a reform program. "We want them to change the way they do business," Mr. Blumenthal says.

Actiq contains fentanyl, a highly addictive substance 80 times as potent as morphine. Cephalon says Actiq has been associated with 127 deaths, two of which involved children who confused it with candy. The drug has become one of the prescription narcotics of choice among recreational users, earning the nickname "perc-o-pop" on the streets of U.S. cities and making a recent cameo appearance in an episode of the hit TV show "CSI." In the first nine months of this year, Actiq sales reached $471 million.

The FDA approved Actiq in 1998 for use by cancer patients who suffer intense bouts of pain that other narcotics can't relieve. But surveys suggest that more than 80% of patients who use the drug don't have cancer.

The trigger for Mr. Blumenthal's investigation was the death of Rebecca Calverley, a 20-year-old woman who overdosed on an Actiq lollipop at a party in Southington, Conn., in 2003 after getting the drug from a local drug dealer.

Mr. Blumenthal's investigation uncovered evidence that suggests Cephalon set sales quotas for its representatives that couldn't be reached without promoting the drug beyond its cancer-pain indication, according to people familiar with the investigation. Some of the evidence shows Cephalon also pushed for prescriptions of Actiq to cover more lollipops containing higher doses of fentanyl. Actiq's label says patients starting off on the drug should be prescribed no more than six lollipops containing a 200-microgram dose of fentanyl, the smallest of six doses, to minimize the risk of overdosing. Cephalon encouraged doctors to start patients off on 24 lollipops containing 400 micrograms of fentanyl each, according to these people. The higher dose costs more and brings in more revenue.

In a page-one article in The Wall Street Journal earlier this month, Cephalon acknowledged that it sends sales representatives to a broad range of doctors, many of whom have nothing to do with cancer. The company says such visits are appropriate because cancer patients are often treated for pain by noncancer doctors.

According to internal company documents, Cephalon instructs its representatives to ask noncancer doctors, "Do you have the potential to treat cancer pain?" Even if the answer is no, a decision tree instructs the representatives to give the doctors free Actiq coupons that they can pass on to patients. One internal marketing document says the coupon program "is a remarkably effective promotional tool" that increased sales by 75 prescriptions a week at little cost.

Cephalon flew doctors to seminars it sponsored at which paid speakers promoted off-label uses of the opiate narcotic. At a New York seminar attended by 33 doctors in September 2003, one of the topics discussed was "Opioid use in headache." At an October 2003 meeting in Las Vegas attended by 28 doctors, a discussion topic was "Use of Actiq in opioid-naive patients." Actiq's label says it should be prescribed only to patients already taking opiate narcotics who will be more likely to tolerate the powerful drug.

Mr. Grupp declined to comment on the seminars. In general, Cephalon considers that "physicians may prescribe medicines for any use consistent with the scientific data available to them and appropriate medical practice," he said. "The decision to prescribe 'off label' is theirs and theirs alone."

DOJ_NMG_0096701

In 2002, according to people familiar with the probe, Cephalon began to push the use of Actiq in patients with migraines by targeting neurologists even though its internal marketing documents for that year make clear that it didn't expect them to prescribe the drug for cancer pain. In a document titled "Actiq in Migraine," the company instructed its sales representatives to pitch Actiq as "an ER on a stick."

Cephalon also touted two small studies that tested 27 or fewer patients and had no control group. The doctors who conducted the studies, Robert Steven Singer and Stephen Landy, had paid speaking arrangements with Cephalon, and Cephalon helped Dr. Landy with the study he conducted, according to the people close to Mr. Blumenthal's probe.

Dr. Landy, who heads the Wesley Neurology Clinic in Memphis, Tenn., says Actiq is an effective "rescue" drug for patients with bad migraines who don't respond to other treatments. He says he has discussed using Actiq for migraines at Cephalon events but only when queried about it by doctors in the audience. Dr. Landy won't say how much Cephalon paid him for speaking. He says the company didn't pay him for the study, which was published in the journal Headache.

Dr. Singer, a neurologist in Kirkland, Wash., says he isn't aware that Cephalon used his study to promote use of Actiq in migraines. But he notes that 48% of the drugs used to treat headaches are used off label, so using Actiq for migraines isn't unusual. He declines to say how much Cephalon paid him to speak.

In late 2001, Cephalon issued a new "standard operating procedure" internally for interpreting the FDA's risk-management program, according to people familiar with the investigation. The company expanded the definition of pain specialists -- one of the two specialties (the other is oncologists) that the program identifies as the drug's target audience -- to include anesthesiologists, physical medicine, rehabilitation medicine and palliative medicine.

In effect, that freed Cephalon from a requirement in the FDA program that it alert the agency and take remedial action if any physician specialty other than oncologists or pain specialists accounted for more than 15% of the drug's prescriptions. Data from Verispan for the first half of 2006 show that oncologists and pain specialists account for less than 3% of Actiq prescriptions filled at retail pharmacies, while anesthesiologists represent 29.5% of prescriptions.

LSE Shuns 'final' £2.7bn Nasdaq Bid (FT)

By Norma Cohen In London

Financial Times, November 21, 2006

London Stock Exchange on Monday batted away a £2.7bn ($5.1bn, €4bn) "final" offer to be acquired by US-based Nasdaq, saying the bid so undervalued the company its board was not even willing to meet for further discussions.

The announcement sparked tumultuous trading in LSE shares, which closed 6 per cent higher at 1,291p, well above the 1,243p per share offer price. Nearly 50m shares switched hands. The price is the minimum Nasdaq has to pay until next May under UK takeover code rules because that is the average price at which it bought its initial 25.3 per cent stake.

On Monday, Nasdaq increased that to 28.75 per cent, buying the stake of Scottish Widows Investment Partnership, one of the LSE's few remaining long-term investors.

Posturing by both parties is likely to be played out in coming weeks. Under the code, Nasdaq cannot raise its offer unless either its board recommends a bid or a competing bidder emerges. If it fails to acquire the company, it cannot bid for another 12 months.

LSE's response suggests it wants to set a value for its shares well above what Nasdaq would be willing to pay, thus keeping its independence.

The offer is the second that Nasdaq has made for LSE and the fifth approach LSE has received in the past two years.

Clara Furse, LSE chief executive, said: "We believe Nasdaq's final offer fails to recognise the outstanding growth record and prospects of our group on a stand-alone basis, let alone the exchange's unique global position."

In timing its approach, Bob Greifeld, Nasdaq chief executive, said he was very much influenced by a sell-off in LSE shares last week. That had been sparked by an announcement from some of its largest customers that they intended to build a low-cost share trading platform that could compete with the LSE. The US has become fiercely competitive and technology and new European Commission rules are likely to make Europe follow suit.

DOJ_NMG_0096702

"The broad context is that this proposed transaction is recognition that the world we knew will be very different in three or four years' time," Mr Greifeld said.

However, the recovery of LSE shares is believed to have emboldened Nasdaq to make its move, taking the view that the shares would have fallen further without the prospect of an offer.

The offer gives little to customers who have been pressing for tariff reductions. It simply promises that fees will not be raised for at least the next three years.

It offers some protections to the London market in the form of an oversight committee which will be mandated in its articles of association. The committee cannot agree to rule changes for the London market without the consent of the Financial Services Authority – a move aimed at easing concerns about the import of US regulations.

It also will have veto rights over any effort to move more than 20 per cent of the cost base or revenue base out of the UK.

LSE Rebuffs Offer By Nasdaq Valuing Firm At $5.1 Billion (WSJ)

By Aaron Lucchetti In New York And Alistair Macdonald In London

The Wall Street Journal, November 21, 2006

Nasdaq Stock Market Inc. will likely have to increase its offer price if it wants a chance of taking over London Stock Exchange PLC after the London exchange rejected Nasdaq's latest advance.

That presents Nasdaq Chief Executive Robert Greifeld with a dilemma: Use even more of his shareholders' money to continue his lengthy pursuit of a reluctant partner or be saddled with a huge passive stake in LSE at a time when LSE faces challenges. Although it operates Europe's largest stock exchange by the value of shares traded, LSE is dogged by a series of competitive threats and isn't a player in the fast-growing market for trading derivatives.

Early Monday, Nasdaq took another run at the London Stock Exchange, proposing to buy the approximately 71% of the company it doesn't own for £12.43 a share, or $23.55, valuing the LSE at £2.7 billion, or $5.1 billion. The 300-year-old London exchange rejected the offer and declined to meet with Nasdaq officials. The response was similar to LSE's rejection of a March approach by Nasdaq at £9.50 a share. Nasdaq has a 60-day period under British takeover rules in which to convince LSE shareholders and its board to negotiate. Nasdaq billed its latest approach as its "final offer."

Investors quickly drove LSE's share price above Nasdaq's bid price, signaling that it will take a higher offer from Nasdaq to convince them to sell or that they expect a rival suitor to emerge. LSE's shares rose Monday in London to £12.91, up 6%. Nasdaq shares rose 3.1%, or $1.14, to $37.71 in Nasdaq trading, but debt-ratings firms threatened to lower their marks on Nasdaq's already junk-rated debt because of the risks and expense of a deal.

Prospects of another bidder appear dim, at least for now. Nasdaq's interest in the LSE is just one element of a major round of consolidation under way among the world's biggest exchange companies, which means there are few, if any, major potential suitors for LSE that aren't already tied up in deals.

NYSE Group Inc., operator of the New York Stock Exchange, has agreed to purchase Euronext NV, an operator of four stock exchanges and one derivatives exchange in Europe, in a deal Euronext shareholders are expected to vote on next month. Deutsche Börse AG, operator of the Frankfurt Stock Exchange, last week pulled out of a rival bid for Euronext but is unlikely to immediately look at London and has been rejected by LSE in the past. And Chicago Mercantile Exchange Holdings Inc. and CBOT Holdings Inc., operator of the Chicago Board of Trade, are pursuing an agreed-upon merger and aren't that interested in operating a stock exchange anyway.

WALL STREET JOURNAL VIDEO

1

Watch a video report on The London Stock Exchange's rejection2 of a buyout bid from the Nasdaq. (Nov. 20)

The tie-ups are happening now because many exchange companies are seeking cost efficiencies through mergers as the fees they can charge users have come down. Big investors such as hedge funds, pension funds and investment banks also want to trade more easily in a wider range of markets.

DOJ_NMG_0096703

LSE's flat-out rejection of even entering talks means Nasdaq's chances are slim at its current offer price, even though Nasdaq said formally that its offer was final and wouldn't be revised unless it received approval from LSE's board or a competitor jumped into the fray.

"We are disappointed by the quick rejection of our proposal and the LSE board's refusal to meet with Nasdaq," Mr. Greifeld said.

Now he is relying on LSE's shareholders to complain vociferously that LSE should start talking to Nasdaq. One LSE shareholder whose firm owns about 1% of the company's shares said LSE should at least talk to Mr. Greifeld because he has made it clear he could increase his offer if LSE's board would start to negotiate.

Nasdaq is "transferring the burden to LSE's shareholders," says Rick Wetmore, an analyst at Turner Investment Partners, which owns shares of Nasdaq. He says that LSE finding a white knight is "unlikely in the near term."

One manager at a hedge fund that owns more than 3% of LSE said Nasdaq would have to dig deeper. "They are not going to win the company this way," he said.

Nasdaq said a deal would create the world's largest stock market by the number of listings, though it would be far smaller than a combined NYSE and Euronext if measured by the market value of listed companies. Nasdaq and LSE would comprise more than 6,400 quoted companies with a total market capitalization of about £6.3 trillion.

Nasdaq plans to leave the LSE some autonomy to regulate and operate its market. Such steps are likely necessary to gain approval from U.K. regulators. Mr. Greifeld doesn't view the step as the final move by Nasdaq to become a more global company. In an interview he called Asian expansion "a natural outgrowth of a market that wants to be the world's leading equity exchange."

A combined company would be home to Britain's giants such as Vodafone Group PLC and BP PLC, and Nasdaq's technology-oriented giants such as Cisco Systems Inc. and Intel Corp. but also thousands of smaller companies that have chosen Nasdaq in the U.S. and LSE's AIM exchange to list.

Nasdaq, which before Monday's announcement owned 25.3% of the LSE, backed up its offer by buying 7.1 million LSE shares, taking its stake to 28.75%, a move that cost it about £87.8 million.

If Nasdaq proceeds with its offer and wins at least a significant chunk of LSE shareholders, it could give it an inside track to shuffle the LSE board and management to a new group more supportive of a deal. Nasdaq could be in trouble if it doesn't ultimately snap up a majority of LSE shares with its offer. In that case, it would be prevented under U.K. takeover rules from bidding again for as long as one year, said Richard Repetto, an analyst with Sandler O'Neill & Partners.

Even among less-obvious potential bidders for LSE there appear to be few candidates. Magnus Böcker, CEO of Nordic exchange operator OMX AB, said in an interview that his exchange has no plans to bid for LSE and doubted whether this would change. The LSE held talks over the summer with U.K. broker ICAP, but the collapsed mainly because ICAP thought the exchange's shares were too high. ICAP also isn't expected to return to the table.

LSE may still look to other deals to give shareholders an alternative to Nasdaq's vision. One exchange investor said Monday that LSE could link with other independent stock markets in Italy or Spain, and the LSE has recently held talks about partnerships with the Tokyo Stock Exchange and the Bombay Stock Exchange.

Under CEO Clara Furse, LSE has repelled four approaches, including Nasdaq's March attempt. "We believe Nasdaq's final offer fails to recognize the outstanding growth record and prospects of our group on a standalone basis let alone the Exchange's unique global position," Ms. Furse said.

LSE in the past argued that it is more than capable of continuing to be independent given that it is located in one of the world's financial centers and because of what it sees as a long-term trend of increasing trading volume with the arrival of fast-moving hedge funds and computer programs that move money in and out of stocks quickly.

Ms. Furse's independent stance bucks the general trend among exchanges that have recently gone public and started looking for ways to expand and cut costs. Exchange executives like NYSE CEO John Thain have talked about the emergence of a handful of global exchange giants, and it is unclear where LSE would fit into that. LSE declined to say whether it was talking to potential rival bidders. A spokesman said: "We are continually exploring options over and above the standalone growth story."

DOJ_NMG_0096704

Mr. Greifeld said Nasdaq was ideally suited to help LSE compete going forward. "We've never had a historical monopoly. We had to scratch and claw for our progress in the market," he said. He said that combining the two companies would give international companies "the ability to dual-list simultaneously in London and New York."

London Exchange Rejects Nasdaq's $5.1 Billion Offer (WP)

By Aaron Lucchetti And Alistair Macdonald

The Washington Post, November 21, 2006

NEW YORK, Nov. 20 -- The Nasdaq Stock Market will likely have to increase its offer price if it wants a chance of taking over the London Stock Exchange after the exchange rejected Nasdaq's latest advance.

The rejection presents Robert Greifeld, Nasdaq's president and chief executive, with a dilemma: use even more of his shareholders' money to continue his pursuit of a reluctant partner, or be saddled with a huge passive stake in the London exchange at a time when it faces challenges. Although it is Europe's largest stock market in terms of the value of shares traded, the London exchange is dogged by a series of competitive threats and is not a factor in the fast-growing market for trading derivatives, which are investments used to hedge against interest-rate changes.

Nasdaq's offer of $23.55 per share Monday was valued at $5.1 billion, which the 300-year-old London exchange said substantially undervalued the company. London exchange representatives also declined to meet with Nasdaq officials, similar to their response when approached by Nasdaq in March. Nasdaq has a 60-day period under British takeover rules in which to persuade the shareholders and board of the London exchange to negotiate.

Investors quickly drove the London exchange's share price above Nasdaq's bid price, signaling that it will take a higher offer from Nasdaq or that they expect a rival suitor to emerge. But prospects of another bidder appear dim, at least for now.

Nasdaq's interest in the London exchange is just one element of a major round of consolidation going on among the world's biggest exchange companies, which means there are few, if any, major potential suitors for London exchange that are not already tied up in deals.

NYSE Group., operator of the New York Stock Exchange, agreed to buy Euronext, an operator of four stock exchanges and one derivatives exchange in Europe, in a deal that Euronext shareholders are expected to vote on next month. Deutsche Borse, operator of the Frankfurt Stock Exchange, last week pulled out of a rival bid for Euronext, but is unlikely to soon look at London and has been rejected by London exchange in the past. And Chicago Mercantile Exchange Holdings and CBOT Holdings, operator of the Chicago Board of Trade, are pursuing an agreed merger and aren't that interested in operating a stock exchange anyway.

The tie-ups are occurring now because many exchange companies are seeking cost efficiencies through mergers as the fees they can charge users have come down. Big investors, such as hedge funds, pension funds and investment banks, also want to trade more easily in a wider range of markets.

But Nasdaq and the London exchange may be dealing only with each other or with no one at all. And London's rejection of talks with Nasdaq's means chances are slim at its current offer price, even though Nasdaq said its offer was final and would not be revised unless it received approval from the London board or a competitor jumped into the fray.

"We are disappointed by the quick rejection of our proposal and the London exchange board's refusal to meet with Nasdaq," Greifeld said.

Now he is relying on shareholders to complain that the London exchange should start talking to Nasdaq. One shareholder, whose firm owns about 1 percent of the company's shares, said that the London exchange should at least talk to Greifeld because he has made it clear that he could increase his offer if the London board would negotiate.

Nasdaq is "transferring the burden to London exchange's shareholders," said Rick Wetmore, an analyst at Turner Investment Partners, which owns shares of Nasdaq. He said the London exchange was unlikely to find a white knight soon.

A manager at a hedge fund that owns more than 3 percent of the London exchange said that Nasdaq would have to dig deeper. "They are not going to win the company this way," the mananger said, on condition that he not be named.

Nasdaq said a deal would create the world's largest stock market by the number of listings, though it would be smaller than a combined NYSE and Euronext if measured by the market value of listed firms.

DOJ_NMG_0096705

British Shun A New Offer By Nasdaq (NYT)

By Heather Timmons And James Kanter

The New York Times, November 21, 2006

LONDON, Nov. 20 — The Nasdaq Stock Market has intensified a trans-Atlantic battle for the London Stock Exchange in an effort to overtake the rival New York Stock Exchange as the world's leading equity marketplace.

The London exchange, the largest in Europe, quickly rejected Nasdaq's $5.1 billion cash offer on Monday and said it would not meet with Nasdaq executives. Nasdaq officials said that while they still hoped to reach a friendly deal, they planned to go ahead with their offer.

The London market is attractive to Nasdaq because it has benefited from a flood of new money from Asia and the Middle East. It has lured new listings because its regulatory regimen is seen as less onerous than the oversight of stock exchanges in the United States.

A combination of the London market and Nasdaq would create a company with 6,400 listings and a total market capitalization of $11.3 trillion — making it the world's biggest stock market, Nasdaq said.

The world's share markets are moving energetically to consolidate, under pressure from customers to reduce fees and offer global services. By merging, exchanges can pool their liquidity and offer better prices to buyers and sellers. Last week, a group of big investment banks added to the pressure by announcing plans to create a pan-European stock trading platform next year.

Reaching a deal with London could help Nasdaq overtake the New York Stock Exchange's parent NYSE Group in Europe. The New York exchange and Euronext, a network of four European stock markets and a London derivatives market, are expected to ask shareholders for final approval of their planned merger in December.

This is the second time this year that Nasdaq has offered to acquire the London exchange. In March, London rejected an informal offer of £9.50 a share. On Monday, Nasdaq made an offer of £12.43 a share ($23.57), up more than 30 percent from March, but only 2 percent above the London exchange's closing stock price of £12.18 on Friday.

Much has changed since March, though. London's shareholders have rapidly turned over, and as many as a third of its investors now are thought to be hedge funds, chiefly concerned not with a company's long-term business strategy but with the highest short-term return.

"It is difficult to see how this is not going to go through," said Lynton Jones, a former head of Nasdaq's international operations and a founder of Bourse Consult in London, which advises stock exchanges. "The London exchange is boxed into a corner."

But Nasdaq may still need to sweeten its offer. Apparently anticipating a higher bid, investors bid up the shares of the London Stock Exchange 6 percent on Monday, to £12.91.

Andrew Mitchell, an analyst with Fox-Pitt, Kelton in London, said, "It's not obvious where the L.S.E. can move next, but by not entering into negotiations with Nasdaq, they have put them in an awkward position." Nasdaq, he said, might be forced to offer more.

Yet officials at ratings agencies said that paying more could be dangerous for Nasdaq. One agency, Moody's Investors Service, put Nasdaq on review for a possible downgrading because of any additional debt that the company might take on.

Nasdaq has now accumulated nearly 29 percent of the London exchange's shares, enough to scare away rival suitors. It needs just over 50 percent to win control.

Doug Atkin, chief executive of Majestic Research in New York, said "the really powerful thing about this is there is no alternative" for Nasdaq rivals who hope to match the deal.

He added that Clara Furse, the chief executive of the London exchange, had "the equivalent of the only beachfront property in town."

And London has been reluctant to sell. The 246-year-old exchange has turned down offers in recent years from the Macquarie Bank of Australia, Deutsche Börse of Germany and OM, owner of Nordic region markets.

In a statement Monday, Ms. Furse said, "Nasdaq's final offer fails to recognize the outstanding growth record and prospects of our group on a stand-alone basis, let alone the exchange's unique global position."

DOJ_NMG_0096706

Nasdaq replied that it was “disappointed” by the London exchange’s decision.

Its chief executive, Robert Greifeld, said during a call with investors that he would like to reach a deal with the approval of the London exchange’s board. He ran off a long list of concessions he would make in a takeover, including leaving the London Stock Exchange’s board independent, its management intact and holding Nasdaq board meetings in London. Nasdaq would also list its shares on the London exchange.

He said Nasdaq “respects the strength of the London market” and will ensure that it continues its same practices. Mr. Greifeld also pledged not to raise broker-dealer fees for users of either market for three years. Nasdaq plans to use a combination of cash, preferred stock and bank debt arranged with Bank of America and Dresdner Kleinwort to finance the deal.

Nasdaq expects to post an official offer this week, at which time London Stock Exchange holders have 28 days to tender their shares. That period can be extended to 60 days. In addition, 30 days after posting a formal offer, Nasdaq can buy more shares of the London exchange on the market.

If Nasdaq succeeds, both it and the New York Stock Exchange would face competition on other fronts. The global investment banks — Citigroup, Credit Suisse, Deutsche Bank, Goldman Sachs, Merrill Lynch, Morgan Stanley and UBS — have formally disclosed their plan to start a electronic European exchange. Predictions that such a market could take business away from the London Stock Exchange have recently weakened its share price.

Underlining the increasingly global market for stocks and futures, and a growing demand for cheap trading across time zones, both the New York and the London exchanges are in talks with the Tokyo stock market over possible alliances.

On Monday, the British government said it was open to foreign ownership in London but stressed that any takeover must not threaten the current regulatory framework.

"We are neutral with respect to the nationality of the ownership of the L.S.E.," said Ed Balls, economic secretary to the chancellor of the exchequer, Gordon Brown. “Our interest in the ownership of the L.S.E. is that it should not affect the existing risk-based regulatory regime under which the exchange and its members and issuers operate.”

Curtain Rises On Final Act In LSE Drama (FT)

Financial Times, November 21, 2006

The takeover battle for the London Stock Exchange has been like a romantic comedy in which the leading lady is determined not to get married. The LSE has seen off Deutsche Börse, the German exchange, Macquarie, the Australian bank, and other less determined suitors. Now Nasdaq, the US exchange, is wooing the LSE with a cash offer. The LSE's users will hope that it meets with no more success.

Nasdaq should not be turned down because it is American. The LSE is a profitable, private business and there is no public interest in protecting it from foreign ownership. It is important to ask, however, if the US authorities would allow a deal if the LSE were trying to buy Nasdaq.

Nasdaq has been careful to say that it would protect London's regulation, its brands and its individual identity. But it would be insane to do otherwise: those strengths, and the business that they bring, help to justify the high price Nasdaq is offering.

That price would stretch Nasdaq. It is already highly leveraged and its debt is not rated at investment grade. Yet it plans to pay for the LSE by borrowing more. Such a large debt burden would make it hard for the new company to cut prices for its users.

That would upset users, given that there would be cost savings from a merger. The economics of a stock exchange are like those of the software business. Once a computer program is written it costs almost nothing to sell more copies; once a stock exchange is set up it costs almost nothing to process more trades. Nasdaq and the LSE could share a technology platform and strip out costs.

Any merger between two stock exchanges has that advantage. The particular logic of Nasdaq buying the LSE, however, is less clear. There is no obvious demand for joint listings on the two stock exchanges and the bid seems to have more to do with Nasdaq management's desire to lead consolidation. Their shareholders should be asking tough questions about the price to be paid for that privilege.

For users the danger is that a Nasdaq deal makes consolidation among the European exchanges more difficult. With the NYSE likely to buy Paris-based Euronext, Europe may be stuck with three large exchanges: two owned by American rivals, and an independent Deutsche Börse. But what users want is a pan-European exchange, with independent, pan-European clearing and settlement.

DOJ_NMG_0096707

The real prizes would be mergers among Europe's national exchanges and the merger of Deutsche Börse's clearing and settlement arm with LCH.Clearnet, which performs that function for the LSE and Euronext. A Nasdaq deal with the LSE brings such outcomes no closer. Shareholders in the LSE are likely to accept an offer at the right price. But stock exchange users will still sigh about the handsome Europeans the LSE turned away.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Snowmobile Plan Proposed For Yellowstone (AP-Y)

By Mary Clare Jalonick

AP, November 21, 2006

The National Park Service wants to maintain snowmobile regulations allowing 720 snowmobiles per day to enter Yellowstone National Park.

A draft statement issued Monday by the agency mirrors a temporary plan that has been in use for the past two winters. It would also allow 140 snowmobiles a day to enter Grand Teton National Park and the John D. Rockefeller Jr. Parkway, which connects the two parks.

The snowmobiles must use what the Park Service calls "best available technology" to reduce noise and pollution levels.

The plan was issued to other government agencies. The public will be able to comment on a separate draft expected in March.

Park officials stressed that the report is only a draft and that the plan is the agency's preferred alternative out of several proposals. A final plan is expected to be issued in time for the 2007-2008 winter season.

The agency has been looking at a wide range of options, from a ban on snowmobiles in Yellowstone in favor of snowcoaches — which run on tracks and can carry several people — to allowing more snowmobiles, which generally carry one to two.

"We are far away from the final decision," Grand Teton National Park spokeswoman Joan Anzelmo said.

The plan would limit snowcoaches in Yellowstone to 78 per day and require those vehicles to meet sound and emissions requirements.

For years, snowmobile access to the park was largely unrestricted. But that ended before the 2003-04 winter, when the Park Service moved from a Clinton administration-era plan that called for phasing out snowmobiles in favor of snowcoaches and decided instead to limit the numbers and types of snowmobiles. Court challenges have also delayed a final decision.

Jon Catton, a Bozeman, Mont.-based conservationist, called the proposal "an unfortunate U-turn by the administration only months after it pledged to emphasize conservation in our national parks." Catton said noise pollution has continued to be a problem, even though far fewer than 720 snowmobiles have entered the park each year.

Yellowstone Plans To Retain Current Snowmobile Limit (NYT)

By Jim Robbins

The New York Times, November 21, 2006

HELENA, Mont., Nov. 20 — Yellowstone National Park officials say they will keep the number of snowmobiles allowed into the park at the level it has been under a temporary plan for three years, about 720 a day.

The park released a long-awaited draft environmental impact statement on Monday, proposing a long-term winter use plan for Yellowstone and Grand Teton National Parks.

Officials are seeking comments from the states and counties that border the park and will release another draft document for public comment early next year. The new plan will go into effect for the winter of 2009.

DOJ_NMG_0096708

Allowing snowmobiles into Yellowstone, the nation's most famous wilderness park, has been hugely controversial and political. The current statement is the fourth environmental study of snow machines in the park. The Clinton administration proposed banning snowmobiles; the Bush administration proposed a limit of 1,000 a day.

The latest plan would allow 720 a day, split among the three main entrances. All snowmobiles that enter the park have to meet noise and pollution standards.

Although 720 is the current limit, the park has averaged only 250 snowmobile visits a day in the last three years. Environmentalists had hoped that the new plan would reflect the lower number.

"Yellowstone has a noise problem with 250 snowmobiles a day," Jon Catton, an environmentalist in Bozeman, said. "The park service says it already interferes with visitors' ability to hear erupting geysers and wildlife. This proposal will make it worse by allowing a threefold increase."

A spokesman for the park, Al Nash, said, "All of our measures would meet federal and state air quality guidelines," because of new technology.

Noise problems, Mr. Nash said, are largely caused by older snow coaches, an over-snow bus on rubber treads or skis.

The new plan requires such coaches to meet stricter sound and emission levels and limits them to 78 a day. On average, 32 now enter the park daily.

Businesses that depend on snowmobiles favor keeping the higher number.

The new limit, said Glen Loomis, owner of a snowmobiling and snow coach business in West Yellowstone, "still protects the wildlife and other values."

The new plan would also keep a requirement that snowmobilers ride with guides. Business owners have said that requirement limits the number of snowmobilers who visit the park.

Mr. Nash said the guide requirement had proven successful.

"We've seen the number of arrests and moving violations dramatically decrease," he said. "Guided travel is a way to provide safe and effective travel."

Environmentalists Seek Marine Protection For Parts Of Northwest Atlantic (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, November 21, 2006

(AP) - BOSTON-Parts of the northwest Atlantic Ocean stretching from Cape Cod in Massachusetts to the northeastern tip of Nova Scotia in Canada should be declared off-limits to fishing and other human activities in order to protect threatened marine species, two environmental groups said Monday.

The Boston-based Conservation Law Foundation and the World Wildlife Fund-Canada recommended creating 30 marine reserves extending 10 miles (16 kilometers) to 200 miles (322 kilometers) from shore.

The proposed zones include productive fishing areas, however, and creating the reserves in U.S. waters would require federal authorization.

A fishing industry official worried that closing large areas permanently could make it harder for fishermen to earn a living.

"They have to be very careful not to close an area that is producing a lot of net benefit to the nation," Vito Giacalone of the Northeast Seafood Coalition told The Boston Globe newspaper.

The groups said they used computer technology to identify offshore areas where a large number of species could be protected while imposing the fewest restrictions.

Letters (WSJ)

Wall Street Journal, November 21, 2006

LETTERS

'Freedom' Is America's Truth, Sen. Webb -- 'Fairness' Is Subjective

In response to Jim Webb's Nov. 15 editorial-page essay "American Workers Have a Chance To Be Heard":

It is unfortunate, albeit not unexpected, that senator-elect Jim Webb makes the common mistake of using income inequality as a gauge of social injustice in this country. In a free market, income inequality is the inevitable result of individual productivity inequality, and of course productivity inequality exists due to variations in natural ability, industriousness, education, risk-aversion and dumb luck. The reason income equality has grown rapidly (although hardly "infinitely," as Mr. Webb hyperbolically asserts) is that productivity inequality has grown. And the reason productivity inequality has grown is that with the advance of technology and globalization, the impact of a good idea or exceptional performance can be leveraged dozens of times more than it could be even one generation ago. J. K. Rowling, the author of the Harry Potter series, has made more than $200 million for each book she has written. Is that too much? Absolutely not, when one considers the benefits that each book brings to tens of millions of children (and adults) around the globe. But the impact of J.K. Rowling's creativity and hard work, and the income she has earned from it, would have been perhaps orders of magnitude smaller 30 years ago.

Mr. Webb misses the point that one of the pillars of a free-market economy is that people should be allowed to earn in proportion to their productivity. To use government to do otherwise would be to impede productivity everywhere. In fact, my guess is that in most of the regrettable cases in which income vastly outstrips productivity, government intervention is probably to blame. The news that the three richest counties in the United States are clustered around Washington, D.C., certainly came as no surprise to me this morning.

In any case, a much better gauge of social injustice is consumption inequality. Of what relevance is it that there is large income inequality? Or wealth inequality for that matter? It only matters to the extent that it translates into unequal consumption of the country's resources, consumption being the true gauge of one's standard of living. I have not seen studies in this area, but my guess is that we are many times less unequal in our rates of consumption than in our levels of income or wealth.

Eric Meyer

Newton, Mass.

Blah, blah, blah. When are we going to actually hear something of substance from the Democrats? You would think they would've begun outlining how to deal with the "inequalities." People will start to think that they might not know what to do next.

Michael S. Woodard

Charlotte, N.C.

Mr. Webb forgets to mention in his diatribe against top wage earners that the top 5% band of earners pay 57% of the country's total income taxes. I guess that kind of data flew out of his mind when he switched sides.

Margaret McGirr

Greenwich, Conn.

Underneath the smooth rhetoric is a frightening message: "Fairness" is emphasized, but "freedom" not at all. Beware of any politician who places fairness over freedom. What is at jeopardy, in his hands, are your life, liberty and property.

Jim Brankin

Southlake, Texas

Mr. Webb asserts that the top 1% of wage earners "takes in" (not earns, mind you) "an astounding 16% of national income." IRS statistics for 2003 show the same top 1% pays a truly "astounding" 34.3% of all income taxes. If Mr. Webb could replace DNC talking points with some thinking and historical perspective, he might contribute rational problem solving rather then tired class envy and nostalgia for Great Society nostrums that led to Jimmy Carteresque stagflation.

Jay S. Haberman

New York

Nowhere does Mr. Webb actually outline what he'll do to benefit the American worker. All he provides is a list of Democrat buzzwords and phrases -- job outsourcing, CEO compensation, Rove, wage gap, Wal-Mart, etc. I have no problem with Democrats addressing issues they perceive to be hurting the American worker, but, please -- offer solutions.

Timothy O. Corkery

South Boston

Mr. Webb is long on class envy and short on facts. Nowhere does he state what he would do to change the status quo. Senator, it is not the politics of the Karl Rove era that are distracting and dividing people -- it's you.

Joe Schroeder

Big Canoe, Ga.

Mr. Webb's rant is right in tune with the heart and soul of his new party. He sounds like Willy Stark.

DOJ_NMG_0096710

Douglass M. Holmes

Louisville, Ky.

I'm so glad Mr. Webb opened my eyes to the fact that we mindless rubes, who are concerned only with the issues of "God, guns, gays, abortion and the flag," have merely been victims of seduction by the all powerful "Oz" -- Karl Rove.

Mark Rauschenberger

Washington

The country has changed in the 40 years since Mr. Webb "graduated from college in the 1960s," but apparently he has not. Today, the percentage of home owners has increased from under 20% to about 70%; the stock-owning investor class has increased from less than 10% to about 60%. The "top tier" that "has grown richer" has itself increased (as a definition of upper middle class and above) exponentially. All of this is under a program of steady decrease in taxation and regulation.

Lenny Toboroff

New York

If so many jobs are disappearing, as Mr. Webb would have us believe, why is unemployment at a historical low?

Patrick Duffy

Haddon Township, N.J.

Mr. Webb says "manufacturing jobs are disappearing." True. Contrary to his suggestion, though, this fact is unrelated to recent trends in globalization, corporate governance or tax policy. Manufacturing jobs as a percentage of the U.S. work force peaked in 1945 and have declined steadily ever since, even though manufacturing output continues to rise. Today this output is at an all-time high.

Donald J. Boudreaux

Chairman

Department of Economics

George Mason University

Fairfax, Va.

Mr. Webb's discussion of class structure implies that we are locked into a class and cannot escape, something that is simply not true in America. We can all move through various economic situations quite fluidly without any restrictions due to birth. Mr. Webb himself is a fine example: From his days working part time in college to becoming a best selling author to a senator, he has moved dramatically between various "classes" of earnings. Opportunity in America is distinctly classless.

Richard Noble

Eagle, Ind.

Jim Webb expresses a profoundly shocking un-American idea: From each according to his ability, to each according to his need. Our founding principle of individual rights recognizes the sovereignty of the individual in his thoughts and actions and the government as the protector of the individual's life, liberty, property and pursuit of his own individual happiness. The values he creates by his own efforts are his to dispose of as he chooses, not the property of the family, the tribe, or the state. There is no national income.

Ralph C. Whaley, M.D.

Barron, Wis.

Great Plains Drought Is a National Disaster

Your Nov. 15 editorial "Fargonomics" misrepresents the facts on agriculture disaster assistance. My bipartisan legislation would bring badly needed federal aid to the thousands of farm and ranch families whose livelihoods were destroyed by natural disasters including drought, flood, frost and disease.

This country has always responded to disasters, whether hurricanes, wildfires or drought. To represent the deepening drought of the Great Plains as anything but a national disaster is an affront to every farm family in the Midwest. This is the third worst drought in U.S. history, searing millions of acres of crops and livestock forage, and driving producers and the small town businesses that rely on them to the brink of foreclosure. If we do not respond, the drought will be followed by economic disaster across the plains.

DOJ_NMG_0096711

You misrepresent the role of crop insurance. Yes, crop insurance is an important risk management tool for farmers and ranchers. But when those losses stack up year to year, as has happened as the drought conditions have worsened year after year, crop insurance loses its effectiveness -- the amount of crop loss covered goes down, while premiums go up. Crop insurance was never designed to cover repeated losses. Crop insurance isn't covering basic farm expenses, and the natural disasters depleting our farms and ranches are breaking the backbone of the Midwest economy.

Sen. Kent Conrad (D., N.D.)

Washington

Suffering in Africa Makes Us See (RED)

Your Nov. 10 editorial "Shopping for the Poor" (Taste page, Weekend Journal) made an astute observation: "Good charity" theory includes (in its DNA) the concept of sacrifice. You suggest that (Product) RED, our venture, is playing a part in questioning the hair shirt thinking. That was great. But alas, you then committed several interpretive misdeeds.

First, you say "too bad" that many (Product) RED items are not made in Africa. Give us a chance! We've been in business in the U.S. only five weeks. But within these weeks, we now have what we never had during our two years developing this project: objective proof that (RED) branded products produce a measured commercial advantage. Because we did not have that proof during development, could you really have expected us to persuade giant multinationals to source 100% of the (RED) products in Africa? That said, it is great that Gap has been producing there for years and that Motorola was able to purchase packaging materials in Lesotho.

Now that Gap has proved our theory, you will see many more products manufactured on the continent, not because we proselytized but because companies have seen the commercial advantage in doing so.

Second, you assert that because the Geneva-based Global Fund supports "a range of heath-related projects," our manifesto's assertion that (RED) money will not purchase AIDS medicines is incorrect. I am thrilled to confirm that the fund has accepted that money made by (RED) and will be used only for purchase and delivery of medicines to those suffering from HIV in Africa, with particular emphasis on women and children.

Third, you suggest that our energy might be better spent on promoting trade with poor nations. Because we have a lot of energy, we have made this exact idea part of our work at DATA, a public education/lobbying organization Bono and I co-founded in 2000. In fact, DATA is an acronym for "Debt Aids Trade for Africa" in return for "Democracy, Accountability and Transparency for Africa." Along with many others, we have supported new trade initiatives, including the Millennium Challenge Corp., change to customs regulations and AGOA, the African Growth and Opportunity Act, which allows tremendous new investment and trade between the U.S. and Africa. Our sister entity, one.org, works on trade issues in a grassroots manner.

We created (RED) to bring the marketing brilliance and the budgets of the private sector to bear on the greatest human health-care crisis in history. To make this happen, we needed a device, a brand that would enable the bravest and smartest companies to invest and to make money on that investment. (RED) is that brand.

Gap's campaign has proved our idea not only by its genius advertising and products, but by that fact that all Gap employees have been trained to explain this crisis to customers. In malls across America, young Americans are explaining AIDS to their customers and selling them T-shirts made in Lesotho and denim made in America from African cotton. As success builds on itself, more products will be sourced in Africa.

In addition, Motorola has launched its (Product) RED phones with Sprint and US Cellular -- wait until sales people in Sprint stores are telling stories about the positive effects of America's medicines and the opportunities for investment in Africa. Wow.

The Wall Street Journal

200 Liberty Street

New York, N.Y. 10281

Fax: (212) 416-2255

E-mail: wsj.ltrs@wsj.com

Because of the large volume of mail, all letters are subject to abridgment and those unpublished can be neither acknowledged nor returned.

DOJ_NMG_0096712

Navajos' Desert Cleanup No More Than A Mirage (LAT)

By Judy Pasternak, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, November 21, 2006

Through a federal program, decontamination seemed possible. But delays and disputes thwarted the effort.

Church Rock Mine, N.M. — Most of the mining companies that drilled, dug and blasted for uranium on the Navajo reservation during the Cold War did nothing to repair the environmental damage they left behind. For a time, tribal leaders staked their hopes for a cleanup on Superfund, the landmark legislation that forces polluters to pay for remediation of toxic sites.

More than 1,000 abandoned mines are scattered across the Navajo homeland, which covers 27,000 square miles in Arizona, Utah and New Mexico.

Such a comprehensive cleanup is "exactly what Superfund was designed for," said Paul Connor, a lawyer who once directed Superfund enforcement policy for the Environmental Protection Agency.

It hasn't happened. Bureaucratic delays and misunderstandings between the tribe and the EPA have prevented the Navajos from tapping Superfund's deep pockets and broad legal authority.

Instead, the tribe reluctantly settled for a partial cleanup under a separate program. That effort left many hazards untouched.

One of them is in Church Rock Mine, a Navajo community named for an abandoned uranium site. A 30-foot-high heap of grit and dynamited stone from the mine looms over a cluster of 15 homes. The wind roars for hours at a time, scattering radioactive dust throughout the settlement.

For years, residents appealed to tribal leaders and the U.S. government for help. In 2003, tired of waiting, they joined forces with Navajo activists who were using a foundation grant to conduct radiation testing.

In a dry wash where generations of children had played catch and tag, they discovered elevated radiation levels.

As word spread of the citizen effort, authorities stirred at last. Under pressure from the tribe, the EPA opened negotiations with the mine's operator, United Nuclear Corp., and its parent, General Electric Co., to clean up the mess.

If the companies eventually foot the bill, it would mark the first time a polluter has been held to account under Superfund for contaminating the reservation.

But like the Church Rock families, members of other Navajo communities are done waiting for the government to act. They have reached out to environmental groups or university scientists, hoping to fashion their own solutions.

"The Navajos need a champion," said Glynn R. Alsup, a retired Army Corps of Engineers official who served as a liaison to the Navajos. "The EPA and the tribe should be knocking on doors in Congress every year if they need money. I don't see that happening."

*

Thwarted efforts

The Navajos allowed intensive uranium mining by private companies starting in the 1940s. The lone buyer of the uranium was the federal government. The nuclear arms race with the Soviet Union was just beginning, and U.S. officials were desperate for material to make atomic bombs.

In contracts typed on onion-skin paper, the companies promised to leave the land "in as good condition as received." The federal Bureau of Indian Affairs approved all leases and was supposed to enforce their terms.

When demand for uranium eased in the late 1950s, mines and processing mills began to close. The operators often left behind open tunnels and shafts and piles of radioactive tailings. Rarely did they fence off the sites or post warning signs. Federal inspectors knew of the hazards but seldom intervened.

Decades passed. As former miners were dying of lung cancer and respiratory disease in the 1970s, their widows started to wonder whether they and their children were endangered by the detritus of the uranium boom.

In 1982, the tribal government demanded $6.7 million from a federal claims court to seal and clean about 300 mines. The tribe argued that federal inspectors had failed to enforce safety standards in order to keep down the price of bomb material.

A judge rejected the claim in 1985, calling the allegations "entirely speculative."

DOJ_NMG_0096713

Next, tribal officials considered suing the mining companies. But a legal consultant advised that victory was unlikely because the firms had operated and departed with government approval.

The only other parties possibly liable were tribal members who had staked mineral claims and leased them to outside companies. But few of those Navajos made much money.

Running short of options, the tribe pinned its hopes on Superfund.

*

Superfund criteria

The 1980 law gave the EPA power to identify the worst toxic-waste sites and force polluters to pay for cleanup, health studies, clinics, maintenance and monitoring. If no polluters could be found, EPA could pay for the cleanup from its $1.6-billion trust.

To get a site on Superfund's priority list, the tribe had to document the pollution. So staff members of the Navajo environmental commission, established in 1972, went from mine to mine, assessing contamination levels.

As they drove near New Mexico's Haystack Butte in 1990, their radiation detector began beeping. They determined that the radiation was coming from two mining complexes just outside the reservation. More than 50 Navajos lived within half a mile. Inspectors from the federal Centers for Disease Control and Prevention declared a health emergency.

Determining who was responsible for the contamination proved arduous. Most of the mine operators had vanished. The Department of Energy paid to clean a part of the site once leased by the Atomic Energy Commission. Another portion was owned by the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway. A subsidiary had mined there, and the railroad agreed to pay for cleanup.

The EPA did not pursue any other companies and ultimately paid for the balance of the cleanup — $500,000. The work was finished in 1992.

Sadie Hoskie, then the Navajo environmental administrator, figured there had to be another way. Restoring the reservation one mine at a time would take too long.

"We were concerned about the health impacts on the people," recalled Hoskie, who was working for the Navajos while on leave from a position at the EPA. "Their daily lives were not as safe as they believed."

In 1993, Hoskie went to Washington to complain. She told members of two House subcommittees that the Navajos wanted "speedy, thorough and permanent remediation of all sites."

Of 42 abandoned mines investigated by her staff, 28 were hazardous under Superfund criteria. But none had made it onto the national priority list — a sought-after status that all but assured the EPA would put its money and muscle behind a cleanup.

The reservation's low population density worked against the Navajos in the Superfund ranking system. The process "has proven a failure and must be changed," Hoskie said.

Rep. George Miller (D-Martinez) criticized the "piecemeal and uncoordinated approach" that "fails to eliminate the radiation health hazard."

Bill Richardson, then a Democratic congressman from New Mexico and now the state's governor, said the work at Haystack Butte was "all well and good, but "there must be a final and complete way to address the problems of cleanup."

*

Disagreements

To Hoskie, King Tutt Mesa illustrated the need for a comprehensive approach.

The rock tabletop in the reservation's northeast section was once the domain of a Navajo couple named King and Despah Tutt.

From 1953 to 1958, the Tutts leased a parcel known as King Tutt No. 1 to a succession of operators, the largest of which was Vanadium Corp. of America.

In 1989, Navajo inspectors visited the abandoned site and found huge mounds of dust and ore rich in uranium and other heavy metals — vanadium, selenium and arsenic. They also found products of uranium's decay — radium, radon gas, thorium and lead.

About 200 mines had been bored into the mesa. Hoskie suggested lumping them into one Superfund application. She believed that "the sheer number of sites" would make the application hard to reject.

DOJ_NMG_0096714

After hearing her House testimony, EPA officials said they would consider the proposal.

In January 1994, tribal and federal officials gathered in Albuquerque to devise a plan for the mesa. But they quickly got bogged down. They couldn't even agree on the minutes of the meeting.

The Navajos thought the government had committed to pursuing "responsible parties" early in the process and listed this as an "action item" in their summary of the discussion.

After getting a copy, the EPA wrote back: "Please delete as an action item…. USEPA did not agree."

In 1996, federal officials finally concluded that King Tutt Mesa did meet criteria for a Superfund cleanup.

But because there were only 19 homes within three miles, its chances of making the national priority list were uncertain, said Andrew Bain, a regional EPA manager.

There was one sure way to make the cut. The Navajo president, like any state governor, could designate a single site for the national list. If the president wrote a letter, King Tutt Mesa could be the one.

But by then, the EPA was urging the tribe to consider a different path.

*

Another approach

Long before the uranium boom, miners had been digging for coal in Navajo country. Hundreds of spent coal mines dotted the reservation, and by the 1990s the tribe was filling and sealing them.

The work was paid for with fees collected from coal mining companies across the country and distributed by the Interior Department. The EPA began pushing the Navajos to use this coal money to seal the uranium mines, too.

Hoskie much preferred Superfund. The coal program wasn't designed to deal with the complicated issues surrounding the uranium sites.

Superfund gave the EPA the power to clean polluted groundwater that had spread beyond a mining site. The coal program couldn't pay for that.

Superfund could remove and replace homes built with radioactive waste, a pervasive problem on the reservation. The coal program couldn't pay for that, either.

Superfund could go after mining companies to pay for cleanups. The coal program couldn't.

But the coal-fee money had one big advantage: It was readily available.

As for Superfund, even if the tribe put King Tutt Mesa on the national priority list, EPA's pursuit of the polluters could get tied up in court for years. The hundreds of other Superfund candidates on the reservation faced even longer delays, if they made the list at all.

In May 1994, the Navajos finished sealing entrances to the reservation's coal mines. The Interior Department certified that the tribe could start using coal money to fill uranium mines.

In the Navajo capital of Window Rock, Ariz., the time had come to make a choice.

Navajo Abandoned Mine Lands, the tribal unit that sealed old mines, was ready to start work on King Tutt "right then and there," recalled Stanley Edison, a chemist for the Navajo environmental agency.

"We'd been waiting, and the residents had been waiting," he said.

A partial cleanup trumped none at all, Navajo officials decided.

*

Starting over

Over the next decade, the tribe's workers sealed about 900 uranium mines, at a cost of more than $25 million. The achievement was substantial: Most of the old pits and shafts no longer presented a temptation to people and animals seeking shelter and water.

But Madeline Roanhorse, head of the Abandoned Mine Lands department, noted at a 2004 meeting in Washington that her staff was charged with fixing "physical hazards, not subsurface contamination."

Another problem is that erosion keeps undoing the tribe's work. In the desert, drought and wind continually strip the earthen covers off the mines and waste piles, exposing radioactive material. The tribe's maintenance workers have trouble keeping up with this wearing-away. The task will become harder if Congress approves a proposal to shift more coal-fee money to eastern states.

DOJ_NMG_0096715

King Tutt Mesa reflects the limitations of the coal-fee program. Tribal workers have sealed the many shafts and tunnels, but polluted groundwater remains, and condemned homes, built with radioactive waste, still stand nearby.

So the effort to get the site listed for Superfund action is starting over.

On hearing this, Hoskie, now back in the Denver office of the EPA, sighed loudly. "Oh, my goodness," she said. "I don't think that the [coal-fee] reclamation is enough…. It's so bureaucratic. Why can't we rise above it?"

In 1999, Phelps Dodge Corp. swallowed the vestiges of Vanadium Corp. of America. Phelps Dodge is currently spending millions of dollars to clean up 10 former Vanadium Corp. uranium sites in remote canyons in Colorado and Utah. The company acted at the urging of the U. S. Bureau of Land Management and the Forest Service, which were concerned about the safety of hikers and campers.

Whenever Phelps Dodge is informed of such health hazards, "we will of course take responsible action," company spokesman Kenneth Vaughn said.

Asked why the firm was not cleaning King Tutt Mesa or other Vanadium Corp. sites on the Navajo reservation, Vaughn said there was a simple explanation:

"No one asked."

*

Turning elsewhere

In 1998, the EPA finally began to test for radiation and water contamination throughout the reservation. Navajo leaders saw reason to hope for the thorough cleanup that had eluded them for so long. But the sampling effort ended prematurely after an argument between tribal and U.S. officials over control of information.

The Navajos demanded that the federal crew pack up and leave. The sampling never resumed.

Ordinary Navajos resolved to turn elsewhere for help.

Milton Yazzie had been trying for seven years to get the tribe or EPA to test springs and reservoirs in Black Falls, Ariz. He suspected that cancers, kidney disease and eye problems among his family and neighbors were connected to the uranium mines. Yazzie drove an hour or more to Flagstaff, Ariz., several times a week to fill barrels with drinking water for his family.

In 2002, he persuaded EPA officials to hold a meeting at his parents' home to talk about uranium hazards. A year later, the agency honored him as an "environmental hero." He drove to San Francisco to receive a plaque.

"Despite approaching numerous agencies, the area remains without clean, regulated water," an EPA news release said.

Yet six months later, the EPA denied an application from the U.S. Indian Health Service for a grant to bring clean water to Black Falls. The project was "ineligible," EPA officials said, because there was no evidence that the locals were drinking polluted water.

At wit's end, Yazzie asked researchers at Northern Arizona University to help. He guided chemistry professor Jani Ingram to six springs, wells and reservoirs. Tests of the water found dangerous concentrations of uranium and arsenic.

The Indian Health Service went back to the EPA. Eventually, the agency provided $830,000 for a pipeline to Black Falls Bible Church, where water will be sold to residents. The pipeline is expected to be finished in 2008.

But Yazzie, 49, said he would always wonder whether tainted water caused the kidney cancer that took his sister's life last year. She was 59.

When a tribal official e-mailed condolences, Yazzie typed a choppy reply: "There isn't a day that goes by thinking, what if I had done things differently, something would have been accomplished."

In the hamlet of Red Valley, Ariz., residents fear that pollution from uranium mines will spoil their plans for a new ball field, senior center, high school and other development. The planning committee contacted Franz Geiger, a chemist at Northwestern University, who sampled six wells in June 2004 and found uranium and arsenic. The concentrations were particularly high in a well serving 200 students at Red Rock Day School.

Back on campus, Geiger and a student researcher experimented with filters they hoped would remove the contaminants. The filters took out uranium, but not arsenic.

DOJ_NMG_0096716

"It's at best a temporary solution," Geiger said, "but it's something."

*

A big gray heap

Before United Nuclear Corp. began mining there in 1968, the valley where the big waste pile now stands was called Red Water, for the color of the local pond after a heavy rain. But residents soon adopted the name of their noisy new neighbor, Church Rock Mine.

Before long, they got used to the rumble of pickup trucks dropping low-grade ore off a ridge. In time, the waste pile reached the top of the cliff and stretched along its breadth.

Teddy Nez, his wife and their children lived about 500 feet from the heap. When United Nuclear closed the mine in 1982, Nez assumed the company would haul away the waste. He was wrong. He watched with concern as sheep, goats and cattle climbed up the pile and onto the ridge and as people searched the property for sacred herbs for healing ceremonies.

Through the 1980s, Nez, his wife Bertha and her cousin lobbied Navajo leaders to complain to the EPA.

Diane Malone, the tribe's liaison to the Superfund program, said she didn't learn about the waste pile until the mid-'90s, and then by chance. She was invited on a tour of United Nuclear's nearby processing mill, just off the reservation, which was being cleaned under Superfund.

Malone glimpsed the gray heap on the Navajo side of the border. On future visits to the mill site, she'd ask company and EPA officials: "Why is that pile still sitting there?"

"Nobody really took it seriously," she said.

Through fellow Navajos, Church Rock residents made contact with Chris Shuey, who studies uranium issues for the Southwest Research and Information Center in Albuquerque. With Shuey's help, Navajo activists had obtained a $90,000 grant to conduct radiation testing. Church Rock Mine was added to the project.

On learning of the grass-roots effort, the EPA provided technicians and a van with radiation-scanning equipment. The tribe donated detectors and training.

Malone joined the Navajos who walked through the residential community near the waste pile in October 2003, halting every few steps to take readings at waist and ground level. The morning was cold and blustery and the readings confirmed that the sand stinging their faces was radioactive.

"We just wanted to get out of there," she said.

The EPA concluded that chronic exposure to the radiation levels in the valley could lead to bone, liver and breast cancers.

In September, after negotiations with the agency, United Nuclear agreed to investigate the extent of the contamination. Then the two sides will discuss what further steps to take.

The network of families in the valley includes 96 grandchildren. The grown-ups want them to be able to stay and raise families of their own.

"We would like for them to build houses here that are safe," said Teddy Nez. "That's our goal."

judy.pasternak@latimes.com

Times researcher Mark Madden contributed to this report.*

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Senators To FBI: Get A VCF Refund (GCN)

By Wilson P. Dizard III

Government Computer News, November 21, 2006

Proposal would pit bureau against SAIC over failure

The Senate's draft of the appropriations bill for the Justice Department and the FBI would order the bureau to use "all means necessary" to try to recover funds from the vendor of its failed Virtual Case File project.

In an unusual action, according to several sources, the draft legislation—known as HR 5672, the Departments of Commerce and Justice, Science and Related Agencies appropriations bill—directs the bureau to retrieve as much as $104 million from the defaulted VCF contract.

The FBI hired Science Applications International Corp. of San Diego in 2001 to build VCF, which was intended to create an investigative case management system. The FBI pulled the plug in 2005 after realizing the system would not work.

A key sentence in the Senate report language for HR 5672 reads: "In addition, the Committee expects the FBI to use all means necessary, including legal action, to recover all erroneous charges from the VCF contractor ... ."

The Senate's reference to "the VCF contractor" especially singles out SAIC.

The FBI and SAIC both declined to comment on the legislation and related VCF matters.

If the FBI could recover funds, the bill would direct the bureau to use the money it would potentially recover from the VCF contractors on its current case management project, known as Sentinel.

The House version of the bill does not include a similar provision—meaning if the full Senate passes the bill with the language intact, it still could be stripped out during the conference committee session between the two bodies.

If the FBI were to try to take legal action to recover the VCF funds, it would be stepping into a legal and political minefield, sources close to the project said.

For one thing, even after the FBI had decided to scuttle the investigative case management system, SAIC recommended that the bureau should deploy VCF and made detailed technical proposals on how it could be salvaged.

Another critical problem is that the bureau has accepted some responsibility for the demise of the VCF project [GCN.com, Quickfind 714]. Sources close to the project said that some of the senior officials in place during the VCF fiasco—including director Robert Mueller—still hold powerful jobs in the bureau, and their reputations could suffer if a public lawsuit or civil trial unveiled the details of their roles.

The Senate Appropriations Committee itself acknowledged the bureau's role in bungling VCF, in report language attached to HR 5672: "The Committee understands that the FBI shares much of the burden for past IT failures."

One federal official involved in the VCF incident noted that federal contract law requires an agency that has cancelled a project because of contractor default to attempt to recover the funds from the contractor. "The FBI did not carry out that obligation because it never punishes its own," the official said.

"The real issue is why didn't they [seek to get the money back from SAIC]," the official said. "The world's greatest investigative body slowed this down. The answer is culpability of the FBI officials who are still there. Mueller says he takes the responsibility. I still think there is accountability and culpability."

A prominent federal procurement law attorney noted, "In general, when it terminates for default, the government has the same rights as a private party would in the event of a breach of contract [to recover misused funds].

"However, what the government usually does is to assess 'excess reprocurement costs,' " the attorney said. "In other words, it buys the same thing from someone else, and if it costs more, it charges the difference to the defaulted contractor."

The procurement attorney cautioned that he had not studied the specific details of the FBI's pact with SAIC, so he could not comment on how the general principles of federal contract law would apply to that specific matter.

The FBI and SAIC both declined to comment on the legislation and related VCF matters.

Legislative analysts said the VCF fund recovery language was inserted at the behest of Sen. Judd Gregg (R-N.H.), who is the second most senior Republican member of the Appropriations Subcommittee on Commerce, Justice and Science. Gregg's office did not respond to a detailed inquiry on the matter.

The full name of HR 5672 is the Departments of Commerce and Justice, Science and Related Agencies Appropriations Bill, [fiscal] 2007.

In addition to requiring the FBI to get back the money it paid to SAIC, the bill imposed other restrictions on the bureau that reflected the committee's skepticism that the agency is capable of managing large software projects.

DrugNet, Chapter 3: The PowerPoint (PHI)

By John Shiffman

DOJ_NMG_0096718

The Philadelphia Inquirer, November 21, 2006

THE STORY SO FAR: Pills discovered at Philly's airport launch DEA's first global Internet pharmacy case, leading agents to a rendezvous with a mysterious shipper and a clue from overseas. Today's installment begins as Akhil Bansal, smuggling a half-million pills a month here from India, prepares for the biggest business meeting of his young life. It is July 2004.

ROXBOROUGH

"A red tie?"

Akhil Bansal scoffed. So far, he had accepted most of his roommate Atul Patil's advice for the big meeting: Put together a compelling PowerPoint presentation. Lean forward when you speak. Exaggerate your expenses, and expect the buyer to do the same. Above all, don't budge on price.

But the color of a tie? What difference could it make?

"It is a business tie - red means power," explained Patil, also an MBA student at Temple University. "You want them to take you seriously."

Akhil knotted the tie. The Manhattan meeting his father, Brij Bansal, had set up from India was too important to ignore any detail. A Costa Rican client sought an exclusive deal to buy 500,000 generic pills a month. Millions of dollars were at stake.

Akhil stepped from his apartment near Fairmount Park in Philadelphia and into the humid day. The laptop he carried contained a PowerPoint presentation of which he was very proud - one that months later would come back to haunt him.

He revved his Chevy TrailBlazer and sped toward Manhattan.

CHINATOWN

Like most law enforcement agencies in Philadelphia, DEA liked to keep cases in the family.

When other agencies got involved, DEA worried about losing control. Or sharing the credit - what feds called "the stat" - or sharing cash, cars and property seized in the arrests.

Carlos Aquino understood this.

He also understood that this case was different. DEA had never conducted an Internet pharmacy case on such a scale. It needed help.

What Carlos initially viewed as a quick-hit investigation had morphed into something much bigger, perhaps the case of his career.

Four months earlier, Carlos traced 119 packages of generic Valium and Viagra to a Chester shipper and two Indian graduate students. The shipper was an ex-con. The Indians looked like small-timers, couriers maybe.

The identity of the real targets - the Internet pharmacy kingpins - wasn't clear yet. But already a clue found at the shipper's storefront had led to something called Rx-mart.com, and from there to an Australian pharmacy with global tentacles.

So far, DEA had identified suspect Web pharmacies in Australia, India, Germany, New York, Virginia and Philadelphia. The pharmacies bought generic drugs for pennies a pill, then sold them online, without requiring a prescription, for a dollar apiece.

In a report Carlos shared with Homeland Security, he wrote: "Early investigative findings indicate... sales of $108 million annually... . This organization generates enough revenue per year to purchase a virtually unlimited supply of drugs."

In short, a public-health nightmare - people, even teens, buying highly addictive pills online, generics made cheap overseas, from who knows where.

Carlos approached DEA supervisor Jeff Breeden to begin putting together a team with other agencies. At a minimum, they would need people to trace Web sites, track bank accounts, run surveillance, supervise wiretaps, and trace passport and customs data.

Carlos sat in his DEA cubicle on Eighth Street, looked at the ferns, the Puerto Rican flag, and his Emiliano Zapata poster, and tried to think of a sexy title for the investigation, something to remind everyone who was top dog.

Carlos called it "Carlito's Way."

N.J. TURNPIKE

Akhil drove as fast as he dared, rolling through toll plazas with E-ZPass, toward Jersey's congested north and Manhattan.

He loved driving, just as he loved computers and business.

DOJ_NMG_0096719

He missed India's hectic traffic with its Darwinian rules. For a young man who hated video games - they wasted valuable computer memory - driving was the ultimate reality game.

At home, he'd snake through Agra's clogged, 16th-century roads, then break onto the highways that split farmland between Agra and Delhi, or roar east to the Himalayas and Nepal. He'd push his Korean sedan to 80 m.p.h., crank up the air, and blast his 12-CD stereo, the woofer thumping Phil Collins or a Hindi cover of "Pretty Woman."

Using the horn more than the brake, like any good Indian driver, Akhil would lean low, bouncing from lane to lane, zooming past cows, chickens, scrawny dogs, motorized rickshaws, camels carting rice, semis hauling flammable fuels, pickups stacked with wind-whipped riders. He'd fly by grimy green buses jammed with lesser castes, by women ferrying jugs on their heads, by motorbikes balancing families of four.

The sight of the Manhattan skyline with its steel canyons jolted Akhil back to the task at hand.

He did his best to act cool, but he was glad his roommate had come along. Patil was 30, five years older than Akhil, though his receding hairline made him appear older than that. Patil read books on the art of negotiation. Patil knew what he was doing.

They were on their way to meet Corrina Meherer, an executive for Interphar, a Costa Rican-based Internet pharmacy that also operated strip clubs. Interphar, looking to expand its business with the Bansals, had sent Meherer to New York to eyeball Akhil and his operation.

Akhil viewed the meeting as a different kind of test. He had built his father's U.S. business into an efficient, assembly-line operation, largely by phone and e-mail. But now he was headed for his first face-to-face business negotiation.

Could he close the deal? Or was he some young poseur playing businessman in a fantasy league?

WASHINGTON

DEA Administrator Karen Tandy had just settled into her seat at a U.S. Senate hearing, her prepared text next to the microphone, when the chairman began to rant.

"We are drowning in a flood of imported drugs of unknown composition and origin as well as potentially lethal controlled substances," Sen. Norm Coleman said. Unknown quantities of untested imported drugs too easily slip through customs, he said, mostly through regular cargo to JFK Airport.

"The federal government has been on notice about this issue for at least five years," the Minnesota Republican complained. "Many of the initiatives that we will hear about today sound eerily familiar. I am concerned by the apparent lack of progress in getting our arms around this glaring problem."

Tandy didn't disagree. "The attorney general and I have made it a priority," she said.

CHINATOWN

By midsummer, Carlos and Breeden had finished assembling a team for Operation Carlito's Way:

DEA agent Eric Russ - age 36, a no-nonsense former Marine who had worked hard-core pot, cocaine and heroin jobs, but never a pill case. No Internet jock, he still used AOL dial-up at home. His assignment: With Carlos, supervise the case.

IRS agent Aaron Carp - age 25, eager, hungry for something significant. His assignment: Trace bank records.

FBI agent Jason Huff - age 30, a buttoned-down software engineer recently transferred from the antiterror squad. His assignment: Trace the Web addresses of pharmacies and make undercover online purchases.

Immigration Customs Enforcement agent Andrew McCrossan - age 55, paternal, a customs inspector for 23 years. His assignment: Search passport, travel and global financial databases and determine how pills are smuggled past Customs.

Lower Merion Police Officer Christine Konieczny - age 35, quick-witted, a natural leader, one of a dozen suburban Philadelphia officers on loan to DEA since 2001. Her assignment: Supervise surveillance of the Indian suspects.

At Carlos' request, Konieczny took Carp and Huff on an early undercover job. When the young crewcut agents showed up, veteran cops on the detail cringed.

The baby-faced FBI man wore a suit, making him look a lot like... an FBI agent. And the IRS kid? He sported a Hawaiian shirt and shades, like something off the set of Magnum, P.I.

Konieczny laughed.

FORT LAUDERDALE, FLA.

Vic Devore, who ran bigcitymeds.com, studied the spam e-mail:

DOJ_NMG_0096720

The medicine are the best quality available in India. We have made arrangements to ship within five to six days, in any part of USA, without any Customs problem. If you are interested...

Devore, 25, had chiseled cheekbones, white teeth, dark hair, and all-American aspirations to become a celebrity and a millionaire. He appeared well on his way, too. Devore gave traffic reports on South Florida radio and operated Web sites; some of them sold Zippo lighters, some sold generic Valium, Viagra, Darvon and Xanax.

Devore excelled at Web design, but had no medical training, not even a college degree. He didn't read the medical histories customers sometimes sent him. He didn't understand the legal disclaimers he posted. It was just marketing, words to make it all look legit.

Devore thought about the Indian's e-mail. This guy, Dr. Brij Bansal, was saying he could ship from inside the United States, which meant fewer packages seized by Customs, which meant more money.

From a Google search, Devore knew this was all illegal. Whatever. He e-mailed Bansal back.

MANHATTAN

At a hotel near Times Square, Akhil met Meherer - 34, slender, in jeans and a T-shirt.

Akhil shook hands, feeling silly in his suit. He shot Patil a screw-you stare: Red tie, eh?

Akhil opened his laptop. Time to wow her.

Akhil titled his PowerPoint presentation Evolution because it outlined the development of his pill distribution network.

Evolution had four chapters. The first three - "Stone Age," "Bronze Age" and "Iron Age" - recounted Akhil's struggle to ship pills by himself and later to use a private shipper. Results had been mixed.

Meherer listened.

Gaining confidence, Akhil moved to the final chapter, "Revolution." His was a professional operation! Pills were now shipped in bulk from India to a home in Queens. Each morning, women working there downloaded customer orders and fulfilled them via UPS. With the new system, consumers got their drugs in 48 hours.

From the last slide, Akhil read aloud questions for discussion: "Can we process more orders? Can it be done with the same efficiency? How long can we keep this going? What if anything bad happens?"

He showed her clip art of Donald Duck and dollar bills. It seemed to say: Can you believe how much we're going to make?

Meherer laughed. Akhil did, too.

PLYMOUTH MEETING, PA.

Carlos wanted to meet a customer. What kind of person ordered pills online?

Of the 119 packages seized at the airport in February, a dozen had been destined for local addresses. That gave Carlos a list of leads.

As he headed out for his first visit, background data in hand, Carlos grabbed Huff, his new FBI colleague. They headed west on the Schuylkill Expressway, past Boathouse Row, past Roxborough.

Laura, an attractive woman in her mid-20s, answered the door of a luxury townhouse. Agents knew that she and her husband had no children, and that she held a six-figure sales job with, ironically, a pharmaceutical company. She looked nervous.

Carlos tried to put her at ease. "You're not in any type of trouble. We just want to talk to you about the Ambien."

Carlos saw her hands quiver as she invited them in. They sat on overstuffed couches, near a giant flat-screen TV. Everything looked new, clean. Too perfect, Carlos thought.

The woman spoke freely, almost eager to confess her secret: It all started with insomnia two years ago, for which her doctor prescribed the proper dosage - one pill a night. When the refills ended, and her doctor refused to renew the prescription, she decided she couldn't sleep without the drug. So she got online, Googled "Ambien," found a site, and bought 100 tabs with her credit card. Days later, the pills arrived.

Carlos: "How many pills a night do you take now?"

"Ten."

Ten? The agents tried not to flinch. Two years hooked on Ambien, at possibly lethal doses.

Carlos stepped gingerly. "Have you ordered any lately?"

DOJ_NMG_0096721

The woman walked to a closet, where she hid her stash from her husband. She handed Carlos an envelope.

He spilled the pills across a coffee table and began to count.

QUEENS, N.Y.

Akhil felt pumped.

The meeting with Meherer had gone so well that the next day he took her to the Queens depot to show her how sophisticated his operation really was.

There was his fulfillment center, a clean, brick rowhouse secured by bars on the windows. He'd called ahead to send the workers home. Coffee and snacks were waiting.

Inside, Akhil gave Meherer and her Asian assistant the full tour:

Here, on the ground floor, was the office where supervisors David and Elizabeth Armstrong received e-mail orders from online pharmacies.

Here, on the second floor, the Indian women grabbed blister packs of pills from cubbyholes, each labeled with the names of the appropriate medicine.

And here, in the basement, the women packed the pills into boxes and labeled them.

Then, Akhil explained, the Armstrongs drove the packages to their nearby home, where UPS made a pickup daily.

As they moved through the tour, Patil could sense Meherer's assistant grow uneasy.

The volume. The audacity. The risk.

Patil overheard the assistant whisper to Meherer: "My God, this guy is crazy! I want to get out."

What if the police found out? What if they seized the pills? What was the plan?

Stealing a line from Akhil's PowerPoint presentation, the assistant said, "What if something bad happens?"

QUEENS

A crisp October evening three months later. Rush hour.

A silver Olds Alero parked half a block from the Armstrong home. In the front seat, two blond women in their mid-30s chatted. Stuffed animals lined the rear window, above two child-booster seats. A couple of neighborhood moms.

Out of sight, the driver cradled a police radio, the passenger a tiny video camera.

Weeks of grueling surveillance had brought the driver, Konieczny, and her DEA team here. The 10-person detail had spent days camped near the Indian students' spartan Roxborough apartment. The agents hadn't seen much, just trips to the grocery store and the bank.

And when this Akhil ventured out? The way he drove! So fast, so crazy. And tough to tail.

Besides, how important were these Indians, anyway? Were they stars of a global conspiracy? Or bit players?

Either way, they were now essential to the case. Even if they didn't lead the DEA to a big boss behind the Internet pharmacies, they gave the feds in Philadelphia jurisdiction. Without a local defendant in the case, the office couldn't prosecute.

In August, the DEA team had followed the Indians to another Queens home. In September, agents there photographed the Armstrongs stuffing packages into a 1999 Lincoln Continental with MOTOR vanity plates.

Now, as dusk fell, the MOTOR car arrived at the Armstrongs' driveway. The cops watched them unload large, see-through plastic bags, each with about 20 packages inside.

Paydirt.

At 7:03 p.m., a UPS truck pulled up.

"You getting this?" Konieczny asked her partner holding the camera, Christine Kelliher.

"Yeah," Kelliher shot back. "I remembered to push record."

With the videotape rolling, Konieczny narrated, "The front door opened, and the driver is starting to load the bags. One, two... I'll count them. Three, four, five. God. Six, seven, eight, nine, 10, 11..."

The bags were so light that the Armstrongs carried a big one in each hand.

"Unbelievable! She's got 12. That's 13. 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22. Oh, my!"

The packages kept coming.

"... 23, 24, 25, 26..."

DOJ_NMG_0096722

The agents started laughing.

"... 27, 28. Oh, my gosh, 29, 30! I think they're done. 30 bags!"

They did the math: 30 bags, each with 20 smaller packages inside. That meant UPS had loaded about 600 packages. The average online pharmacy order was 100 tabs.

The Indians had just shipped roughly 60,000 pills illegally.

"Unbelievable," Kelliher said.

Another UPS truck appeared.

"I wonder," Konieczny suggested, "if they didn't have enough room in the first one."

Texas Man Pleads Guilty To Pot Charges (AP)

AP, November 20, 2006

LOUISVILLE, Ky. - A Texas man pleaded guilty Monday to conspiracy to distribute marijuana after he was caught driving a semi-trailer truck loaded with about 1,700 pounds of pot hidden among broccoli, authorities said.

Erasmo Castillo, 27, of Starr County, Texas, pleaded guilty to one count of conspiracy to distribute marijuana and one count of possession of marijuana with intent to distribute, said U.S. Attorney David L. Huber said in a statement.

Because of the quantity of marijuana involved, Huber said, Castillo faces a penalty of from five to 40 years in prison, a fine of not more than $4 million and a term of supervised release of at least four years.

Huber said that on June 26, 2005, a commercial vehicle inspection in Hope, Ark., revealed a semi was carrying a large quantity of marijuana. The Drug Enforcement Agency was notified and began surveillance of the semi and another vehicle. The vehicles ended up at warehouse in Louisville, where they were joined by two other vehicles. Castillo was arrested by DEA agents on June 27, 2005.

The street value of the marijuana is estimated to be approximately $7 million. None of the men arrested, including Castillo, were armed or resisted arrest.

The plea was entered before U.S. District Judge Jennifer B. Coffman for the Western District of Kentucky. Coffman has ordered a presentence investigation.

115 Charged In Prescription-drug Sweep (LCJ)

By Tom Loftus

Louisville Courier-Journal, November 20, 2006

LEXINGTON, Ky. — More than 100 people have been charged in connection with a joint federal and state investigation into illegal prescription-drug trafficking in Eastern Kentucky.

State arrest warrants were issued Monday for 103 people in Eastern and Southeastern Kentucky, people that authorities described as street-level dealers.

In addition, 12 more people were federally indicted over the past month, including two pharmacists and 10 people authorities described as “suppliers,” authorities said in a news conference Monday.

Those indictments were unsealed Monday as arrests were made.

The drugs involved in most of the cases involved prescription painkillers such as Oxycontin, authorities said.

70 Seized In E. Kentucky Drug Sweep (LEXHL)

Lexington Herald-Leader (KY), November 21, 2006

Two licensed Kentucky pharmacists were among nearly 70 people arrested yesterday afternoon in a huge crackdown on prescription drug abuse in Eastern Kentucky.

David Gregory Jones, who owns RX Express in Ashland, and Dan Daffron, owner of Quick Script in Monticello, face federal indictments charging them with unlawful distribution of controlled narcotics. Daffron was arrested early Monday on a 16-count indictment and Jones was arrested later on a 559-count indictment.

DOJ_NMG_0096723

During a news conference Monday, Kentucky State Police Capt. Joe Williams classified prescription drug abuse as "a substantial problem in Kentucky." Williams declined to go into details about the case involving the two pharmacists, but said controlled substances accounted for 98 percent of business for one of the men.

"I'm told the normal percentage at your corner drug store is about 15 percent controlled substances," he said. "This guy is out there distributing these drugs and making a lot of money off of it, getting it out to people who are going to divert it. Some of them are drug addicts themselves; a lot of them will turn around and sell them and they'll make money off it too."

Jones, according to court documents, distributed large quantities of several prescription drugs including OxyContin, hydrocodone and alprazolam. Daffron is accused of distributing several drugs, including hydrocodone, Darvocet and dextroamphetamine.

During the course of the investigation, officials say, Jones made $1.5 million and used the money to -- among other things -- pay premiums on a life insurance policy, purchase a Yamaha Grand Piano, a custom-made 10 carat diamond bracelet, property and several vehicles, including a 2005 Mercedes SCK350.

U.S. Attorney Amul Thapar said law enforcement officials were still searching for more than 30 others suspected of trafficking prescription drugs. Most, he said, appeared to be mid- to street-level dealers.

Arrested and charged with conspiring to possess and distribute quantities of controlled substances were Javed Ashiq, Roger Dean Combs, Kelly Marie Green, Tonya Lynn Groover, Kurt Francisco Kilgore. Adam Justice Palm and Kimberly Monette Palm were part of a five count indictment, charging them with two counts of conspiracy to distribute controlled substances, two counts of possession with intent to distribute controlled substances and one count of forfeiture.

The maximum penalty for all charged would be up to 20 years imprisonment.

The arrests, part of 101 arrest warrants issued for alleged dealers, some with out-of-state ties, came after an 18-month investigation involving local, state and federal law enforcement. The criminal conduct spanned more than 11 counties in the Eastern District of Kentucky and distributors were from Georgia, Indiana, Ohio and Tennessee, authorities said.

Law enforcement agencies teamed up with the anti-drug organization UNITE and Kentucky All Schedule Prescription Electronic Reporting or KASPER, a state database that helps health officials and law enforcement detect prescription fraud and drug diversion by tracking suspicious prescription patterns, Thapar said.

"Through teamwork, we're moving beyond our borders," Thapar said. "We're reaching out grabbing these people. We're reaching beyond our borders and saying 'enough. Don't bring it to Kentucky.'"

Eastern Kentucky, nicknamed the "prescription-painkiller capital of the United States," has long been known for heavy abuse of OxyContin and Vicodin.

Yesterday, Karen Engle, executive director of UNITE, said it was time to put an end to the pipeline into Eastern Kentucky. Several counties in Eastern Kentucky, she said, have more prescribed narcotics than anywhere else in the nation.

"This pipeline from Ohio and Tennessee and Virginia must stop, and it must stop now," she said.

Drug Sweep Nets More Than 50, Including 2 Pharmacists (AP)

AP, November 21, 2006

LEXINGTON, Ky. State and federal authorities have arrested more than 50 people in a major drug sweep in eastern Kentucky today.Two pharmacists from Ashland and Monticello were among those caught in the drug busts.U-S Attorney Amul Thapar says authorities also confiscated numerous prescription drugs, including the powerful painkiller OxyContin, that were being sold on the black market.Police are still looking for about 50 more alleged street-level drug dealers named in indictments. They also are looking for black market distributors from Georgia, Indiana, Ohio and Tennessee.Investigators from the anti-drug organization UNITE coordinated the roundup.

Bonds' Personal Trainer Back In Prison (AP)

AP, November 21, 2006

DUBLIN, Calif. -- Barry Bonds' personal trainer returned to prison Monday afternoon for refusing to testify before a federal grand jury investigating Bonds' steroid use.

DOJ_NMG_0096724

Greg Anderson has twice been freed on technicalities. He was ordered to report after an appeals court last week upheld the entirety of his contempt-of-court citation _ meaning Anderson could serve a year or more unless he testifies against Bonds, his boyhood friend.

In 2003, Bonds testified before a federal grand jury probing steroid use that Anderson had provided him flaxseed oil and arthritis balm, not steroids. Authorities suspect Bonds is lying, and have subpoenaed Anderson to testify.

Anderson also has served three months stemming from that steroids investigation, pleading guilty to distribution and money laundering charges.

The Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative scandal has netted five convictions, including Anderson's, and one pending indictment.

27 Face Charges In Mississippi Drug-trade Ring (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, November 21, 2006

Drug Enforcement Administration agents in Mississippi, assisted by local law-enforcement authorities, have arrested 27 persons, confiscated more than $15 million in cocaine and marijuana and seized cash and property worth $3 million as part of a lengthy undercover investigation.

"Operation Central Hub targeted and successfully dismantled one of the largest drug-trafficking operations ever known to operate in the state of Mississippi," said DEA Assistant Special Agent Stephen Luzinski in the agency's Jackson, Miss., field office.

"It was especially significant in that agents were able to successfully trace the movement of both drugs and money from the hands of high-level Mississippi traffickers into the hands of some of Mexico's most powerful drug traffickers," Mr. Luzinski said.

The Mississippi Bureau of Narcotics initiated the investigation in April 2005 and later joined forces with DEA to jointly start a federal investigation targeting multiple high-priority cocaine and marijuana trafficking distribution cells operating in Hattiesburg and the Jackson-metro area.

DEA spokesman Rusty Payne at the agency's Washington headquarters, said yesterday that the investigation also yielded criminal links to drug organizations in Dallas; Atlanta; Little Rock, Ark.; Detroit; and Laredo, Texas.

Mr. Payne said Operation Central Hub also produced important connections to Mexico, revealing direct criminal links and associations between select Mississippi organization heads and Mexican drug sources of supply. Texas-based organization members, he said, were found to be functioning as logistics coordinators in arranging the delivery of drug loads from Mexico to Mississippi.

This same group arranged for the collection of money as payment for the drugs, he said.

Through a coordinated multiagency investigative attack, agents uncovered the existence of a highly sophisticated drug-trafficking organization with tentacles across the United States, which routed large shipments of cocaine and marijuana across the border from Mexico into South Texas.

Once inside U.S. borders, Mr. Payne said drug shipments were shuttled from Texas to various cities throughout the nation in 18-wheel commercial tractor trailers operated by truck drivers employed by the Mexican drug bosses.

Investigators also discovered that the organization used large gooseneck trailers outfitted with sophisticated hidden compartments accessible only through a hydraulic remote-control system. The trailers were pulled by dual-wheel pickup trucks and were capable of holding several thousand pounds of marijuana.

Mr. Payne said Dallas, Laredo and San Antonio-based drivers and couriers routinely were dispatched to Mississippi to meet with cell leaders and deliver the drug loads.

As part of a parallel financial investigation, he said, agents discovered that local distributors were normally provided with drug shipments on a consignment basis -- meaning that shortly after receipt, the Mexico-based suppliers and Texas logistics coordinators requested cash payment.

Agents Credited For Drug Busts (BSH)

By Robin Fitzgerald

Biloxi Sun Herald, November 21, 2006

GULFPORT - Federal authorities credit Gulfport-area narcotics agents with starting an investigation that has dismantled one of the largest drug-trafficking operations in Mississippi.

The investigation has resulted in 27 arrests and the seizure of $15 million in drugs and $2.9 million in cash and other assets, said Stephen Luzinski, assistant special agent in charge of the DEA in Jackson.

"It was especially significant," said Luzinski, "in that agents were able to successfully trace the movement of both drugs and money from the hands of high-level Mississippi traffickers into the hands of some of Mexico's most powerful drug traffickers."

As the cocaine and marijuana investigation expanded, it became known as Operation Central Hub and linked courier travels with cash payments at hotels mostly in the Hattiesburg and Jackson areas.

The investigation was launched in April 2005 by the Mississippi Bureau of Narcotics and agents assigned to DEA's Gulfport district office, which includes Hattiesburg.

Operation Central Hub produced "important connections" to Mexico with criminal links in Mississippi and in Texas, where drug delivery arrangements were coordinated, Luzinski said.

Once the drug shipments crossed the U.S. borders, they were shuttled to various cities, primarily in 18-wheelers driven by employees of Mexican drug bosses. The drugs often were hidden compartments or commingled with legitimate cargo loads.

In some cases, the deliveries used "large, gooseneck trailers that were outfitted with sophisticated hidden compartments accessible only through a hydraulic remote control system," Luzinski said.

Drivers and couriers based in Dallas, Laredo and San Antonio were sent routinely to Mississippi to deliver the drugs. The large loads of cash were then hidden in 18-wheelers for delivery to Mexico.

Luzinski said the investigation also turned up illegal drug links in Atlanta, Detroit and Laredo, Texas.

Police Find One Completed IED, Components For More Explosive Devices (DLYSENT)

By Emily Taravella

The Nacogdoches (TX) Daily Sentinel, November 21, 2006

The components of an explosive device and a psilocybin mushroom/marijuana-growing operation were discovered early Monday in a unit at Lakewood Village Apartments, by Nacogdoches police officers investigating an assault.

One resident of the apartment unit was undergoing psychiatric evaluation Monday. At press time, no arrests had been made.

Nacogdoches police and fire, along with University police officials and ATF agents cordon off a section of apartments where they say they found 'components' that could be used to craft an explosive devise.

A joint investigation is being conducted by the Nacogdoches Police Department and the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, according to Sgt. Greg Sowell, NPD community relations officer.

Although Sowell did not release the nature of the components seized by the ATF, he said the ATF is describing them as "components that could be assembled as an improvised explosive device."

"As it stands, the investigation is in preliminary stages," he said. "Everything has been seized, and the apartment has been released. Arrests could be forthcoming."

Sowell said the report of assault came in around 1 a.m.

After discovering the components of an explosive device, some of the surrounding Lakewood units were evacuated. Lakewood Street was closed from North Street to North Pecan Street until the ATF arrived.

IMMIGRATION:

Arizona Growers Race Against The Clock To Find Winter Harvest Workers (USAT)

By Daniel González

USA Today, November 21, 2006

YUMA, Ariz. — C.R. Waters practically lives in his pickup now that harvest season has begun for the winter vegetable capital of the USA.

DOJ_NMG_0096726

As the farm manager for a major vegetable distributor, he makes sure everything from iceberg lettuce to broccoli is ready to pick at precise times.

Good weather has created ideal growing conditions, but Waters is worried that when the vegetables are ready, there won't be enough laborers to get crops out of the fields to market.

Waters, president of the Yuma Fresh Vegetable Association, said it will take 30,000 seasonal workers to harvest the sea of winter vegetables grown in Yuma County, where the fruit and vegetable crop was valued at $745 million in 2004. The area produces 90% of the winter vegetables consumed in the USA and Canada, and 98% of the iceberg lettuce, according to the Arizona office of the National Agricultural Statistics Service, a part of the U.S. Department of Agriculture.

If growers can't find enough workers, some crops may go unpicked. That could increase prices at the supermarket, and create substantial financial losses for farmers.

Last year some growers overproduced, so prices stayed low even though some labor contractors reported a 30% shortage of workers. Yuma growers won't know how severe the labor shortage will be until the harvest kicks into high gear this month. To hedge their bets, they planted 15% fewer acres this year.

“You can have the best crop in the world, but if you don't have the labor to harvest it, it's going to rot in the field,” Waters said.

Growers and farm advocates say the shortages, even with thousands of legal Mexican laborers, have become more severe as stricter immigration enforcement, tighter border security and increased competition from construction and other industries have shrunk the pool of seasonal workers.

The shortages are not limited to the Yuma region. Vegetable growers in Colorado, pear growers in northern California, and apple growers in Washington, all have lacked workers. During the harvest, lettuce pickers earn a base pay of $8 an hour, plus bonuses the faster they pick. The best lettuce pickers can earn as much as $12 to $14 an hour.

For years, these workers have served as the backbone of the labor force in Yuma. Many farmworkers, however, have been drawn by steady jobs at housing developments and construction sites sprouting up around Yuma that pay better.

The increased presence of Border Patrol agents also has scared some illegal workers already in the USA away from Arizona.

In the past year, the Border Patrol also doubled the number of agents assigned to the Yuma sector to 551. Another 200 are on the way. The buildup is having an effect, the Border Patrol reports. Arrests for the 2006 fiscal year that ended Sept. 30 declined 14%, to 118,549 from 138,438 the year before.

“As we gain more operational control, they (smugglers) are seeking other routes,” Border Patrol agent Maranda Weber said. “In the past, there were a lot of undocumented doing this work but now there is so much border enforcement,” said Glafira Sanchez, a lettuce crew foreman for Valley Pride, a vegetable harvester in Yuma.

Growers such as Doug Mellon, 61, scoff at that notion that growers would have less trouble finding workers if they paid more. Because unemployment is low, there simply aren't enough workers, he said. On top of that, most Americans shun farm work.

“I don't care if you paid $40 (an hour), they'd do it about three hours and say, ‘That's not for me,' ” Mellon said.

Many growers say the long-term solution is an expanded “guest worker” program for agriculture.

Earlier this year, the Senate passed comprehensive immigration changes, legislation that included a provision known as AgJobs, which would have created a new temporary-resident status for seasonal farmworkers and given long-term farmworkers a chance to apply for permanent residence.

During negotiations in Congress this year, Yuma farmers offered to test a scaled-down version that would have allowed Mexican workers to commute daily across the border with temporary work visas. Conservative Republicans in the House, however, refused to consider the comprehensive immigration changes, angering growers who tend to vote Republican.

“I hate to say this, but the Republicans in Congress just played politics with this and never came up with a solution. It has really frustrated me,” said Mellon, a Republican.

Now growers hope the new democratically controlled Congress will revive guest-worker legislation next year.

As for this year's harvest?

“It's too late,” Mellon said.

DOJ_NMG_0096727

TAX:

IRS Links Increased Revenue To More Audits (WP/AP)

By Jim Abrams, Associated Press

The Washington Post, November 21, 2006

A taxpayer who made more than $1 million had a one-in-16 chance of being audited by the IRS in the fiscal year just ended, up slightly from the year before.

Commissioner Mark W. Everson said in a telephone news conference Monday that the Internal Revenue Service also paid more attention to the filings of small businesses that tend to underreport incomes and to the records of tax-exempt organizations.

Overall, enforcement revenues for fiscal 2006 were $48.7 billion, up from $47.3 billion. Revenues in fiscal 2005 had jumped 10 percent because of collections from a crackdown on improper tax shelters.

"We have restored the credibility of our enforcement programs which were badly diminished and to some degree gutted" in the 1990s, Everson said.

The "tax gap," the difference between what taxpayers owe and what is collected, has been estimated as $345 billion annually, and congressional Democrats coming to power see closing this gap as an important way to raise revenue without raising taxes.

Everson said that audits of individuals making $1 million or more increased to 17,015 from 12,835. That was an increase only from 6.1 percent to 6.3 percent because of the growing number of millionaires. About 1 percent of all taxpayers face audits.

Audits of people with incomes surpassing $100,000 were up 18 percent, to 257,000. Total audits increased 6 percent, to almost 1.3 million.

Everson said there was also a one-third increase in audits of S corporations, to almost 14,000. An S corporation is generally a small business in which profits pass through to the owners, who report them on their personal tax returns.

He said the IRS had added resources to its tracking of charitable and tax-exempt organizations, with audits up 43 percent to 7,079.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

GOP Leaving Spending Bills To Democrats (AP-Y)

By Andrew Taylor

AP, November 21, 2006

Republicans vacating the Capitol are dumping a big spring cleaning job on Democrats moving in. GOP leaders have opted to leave behind almost a half-trillion-dollar clutter of unfinished spending bills,

There's also no guarantee that Republicans will pass a multibillion-dollar measure to prevent a cut in fees to doctors treating Medicare patients.

The bulging workload that a Republican-led Congress was supposed to complete this year but is instead punting to 2007 promises to consume time and energy that Democrats had hoped to devote to their own agenda upon taking control of Congress in January for the first time in a dozen years.

The decision to drop so much unfinished work in Democrats' laps demonstrates both division within Republicans ranks and the difficulty in resolving so many knotty questions in so short a time. GOP leaders promised their House and Senate members the December lame duck session would last no more than two weeks, or until Dec. 16 at the latest.

Now, with the agenda shrinking, a session that will be the last for 45 retiring or defeated House members and senators should be wrapped up by Dec. 8.

That could work against efforts to forestall a cut in physicians' Medicare payments. Under a formula dating back to 1997, Medicare payments to doctors for office visits will drop an average 5 percent on Jan. 1 — unless Congress steps in. Keeping them the same for another year would be expensive, about $10.8 billion, and chances are mixed at best for the doctors' lobby.

DOJ_NMG_0096728

Driving the decision to quit and go home rather than finish the remaining budget work is a determined effort by a group of conservative Republicans to prevent putting a GOP stamp on spending bills covering 13 Cabinet Departments — and loaded with thousands of homestate projects derided as "pork" by critics.

Some Republicans on Capitol Hill would rather complete this year's budget work and have the GOP's imprint rather than a Democratic one on how federal agencies will be spending their money through next September. However, conservatives such as Sen. Jim DeMint, R-S.C., fear doing that would leave as the GOP's legacy a foot-tall bill containing thousands of parochial projects. Last week they seized the upper hand by employing delaying tactics to drag the budget process to a halt in the Senate.

"The last thing Republicans need is an end-of-Congress spending spree as our last parting shot as we walk out the door," said DeMint spokesman Wesley Denton.

Some Republicans also look forward to using unfinished budget work to gum up an early Democratic agenda that includes raising the minimum wage, negotiating lower drug prices for Medicare beneficiaries, cutting interest rates on college loans and repealing some tax breaks for oil companies.

"Other stuff may get pushed off the table," said GOP lobbyist Hazen Marshall, a former longtime Capitol Hill aide. "It kills (Democrats') message."

For its part, the White House sided with GOP traditionalists such as Appropriations Committee Chairman Thad Cochran, R-Miss., who has been pushing to finish the budget while Republicans still hold power.

"We think it's the best thing for fiscal discipline," White House Budget Director Rob Portman told reporters last week.

Instead, lawmakers are expected to pass a temporary bill to keep the domestic agencies such as the Education, Transportation and Housing and Urban Development departments on autopilot at this past year's spending levels until Democrats can come up with new bills.

It will be no small test of the incoming Democratic majority, which has yet to develop a plan to cope with the more than $460 billion in unfinished budget business. The Democrats' problem is made even more complicated because President Bush in early 2007 will send Congress a bill that could exceed $130 billion for continuing the war in Iraq, according to Capitol Hill aides.

Bush is likely to be torn between the necessity of working with Democrats to finance his priorities — including the war — and a desire to take a stand against spending increases. Bush has never vetoed a spending bill in his six years in office, but that may change now that it will be Democrats writing them.

Democrats pledge not to overreach in their dealings with the president.

"We're not going to send him veto bait," said Rep. David Obey, D-Wis., who will be taking over as the chairman of the House Appropriations Committee. "We're not that stupid."

Fiscal Battle Lines Drawn (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, November 21, 2006

As partisan wrangling over spending priorities dominates the Senate's lame-duck session, the battle lines are forming for next year's Democratic effort to reinstate pay-as-you-go budget rules that Republicans decry as a back-door tax increase.

Democratic leaders vowed even before their decisive Election Day victories to demonstrate their commitment to fiscal responsibility by restoring the pay-as-you-go statute, also known as pay-go, should they win back the majority. Pay-go under law, which expired in 2002, required any new mandatory spending or tax breaks to be offset or risk automatic across-the-board spending cuts.

While budget analysts often point out that the hefty Democratic agenda for the 110th Congress would present an immediate challenge to pay-go, Republicans blast pay-go as a tax hike in budget-cutting clothing. Extending President Bush's tax cuts, including investment tax breaks that the GOP pursued through a marathon reconciliation process last year, under pay-go would require finding offsets that few Republicans believe a Democratic majority would want to seek out.

Though they have little hope of defeating a Democratic pay-go plan next year — the vice president cast a tiebreaking vote to stave one off in March — Republicans are poised to put up a fight for a pay-go rule that treats taxes and entitlements equally.

DOJ_NMG_0096729

"The big question is, are they going to have integrity in the presentation?" said Sen. Judd Gregg (R-N.H.), outgoing Budget Committee chairman.

The Congressional Budget Office treats reauthorized entitlements as pre-existing programs, relieving lawmakers of the need to find offsets under pay-go, but Democrats could tweak their new pay-go rule to apply to more entitlement spending. Gregg said he would support a pay-go process with those changes made, but he also wondered whether Democrats would pass alternative minimum tax (AMT) relief before restoring pay-go as a means to avoid offsetting it.

"So far I've heard, 'We're going to do an AMT fix, and then [tax] extenders, and then do pay-go,' " said Gregg, who often refers to pay-go as "tax-go." "Let them put pay-go in place first."

New Senate Budget Chairman Kent Conrad (D-N.D.), a strong supporter of pay-go, blocked floor action last week in a push to secure a vote on his $4.5 billion emergency farm aid package. Six farm-state Republicans, including Mike Enzi (Wyo.) and Pat Roberts (Kan.), signed on as cosponsors of Conrad's amendment, but some conservatives were taking notes on the move with an eye to the coming pay-go debate.

"This tension is not taking too long to play out," said Brian Riedl, budget analyst at the conservative Heritage Foundation. "Congress would routinely waive pay-go [in the 1990s]. It ends up being a paper tiger."

Yet Conrad's floor fireworks came after compromises on his part, such as the removal of direct payments to farmers that had raised White House objections and a cut in the package's overall cost. Conrad won a promise from leadership to take up his amendment as soon as the Senate returns next month, which he views as a chance to lay down his marker even as the overall appropriations bill appears unlikely to come to a vote.

"Pay-go is not designed as the cure-all for our budget ills," Conrad said in an interview. "I've never wanted to oversell pay-go. It's sort of a straw-man argument on [Republicans'] part, that 'it doesn't solve this, it doesn't solve that.' It's not intended to solve all those things."

Conrad also expressed support for a pay-go that would cover entitlement reauthorization, citing next year's children's health insurance program rewrite as an example. As for cutting down on future emergency farm-aid packages, he proposed a permanent disaster relief title in next year's new farm bill, which a spokesman for new Agriculture Committee Chairman Tom Harkin (D-Iowa) said was under consideration.

Meanwhile, both parties are amplifying their pay-go messages. The Senate GOP Policy Committee, which Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison (Texas) will take over next year, released a pre-election report dismissing Democratic pay-go as "support[ing] an anti-tax-cut agenda unrelated to fiscal restraint."

Former Senate Budget Chairman Don Nickles (R-Okla.), now head of K Street powerhouse The Nickles Group, noted that senators would still be free to offer pricey spending increases during the appropriations process even under pay-go.

"Democrats have acted like, 'This is so important, it's going to lead us to fiscal responsibility,' but they always try to bust the limits on the appropriations side," Nickles said. "I almost say, hey, let them have pay-go. They have been touting it. Now they're going to get to live with it."

Incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) affirmed to reporters last week that "we believe in the pay-go system" and offered a road map to where Democrats would look for offsets. The $15 billion in subsidies to oil companies passed along with last year's energy bill would be on the block, Reid said, and as much as $200 billion per year could be won by closing the "tax gap," the shortfall between federal taxes owed and received.

Budget watchdogs, however, are skeptical that the tax gap can provide much of a fiscal cushion for Democrats.

"I don't view them as realistic offsets," said Robert Bixby, executive director of the nonpartisan Concord Coalition. "Every effort ought to be made to close the gap, but nobody should think you can press a button and get $300 billion."

Conrad asserted that the CBO would be able to treat the efforts to close the tax-gap as a budget item if a bill were written specifically enough: "[They] would have to be convinced that it's real."

The Bush administration has included pay-go for spending in its annual budgets, Christin Baker, spokeswoman for Office of Management and Budget (OMB) director Rob Portman, said in an e-mail.

"We support budget reforms and look forward to working with Congress on ways to increase accountability and transparency," she wrote. "But we are concerned about pay-go that would block the extension of tax relief."

DOJ_NMG_0096730

The Economic Front (WSJ)

By Roger C. Altman And Alan S. Blinder

The Wall Street Journal, November 21, 2006

Election returns drive policy changes. On Nov. 7 the voters clamored for change. And with the departure of Donald Rumsfeld, politicians have already started to deliver it. The leadership at the Pentagon is unlikely to be the only change in the administration's failed foreign policy. But what about the economic front? For the answer, though not for all the details, look to the economic anxieties which voters expressed through exit polls.

Sixteen years ago, one of us wrote a book titled "Growing Together." The double meaning was deliberate. But in recent decades the fruits of economic growth have not been widely shared, and we Americans have been growing apart. Notably, the middle class has fallen much further behind the rich; and recently, real wages have lagged behind productivity while profits have soared. One way to read the election returns is as a cri de coeur from the middle class for a fairer shake. They want to reap some of the dividends of economic growth -- as they should.

What to do? The problem is both deep-seated and longstanding, and there is no magic bullet to set things right. But a few obvious steps would help. For starters, the Democrats have pledged to raise the federal minimum wage, which is now at its lowest (relative to other wages or prices) in a half-century. Making the Earned Income Tax Credit more generous would also help.

Beyond that, our government needs to repair and thicken the badly tattered safety net for the middle class. Tens of millions of Americans live in fear that a major health problem could reduce them to penury. While citizens of other rich countries also worry about their health, only Americans fear financial ruin due to lack of health insurance. That should not be. Health insurance poses complex problems that will not be solved easily or cheaply. But it is well past time that we started moving judiciously toward universal health insurance. Covering all children is a sensible first step.

Retirement security is another worry of the non-rich majority. Both of us opposed President Bush's failed attempt to privatize Social Security, but the president was right to call attention to the system's long-run financing gap. Fixing Social Security is not that difficult with a little bipartisanship and a dose of goodwill -- two more things the voters want. That said, all realistic solutions involve moderating benefit growth and/or raising more revenue -- which is precisely why they require bipartisanship.

The exit polls also reminded us that many Americans no longer believe that the next generation will be better off than they are. The federal budget deficit, the negative personal saving rate, and our massive borrowing from abroad are all evidence that America is focused too much on the present and not enough on the future. We need a multidimensional investment strategy to change that orientation.

Two of the top priorities should be equipping our work force to cope better with the rapidly globalizing economy, and reducing our dependence on oil and gas. The first requires more and better education and training. The second requires a greater commitment to research on alternative energy technologies, plus serious conservation measures by consumers and industry. Setting sensible priorities will be critical -- and perhaps a bit painful. We probably cannot afford all the good things mentioned above, not to mention other expensive items that do not appear on our wish list (such as public infrastructure). But making hard choices is what grown-ups do, and the voters were telling the politicians to grow up.

The federal budget deficit is a concrete example. Regardless of whether you supported or opposed the Bush tax cuts, it is clear that the long-run budget is in shambles. With the baby boom generation about to retire, the budget should be in surplus. But instead, we face cumulative 10-year deficits of $3.5 trillion -- and worse after that. You can blame this sorry state of affairs on either excessive tax-cutting or on profligate spending -- take your pick. It's more accurate to blame both, because fiscal discipline has utterly broken down. Restoring that discipline will doubtless mean both spending restraint and new revenues -- more hard decisions that the voters want politicians to make.

As an important procedural step, Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi has promised to restore pay-as-you-go financing -- a bipartisan set of budget rules that were originally adopted under the first President Bush, but then brushed aside under his son. Unfortunately, when paygo went, so did any pretense of fiscal discipline. A coincidence? We think not. The new Congress should bring back paygo immediately.

DOJ_NMG_0096731

We fully realize that only a few of these policies can be promulgated right now. But a year hence, the policy window will have closed tight and the (presidential) political window will be wide open. So time is short. After watching the recent election results, we'd hate to be an empty-handed politician facing the voters in 2008.

Mr. Altman, chairman and co-CEO of Evercore Partners, was deputy secretary of the Treasury in the first Clinton administration. Mr. Blinder is a professor of economics at Princeton and former vice chairman of the Federal Reserve Board.

Pelosi: Relieving Middle Class Tops List (AP-Y)

By Jim Abrams

AP, November 21, 2006

House Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi said Monday her new Democratic majority will extend a hand to Republicans in moving the agenda of relieving the "middle-class squeeze." She said restoring the military draft will not be part of that agenda when Democrats take over the House in January.

Pelosi, following a strategy meeting with the next House majority leader, Steny Hoyer, D-Md., said she will meet with incoming House Minority Leader John Boehner and "we'll find our common ground for the American people."

"The principle of civility and respect for minority participation in this House is something we promised the American people. It's the right thing to do," she said.

Pelosi and Hoyer repeated that in the first 100 legislative hours of the new Congress that convenes in January, they will try to pass bills that directly affect the pocketbooks of working-class and middle-class people, including raising the minimum wage, cutting interest rates for student loans and allowing the Medicare program to negotiate lower drug prices.

Other top priorities for January are lobbying reform, implementing the recommendations of the 9/11 Commission and rolling back subsidies to the oil industry.

Pelosi said restoring the draft will not be on that list and was not something she supported.

"The speaker and I discussed scheduling and it did not include that," Hoyer added.

Incoming Ways and Means Committee Chairman Charlie Rangel, D-N.Y., caused a stir by repeating a long-held position that a draft is the best way to ensure that all levels of society are represented in the military. Besides Rangel, there is almost no support in Congress for restoring the draft.

"It's not about a draft, it's about shared sacrifice in this country," Pelosi said. She said Rangel is "a strong voice for social justice in our country" and his support for the draft was "a way to make a point."

Democratic Leadership Spotlights Middle Class (WT)

By Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, November 21, 2006

House Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi and Majority Leader-elect Steny H. Hoyer -- days after engaging in an intraparty power struggle -- said yesterday that they will push bills to help the middle class and that they don't need Republican support to pass them.

Mrs. Pelosi and Mr. Hoyer said they expected bipartisan backing for their efforts to lessen the "squeeze" on the middle class, specifically increasing the minimum wage, lowering Medicare prices and cutting interest rates on student loans.

But Mrs. Pelosi said Democrats can pass those measures on the strength of their new majority alone, if need be.

"I think that's what winning the majority was all about," Mrs. Pelosi said when asked about the role of Republicans.

She quickly added that she hopes to see a large number of Republicans support her legislative agenda, and that she plans to meet with incoming House Minority Leader John A. Boehner of Ohio when he returns to town after the holiday.

Mrs. Pelosi, who last week had backed Mr. Hoyer's challenger to become her second-in-command when the Democratic Congress is seated in January, said she looks forward to working with Mr. Hoyer after their strategy session yesterday.

The California Democrat again congratulated Mr. Hoyer, Maryland Democrat, on his "stunning" win over outspoken war critic Rep. John P. Murtha of Pennsylvania.

DOJ_NMG_0096732

Mr. Hoyer, who defeated Mr. Murtha 149-86, said he and Mrs. Pelosi had worked together as the top two House leaders of the minority to create the "most unified and focused [Democratic] caucus" in many decades and would continue to do so as the majority leaders. Mr. Hoyer is the outgoing minority whip.

Mrs. Pelosi and Mr. Hoyer did not raise any new agenda items yesterday as they said they would pursue allowing Medicare to negotiate with drug companies for lower prices, expanding federal support for embryonic-stem-cell research and lobbying reform.

Besides trying to generate some Republican support, Mrs. Pelosi may have to work on keeping her caucus from straying from the agenda.

Rep. Charles B. Rangel, New York Democrat and likely new chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, recently reiterated his long-held belief that there should be a military draft.

When asked whether she would support reinstituting the draft, Mrs. Pelosi said Mr. Rangel has "long held this position" and uses it as "a way to make a point" about the Iraq war.

"It's not about a draft; it's about a shared commitment," she said.

When pressed, she said she doesn't support the idea. Mr. Hoyer chuckled and said the schedule they're compiling doesn't include a bill to reinstitute the draft.

One thing both Mr. Hoyer and Mrs. Pelosi found amusing as they spoke to the packed room yesterday was the spike in the number of reporters attending their briefings.

Mr. Hoyer joked that he had "two and a half times the people" this week than he usually does at his normal briefing.

"It's nice to be in the majority," Mrs. Pelosi quipped. "We have many more visitors."

Rebalancing Act Democrats Target Wealth Gap And Hope Not To Hit Economy Divide Between Rich And Poor Continues To Widen; Spurs 'Robin Hood' Plans Can Growth Benefit Workers? (WSJ)

By David Wessel

The Wall Street Journal, November 21, 2006

By almost every measure, the gap between winners and losers in the American economy has widened over the past 20 years. In this month's election, anxiety about that gap was not far behind voter anger over Iraq and congressional corruption in driving Democrats to victory. "We will make our economy fairer" vowed House Democrats, in a campaign manifesto.

Now they're in a position to try, raising a big question: What can Democrats do to resist inequality in a way that doesn't choke off economic growth? Can government slice the economic apple more evenly without shrinking it?

See a chartbook3 examining income disparities and a guide to Democrats' relevant writings4 about the economy. • Plus, share your thoughts at the new online Capital Exchange forum5.

Today's inequality reflects a confluence of forces. Technology is increasing employers' appetite for some skilled workers, while diminishing it for assembly-line workers in auto and textile factories. Imports and outsourcing are doing the same. Schools aren't graduating enough of the workers in short supply, such as engineers. Immigration is contributing to a glut of others, visible wherever day laborers gather hoping for work. Unions are atrophying. Corporate boards, hedge funds and sports teams are increasingly willing to write super-sized paychecks to a chosen few.

At the extremes, some politicians (not all of them Democrats) believe the benefits of a globalizing, high-tech economy are outweighed by the costs to U.S. workers. They would build a fence around the U.S. to reduce immigration or erect tariff barriers to imports. Even at the Democratic middle -- where the virtues of technology and globalization are prized -- proposals to reduce inequality range widely. They include interceding in the market to raise pay at the bottom or limit it at the top, pushing "Robin Hood" take-from-the-rich tax policies, improving shock absorbers that protect workers when their employers crash, extending health and retirement plans to workers without them and spending more to promote education from pre-K through college.

Meddling With the Market

High on Democrats' to-do list is lifting the federal minimum wage. It's been steady at $5.15 an hour since 1997, while consumer prices have risen 25%. Although many economists warn a higher minimum wage means fewer jobs, the 1990s suggest that boosting the minimum wage can boost incomes of those at the bottom. But its potential to shrink the gap between the wealthiest and poorest wage-earners is limited, especially when wages at the top are soaring far away from the middle and bottom.

DOJ_NMG_0096733

Limiting pay at the top has proven tough. A 1993 law that discouraged tax deductions for executive salaries above $1 million is widely regarded as a bust. "Executives responded by rewarding themselves with millions of dollars worth of stock options" instead of big salaries, lament former Clinton aide Bruce Reed and Chicago Rep. Rahm Emanuel, a key strategist in the Democrats' win, in their pre-election book calling for "a new social contract for the 21st century." They go on, "This time we should approach the problem from the other direction and require companies that provide stock options to their executives to provide stock options to every worker."

That's unlikely to become law. But Barney Frank, the Massachusetts Democrat in line to chair the House Financial Services Committee, vows to push legislation that would force companies to provide more and clearer details of CEO pay, devise policies to recapture incentive pay if earnings are later restated, and require shareholder approval of "golden parachute" payments to dismissed executives. Mr. Frank says he plans hearings into a "fundamental" economic question: "How do you do a better job of sharing overall economic growth with the average worker?"

Few Democrats would block employers from laying off workers or closing factories, as is often done in Europe. But several newly elected Democrats, particularly from the beleaguered Midwest, vow to slow the flood of imports and rethink the pacts that President Bush has been negotiating to lower trade barriers.

There also is strong support among Democrats for strengthening American labor unions to try to tilt the balance in the labor market more toward workers. A bill co-sponsored by 215 House members and 43 senators, would, among other things, require employers to recognize a union after a majority of workers sign cards asking for representation instead of secret-ballot votes.

Robin Hood

A popular alternative among Democrats is to champion the market -- that is, allow it to direct people and money to best use -- and then tax the rich to give more to the poor. Enlarging the earned-income tax credit, viewed by many economists as a smart alternative to a higher minimum wage, is an option likely to figure in Democratic tax deliberations. The credit offers up to $4,536 to a family with two or more children to offset payroll taxes that the working poor pay. And it offers a cash bonus if the credit exceeds taxes paid, rewarding low-wage workers without raising employers' costs.

But most of the focus is on taking more from the top. Many Democrats would let at least some of Mr. Bush's income-tax cuts expire in 2010 or roll them back. Many favor preserving the estate tax, which Republicans target for abolition. New House Speaker Nancy Pelosi has vowed to restore a 1990s rule requiring new spending to be offset by spending cuts or tax increases; upper-income taxpayers are the sure target.

The Senate Finance Committee, with the blessing of both parties' leaders, is circulating a list of ways to shrink the "tax gap" between taxes owed and taxes actually paid. Most are aimed at upper-income taxpayers, such as requiring stock brokers to report not only the price a client got for shares, but also the original purchase price paid.

Boosting taxes on upper-income Americans would reduce disparities and provide revenues for other attacks on inequality. Raising the top two tax rates, now 33% and 35%, by a single percentage point would yield $90 billion over five years, the Congressional Budget Office estimates.

Another favorite Democratic target is the lower tax rate -- a maximum of 15% -- on capital gains and dividends. The administration says the lower rates have strengthened the stock market and the economy. Some Democrats say they're unfair. "We must end the Republicans' war on work, which taxes a millionaire at a lower rate for his stock trades than it taxes the wages his secretary earns for placing the call to his broker," wrote Rep. Emanuel and Mr. Reed. Also under discussion, often in conversations about ways to shore up Social Security, is increasing the ceiling -- now set at $94,200 -- on wages subject to the Social Security payroll tax.

Republicans as prominent as Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson and Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke recently have warned in speeches of risks posed by widening inequality. But many conservatives fear taxing the rich in response would reduce incentives for innovation, entrepreneurship and education -- and thus reduce economic growth to the detriment of all. Their counsel: Try to lift incomes of the poor and middle class, and don't worry if the rich do even better.

DOJ_NMG_0096734

Democrats argue that the 1990s proved that raising taxes on upper-income Americans can produce lots of revenue and coincide with a very strong economy. Republicans counter that the 2000s show tax cuts propel the economy and can coincide with surging tax revenues. Both arguments exaggerate the ability to isolate tax rates from other economic crosswinds. But the fundamental disagreement is over the extent to which higher taxes discourage work, savings and investment. "The market is not so good at spreading the gains. We need an activist government that pursues broad-based growth," says Mr. Reed.

Shock Absorbers

One direct response to workers' anxiety is expanded government programs to cushion the fall of those who lose jobs in today's rapidly changing economy. "Better preparation before adverse events happen and more...assistance after bad events occur" would both help workers and "diminish political demands for growth-reducing policies, such as protectionism," says Peter Orszag, who heads the Hamilton Project, a think tank spawned by former Treasury Secretary Robert Rubin to find way to promote "broad-based economic growth" and "economic security."

Targeted federal programs, created to lure congressional votes for free-trade pacts, now reach few people. There's a tax credit to help those who lose jobs due to imports buy health insurance. And there's wage-loss insurance, which offers cash to eligible workers dislocated by imports to compensate for taking lower-paying jobs. Inequality foes would greatly expand such programs.

Lori Kletzer of the University of California at Santa Cruz and Howard Rosen of the Peterson Institute for International Economics in Washington, for instance, would offer eligible dislocated workers up to half the difference between weekly earnings at their old and new jobs, up to $10,000 a year. This isn't cheap: They put the price tag at between $2.6 billion and $4.3 billion a year, financed through general tax revenues or an expanded payroll tax.

Universal Coverage

An alternative, albeit expensive, is to close the gap between those with health insurance and a retirement-savings plan (on top of Social Security) and those without. About 25% of people in households with incomes below $25,000 lack any health insurance, even government provided. Among the over-$75,000 crowd, only 8.5% are without insurance. About 45% of full-time workers on private payrolls aren't offered private retirement savings plans of any sort at work.

Gene Sperling, a former Clinton aide who published a 300-page "economic strategy for shared prosperity" last year, preaches to Democrats: "Simply voting yes [on trade pacts] and getting 5,000 more people on Trade Adjustment Assistance is a losing strategy. With control, Democrats can envision a more expansive social compact might make people less fearful about the pace of change and globalization."

Finding a politically palatable and affordable way to make health insurance universally available has been impossible, so far. Mr. Bush has pushed tax credits to help more people buy insurance on their own, and dangled rule changes and low-premium, high-deductible policies to encourage small firms to offer coverage. Although some Democrats still drool over proposals for government health insurance for all, others prefer piecemeal approaches. Among them: Allowing businesses with up to 100 employees tax credits to buy insurance through a government-sponsored pool modeled on the Federal Employee Health Benefit Plan, which gives federal workers a choice of private health insurance plans.

On retirement savings, outside the contentious Social Security debate, Democratic and Republican centrists are inching toward similar proposals, described differently. Mr. Sperling is pushing a "universal 401(k)" to which employees, employers and, in some cases, the government would contribute, a cousin to the private accounts Mr. Bush wanted to carve out of Social Security. Increasingly prominent Democratic Sen. Barack Obama cites it favorably in his new book, "The Audacity of Hope" and Ms. Pelosi backs a similar proposal. It would, in essence, narrow tomorrow's inequality by encouraging Americans to save more in their working years.

Education

Improving education is the feel-good solution, seen across the political spectrum as a way to promote growth and equality simultaneously. "The economy increasingly rewards education and skills," says Edward Lazear, chairman of Mr. Bush's Council of Economic Advisers. "We would not want it any other way. However, inequality in skills and education levels means inequality in income." His fix: Improve public schools for the disadvantaged through the No Child Left Behind Act and foster competition among schools.

DOJ_NMG_0096735

Democrats are focused on doing more to help Americans pay for college, especially important since the typical college grad earns 45% more than the typical high-school grad. Ms. Pelosi's platform calls for making up to $12,000 a year in college tuition tax-deductible -- or the equivalent in a $3,000 tax credit -- as well as cutting interest rates on student loans and increasing the maximum Pell Grant for low-income students to $5,100 from $4,050.

A coalition that spans the political spectrum is pushing more government support of Pre-K education. The case: Low-income children are behind when they arrive at kindergarten and never catch up; spending more on them sooner would have a big payoff.

One political problem: Education has a long fuse. It can take a generation to see results.

In the end, government can do only so much, especially given Americans' traditional ambivalence toward big government and European-style social welfare programs. "It's not hard to think of government policies with redistributive aspects," says Mr. Sperling, the former Clinton adviser. "What gets hard is to say: Here's my vision for how the private sector is going to create jobs that lead to a strengthening, not a hollowing out, of the middle class."

Americans want government to protect their current jobs and tell them where their next job -- and their children's jobs -- will come from. "But government is not good at that," Mr. Sperling says.

Write to David Wessel at david.wessel@wsj.com6

Washington Wire (WSJ)

Wall Street Journal, November 21, 2006

November 20, 2006, 2:02 pm Bumper to Bumper

What do private economists expect from the new Congress? Gridlock, mostly.

Sure, Congress is likely to deliver on Democrats' promise to raise the federal miniumum wage. But beyond that, they expect little to be accomplished on the economy.

Forty-six of 48 economists in the latest WSJ.com economic forecasting survey said they believe an increase in the federal minimum wage is very or somewhat likely to be passed in Congress and signed by the President.

As for the raft of other economic issues at hand — tackling the finances of entitlement programs, dealing with foreign trade, addressing the tax code — the economists expect gridlock.

Entitlement programs, such as Social Security and Medicare, should be the top priority for Congress when Democrats take control next year, the economists said. But 44 of the 48 economists believe it is somewhat or very unlikely any reform will be signed into law.

The story is little different on other fronts: On ensuring that trade negotiations move forward, 31 say unlikley. On revising the Medicare drug benefit, 30 say unlikely. On extending tax breaks for the wealthiest: 37 say unlikely. Rescinding the breaks? Thirty-six.

Economists expect the federal budget deficit to narrow. By the end of fiscal 2008, they predicted the gap will be equal to 2.2% of gross domestic product, the total output of all goods and services produced in the economy, compared with 2.6% for fiscal 2005.

But that has little to do with the change in control in the House and Senate. Their prediction for the budget deficit had the Republicans remained in power: 2.2%.

Video: The Journal's David Wessel discusses WSJ.com's forecasting survey

Comments (4) | Permalink | Trackbacks

Save & Share: Share on Facebook | Del.icio.us | Digg this

Read more: Global, Budget, Spending and Taxes, Economy

November 20, 2006, 12:43 pm Treasury's To-Do List

Paulson

Henry Paulson, who left Wall Street to become President Bush's third Treasury secretary, returned to New York today to sound his trumpet call for making the U.S. more friendly to capital markets in the face intensifying global competition.

DOJ_NMG_0096736

His to-do list: "First, it is necessary to take a global view. We don't operate in isolation, so it is very important to consider how changes we make affect the ability of our companies to compete globally and how these changes affect our interaction with markets and regulators around the world. Second, our regulatory structure should be more agile and responsive to changes in today's marketplace. Third, to stand the test of time, rules should be embedded in sound principles. Fourth, regulators should take a risk-based approach to regulation, weighing the cost to shareholders against the benefits. Fifth, our enforcement regime should punish and deter wrongdoing and encourage good behavior without hindering responsible risk-taking and innovation. And, lastly, the best way our business leaders can protect the integrity and competitiveness of our markets is to exert moral leadership, where the threshold question is, 'Is this right?' not 'Do the rules allow us to do this?' "

Video: Paulson Q&A

Comments | Permalink | Trackbacks

Save & Share: Share on Facebook | Del.icio.us | Digg this

Read more: Global, Economy

November 20, 2006, 8:04 am How Official Promotes Marriage to Help Poor Kids

The notion that government can help children escape poverty by promoting marriage for their parents was once considered a fringe idea from right field. It is now federal policy.

In very large part, that's due to Wade Horn, a child psychologist turned bureaucrat who has put marriage atop the Bush administration's limited antipoverty agenda.

As head of the federal Administration for Children and Families, Dr. Horn has employed the zeal of an ideologue and the discipline of an academic to inject marriage promotion into a host of government programs under his purview, even before Congress authorized an official marriage program. Today, more than 200 programs are at work across the country, seeking to change public attitudes surrounding marriage, persuade teenagers to aspire to matrimony and teach relationship skills to young couples.

Along the way, Dr. Horn has co-opted critics, fine-tuned his rhetoric, and persuaded Congress to insert his marriage agenda into this year's welfare legislation, winning $500 million over five years.

"Wade Horn has shown the influence a bureaucrat can have," says Ronald Haskins, a welfare expert who has worked for Congress and the current President Bush's White House. Read the full article. – Laura Meckler

Comments (5) | Permalink | Trackbacks

Save & Share: Share on Facebook | Del.icio.us | Digg this

Read more: Global

Pelosi-Harman Friction Strains Democrats' Unity (LAT)

By Johanna Neuman And Michael Finnegan

The Los Angeles Times, November 21, 2006

WASHINGTON — When Jane Harman left Congress in 1998 to run for governor of California, her colleague Nancy Pelosi threw her a party — a chocolate-fudge sundae "social" in the House members' dining room.

Two years later, Harman hosted a fundraiser in Los Angeles for Pelosi when she was running for minority whip, raising $400,000.

These days the two rarely talk, much less throw parties for each other.

Their relationship has been deteriorating since Harman returned to the House in 2001, according to those who know them, and the tension now threatens to complicate Pelosi's role as House speaker when the 110th Congress convenes in January.

Pelosi indicated as early as last year that she intended to oust Harman from the Intelligence Committee — where Harman expected to become chairwoman if Democrats won control of the House — in favor of someone more to Pelosi's liking.

The move has created dissension within the party. Some Democrats and foreign policy experts argued that Harman, a centrist on national security, is the most credible person for the job. The Congressional Black and Hispanic caucuses countered that it was time for one of their members on the committee to take the helm.

DOJ_NMG_0096737

Fresh from Pelosi's fierce and unsuccessful lobbying effort to install antiwar ally John P. Murtha of Pennsylvania as her No. 2, the coming battle over the Intelligence Committee leadership is turning into a showdown where the political has turned personal. And it could undermine the unity that the Democratic Party has hoped to show as it prepares to take the reins of power.

The falling-out between Pelosi and Harman offers a window into how business gets done on Capitol Hill, where personal friendships are often as important as policies and politics. Pelosi in particular is noted for remembering who has been on her side and who hasn't, as evidenced by her support of Murtha for House majority leader over her one-time rival Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland, even though Hoyer was widely preferred by the party caucus.

The prospect of conflict between two such powerful Democratic women is tantalizing to gossipy Washington. But the split is so toxic that Democrats in California and Washington won't go near it.

"I don't want to talk about it," said Roz Wyman, the doyenne of California Democratic fundraising and a friend of both.

Most people contacted for this article spoke only on condition of anonymity, not wanting to get on the wrong side of two formidable politicians.

Pelosi declined through her spokeswoman to comment. The only statement issued from her office, by Press Secretary Jennifer Crider, was that the committee decision "will be made before early January."

Harman said in an interview that she did not wish to vent the matter in public. "I read about this in the paper last year and I visited with her then," said Harman, who would not disclose the nature of their conversation.

"It's so unfortunate because they're both capable people," said William Coblentz, a San Francisco lawyer who has contributed to both their careers and coffers. "I know them both well, and I love them both, but I believe Nancy felt that Jane was abrasive and aggressive, which she can be."

Pelosi's supporters say the dust-up over Harman is not personal, noting that the Democratic leader spent an extra day in California lobbying the state party to endorse Harman in her reelection bid.

Although they may seem similar on the surface — two wealthy and powerful Democrats from California — Pelosi and Harman are cut from different cloth. Pelosi is a people person — she recently entered a raucous room of reporters offering to shush them in her "mother-of-five voice." Harman has a more cerebral personality and revels in the minutiae of policy.

Pelosi grew up in Baltimore, where her father, Thomas D'Alesandro Jr., was mayor, and got an early education in the art of machine politics. She met Paul Pelosi while at Trinity College in Washington, and the couple moved to his hometown of San Francisco. As Paul Pelosi grew the family's fortune through real estate and stock investments, Nancy Pelosi raised their children, then worked her way up in California Democratic Party politics from volunteer to chairwoman for Northern California. She was elected to the U.S. House in 1987.

Harman grew up in Los Angeles, the daughter of a Westside physician. She graduated from Smith College and Harvard Law School at a time when few women went into law. Harman began her career in Washington as a Capitol Hill staffer and later worked in the Carter White House before going into private law practice. She is married to Sidney Harman, founder and chairman of Harman Industries. She ran for the House in 1992 and joined Pelosi in the California delegation, representing Venice.

People who know both women say there was no single incident that soured their relationship; rather it was a series of small irritations that eventually led to estrangement.

Some California Democrats say tensions began during the 2001 redistricting of the state's congressional seats.

As lawmakers from both parties cooperated in Sacramento to make Democratic seats safer for Democrats and GOP seats safer for Republicans, Harman reportedly complained that her district did not include Los Angeles International Airport.

"She wanted to get the LAX asset in her district," said one Californian who was familiar with the process. "Jane thinks the airport is power."

Party leaders were annoyed, given that the redistricting gave Harman — who until then represented a swing district — a safe seat.

A Capitol Hill staffer suggested that Pelosi also was miffed that Harman had higher visibility in the media.

DOJ_NMG_0096738

Harman, using her platform as ranking Democrat on the Intelligence Committee, landed on Sunday talk shows so regularly that she all but eclipsed Pelosi's rising star as House minority leader. An informal survey of the major talk shows over the last two years found that Harman made 18 appearances to Pelosi's six.

Associates of Pelosi say she was not troubled that Harman was on television frequently, only that Democrats' message on Iraq wasn't being aired.

Some Democrats say Pelosi's choice for intelligence chair is less about personal conflict than fixing a political problem, which ironically began with Harman's return to the House in 2001.

After Harman lost her gubernatorial bid, Pelosi urged her to run for Congress again. Harman's choice was made easier by the fact that then-Minority Leader Dick Gephardt (D-Mo.) had promised her in writing that she could reclaim her seniority on the Intelligence Committee. That bumped a member of the Congressional Black Caucus, Rep. Sanford D. Bishop Jr. (D-Ga.), off the committee and jumped her over another African American, Rep. Alcee L. Hastings (D-Fla.), in seniority.

Black members of Congress were upset by what they saw as a slap by House Democratic leaders. Last year the black caucus asked for a meeting, and according to one witness, Pelosi promised not to slight either blacks or Latinos when plum slots came up on the Intelligence and Homeland Security committees.

When news got out that Pelosi was not planning to name Harman chairwoman, heavy hitters from the foreign policy establishment besieged Pelosi to change her mind.

Those close to Harman say the lobbying campaign came to life on its own. The Pelosi side doesn't buy it.

"The biggest mistake Jane made was lining up people to lobby," said a Hill staffer. "People went over the line lobbying for her. Now Nancy is very angry."

Asked whether Pelosi held a grudge against Harman, Rep. Anna G. Eshoo (D-Atherton) said: "People are going to do what they're going to do. But anyone who underestimates Nancy Pelosi does so at her own risk."

*

johanna.neuman@latimes.com

michael.finnegan@latimes.com

Neuman reported from Washington and Finnegan from Los Angeles.

*

(INFOBOX BELOW)

Jane Harman

1945: Born in New York City; raised in Los Angeles where father is a Westside physician

1966: Graduates from Smith College, Northampton, Mass.

1969: Graduates from Harvard Law School; later serves in Carter White House and as Defense Department special counsel

1992-98: Elected by California's 36th Congressional district

1998: Runs for governor, spending more than $20 million, including $15 million of her own money, but finishes third among Democrats

2000-present: Reclaims her former House seat; joins Energy and Commerce Committee; joins Intelligence Committee, becoming ranking Democrat of new Terrorism and Homeland Security subcommittee

2003: After November 2002 election, chosen by Nancy Pelosi as her successor on Intelligence

2004: Works closely with new Intelligence chairman Peter Hoekstra and Senate Governmental Affairs Chairman Susan Collins to get Congress to pass intelligence reorganization bill

2005: Calls for a ban on torture by U.S. interrogators and a prohibition on transferring detainees to countries that torture

Sources: Almanac of American Politics 2006; office of Jane Harman; Los Angeles Times

**

Nancy Pelosi

1940: Born Nancy D'Alesandro in Baltimore; her father served five terms in Congress ending in 1947, then 12 years as Baltimore mayor

DOJ_NMG_0096739

1962: Graduates from Trinity College (now called Trinity University), Washington, D.C.

1977-1981: Northern chair, California Democratic Party

1981-1983: State chair, California Democratic Party

1985-1987: Finance chair, Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee

1987-present: Elected by California's 8th Congressional District, which includes most of San Francisco; serves for 10 years (until early 2003) on the Intelligence Committee

2001: Elected minority whip by House Democrats

Oct. 2002: Leads Democratic faction opposed to authorizing military force in Iraq, bucking the House Democratic leader

Nov. 2002: Elected minority leader by House Democrats

Nov. 2006: Slated to become next House speaker after midterm election gains

Sources: Almanac of American Politics 2006; office of Nancy Pelosi; Los Angeles Times

Democrats Plan Series Of Votes On Ethics Reforms (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, November 21, 2006

Despite divisions among Democrats over how far to go in revising ethics rules, House leaders plan a major rollout of an ethics reform bill early next year to demonstrate concern about an issue that helped defeat the Republicans in the midterm elections.

But they will do it with a twist: Instead of forwarding one big bill, Democrats will put together an ethics package on the House floor piece by piece, allowing incoming freshmen to take charge of high-profile issues and lengthening the time spent on the debate. The approach will ensure that each proposal -- including banning gifts, meals and travel from lobbyists as well as imposing new controls on the budget deficit -- is debated on its own and receives its own vote. That should garner far more media attention for the bill's components before a final vote on the entire package.

"This will be the most significant ethics and lobbying reform that Congress has ever voted on," promised Rep. Martin T. Meehan (D-Mass.), one of the point men on the effort.

The approach may be the first indication of how the Democrats plan to use their ability to control the House agenda as the majority power, setting the terms of debate while lifting the strict rules that Republicans used to curtail dissent.

And Democrats hope to show that they are attentive to issues of corruption that, according to exit polling, proved to be of major concern to voters on Nov. 7. House and Senate GOP leaders pledged early this year to pass major lobbying reforms in the aftermath of the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal but never delivered on their promise.

Democratic leaders are still putting the finishing touches on the floor schedule and some of the components of the ethics package, said Jennifer Crider, spokeswoman for incoming House speaker Nancy Pelosi (Calif.). But other Democratic leadership aides said the proposal to break up the package and reassemble it is virtually a done deal.

Under that plan, freshmen would offer, over as many as five days in January, separate amendments to ban gifts, meals and travel financed by lobbyists, said Rep. Rahm Emanuel (Ill.), incoming chairman of the House Democratic Caucus. New rules mandating the disclosure of all contacts with lobbyists would be another vote, as would a rule requiring that the sponsors of funding for home-state pet projects be identified. The House would also vote on whether to reinstate budget rules, known as pay-as-you-go, or "paygo," requiring that any new spending or tax cuts be offset by equal spending cuts or tax increases.

While there is broad support for reform, Democrats face divisions on how far to go on some issues, such as whether to establish an independent board to enforce ethics rules. But leaders are eager to show that they are serious about tackling the corrosive influence of lobbyists and money, so much so that they are willing to spend days working on the issue. They may even let the divisions play out in public, with amendments allowed that may or may not pass, on issues from campaign finance to independent oversight.

"We heard continually out here that people were tired of the way business is conducted in Washington," said Rep.-elect Harry Mitchell (D-Ariz.). "They didn't like the way lobbyists had so much influence. They didn't like the way rules were not enforced. They just didn't think things were being done right."

DOJ_NMG_0096740

The idea is to give each provision what Emanuel called its "Warhol time" -- 15 minutes of fame -- while forcing Republicans to take a stand on the components before a final vote on the ethics package. Because House rules changes are, by tradition, party-line votes, breaking the package into its components would also allow Republicans to support individual amendments, even though they probably would vote against the package in the end.

The unorthodox approach, more reminiscent of the drawn-out legislating done in the Senate than the slam-dunks of the House, would also give Democratic leaders a chance to show that they plan to change the way the House does business, Democrats said.

"Why have the gift ban, if that's one of [the components], be buried inside when it can stand on its own and the public wants it and gets it?" Emanuel asked. "Why have paygo have to share space with the meal ban or gift ban?"

The procedure would be as much about solidifying Democratic power as it would be about changing the rules of the House. Freshmen Democrats, many of them representing Republican-leaning districts, would take ownership of components that would resonate most with their voters, Democratic leaders said. For example, a conservative "Blue Dog" would get to present the budget-balancing rule.

Amendments aimed at reducing the influence of lobbyists would go to swing-district Democrats who campaigned on ethics themes. One is Mitchell, who unseated Rep. J.D. Hayworth (R-Ariz.) in large part by stressing Hayworth's links to Abramoff, the disgraced lobbyist. The others are Zack Space (Ohio), who took the Republican-leaning district of convicted former representative Robert W. Ney, and Michael A. Arcuri (N.Y.), who ran on corruption themes to take the district vacated by retiring Rep. Sherwood L. Boehlert (R).

Such a freewheeling approach could expose disagreements within the Democratic Caucus. For example, some members think that an independent board should be created to conduct ethics investigations and mete out punishment to members who violate House rules. Others say the House Committee on Standards of Official Conduct, informally known as the ethics committee, can handle the assignment as long as leaders allow it to do its job.

Democratic leadership aides say Pelosi is weighing a middle ground -- the establishment of an independent body similar to a grand jury that would weigh the validity of ethics complaints, then pass meritorious allegations to the ethics committee.

The rules change on earmarks, or lawmakers' pet projects, is expected to differ from the proposal Democrats outlined earlier this year, the aides said. That rule would mandate that home-district projects be identified by the names of their congressional sponsors. Pelosi wants to make sure that change applies to projects in spending bills as well as in policy bills, such as the broad highway and transit law that passed in 2005. Tax breaks known as rifle shots, narrowly targeted to benefit only a few companies or individuals, are also expected to face more scrutiny.

Has Gates Learned His Lesson? (LAT)

By Jennifer Glaudemans

The Los Angeles Times, November 21, 2006

FIFTEEN YEARS AGO, the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence asked me to testify at the confirmation hearings for Robert M. Gates, who had been nominated to be director of Central Intelligence.

I was asked because I had worked in the CIA's office of Soviet analysis back when Gates was the agency's deputy director for intelligence and chairman of the National Intelligence Council.

More specifically, I was asked to testify because of my knowledge about the creation of a May 1985 special National Intelligence Estimate on Iran that had been used to justify the ill-fated deals known as Iran-Contra.

It seems like a long time ago now. Iran-Contra is just one of many scandals that have come and gone in the intervening years. But today, in the aftermath of the U.S. decision to go to war in Iraq based on faulty intelligence — and with Gates poised to reemerge, this time as secretary of Defense — it is worth remembering some lessons from the 1980s about how intelligence was politicized to support ideologically-based positions.

In 1985, during Ronald Reagan's second term as president, the U.S. faced enormous diplomatic and military challenges in the Middle East and in Central America. Reagan and then-CIA Director William J. Casey were known for their aggressive anti-Soviet rhetoric and policies. Gates, as Casey's deputy, shared their ideology.

DOJ_NMG_0096741

Iran-Contra was in the planning stages then, a secret scheme in which the Reagan administration was going to sell arms to an enemy country, Iran, and use the proceeds to fund the anti-communist Contras in Nicaragua.

In order to justify these actions, administration officials felt they needed some analytical backing from the intelligence community. Those in my office knew nothing of their plans, of course, but it was the context in which we were asked, in 1985, to contribute to the National Intelligence Estimate on the subject of Iran.

Later, when we received the draft NIE, we were shocked to find that our contribution on Soviet relations with Iran had been completely reversed. Rather than stating that the prospects for improved Soviet-Iranian relations were negligible, the document indicated that Moscow assessed those prospects as quite good. What's more, the national intelligence officer responsible for coordinating the estimate had already sent a personal memo to the White House stating that the race between the U.S. and USSR "for Tehran is on, and whoever gets there first wins all."

No one in my office believed this Cold War hyperbole. There was simply no evidence to support the notion that Moscow was optimistic about its prospects for improved relations with Iran. All of our published analysis had consistently been pessimistic about Soviet-Iranian relations as long as Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini was alive.

We protested the conclusions of the NIE, citing evidence such as the Iranian government's repression of the communist Tudeh Party, the expulsion of all Soviet economic advisors and a number of Soviet diplomats who were KGB officers, and a continuing public rhetoric that chastised the "godless" communist regime as the "Second Satan" after the United States.

Despite overwhelming evidence, our analysis was suppressed. At a coordinating meeting, we were told that Gates wanted the language to stay in as it was, presumably to help justify "improving" our strained relations with Tehran through the Iran-Contra weapons sales.

It's possible that the Reagan administration would have gone ahead and made its overtures to Iran regardless of what was said in the NIE, but having the coordinated assessment of the intelligence community support its views certainly added legitimacy to its rationale. What's more, if the policymakers had received better and more accurate intelligence, perhaps someone would at least have questioned the false sense of urgency. Instead, our intelligence was used as expensive intra-government propaganda.

Unfortunately, the Iran NIE was not the only case of politicization under Gates. It began in 1982, when Casey asked for an NIE on Soviet support for international terrorism. It continued when we were asked how far we thought the Soviet Union would go in its support for leftists in Central America. There was also an investigation by the CIA's inspector general into the atmosphere of politicization at the agency, the results of which were published even before 1991.

It was well known among analysts at the time that we would have a hard time getting Gates to sign off on analyses that did not fit his ideological preconceptions. All one had to do was look at his margin comments on controversial papers to know what was going on. Fortunately for him, classification and layers of bureaucracy kept those comments from public view. Today, however, many cases of politicized intelligence are a matter of public record. The National Security Archive, a not-for-profit organization, has posted many documents on its website that tell the story.

During those years, the government was clearly dominated by people who had a strong ideological view of the Soviet Union. But their conflict was not with people who were "soft" on communism, it was with people who looked at all the available evidence, without much bias one way or another, and who had been to the USSR and witnessed its hollow political and social structure, seeing not an omnipotent superpower but a clumsy, oafish regime often stumbling over its own feet.

The real untold story is just how wrong the American hard-liners, such as Gates, got the Soviet Union. Although they were the last to recognize that Mikhail S. Gorbachev was indeed reforming the USSR, they were the first to state that Gorbachev would be ousted and replaced by neo-Stalinists, as had been done to Nikita Khrushchev. (See Gates' Op-Ed article in the Washington Times in March 1989.) They also completely missed the Boris Yeltsin reform option.

Is all this ancient history relevant today? It is if you believe that policymakers are poorly served when analysis is concocted to support their preexisting positions. It is relevant if you believe that the failure to learn the lessons from the 1991 Gates hearings harmed U.S. foreign policy when, a decade later, we went to war on false intelligence about weapons of mass destruction in Iraq. It is relevant if you believe that Congress should take its oversight responsibilities seriously.

The nomination of Robert Gates to become secretary of Defense is an opportunity for him to demonstrate that he has learned from his mistakes and for Congress to reassert its constitutional authority.

DOJ_NMG_0096742

Democratic Leaders Reject Idea Of Draft (WP)

By Charles Babington And Josh White

The Washington Post, November 21, 2006

The new Democratic-controlled Congress will not seriously consider reinstating the draft, even if concerns about the military's strength and resiliency grow, party leaders said yesterday.

Key Democrats, including the incoming House speaker, House majority leader and chairmen of the House and Senate armed services committees, said they do not support a resumption of the draft. They predicted that the idea will gather little momentum in the 110th Congress, which convenes in January. Pentagon officials also restated their opposition to a draft.

Their comments came a day after Rep. Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.), who will chair the Ways and Means Committee, said he would again introduce a bill calling for a return to the draft, which has been suspended since 1973.

Rangel's previous bids to reinstate the draft stirred little interest in Congress but considerable agitation among some bloggers and talk radio hosts, who suggested the public was about to be blindsided. Yesterday, congressional leaders tried to allay such fears, saying the 2007-08 legislative agenda will not include a resumption of the draft.

"Mr. Rangel will be very busy with his work on the Ways and Means Committee, whose jurisdiction is quite a different jurisdiction," Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) told reporters. Ways and Means handles tax matters, not military legislation.

Dismissal of the draft idea does not mean key lawmakers and analysts are not worried that the military is being stretched to its limits in Iraq, Afghanistan and elsewhere, with possible threats looming in Iran and North Korea. If higher troop levels are needed, several said, the answer is in recruiting more volunteers, not drafting people.

"The all-volunteer force has been successful," said Rep. Ike Skelton (D-Mo.), who will chair the House Armed Services Committee. "But the Army is stretched thinner than paper."

Skelton said Americans soured on the draft during the Vietnam War era because many felt that the system of exemptions -- claimed mainly by wealthier and better-educated people -- "was downright unfair in many instances. . . . I think it would not be acceptable to the American people today."

To address the manpower concerns, Skelton said, "we must slowly disengage ourselves from Iraq" and focus on fully equipping all units before they go into combat. "The recruiting is coming along better," he said. "The retention, with the exception of captains and junior majors, is going well. . . . The bigger problem is readiness," which he said is mainly a matter of equipment.

Pentagon officials have long said they do not support reinstatement of the draft, which would send people unwillingly into the armed forces alongside the hundreds of thousands of professional troops who volunteer. Top officials have shown great pride that the military has been an all-volunteer force for more than three decades, even as the armed services face growing strain as a result of the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan.

In 2004, when the same topic was raised in House hearings, top Pentagon officials said the Bush administration did not support the draft and had no plans to pursue it. Officials said yesterday they still do not believe that conscription is a viable option for today's military.

Army officials point to the turnaround in recruiting efforts over the past year -- during which the Army met an elevated goal of 80,000 new soldiers and continued to surpass reenlistment targets -- as evidence that the military can support itself as a volunteer force. Training draftees, who likely would leave the service as soon as possible, would cost millions of dollars with little return on the investment, they said.

Rangel, a Korean War veteran, said a draft would bring more upper-middle-class Americans into the military and would force policymakers to evaluate warmaking more carefully. But a recent Heritage Foundation study found that the all-volunteer military has a fairly good distribution of people from all family income and education levels.

"No evidence supports arguments for reinstating the draft or altering recruiting policies to achieve more equitable representation," wrote Tim Kane, director of the foundation's Center for International Trade and Economics.

Rangel has suggested incorporating military conscription into a larger program of mandatory national civilian service, in which Americans would perform nonmilitary functions.

But such a proposal probably "would go nowhere even faster than a military draft," said Robert Goldich, a retired expert on military manpower for the Congressional Research Service.

DOJ_NMG_0096743

American traditions and courts frown on "involuntary servitude," he said. Moreover, he said, "what Vietnam did was sort of confirm a basic American attitude that the draft was something that was going to be used only for major conflict."

The U.S. military included about 2.2 million people in the mid-1980s, Goldich said, compared with about 1.4 million now. If the nation's policymakers decide the military must grow, they can probably achieve their goals by improving benefits and targeting people ages 22 to 25, rather than the customary 18- and 19-year-olds, he said.

"Clearly we've recruited a much larger all-volunteer force in the past" and can probably do so again, Goldich said.

Rangel's Call For New Military Draft Rebuffed (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough And Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, November 21, 2006

Democratic Rep. Charles B. Rangel's latest call to quickly restart the military draft was shot down yesterday by incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi and other party members, who said it will not be part of the Democrats' legislative agenda.

New York's Mr. Rangel periodically has urged a draft revival as a mechanism to criticize President Bush's handling of military deployments in the war on terrorism. He renewed his call again on Sunday, saying on CBS' "Face the Nation" that "if we're going to challenge Iran and challenge North Korea and then, as some people have asked, send more troops to Iraq, we can't do that without the draft. ... I will be introducing that bill as soon as we start the new session."

But Mrs. Pelosi, California Democrat, told reporters she does not favor the draft and has no plans to schedule a floor debate. And in the Senate, incoming Armed Services Chairman Carl Levin, Michigan Democrat, also dismissed the idea.

"I don't think we need it," he told reporters.

House Armed Services Committee Chairman Duncan Hunter, California Republican, disagreed with Mr. Rangel's long-held position that the burden of fighting wars fall disproportionately on low-income people. A study by the conservative Heritage Foundation concluded that the children of higher-income parents increased their enlistment numbers after the September 11 attack.

Mr. Hunter said his son left a civilian job to serve in Iraq and that several committee members have sons fighting in the war.

Mr. Rangel, an Iraq war critic who will become chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, urged a new draft during the 2004 presidential election. Other Democrats floated a rumor that the Bush administration plotted behind the scenes to institute compulsory service because of missed recruiting goals.

The Republican leadership quickly moved for a floor vote that October. Then-House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, Texas Republican, said of Democrats, "We've had enough of that. We're going to call them on it. The Democrats are the only people that have a bill instituting the draft. We're going to bring it out there, and we're going to put a nail in it."

Mr. Rangel's proposal, which would draft women as well as men, was defeated 402-2. He even voted against it, saying Republicans brought up the bill up as a political stunt. Rep. John P. Murtha, Pennsylvania Democrat, who subsequently called for an immediate troop withdrawal from Iraq, and Rep. Pete Stark, California Democrat, voted in favor of the bill.

The all-volunteer force began when President Nixon ended the draft in 1973, more than 30 years after President Franklin D. Roosevelt ordered it to prepare for World War II. The draft was suspended after the war, but restarted in 1948. Women were exempt.

Mr. Rangel argued Sunday that "there's no question in my mind that this president and this administration would never have invaded Iraq, especially on the flimsy evidence that was presented to the Congress, if indeed we had a draft and members of Congress and the administration thought that their kids from their communities would be placed in harm's way."

He added, "I think at a time where national security is so important, having our young people commit themselves to a couple of years in service of this great republic, whether it's our seaports, our airports, in schools, in hospitals and at the end of that to provide some educational benefits is the best thing for our young people and the best thing for our country."

Rejecting The Draft (NYT)

The New York Times, November 21, 2006

There are many reasons why we are distressed to hear that Representative Charles Rangel of New York plans to reintroduce his annual measure aimed at resurrecting the draft when the Democrats take control of the House in January. We don't favor military conscription in general. And in this particular case, compelling military service won't achieve the things Mr. Rangel says he wants, either.

DOJ_NMG_0096744

Mr. Rangel wants to replenish an Army that is in critical condition, make the armed services more equitably representative of American society as a whole, and find a way to prevent future presidents from embarking on military misadventures. Those are laudable goals, but not ones the nation can achieve by bringing back the draft.

Even if the draft was a good idea, it would be politically impossible to achieve. Members of Congress are well aware that their constituents oppose it. This White House has never been willing to ask the American public to do anything but accept more tax cuts; it's hardly going to embrace something as difficult and unpopular as military conscription.

But the idea is flawed as well. Because of the dire situation in Iraq, the Army is indeed having trouble meeting its yearly quota of 80,000 recruits. Yet military leaders nevertheless oppose a draft. They believe you don't get a highly skilled Army by forcing people to serve against their will, and they are right.

The draft would not demonstrate to young people that everyone must do his or her fair share. It is more likely to convince them that the demand for sacrifice is made mainly on those too poor to avoid it. The volunteer force in Iraq has been a truer cross section of America than the force created under the last draft, which ended in 1973, before the end of the Vietnam War. The wealthy and well-connected could get deferments then or assignments to safe alternatives, and many did. While there are plenty of underprivileged in the current force, at least they are there by their own choosing.

The problem with the draft does not lie in the fact that it requires young people to spend some time contributing to the nation's well-being before they embark on their life careers. We wish the president had called for such sacrifices after Sept. 11, 2001, when so many Americans were aching to contribute.

For those young people who do not feel moved by patriotism or propelled by economics to enlist in the military, there should be other options for national service — like AmeriCorps. These programs need money and attention. Some of the potential candidates for president in 2008 have said the United States should require all young people to devote a year or two to service after high school or college, and that idea should be debated during the upcoming campaign.

But the urgency of the Army's current needs requires a different solution. There are many ways for the armed services to meet their recruitment goals outside of general conscription. After all, the Army's annual quota of 80,000 recruits is barely a drop in the ocean of some 60 million Americans between 18 and 35. Forcing the issue, with a draft, is no solution.

Democrats' Rx? Generics (WSJ)

By Anna Wilde Mathews

The Wall Street Journal, November 21, 2006

NEWLY EMPOWERED Democrats' vow to cut health-care costs might spell bad news for the brand-name pharmaceutical industry, but their efforts could provide new momentum for the generic-drug rivals' agenda.

Boosting the generics industry may prove to be a politically palatable way to follow up on the party's campaign promises. That's because making more room for generics is meant to cut prices through increased competition -- a solution that is easier to sell as pro-market than other proposals Republicans will portray as precursors to federal price controls. In addition, some legislation that must be renewed in 2007, including laws providing vital funding to the Food and Drug Administration and encouraging studies of drugs' use in children, could provide gridlock-proof vehicles for generics provisions.

"Overall, because of the shift in Congress, next year could be the most important year to the generics industry since 1984," when Congress passed the law that opened the door to the modern generics business, says Jake Hansen, a vice president at generics maker Barr Pharmaceuticals Inc., of Woodcliff Lake, N.J.

The most important question will likely be how and whether to create a legal pathway for the FDA to approve generic versions of biotechnology drugs. The 1984 law that created a framework enabling the FDA to approve generic drugs focuses on traditional, chemically derived drugs such as Prozac, but didn't give the agency a way to approve generic versions of most biotech products. Now, the issue will get a push from several key Democrats, though it will be difficult to pass such a complicated and contentious change in 2007.

DOJ_NMG_0096745

An array of other measures aimed at smoothing the way for traditional generic drugs will also get attention, and could well be tucked into broader bills next year. Among them are proposals to limit branded-drug company tactics that thwart generic competitors, such as licensing additional companies to sell their drugs and thus diluting the profits to be made from copying them.

The FDA generics office is likely to get more funding to speed its reviews now that the Democrats are in charge, and there may be limits put on FDA petitions filed by brand-name makers that can delay generic-drug approvals. Another likely goal for Democrats: shortening a six-month period of exclusive marketing that branded-drug makers get in exchange for their pediatric research, a benefit that can be worth millions of dollars because it delays generic competition.

Makers of traditional chemical generics sell versions that can be substituted for the originals, typically at a substantially lower price. The generics companies have far smaller development costs, since they don't have to duplicate years of research and regulatory review borne by branded-drug makers.

A number of Democrats who have been allies of the generics makers are slated for positions that could help in pushing forward such changes. In the Senate are Vermont's Patrick Leahy, the expected Judiciary Committee chairman, as well as high-profile lawmakers such as New York's Hillary Clinton and Charles Schumer. Sen. Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts, who will head the health committee, is among the Democrats who have signaled that health-care costs will be a major focus for next year.

Sen. Herb Kohl, a Wisconsin Democrat who is expected to head the Senate Appropriations subcommittee that handles the FDA's funding, says, "We really want to promote the use of generics because of the savings."

In the House, California Rep. Henry Waxman, a sponsor of the 1984 generics law, will be chairman of the Government Reform Committee, while FDA appropriations will go through a subcommittee headed by Connecticut Rep. Rosa DeLauro. The generics makers count some Republican supporters as well: Mississippi's Trent Lott, who will be the new Republican whip in the Senate, co-sponsored a bill supported by the industry last year with Michigan Democrat Debbie Stabenow.

"I'm obviously supportive of whatever we can do to make generics more available," says Democratic Rep. Frank Pallone of New Jersey, who may become chairman of the House Energy and Commerce health subcommittee. Drug prices are the kind of "affordability issue" that drew votes to Democrats, he says, adding that he supports the idea of generic biotech drugs. Mr. Waxman, with Sens. Schumer and Clinton, has introduced a bill to create a generic biotech pathway, which he says is "very, very much needed."

Generics makers are leaning on a coalition that has worked in the past, drawing on big employers and others scared by rising health-care costs. European regulators, meanwhile, have already begun crafting guidelines for what they call "biosimilars."

The generics makers' pitch is simple, and likely to resonate with many lawmakers: Helping them means lower drug costs, and doesn't involve government-imposed price controls or the controversies surrounding imported medicines.

The generics industry complains about remaining "loopholes" in law and regulation exploited by branded-pharmaceutical makers to delay generic competition. On the issue of generic biotech drugs, they argue that they can safely create copies without duplicating all the expensive studies done by the original manufacturers. "Right now, there's a regulatory monopoly" for biotech drugs, says Kathleen Jaeger, chief executive of the Generic Pharmaceutical Association.

Branded-drug companies defend their tactics. In a statement, the Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America says licensing additional competitors increases competition and brings down prices beyond the introduction of a generic version. The group also says the FDA needs to consider safety issues raised by petitions before it approves a drug, and such petitions allow consumers and others to "present their views on important FDA issues."

The biotech industry, for its part, is pushing its own case on Capitol Hill. One argument: Science isn't advanced enough for generics makers to produce truly identical duplicates of their medications. It is likely to get a good hearing from Democrats, partly because of biotech companies' base in Democratic strongholds of California and Massachusetts.

Some biotech officials argue that generics makers will need to redo all the studies performed by the original manufacturer, in order to guarantee their copycat products are effective and safe for patients. That would likely eliminate much, or all, of the price advantage offered by the generics rivals. "There is no way to characterize a biological," says James Greenwood, a former congressman who heads the Biotechnology Industry Organization, a trade group.

DOJ_NMG_0096746

Biotech companies also argue that their products take longer to develop, and are often tested for use in fighting more illnesses than traditional drugs. For small start-ups, they say, generic competition could be devastating. So if legislation moves forward, they will press for trade-offs such as extra years of exclusive marketing. Such a compromise was the basis for the 1984 passage of the generics bill.

"I would like to see Congress be fair to the innovators," says Jim Green, a senior vice president of Biogen Idec Inc., of Cambridge, Mass. "The level of research-and-development investment in the next product is not going down."

Write to Anna Wilde Mathews at anna.mathews@wsj.com1

Intelligence Panel Staffer Reinstated (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, November 21, 2006

A Democratic staff member of the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence has had his security clearances reinstated and yesterday resumed work for the panel, ending a pre-election drama during which senior House Republicans alleged he may have leaked an intelligence report that was politically embarrassing to the Bush administration.

The mid-level staffer, Larry Hanauer, had signed an affidavit that he did not "discuss, disclose or cause to be discussed or disclosed" a National Intelligence Estimate (NIE) on Iraq to any person "affiliated with the press."

Committee Chairman Peter Hoekstra (R-Mich.) wrote on Friday to ranking Democrat Jane Harman (Calif.) that the affidavit and the results of the committee staff director's interview of Hanauer were enough for him to rescind the punishment.

An earlier plan to carry on an investigation of all staff members to include possible review of their past e-mails was dropped. A spokesman for Hoekstra, Jamal Ware, said that the staff member's access to classified information had been "restored," but that otherwise the chairman would have no comment on the matter.

At the time of the suspension, Hoekstra told Harman that another committee member, Rep. Ray LaHood (R-Ill.), had questioned the timing between Hanauer obtaining the NIE for a Democratic lawmaker who requested it and the New York Times publishing a story about it days later. Although the leak allegation was not based on any evidence, Hoekstra suspended Hanauer, telling Harman he had "come to the conclusion that I cannot assume that this was a mere coincidence."

Soon after the suspension last month, House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) and House Majority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.) released statements condemning leaks and praising Hoekstra.

Jonathan Turley, Hanauer's Washington attorney, yesterday released a statement welcoming the news that "this long nightmare for Larry and his family is now over." He added that it is "regrettable that it took this long given the total absence of any evidence linking Larry to the New York Times articles." In the interim, Hanauer worked in Harman's office handling non-classified duties, and he said he received threatening phone calls as a result of the publicity.

The situation highlighted long-standing animosity between Hoekstra and Harman. Harman objected to the chairman's release of several intelligence reports -- drafted primarily by the Republican staff -- that gave support to the Bush administration's policies dealing with terrorism, Iran and North Korea. In turn, Harman had released an internal report raising questions about how former committee member Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Calif.) had used his status to get Pentagon contracts for political supporters. Cunningham is serving an eight-year prison sentence after being convicted on bribery and other charges.

The antagonism between the two senior committee members seems not to have ended. Hoekstra, in his Friday letter, reminded Harman that his policy prohibits staff members from talking to the media "unless authorized by me," adding: "Even when such contacts do not deal with classified information."

He pointedly noted that he had been told "it has been the routine practice of the minority staff to have contacts with the press at your direction." Hoekstra added, referring to Hanauer: "I expect the staff member to comply scrupulously with my announced policy for the remainder of the 109th Congress."

Under normal circumstances, Harman would be in line to replace Hoekstra as chairman in January. But Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), who under the rules appoints all members of the intelligence panel, has indicated that she plans to choose someone else, possibly the next ranking Democrat, Rep. Alcee L. Hastings (Fla.).

DOJ_NMG_0096747

One alternative, according to a senior Democratic staff member who asked not to be identified because he was not authorized to speak for his boss, would be for Pelosi to give Harman the chairmanship of an intelligence panel subcommittee, rather than just dropping her from the committee.

As for Hoekstra, a Republican congressional staffer said whether the current chairman remains on the committee is up to Boehner, who under the rules chooses the panel's membership. "I believe Mr. Hoekstra would serve if Boehner selects him," the staff member said.

Same Old Party (NYT)

By Thomas B. Edsall

The New York Times, November 21, 2006

Washington

Last Friday, the Republicans gave the Democrats a gift that will keep on giving: Roy Blunt of Missouri.

After an election repudiating the politics of Jack Abramoff and Tom DeLay, Republicans elevated Blunt from the number three spot in the leadership to number two.

Roy Blunt embodies the insidious, half-legal corruption that has permeated the G.O.P. majority since 1995. Blunt's election as minority whip, by a 137-to-57 margin, was a defiant Republican rejection of calls to clean up their act. Warnings by Blunt's challenger, John Shadegg of Arizona — "We ceded our reform-minded principles in exchange for a ...tighter grip on power" — went unheeded.

In 1998, DeLay put Blunt on the leadership ladder, making him chief deputy whip. Blunt modeled himself on DeLay, creating an identical network of state and federal political committees that raised money from the same lobbyists, corporations and trade associations that financed what became known as DeLay Inc.

If one political operation captured the essence of DeLay's leadership, it was the Republican takeover of Washington's influence-peddling industry. This industry, grossing $2.36 billion last year alone, eagerly accommodated DeLay's demands to replace Democratic lobbyists and association executives with Republicans. In a mutually rewarding relationship, lobbyists who financed DeLay Inc. wrote amendments and bills, while DeLay received a flood of cash to build a multimillion-dollar network of PACs. These committees lavished contributions, corporate jets and year-round entertainment on Republican House members, ensuring their loyalty, and channeled cash into local political parties, helping to win control of state legislatures that, in turn, gerrymandered districts to implement a long-term strategy of larger G.O.P. Congressional majorities.

In 2003, after DeLay moved up to majority leader and turned the so-called K Street Project over to him, Blunt promptly converted a legion of Republican lobbyists into an arm of the House whip operation. Lobbyists have always been close to Congress, under rule by either party. What DeLay and Blunt did was to sacralize this relationship. In doing so, they transferred a chunk of power from Capitol Hill to business interests.

This unholy alliance was a crucial factor in transforming the G.O.P. into an army of spenders whose earmarks, appropriations and tax cuts rivaled the government largess of Lyndon Johnson's Great Society.

In 2004, Blunt turned his lobbyist team loose to win passage of a bill eliminating a $50 billion corporate tax break that the World Trade Organization had ruled in violation of international agreements. These lobbyists inserted $143 billion worth of new corporate tax breaks, turning the bill into a Fortune 500 Christmas tree.

Blunt is not the easy target DeLay was. DeLay, a born-again Southern Baptist, by his own account had battled demon rum and the playboy life. Once he started down the path of righteousness, moralizing and sermonizing, he made enemies, painting a bull's-eye on his back.

Blunt, by contrast, is bland, unctuous and adept at keeping a low profile. But there is plenty to see. After divorcing his wife of 35 years to marry a tobacco lobbyist, Abigail Perlman, he cleared his second marriage with the House Ethics Committee to get "a waiver of the limitations of the gift rule to allow me to accept gifts in connection with my wedding."

Blunt unblushingly told the Heritage Foundation this month that Republicans "have allowed our efforts to defend traditional values to be defined as little more than a politically driven effort to appease 'family groups.' "

DOJ_NMG_0096748

For Blunt, the blurring of boundaries is a family tradition. His son Matt is the governor of Missouri. Another son, Andrew, is one of the state's top lobbyists. Almost all Altria subsidiaries — Kraft, Miller Brewing, Philip Morris (remember Abigail Perlman) — hired Andy Blunt, along with other financial backers of Roy Blunt.

In Blunt, House Republicans have kept on display a top official reminding voters why they cast ballots for Democrats on Nov. 7. After winning the post of minority whip last week, Blunt declared that the Republicans had "come together ... frankly, to get rid of the bad habits that we may have developed in 12 years in the majority." This is precisely the opposite of what they actually did, which was to affirm their bad habits. The burden on the Democrats will be to make the elusive Blunt a nationally recognized figure.

A Familiar Number (NYT)

By Robin Toner

The New York Times, November 21, 2006

With only a few races undecided, the new House of Representatives looks increasingly like a mirror image of the old: the Democrats are likely to have a majority close to 232, which was the Republicans' majority in the departing Congress. That may seem small compared with the Democrats' glory days; in 1994, before they lost power, they had 258 seats out of 435, and in the 1970s, after Watergate, they approached 300.

Still, the new Democratic majority is comparatively comfortable; 232 was the high-water mark for the Republicans in the 12 years they held power.

The strength of the Democratic showing in the elections this month was underscored by one statistic: they did not lose a single seat. They have gained 29 and, in New England, left the Republicans with just one House seat — that of Representative Christopher Shays of Connecticut — out of 22 in the region.

Whether the Democrats can hold this majority together on legislation, of course, is another question. And even if they maintain unity in the House, the prospects in the new Democratic Senate are even more fraught, given the particularly independent class just elected. Moreover, Senate Democrats have a majority of only 51, far short of the 60 votes required to break a filibuster.

Behind Democrats' Climb In Mountain West (USAT)

By Martin Kasindorf And Tom Kenworthy

USA Today, November 21, 2006

Some say party's success on Election Day was just a fluke; others see a major political realignment; it could just be a normal part of a cycle between parties

DENVER — A wave of Democratic blue is splashing the fast-growing Rocky Mountain West, which until recently was so Republican that all eight states in the region went red for President Bush in 2004.

Democrats are celebrating their Election Day seizure of a U.S. Senate seat, a governorship, three U.S. House seats and other major offices in Rocky Mountain states. That extends a trend started in 2002 with winning three governor seats. Now, Democrats are hoping to break the Republican lock on the inland West in the 2008 presidential race.

The region's results Nov. 7 tracked with Democratic successes in the Northeast and Midwest. The question is whether the Western shifts indicate a fluke, the normal turn of a cycle or a permanent realignment.

Some Republicans say their party should gird for long-term trouble. "The West is not going to be as definitively conservative and Republican as it has been," says Eddie Mahe, a veteran GOP campaign strategist. "The Rocky Mountain West is probably trending to look more like a lot of the remainder of the country, not quite as unique as it once was."

Utah Gov. Jon Huntsman, a Republican, says, "Many of the Democratic leaders in the region have co-opted Republican issues. It signals the success of certain traditional Western conservative values. Republicans in this region should stick to their knitting. We should focus on that which we do best — economic vitality, immigration, the environment, energy efficiency and tax reform."

Randy Pullen, a Republican National Committee member from Arizona, says the election was a one-shot loss. "This election was a referendum on the president," he says. "We'll fare better in two years."

DOJ_NMG_0096749

The political changes mean both national parties will pay more attention to the West, says Michael Stratton, a Democratic campaign strategist in Denver. “It sets the grounds for the candidacy of a president who can speak Western issues,” he says.

University of Maryland-Baltimore County political scientist Thomas Schaller says Democrats should develop a strategy for 2008 that would cede the South to the GOP. Schaller says in his book, Whistling Past Dixie, Democrats could reach the needed 270 electoral votes by winning Colorado, Arizona, Nevada, New Mexico and other targets in the Mountain West. Midwestern states also would get more attention. “The West is not cowpokes and tumbleweeds, if it ever was,” he says. “It's changing rapidly.”

Signs that the Democratic Party is getting the message:

•The Democratic National Committee this year added Nevada to the early presidential nominating contests. Nevada's caucuses will be in January 2008, between the Iowa caucuses and New Hampshire primary. The DNC wanted to move up a racially diverse state and to please Las Vegas' powerhouse, 60,000-member Culinary Union, says Michael Gehrke of the Senate Majority Project, a Democratic group separate from the party.

•Denver is a finalist to host the 2008 national convention. The DNC will decide between it and New York City next year.

•DNC Chairman Howard Dean's “50-state strategy” put field operatives on the payroll and dispatched them a year ago for groundwork in Mountain West states that Democrats used to write off.

Democrats made notable gains.

Former Denver prosecutor Bill Ritter won the governorship in Colorado. Now, Democrats control that office, the Legislature and a majority of the state's U.S. House delegation for the first time since 1958.

In 2000, Democrats had no governors in the eight Mountain West states. Ritter's win increases the party's count from four to five of the governors.

In Montana, Jon Tester, an organic farmer with a flattop haircut, narrowly upset Republican U.S. Sen. Conrad Burns. Montana, which gave Bush a 59% majority in 2004, now has two Democratic senators. Democrats also held both houses of the Legislature.

Democrats captured three GOP-held House seats in the region. In Arizona, former Tempe mayor Harry Mitchell unseated Rep. J. D. Hayworth, and Democrat Gabrielle Giffords defeated Republican Randy Graf for retiring Rep. Jim Kolbe's seat. Colorado Democrat Ed Perlmutter picked up the seat Republican Bob Beauprez left open in his losing run for governor.

Launching the Democratic trend in 2002 were governors Janet Napolitano in Arizona, Bill Richardson in New Mexico and Dave Freudenthal in Wyoming. All were just re-elected in landslides.

Factors making the difference for Democrats:

•No liberals. Luring Western voters these days are “Blue Dog” Democrats, moderate-to-conservative candidates who are comfortable in Stetsons and boots. They support gun rights, Democratic pollster Celinda Lake says.

“First off, it's recruiting candidates that look like your state and use words you use,” says Montana Gov. Brian Schweitzer, elected in 2004 as the state's first Democrat in the post in 20 years. “We don't scare 'em. We are the kind of people who go to church on Sunday, drive a pickup and lower taxes when we can.”

Lake recalls a moment in Schweitzer's 2004 campaign when he was asked his views on an amendment banning gay marriage. “He said, basically, ‘I believe marriage is between a man and a woman, but aren't you a lot more worried about the price of grain?' ”

•Population changes. Cities and suburbs are booming from Albuquerque to Las Vegas to Boise to Grand Junction, Colo. There's been an influx of Hispanics and others. Many people are fleeing California's high housing costs and flocking to thriving Mountain West economies.

“We've become less isolated, more cosmopolitan, less the Last Frontier typified by Barry Goldwater conservatism,” says F. Chris Garcia, a retired pollster and University of New Mexico political scientist. “As states grow rapidly, there's a blending going on. We're going toward the center, not being just of one party.”

Hispanic population growth also is changing the face of the West, particularly in the Southwest and Colorado, Richardson says.

DOJ_NMG_0096750

According to the Pew Hispanic Center, Hispanics eligible to vote in 2006 were 38% of the New Mexico electorate, 17% in Arizona, 13% in Nevada and 12% in Colorado (Hispanic citizens were 9% of the overall U.S. electorate.) "You have a new melting pot in the West," Schaller says. "It's good for Democrats if they can capitalize on it."

•Social attitudes. Many newcomers are from coastal states where religious fundamentalists have made few inroads, Schaller says. And though the religious right dominates the GOP machinery in some mountain states, it is less pervasive in the Mountain West than in the South, he says.

•Rapid growth. Nevada, Arizona and Idaho are the USA's fastest-growing states, with Utah fifth. In Denver, Albuquerque and other Western cities, growth has brought congestion and sprawl. That points Westerners toward Democrats who say government can manage the problems, says Daniel Kemmis, senior fellow at the University of Montana's Center for the Rocky Mountain West. "There is a growing awareness among Westerners that these growth pressures … require thoughtful responses, not ideological responses," says Kemmis, a Democrat and former speaker of Montana's House.

•Environmental views. Typical new Montana residents, Schweitzer says, are moderate Republicans drawn to the state's open landscapes, blue-ribbon trout streams, hunting and hiking.

"Why we choose to stay or move here is because of the quality of life," he says.

Old-line Western farmers and ranchers are allying with environmental groups in a "coalition for Teddy Roosevelt-style conservation" of land and wildlife that's helping Democrats against pro-industry Republicans, Stratton says.

Put it all together, and the good year for Democrats "is not a fluke," says Larry Sabato, a University of Virginia political scientist. "There may be some one-term wonders … but on the whole, the Democrats in the West were part of a national and regional trend. Colorado has been running toward the Democrats, and I don't see that it's going to move back any time soon."

Freudenthal, Wyoming's Democratic governor, says pundits are reading too much into Democratic gains. "It's hardly as ebullient as the Democrats say, or as dark as the Republicans do," he says. "On the state-level stuff, I think it's all local politics and not some groundswell one way or the other. Wyoming has not become a Democratic state."

Freudenthal says Western voters were concerned this year about health care, education and balanced growth — issues that favored Democrats.

"The issues created the Democrats more than the Democrats created the tide," he says.

Election Day wasn't a Democratic sweep.

Nevada Republicans retained the governorship and fended off a challenge for a House seat. Republicans kept House seats in Montana and Wyoming. Idaho Republicans won all seven statewide races, including governor. Utah, too, stayed in the red column.

The natural cycles of politics provide another explanation for Democratic gains, says Pam Inmann, executive director of the Western Governors' Association.

"We had a big change in '74 (toward the Democrats), another in '94 (toward the Republicans)," she says. "After a party's been in power for a while and things are not going well, things tend to shift."

Can Democrats hold their gains? "It depends on how the Republicans choose to respond," Freudenthal says. "If they move toward more moderate candidates, then it becomes competitive."

Ritter, Colorado's new Democratic governor, says the trend will last "if we govern well. If we squander this because we don't appreciate the Western electorate, then it'll be short-lived."

He says the success will continue if Democrats focus on "how government intersects with where people struggle. It's about running a smart government, not a big government."

Traditionally Republican States Show They're Open To Democrats (MCT)

By Steven Thomma

McClatchy Newspapers, November 21, 2006

WASHINGTON - The next time you look at a political map of the United States, you'll have to adjust the color. After this month's elections, the old red-blue map that's defined the country for years is dead.

DOJ_NMG_0096751

All the solid Democratic states are still Democratic blue - basically the West Coast, the Northeast and scattered Great Lakes states such as Illinois, Wisconsin and Michigan.

Some are even bluer. Democrats took back the governor's office in New York, for example.

But a lot of states that were dependably Republican Red are now some other hue. Call them purple, striped or polka-dotted - the fact is they're now open to Democrats.

They haven't gone completely over. But they did elect some Democrats, signaling that they're in play. And that means a new center of gravity for the Democrats as they struggle to define themselves by governing in Congress the next two years and setting the table for 2008, hoping to consolidate this year's gains and win back the White House.

Democrats gained in states such as Colorado, where they picked up the governor's office.

That gives them a statehouse foothold across the Mountain West, as they now hold governors' offices in a solid line from Montana to New Mexico.

Democrats also picked up Senate seats in once-solid red states, such as Ohio and Virginia.

And they gained U.S. House of Representatives seats in such red states as Arizona, Colorado, Georgia, Indiana, Kansas, Kentucky, North Carolina, Ohio, Tennessee and Texas.

In part that reflects changes within those states. Migration of Democrats from the North to the Sun Belt continues to dilute the Republican red zone. Immigration brings new voters from Mexico and farther south, the majority of them Democrats once they vote.

It also reflects changes in the Democrats, who this year recruited centrists and moderates to compete in culturally conservative areas.

These new voices in the party - people such as incoming Sens. Bob Casey of Pennsylvania, Jon Tester of Montana and James Webb of Virginia - are certain to influence how the party handles issues such as abortion, taxes and gun control. Many are anti-abortion, anti-tax and pro-gun.

Democrats will want to keep those hard-won gains. And having tasted victory in red states, Democrats likely will want to go back and win the 14 House seats they lost by less than 1 percent, many of them in red states.

"Who you represent, who you're fighting over, changes thinking within the party. The party will be impacted by this election," said Democratic pollster Stan Greenberg. "When people look up at whose seats they are defending and the seats they can pick up ... that will impact what Democrats take up, what symbolic issues get put out on the table."

Issues that appealed to the party's liberal base might anger its new supporters and provide fresh ammunition to Republicans to re-energize their base.

Thus, a committed liberal such as Rep. Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., the next House speaker, stifles talk about gay rights, a living wage, tax increases or cutting off funds for the Iraq war. The liberal base will push for those and more - but it can't rule the new map the way it did the old.

Another example: The last time the Democrats controlled the Congress, in 1994, they made gun control a centerpiece of their domestic agenda. This time around, it hasn't been mentioned, and many Democrats boast of their support for gun rights.

"If somebody brings up guns," said Democratic strategist James Carville, "I'm going to shoot `em."

These states also may be purple for the 2008 presidential election.

Democrats now hold governors' offices in states with 295 electoral votes - enough to win the White House.

"I consider all those states part of the presidential strategy," said Greenberg, who helped Bill Clinton win the presidency in 1992.

Still, one of the challenges facing Democrats is to find a presidential nominee who can satisfy both the liberals of Los Angeles and New York and the moderates of Golden, Colo., or Missoula, Mont.

Is The South Truly A Dead Zone For Democrats? (NYT)

By Adam Nossiter

The New York Times, November 21, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0096752

NEW ORLEANS, Nov. 20 — The South largely sat out the drama of the recent election, apparently confirming its reputation as the Democrats' graveyard. An influential book published in October predicted as much, saying the party could safely avert its gaze from a region that could not be of help.

"They don't need the South to win," said Thomas F. Schaller, who wrote the book, "Whistling Past Dixie: How the Democrats Can Win Without the South," and who teaches political science at the University of Maryland, Baltimore County. "Why would Democrats go after the most rural, least unionized, most racially polarized, most evangelized region in the country?" As proof, Mr. Schaller has cited Representative Harold E. Ford Jr.'s losing Senate race in Tennessee.

But not so fast. The thundering silence from the South may prove nothing more than what should be obvious: when Democrats do not compete, or compete unequally, they lose. Party officials in Tennessee, reflecting on the race in recent days, acknowledged that Mr. Ford was not an ideal candidate for the state, and not just because he was a black politician trying to climb the steep mountain of a white electorate. His own political baggage added significantly to his burden.

Throughout the South, Democrats ceded vast swaths of Congressional territory to Republicans, hardly bothering to show that the party was alive, even in places where such a demonstration might have been welcome. In Louisiana, Democrats barely fought in two Congressional districts where Republican incumbents could have been vulnerable: the Fifth District in the north, represented by a party-switching Republican whose last-minute change infuriated the state's Democrats two years ago, and the Seventh District in Cajun country to the south, peopled by socially tolerant French Catholics and long represented by Democrats.

Democratic officials in the state say they tried to persuade strong candidates to take up these challenges but found no buyers and evidently no deep bench from which to draw, testimony to the years of national Republican ascendancy.

True, President Bush piled up big majorities in 2004 in both districts, but he also did so in a southern Louisiana district where the Democratic incumbent was handily re-elected on Nov. 7. Had Democrats fought in Louisiana this year, "they would have made a good run for it," said Wayne Parent, a political scientist at Louisiana State University.

In Mississippi and Alabama, Republican incumbents cruised to re-election with hardly a peep out of the Democrats. Yet Mississippi, depicted by Mr. Schaller in some ways as the most impregnable Republican bastion in the South, has elected progressive Democrats as governor three times in the last three decades, a fact unmentioned by Mr. Schaller in his book. In Georgia, two Democratic incumbents considered by Republicans to be among the most vulnerable in the nation held their seats, albeit narrowly.

In many ways, however, it was the closely watched Senate race in Tennessee that was most indicative of the problems and the promise of the Democrats' future in the region.

At one level, Mr. Ford's loss to the Republican, Bob Corker, was simply a reiteration of an ancient reality for Democrats in the South: black candidates in statewide races are unlikely to win because they face a majority-white electorate, and most whites do not vote for blacks. In other words, there is a challenge with the voters, not the candidate, which is one of Mr. Schaller's arguments.

For example, at an election-eve rally in rural Centerville, about 65 miles west of Nashville, John C. Tidwell, the local Democratic state representative, looked out over the small, mostly white crowd and said, "There are people spread out here that wouldn't vote for" Mr. Ford "even if he were Moses." Mr. Tidwell used a slur for a black man, not Mr. Ford's name.

Another attendee, Wes Morgan, backed up Mr. Tidwell's observation: Mr. Ford's race was a tough sell in Hickman County, which includes Centerville. "You're still in the country," said Mr. Morgan, an emergency medical technician. "A lot of people say, 'Ain't no way my grandfather would have voted for a black man.' "

Yet even given that reality, Mr. Ford came remarkably close, winning 48 percent of the vote. Why he did not do better was suggested by Mr. Tidwell's next comment, which also hinted at why Mr. Ford's racial background was not the only factor in his loss.

"These people are struggling with their vote," Mr. Tidwell said. "They don't like the Republicans, but they don't like a Ford black boy either." Here the racially charged language was accompanied by the Ford name, and for many in Tennessee, that carried a specific meaning.

Voters knew that several members of the politically active Ford family had been caught up in legal and ethical problems, including Mr. Ford's father and predecessor in Congress, Harold Ford Sr., who was acquitted on federal corruption charges.

DOJ_NMG_0096753

"The Ford name has a lot of baggage in West Tennessee," said Will T. Cheek, a member of the Democratic National Committee in Nashville.

That voters might have considered the Fords less than trustworthy could have been reinforced in the Senate race, in the view of some Tennessee Democrats, by the candidate's own late-breaking genuflections toward his faith, by his denunciations of same-sex marriage and by other signals of a swing to the right.

As it happened, white Democrats did turn out for Mr. Ford in Tennessee, just not in sufficient numbers, suggesting that a different candidate, and not necessarily a white one, could have been elected.

"We really lost this thing in rural Middle Tennessee, which is historically Democratic, and it did not perform well at all," said Mr. Cheek, who is also a former chairman of the Tennessee Democratic Party. (Most of the state's black voters are concentrated in the western third of the state.) Looking over the statistics postelection, "Ford is winning," Mr. Cheek said, "but he's not winning as big as he should be winning."

In several counties, Mr. Ford won even fewer votes than Senator John Kerry, who lost big in the state when he ran for president in 2004. And Mr. Ford lost while Gov. Phil Bredesen, a Democrat, was sweeping every county in the state.

"I think another candidate might have won — I think one of the congressmen could have won it," Mr. Cheek said, referring to Tennessee's Democratic representatives.

In an interview last week, Mr. Schaller, the political scientist, was jubilant, seeing the national election as a vindication of his book. "For the first time in 52 years," he said, "Congress will be run by the party that has a minority of Southern seats in the House and Senate."

But others warn that to abandon the South carries risks as well, paralleling those faced by Republicans who let themselves become dominated by Southern voices and ideology.

"The Republican mistake was to center the party too much in the South," said Mr. Parent, of Louisiana State University. But "once the Democratic Party starts extricating itself from Dixie too much, it might move itself too far away from its center in Ohio and Pennsylvania."

Dems' Senate Grip Will Rely On 3 New Hybrids (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

USA Today, November 21, 2006

WASHINGTON

When Democrats take over the Senate in January, the party's bare two-vote majority will include three senators whose history shows they heed their own views more than those of any political leader.

Just how precarious is the Democrats' grip on power? The 51 senators who will make up the party's Senate caucus beginning in January include two who aren't officially Democrats — independents Joe Lieberman of Connecticut and Bernie Sanders of Vermont — and Jim Webb of Virginia, who used to be a Republican.

The 110th Congress will be the first since 1976 to have two people who don't belong to the two major parties serving in the Senate at the same time. Republicans will occupy 49 of the chamber's 100 seats.

Even when one party has a more comfortable margin of control, Senate rules make it "easy to play to a draw on everything," says deputy Democratic leader Dick Durbin of Illinois.

In the new Senate, where every roll call could be a squeaker, political hybrids Lieberman, Sanders and Webb stand to be key players.

No wonder incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid lavished plum committee assignments on the trio last week.

Lieberman will head the high-profile committee that oversees homeland security and governmental affairs. Webb, though a freshman, snagged coveted posts on the Armed Services and homeland security committees. In addition to the three assignments he requested — on the energy; environment; and health, education and labor committees — Sanders said he was surprised to learn he's also been given a seat on the Senate Budget Committee.

DOJ_NMG_0096754

On paper, the three appear likely to push the party in opposite directions: Sanders describes himself as a "democratic socialist;" Webb worked in the administration of President Reagan, a conservative icon. He and Lieberman share a belief that the Democratic Party must develop more muscular stands on defense and foreign policy.

In separate interviews, however, all three members of what could become the Senate's maverick caucus identified one area of common ground: All named the middle class squeeze as one of their top concerns and said they want to reverse Bush administration policies that, in their view, favor the wealthy.

Dems Return To Power With A Long Wish List (USAT)

By Richard Wolf

USA Today, November 21, 2006

WASHINGTON — Democrats will return to power in Congress with a lengthy list of expensive priorities and a pledge to pay for them. Some budget experts say the dual goals don't add up.

Democratic leaders have endorsed an ambitious agenda that includes fortifying the military, improving homeland security, helping veterans, making college more affordable, establishing energy independence and boosting private savings rates. Annual tab: at least $79 billion, according to the National Taxpayers Union, a group opposed to higher taxes.

They also want to protect 20 million upper middle-income taxpayers from the alternative minimum tax. It was originally designed to ensure the rich didn't avoid paying taxes, but it threatens to raise taxes on the less affluent unless it's indexed for inflation. Cost: $50 billion a year, according to the Joint Committee on Taxation.

And they want to eliminate the coverage gap in Medicare's prescription-drug program, which forces those with big drug bills to pay at least $3,600 out of pocket. Price tag: about $30 billion a year and rising, according to the Congressional Budget Office.

At the same time, Democratic leaders say, they will reinstate budget rules that expired in 2002. They want statutory caps on most domestic and defense spending. They also want new tax cuts or benefit increases offset by other tax increases or spending cuts to keep the deficit from growing.

"They can't basically have all of those priorities … without deciding who's going to pay the bill, and that means either cuts in spending or increases in revenue," says Leon Panetta, White House chief of staff and budget director under President Clinton. "There's going to be a huge temptation here to borrow the Republicans' example of borrow and spend."

"It's going to be difficult," says Rep. Charles Rangel, D-N.Y., who is in line to lead the tax-writing House Ways and Means Committee next year. "We're going to have to see how much fat is out there."

The growing list of pent-up Democratic demands reflects 12 years largely spent out of power in Congress. In the days after the election, Democrats who will chair key committees spoke openly of goals as ambitious as expanding health insurance to all children and providing free college educations to math and science majors.

The immediate list is less expensive. In crafting their "Six for '06" campaign agenda, incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid left off fixing the alternative minimum tax and closing the Medicare drug coverage gap because of their costs.

Still, items such as implementing the homeland security recommendations of the 9/11 Commission and cutting interest rates for student loans could cost billions more once specific proposals are made. Democrats have pledged to pass those in the first 100 hours of the new Congress.

Some of the party's leading proponents of reducing the $248 billion federal deficit say the initial package is realistic. Sen. Kent Conrad, D-N.D., in line to be the Senate Budget Committee chairman, calls it "pretty modest." Rep. Jim Cooper, D-Tenn., says it's "reasonable."

Paying for those priorities may prove untenable, they say, forcing Democrats to choose between forgoing new initiatives or waiving the budget rules. "You impose a discipline that may restrict your ability to enact one or more of them," Conrad says.

The Democrats have a much smaller list of ways to pay for their initiatives. They would have the government negotiate lower prices with drug companies for the Medicare prescription program, which the Congressional Budget Office has said will not save money. They would repeal subsidies for big oil companies worth about $7 billion a year. And they would try to close the elusive “tax gap” — an estimated $400 billion in taxes owed but uncollected each year. The IRS says $50 billion to $100 billion eventually could be recouped.

DOJ_NMG_0096755

Republicans scoff at the disparity between the Democrats' wish list and wallet. “It's going to be difficult to do some of the things Democrats have suggested,” says Rep. Jim McCrery, R-La., who's in line to be the top Republican on the Ways and Means Committee.

“It is extraordinarily expensive. You're talking tens if not hundreds of billions of dollars,” says Sen. Judd Gregg, R-N.H., current chairman of the Senate Budget Committee.

Critics of the pay-as-you-go budget rule note that it doesn't reduce the automatic growth of Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid, since it applies only to new initiatives. It could, however, endanger President Bush's tax cuts, which are due to expire in 2010. Extending them for five years would cost more than $1.2 trillion, the Congressional Budget Office says. The rule was in effect but waived in 2001, when most of the tax cuts were enacted but not paid for.

“Every dollar of federal spending, no matter how wasteful, will be defended to the death by whoever receives it,” says Brian Riedl, a budget analyst at the conservative Heritage Foundation. “Gimmicks usually win out.”

Push To Add Real Estate Funds To Savings Plan Is Rebuffed (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, November 21, 2006

Don't bet the mortgage that the Thrift Savings Plan will add a real estate investment fund, or any other option, soon.

A consultant hired by the TSP said yesterday that the retirement savings program for government employees is generally comparable to 401(k) and similar plans offered in the private sector and did not recommend any changes.

"Our review of the program leads us to the conclusion that the core of the investment program is well-structured and there are no gaps in the investment lineup," Ennis Knupp, a consultancy in Chicago, said in a report.

About 200 House members are co-sponsoring a bill that would add a real estate investment fund to the TSP, which prompted the Federal Retirement Thrift Investment Board to order the $140,000 study. After the board signaled opposition to adding a real estate option and sought the study, the chief sponsors of the bill put it on hold.

The board, chaired by Andrew M. Saul, was briefed by representatives of Ennis Knupp yesterday, but board members did not mention the proposed legislation. A board spokesman said copies of the consultant's study had been sent to congressional committees that oversee the TSP.

The National Association of Real Estate Investment Trusts has pushed for adding a real estate fund, contending that it would help government employees diversify their portfolios.

The association's spokesman said the consultant's report is being reviewed but portrayed its findings as predictable. "Given the TSP administration's longstanding opposition to adding new choices to the TSP lineup, we're not terribly surprised that the report validated the TSP management viewpoint," Ron Kuykendall, the spokesman, said.

Real estate investment trusts, or REITs, are publicly traded companies that own and usually manage real estate, such as office buildings, shopping centers, apartments, hotels and warehouses. They are often called "liquid real estate" because they provide a way to invest in an array of commercial properties without having to buy them directly. REITs are required to pay out most of their taxable income to shareholders.

A spokesman for Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.), one of the chief proponents for adding a real estate fund to the TSP, said Davis "looks forward to continuing to discuss with federal employees why he thinks they would benefit from a REIT option."

In reviewing REITs for the TSP, the consultant found they have outpaced most U.S. stocks over the past decade and have performed particularly well in the past five years, with an annualized return exceeding 19 percent.

But Ennis Knupp concluded that REITs remain a "sub-sector" of the stock market and that participants can gain exposure to REITs through the TSP's large, common stock index fund and its small-company index fund. The consultant also raised concerns that the REIT market might have difficulty in accommodating cash flows in excess of $200 million on some days, a possibility based on the TSP's experience with its international fund.

DOJ_NMG_0096756

In addition to REITs, the consultant reviewed growth and value stock funds, emerging markets stocks, non-U.S. bonds, commodities and Treasury inflation-protected securities, known as TIPS.

Russell Ivinjack, an Ennis Knupp principal, said his team found more disadvantages than advantages in the six asset classes, suggesting that the TSP should stick with its four broad index funds, a government securities fund, and five life-cycle funds that automatically shift to less risky investments as a participant nears the time to draw down savings.

Private-sector survey data examined by Ennis Knupp indicated that most 401(k) participants select investment options similar to those of TSP participants, he said. The data, he added, "confirms this program is in the mainstream."

Saul noted that the TSP hit $200 billion in assets this month -- "really a milestone." The TSP has more than doubled in size in the past four years, making it one of the largest retirement savings programs in the world.

Textile Fiasco (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 21, 2006

Congress's failure to pass Permanent Normal Trade Relations with Vietnam embarrassed President Bush on his visit to Hanoi last week. But this failure is an even bigger fiasco than it appears because of the White House's pandering to the U.S. textile industry. It's a case study in how protectionists never stay bought.

The power of the textile lobby is an old story, and the Bush Administration bowed to it by negotiating extraordinary quota provisions with Vietnam. In particular, it agreed to allow quotas to be reimposed if there are import surges in Vietnam textiles to the U.S. once the deal is implemented. But that wasn't enough for the textile crowd, who induced GOP Senators Lindsey Graham (South Carolina) and Elizabeth Dole (North Carolina) to put a hold on the bill. Never mind that the bill has bipartisan support and many more than the 60 Senate votes needed to overcome a filibuster.

But instead of insisting that Republicans bring the bill to a vote, the Administration chose to make one more protectionist concession. In a September letter to the two GOP Senators, Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez and Trade Representative Susan Schwab agreed to "self-initiate anti-dumping investigations" against Vietnamese apparel under certain circumstances. That is, the government declared that it will serve as the textile lobby's protectionist front man.

This is stunning. For one thing, the government almost never initiates anti-dumping actions. The last time we can recall it happening was on softwood lumber in 1991. Under the anti-dumping laws, the industry itself is supposed to show evidence that it is being harmed by specific imported products.

More amazing still, the U.S. textile industry doesn't compete with apparel -- such as trousers, shirts, sweaters -- that American retailers import from Vietnam. It makes yarn or fabric. So the Bush Administration is promising to protect the U.S. yarn industry against a surge in imports of other textile products. It would be as if the U.S. agreed to protect U.S. car makers against a surge in foreign automobile tires. The trade precedent here is dangerous, and probably violates World Trade Organization rules.

What's going on is that the U.S. textile industry is trying to protect its interests not in the U.S. but in Central America. If the Vietnam bill passes, apparel from Vietnam may well be able to undercut the price of similar goods from Honduras. Those Central American plants buy U.S. yarn, so the textile lobby is trying to block exports from Vietnam to protect its own exports to Honduras.

In other words, under the promises made by the Bush Administration, the winners would be big yarn-spinning companies like Parkdale Mills. The losers would be American consumers who would pay more for their clothing.

In the event, even this wasn't enough to get the Vietnam trade deal through Congress in time for the President's trip. The bill failed in the House in part because some Republicans decided to take a slap at the White House for its contributions to this month's electoral rout. Meanwhile, U.S. retailers that import apparel are understandably furious at the protection double-cross and wonder if this bill is now worth their support. The bill could still return for a vote in this lame-duck Congress, but trade bills are never a sure thing.

This fiasco is another illustration that tactical protectionist concessions rarely yield the strategic free-trade gains that supporters claim. The Bush White House justified its steel tariffs and farm subsidy blowout in the first term as the price of passing trade promotion authority, but the global backlash has been extreme. The Doha Round may not even make it to a vote in Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0096757

We doubt President Bush is aware of all this, but the White House aides and Cabinet officers who bollixed up the Vietnam bill owe him an apology. So far they've managed only to turn a vehicle for more open markets into a precedent for more protectionism.

OTHER NEWS:

Leading Economic Indicators Inched Higher In October (WSJ)

By Michael S. Derby

The Wall Street Journal, November 21, 2006

NEW YORK -- An indicator of future economic activity inched higher in October, a private research group said Monday, suggesting that recent weakness in the housing market hasn't been severe enough to offset lower gas prices and a rising stock market.

Separately, the National Association of Realtors reported that existing home sales in the third quarter dipped to a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 6.27 million units nationwide, down 12.7% from the same period a year ago.

The Conference Board, an industry-backed research group based in New York, said its composite index of leading economic indicators for October rose by 0.2% to 138.3, after a revised 0.4% advance the month before. The index was equal to 100 in 1996. October's rise matched forecasters' expectation.

WALL STREET JOURNAL VIDEO

1

WSJ's David Wessel discusses2 an economists' poll of the housing market and whether the worst of the bust is behind us. • Alan Hubbard, director of the National Economic Council3, discusses the latest economic numbers, including the impact of a slower housing market, and the "importance of keeping taxes low."

The index is designed to predict economic activity in the three to six months ahead. October's modest increase fit with economists' view that growth is moderating. The index fell in both July and August before edging modestly higher in September. It has been down four of the last seven months. The index stood at 139.1 in January -- its peak so far this year.

"The impact of a slower housing market on consumers and slower profit growth on business isn't completely offset by lower gas prices and a rising stock market," said Ken Goldstein, an economist with the Conference Board. He added the economy "is unlikely either to reheat or get significantly cooler" and the current pace of cool economic growth could continue into the spring.

The private research group noted that six of the 10 components making up the leading index rose for the month, led by money supply and consumer expectations. The biggest negatives were vendor performance and building permits. The reported noted, "strengths and weaknesses have been roughly balanced among the leading indicators in recent months."

In other details, the group reported that its index of coincident indicators was up 0.1% to a reading of 123.7, after September's revised gain of 0.2%. The lagging index rose 0.2% to 124.1, the same gain as the prior month.

Home Sales Fall

Sales of existing homes fell in 38 states during the summer, led by steep declines in Arizona, Florida and California , as the once-booming housing market showed further signs of a steep slowdown, said the National Association of Realtors.

The declines were the largest in once-booming areas of the country. Sales fell by 36% in Arizona; 34.2% in Florida and 28.6% in California. In all, nine states had sales declines in the summer of 20% or more compared to the third quarter of 2005.

The weakness in sales also affected prices with 45 metropolitan areas experiencing price declines, according to a separate survey the Realtors did of 148 metropolitan areas. The price survey showed that the median -- or midpoint -- price for an existing home sold in the third quarter dipped to $224,900, down 1.2% from a year earlier.

Sales rose in 10 states, and in two states -- New Hampshire and Vermont -- the Realtors did not have available data.

The nationwide 12.7% fall in sales was from a summer 2005 pace of 7.18 million units, which was the second highest in history. The all-time record sales pace was an annual rate of 7.19 million units set in the April-June quarter of last year. Sales of both existing and new homes set records for a fifth consecutive year in 2005 but have been falling steadily this year as conditions in the housing market have deteriorated.

DOJ_NMG_0096758

The plunge in housing shaved a full percentage-point off economic growth in the July-September quarter with economists predicting a similar reduction in the current quarter.

But David Lereah, the Realtors' chief economist, said he believed the decline in prices in formerly red-hot areas of the country was setting the stage for a rebound next year. "With the market in full transition, buyers now have choices and sellers are more willing to negotiate," he said. "Under these circumstances, it's no surprise that overall home prices are slightly below a year ago."

Is The Worst Over For The Housing Bust? (WSJ)

By Phil Izzo

The Wall Street Journal, November 21, 2006

After several years of double-digit percentage increase, housing prices stopped soaring this year. The 49 economists responding to the WSJ.com forecasting survey expect home prices, measured by the government's Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight index, to rise 2.8% this year and to fall by 0.5% next year. That contrasts with a 13.4% increase in 2005.

"We're nearing the end of the slowdown for most markets," said Ethan S. Harris at Lehman Brothers. Prices still have some ways to fall before they'll stabilize, but there are signs that most drastic parts of the downturn – marked by a sharp pullback in demand and new construction – have run their course.

The economists' predictions for home prices next year vary widely, from an increase of 7%, predicted by Kurt Karl and Arun Raha of Swiss Re, to a 10% decline, expected by Maury Harris of UBS. Mr. Harris, for his part, said he expects a large inventory of vacant newly constructed homes to push prices lower in the first half. Construction companies "built much more than were justified because of investor interest," he said.

While 20 economists predicted home prices would rise next year, 24 forecast a decline. Just eight of the economists forecast gains greater than 2.1%, which is their average forecast for consumer-price inflation through mid-2007. The Ofheo index, which is closely watched by economists, has never posted a year-to-year decline.

Richard DeKaser, an economist at National City Corp., a big mortgage provider, said he thinks the worst is over. "We're starting to see inventories topping out and possible declining," he said. Mr. DeKaser forecast a 4.4% increase in prices this year and a 1.8% decline next.

The housing market, of course, doesn't move uniformly across the country; some regions or individual cities often have price changes decidedly above or below the national average.

Mr. Harris of Lehman expects price declines next year to be confined to "bubble" markets, such as those in Florida, California and cities in Nevada and Arizona, where large numbers of investors have artificially inflated prices. "There's no reason for prices to be falling in areas without a bubble," he said. "People are just slowing down purchase decisions."

Allen Sinai, at Decision Economics Inc., believes the worst of the bust is over, but he feels housing remains a big risk to the economy. The housing sector subtracted 1.1 percentage points from third-quarter gross domestic product, according to preliminary numbers from the U.S. Commerce Department.

ABOUT THE SURVEY

The Wall Street Journal surveys a group of more than 50 economists throughout the year. Broad surveys on more than 10 major economic indicators are conducted semiannually, at midyear and at year-end. Between each semiannual survey, four monthly updates are conducted for the most closely watched forecasts. This is the monthly survey for November. For prior installments of the semiannual and monthly surveys, see: WSJ.com/Economists5.

The economists trimmed their forecasts for fourth-quarter economic growth: Their average estimate puts gross domestic product growth at a 2.3% rate in the fourth quarter, down from the 2.5% rate they forecast in the October survey. They expect growth to remain at that rate through the first half of 2007 and then to accelerate later in the year. On average, the economists predicted growth of 2.8% during the second half 2007. GDP is the broadest measure of economic output.

The housing slowdown is expected to hit consumer spending, but the "consumer won't cave in and drive us into a recession," said Mr. Sinai. Steady interest rates, controlled inflation, stabilizing energy prices and a solid jobs market will support the economy, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0096759

Indeed, new data released Monday indicated that weakness in the housing sector is being offset by other areas of the economy. The Conference Board, an industry-backed research group based in New York, said its composite index of leading indicators for October rose by 0.2% to 138.3, in line with expectations. September's reading was revised up to a 0.4% advance. The index is designed to predict activity in the three to six months ahead.

"People say all bubbles end in disaster, but this is a small bubble. Home prices are just about 20% too high. We need to take it seriously, but in the history of bubbles, this will go down as one of the smaller ones," said Lehman's Mr. Harris.

Among other findings in the survey:

• Economists expect a relatively happy holiday for retailers, forecasting a 5.1% rise in sales from last year.

• Some 57% expect Fed policy to be the biggest factor in the economy and markets over the next year, topping Iraq or the budget and tax legislation.

• Just eight of 56 economists expect the Federal Reserve to raise rates beyond the current 5.25% rate before June 2007.

• Economists expect just 107,000 new jobs a month over the next year, down from 109,800 forecast in October and 179,400 at the high for this year's surveys, in February.

Homes' Losing Streak To Continue (USAT)

By Noelle Knox

USA Today, November 21, 2006

Home prices will drop further through the end of the year, the National Association of Realtors projected Monday, after news that prices fell in 45 metro areas last summer, as weakness in the housing markets spread to more areas.

The drag on median home prices has gone beyond the industrial cities, where job losses have taken a toll on housing. Now, markets in Florida, California and Arizona, where prices had shot up higher than many working families could afford, are falling back to Earth.

The 45 metro areas that saw year-to-year price declines in the third quarter were the most since the NAR's record-keeping began in 1979.

“We had the biggest boom ever, so you'd expect we would have the broadest price drop,” says David Lereah, chief economist for the NAR. “In the fourth quarter, you are going to see a meaningful drop in every region of the country.”

Nationally, the median price of an existing single-family house fell to $224,900 in the third quarter, 1.2% lower than in the same period last year.

The Detroit area was the worst hit; prices there fell nearly 11% in the July-September period from a year earlier. Sarasota, Fla., was second, with a 9% drop in the median single-family home price.

Four Florida metro areas were among the 10 regions with the steepest price drops in the third quarter. And in California, prices fell in San Diego and Sacramento.

“Florida has responded a lot quicker than California, which is good news for Florida because they're going to get the correction over with faster than California,” Lereah says. “I'm not sure about California. They've got the problem of the biggest price correction to make because they have a more serious affordability problem.”

Still, just as the real estate boom didn't lift every housing market, the slowdown isn't hitting every area. More than 100 metro areas posted price gains over the summer, including 21 that saw double-digit gains.

Nevertheless, the number of metro areas that suffered price declines jumped from 26 in the April-June period, and the trend could continue for the next few quarters as sellers in more cities are forced to cut prices to woo buyers.

“When you see a large number of metro areas posting declines,” says Joel Naroff of Naroff Economic Advisors, “it tells you it's a widespread phenomenon.”

Most of the metro areas that have seen the deepest price declines this year are in such states as Michigan, Ohio and Indiana, which have suffered huge job losses in manufacturing. These are also areas where foreclosures are highest, further depressing prices.

Though buyers in the region enjoy more opportunities now, many are reluctant to purchase because of the weak job climate in the industrial Midwest, says Mark Hull of Re/Max Realty Group in Detroit.

DOJ_NMG_0096760

"For sellers, it's almost a nightmare," Hull says. "A property can be marketed with every kind of tool you can think of, and unless there are really, really great incentives that make the property 20% below what the market price should be, they're just sitting there."

Wall St Plays It Safe As Deals Surge (FT)

By Michael Mackenzie

Financial Times, November 21, 2006

Wall Street stocks delivered a cautious performance in New York on Monday, as some $50bn in proposed merger deals across copper, steel, exchanges and real estate captured investors' attention.

Consolidation in the steel sector was a major theme, in the wake of Russia's Evraz Group announcing on Monday that it intends buying US steelmaker Oregon Steel Mills valuing the company around $2.3bn. The $63.25 per share purchase represents a 7 per cent premium over Oregon's close last week. Shares in Oregon jumped to a high of $64.40, and settled higher by $4.81 or 8.2 per cent at $63.77. Late last week, as talk of takeover deals in the global steel industry gathered pace, Oregon's shares rose 3.7 per cent.

Meanwhile, the Nasdaq, tendered an offer to buy the rest of the London Stock Exchange, in a deal that would value its shares at $5.1bn and build upon its current 25 per cent holding in the LSE. Shares in Nasdaq were slightly off their high of $37.83, up 3.1 per cent at $37.71. The LSE rejected the new offer, saying it "substantially undervalued" the exchange.

"We believe Nasdaq's final offer fails to recognize the outstanding growth record and prospects of our group on a stand-alone basis let alone the exchange's unique global position," said Clara Furse, chief executive of the LSE.

Another blockbuster deal in the spotlight was Freeport-McMoRan Copper & Gold saying it would acquire Phelps Dodge in a $25.9bn deal including cash and stock. The new entity would be the world's largest publicly traded copper company.

Shares in Phelps, soared to a high of $123.96 and ultimately gained $25.45, or 26.8 per cent to $120.47. Free-port shares were down $1.77 cents, or 3.1 per cent at $56.63, after earlier rising to $59.70.

The private equity firm Blackstone Group said it was buying Equity Office Properties Trust, the largest office-building owner and manager in the US, for $20bn. Shares in the company hit a high of $47.94, and closed up $3.42, or 7.7 per cent at $48.14. The BBG real estate investment trust index closed up 3.2 per cent after the news.

The latest surge in deals, dictated in part by private equity firms hunting for opportunities "heightens the risk for short sellers," argues Citigroup. "When markets slip initially and then reverse to the upside, as has happened several times over the last few weeks, hedge funds have to cover painful losses."

After opening in the red, stocks briefly recovered ground, led by the semi-conductor sector and Microsoft setting a new 52-week high of $29.97 after an upgrade from Credit Suisse. Shares in Microsoft closed 1.7 per cent firmer at $29.89, while the Philadelphia Semiconductor index was up 1.5 per cent after booking a gain of 5.7 per cent last week. Marvell Technology was 9.5 per cent higher at $20.45, Broadcom was 5.7 per cent higher at $37.11, and Novellus gained 7.7 per cent to $33.10.

The Nasdaq Composite lead other indices during the day and settled 6.86 points, or 0.3 per cent firmer at 2,452.72.

The S&P 500 slid 0.70 points, or 0.05 per cent to 1,400.50, having reversed an early fall below the 1,400 threshold it closed above on Friday.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average fell 26.02 points, or 0.21 per cent to 12,316.54, while in contrast small capitalised stocks rose. The Russell 2000 index gained 0.3 per cent to 790.62.

Despite the paring of modest gains in equity prices during the afternoon, a closely watched measure of equity volatility sank towards historic lows.The Chicago Board of Trade's VIX index fell below 10, to 9.91, before it closed at 9.97. Historically, such a low level in VIX has reflected very high appetites for risk taking and has usually been followed by a sharp rise in the volatility measure.

"Falling volatility is partly an indication of investor optimism. As long as it keeps falling it confirms (or supports) the uptrend in stocks," noted Ken Tower, chief market strategist at CyberTrader.

Helping offset weakness in the Dow was Dupont, after a favourable press report over the weekend, and shares gained 1.3 per cent higher at $47.87.

DOJ_NMG_0096761

In the chase for high net worth banking clients, Bank of America has announced a deal to buy U.S. Trust from Charles Schwab for $3.3bn. Shares in Bank of America were barely changed at $54.90.

Other steel companies that enjoyed solid gains on Friday were also higher early on Monday, before paring some of those gains.

Shares in US Steel, rose 3.1 per cent to $72.75, down from a high of $76.16, after a rise of 9.3 per cent on Friday. Steel Dynamics, was up 2.9 per cent at $61.83, down from a peak of $63.75, after prior session gain of 3.8 per cent, Nucor, rose 0.6 per cent to $57.47, after earlier reaching $59.79, and that followed a rise of 3.5 per cent late last week, while AK Steel was up 3.5 per cent at $15.16, in the wake of a 4.8 per cent rise on Friday.

In earnings news, home improvement retailer, Lowes posted third quarter profit of 46 cents a share, beating the 43 cents forecast of analysts. The company also lowered guidance for the fiscal fourth quarter, saying it expects to earn 36 to 38 cents a share, below the 41 cents a share seen by analysts. Its shares had rebounded from a low of $29.50 and were 0.3 per cent firmer at $30.58.

After a blockbuster debut on Friday, that resulted in its shares rising 125 per cent, the New York Mercantile Exchange had reversed an earlier rise to $140, and closed down 2.1 per cent at $130.27.

Ahead of the Thanksgiving holiday on Thursday, stocks may well endure a period of consolidation, and while some analysts caution the market's solid run has stretched valuations, others disagree.

"We do not think that we have hit any peaks in the market yet," noted analysts at Citigroup in research on Monday. "To a great degree, equity markets are not overvalued" and applying various valuation methods, "argues more forcefully for larger cap stocks since they are the ones that appear more favourably valued."

Meanwhile, the appetite of investors for risky assets may also be turning towards equities at the relative expense of other markets as the end of the year approaches.

"Many traders feel that the easier risky asset trade is directly in equities, given a belief that valuations are less extended than in the credit market or emerging currencies," said Alan Ruskin, chief international strategist at RBS Greenwich Capital. "This logic makes perfect sense," he said noting "the Fed is more clearly on a path that is likely to soft land the economy than any time in the last 6 months," after the tone of recent inflation and housing market reports.

In equity fund flows, Emerging Portfolio Fund Research noted net outflows from dedicated US funds for the week ending November 16 were $861.6m. They noted "a second week of net outflows, due mainly to investors retreating from a popular energy sector ETF," that was hit by redemptions. "Otherwise, US equity funds would have received inflows, with money flowing into both the Large Cap Equity Funds and Small Cap Equity Funds," said EPFR. In contrast, "Mid Cap Equity Funds saw outflows for the week," they added.

The Dow Slips In Rare Interruption Of Record Surge Of Past Six Weeks (WSJ)

By Peter A. Mckay

The Wall Street Journal, November 21, 2006

The Dow Jones Industrial Average edged lower, a rare setback in a string of records that has lasted more than six weeks.

The blue-chip average yesterday fell 26.02 points, or 0.2%, ending at 12316.54, up 14.9% on the year. Shares in the drug maker Merck, a Dow component, slid 1.1% after it disclosed an 11% ownership stake in FoxHollow Technologies, a medical-device maker.

The announcement was part of a wave of deal-making on Wall Street, which seemed to hold back stock indicators tracking big-name companies that typically act as acquirers during periods of corporate consolidation.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index barely held above the psychologically important 1400 level, finishing down just 0.05%, or 0.70 point, at 1400.50, up 12.2% on the year.

Indexes with a larger proportion of small companies likely to be gobbled up in deals fared better. The Nasdaq Composite Index rallied 0.3%, or 6.86 points, to 2452.72, up 11.2% on the year. The Russell 2000-stock index rose 0.3%, or 2.15 points, to 790.62, up 17.4% on the year.

DOJ_NMG_0096762

In general, the markets' tone was muted to begin a holiday-shortened trading week. As investors and brokers begin to take off for vacation, such periods tend to produce low trading volume and few major price moves.

Binky Chadha, chief U.S.-equity strategist at Deutsche Bank, said yesterday's deals were consistent with the current environment of low interest rates, which keeps borrowing costs low for companies, and Wall Street's consensus view that the U.S. economic growth is slowing gradually.

In a recent report to clients, Mr. Chadha recommended that investors continue to bet on a rally in stocks. But he also advised taking some cautionary steps, such as buying big-name companies with significant foreign revenue streams, just in case the slowdown in U.S. growth turns out worse than expected, or it doesn't slow enough to keep the Federal Reserve from raising its interest-rate targets again.

"We've been telling people to walk the line between these two alternative scenarios to the baseline forecast" of most firms for a moderate slowdown, Mr. Chadha said.

He estimated an approximate 25% chance the slowdown will miss Wall Street's expectations in some way in the months ahead.

Unseasonably warm weather in the Northeastern U.S. pushed prices for crude oil and natural gas lower. Natural-gas futures for December delivery took the bigger hit in percentage terms, off 2%, or 16 cents, to $8.019 per million British thermal units, off nearly 29% on the year at the New York Mercantile Exchange.

In economic news, the Conference Board said its index of leading economic indicators rose 0.2% in October, slightly less than the 0.3% rise analysts expected.

The Dow's decline yesterday halted a six-day advancing streak. But the blue-chip average did set a new intraday record of 12355.23 before it fell back for the day.

Outside the U.S., stocks fell in dollar terms, despite a rally to a five-year high in China. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, excluding U.S. shares, fell 0.56%, or 1.29 points, to 229.25.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks fell.1 Total trading volume for stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange was 2.56 billion shares, as 1,695 stocks advanced and 1,623 declined.

Bond prices rose.2 The 10-year note gained 2/32 point, or 62.5 cents for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield down to 4.601%. The 30-year bond rose 6/32 to yield 4.681%.

The dollar strengthened.3 Against the Japanese currency, the dollar rose to 118.04 yen, compared with 117.76. The euro fell to $1.2814, compared with $1.2826.

Merger Monday (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 21, 2006

For the second time in a month, investors awoke Monday morning to a slew of big-ticket mergers and acquisitions. Yesterday's tally was at least $52 billion in M&A activity before the market opened for the normally slow Thanksgiving week. Three weeks ago, a spate of deals totalling over $10 billion helped boost the market just ahead of the midterm elections.

Not all these deals will end happily; mistakes and miscalculations are part and parcel of the capital-allocation game. But the very fact that billions of dollars are being put on the table in an attempt to shift assets to their highest and best uses is a sign that the animal spirits that give the U.S. economy its dynamism are alive and well. The time to worry about an economy is when no one wants to take such risks.

A closer look at who's buying and selling also reveals some notable trends in the capital markets. For example, yesterday's deals included the biggest private-equity buyout in history, with the Blackstone Group announcing its agreement to take private Equity Office Partners, a commercial-real-estate trust, for $36 billion, including assumed debt. This adds yet another exclamation point to the rising tide of companies going -- or being taken -- private.

We've argued that the Occam's razor explanation for this trend is that overregulation and lawsuits have tipped the balance in favor of private management for many investors. Managers who want to spend more time taking risks, and less time talking to lawyers, are increasingly turning to private equity to reduce their hassles and improve their returns. Money will flow to where the returns are, and these days more and more investors seem to think that more money can be made outside the hyper-regulated public equity markets.

DOJ_NMG_0096763

As a political matter, this should worry anyone who believes that the development of a broad investor class is good for the preservation of capitalism. But as an economic matter, it is largely irrelevant whether the shares are publicly traded or not. We doubt the employees of such profitable closely held concerns as Cargill or Koch Industries fret much that their shares aren't listed on any public exchange. What they care about is that their companies are successful.

Another place merger money is going is overseas. This may help explain Nasdaq's $5 billion hostile bid for the London Stock Exchange, which was rebuffed yesterday. As more and more international companies list their shares overseas rather than in New York, having a foothold outside the U.S. has come to be seen as a survival strategy for the formerly comfortable U.S. stock exchanges. They have to follow the money if the money won't come here.

Globalization is also a piece of the puzzle in Freeport McMoRan's deal to buy the larger Phelps Dodge for $26 billion and so create the largest U.S.-based mining company. Swallowing larger competitors is often a tough meal to digest, but Freeport's managers said they felt they needed the scale to compete on a global stage. The acquisition of Oregon Steel Mills by Russian Steel Maker Evraz also fits this bill.

Domestically, meanwhile, Bank of America and Schwab seem to have agreed that U.S. Trust, the private wealth manager that Schwab picked up in 2000 at the height of the dot-com boom, is worth more in the hands of a bigger bank than it is under Schwab's discount-broker umbrella.

We have no idea whether this is right. But it is the genius of the market economy that those evaluations are made by the actors involved. Sometimes, as with the U.S. Trust deal, an acquisition done in one economic environment comes to be re-evaluated in another. That can be disruptive in the short term, but it makes the society as a whole more prosperous if underperforming assets can be better managed. And Schwab at least is fortunate to be unloading its earlier purchase at a profit.

The stock-market indexes were flat to slightly down yesterday, but merger waves such as this one tend to buoy the markets as savvy traders place bets on who the next target will be. The world is awash in capital at the moment, interest rates are low, and rising stock prices make stock and cash purchases possible. If politicians and government officials are worried about the trends in private equity and investment overseas, they might want to look at their own policies that have encouraged both trends.

Meanwhile, a vibrant market for corporate control keeps managers alert and hunting for new opportunities. Whatever the bad individual bets, the current merger wave is a sign of continuing economic vitality.

URL for this article:

http://online.wsj.com/article/SB116408311620729250.html

Copyright 2006 Dow Jones & Company, Inc. All Rights Reserved

This copy is for your personal, non-commercial use only. Distribution and use of this material are governed by our Subscriber Agreement and by copyright law. For non-personal use or to order multiple copies, please contact Dow Jones Reprints at 1-800-843-0008 or visit www.djreprints.com.

Flaws Seen In Markets For Utilities (NYT)

By David Cay Johnston

New York Times, November 21, 2006

A growing chorus of large industrial power users, municipal utilities and consumer groups say there is a reason the price of electricity has not fallen since the federal government opened the heavily regulated utility industry to competition a decade ago. The new markets, they argue, do not work right.

They point to a variety of reasons.

For one thing, when electricity producers offer to supply power for use the next day, utilities pay everyone the highest price accepted. One study in Texas, where electricity bills have been rising sharply, found that because of this auction system, consumers pay a lot more than they would have under the old system where the state regulated prices.

They also contend that producers can withhold power or limit production, with little risk of penalty, even when demand is at its highest, meaning prices soar.

DOJ_NMG_0096764

"Shutting down a power plant in July is like the mall closing on the weekend before Christmas, but in July last year, 20 percent of generating capacity was shut down in California," said Robert McCullough, an economist whose Oregon consulting business is advising some of those contending in lawsuits that prices are being manipulated.

The government agency that oversees the electricity market — the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission — set the rules before allowing market prices for electricity to replace regulated prices. A coalition of large industrial companies filed a complaint in September, arguing that the energy commission had failed to ensure proper competition and that it had stymied efforts by others to investigate allegations of improper conduct by withholding some of the data it collects.

"The 'markets' that are rolling off the commission's production line are not fit for their public purpose," wrote Robert A. Weishaar Jr., the lawyer for the industrial companies.

The commission dismisses the critics, saying that where it has determined that a market for electricity exists, the prices in that market are assumed to be "just and reasonable," the standard set in federal law. The commission's rules seek to curb monopoly power, but not oligopoly power, in which a few firms control the market. The commission says that anyone manipulating markets will be discovered either by the monitors in each regional market, by competitors or utilities that buy power, by the commission or even by the public.

Allowing producers of electricity to compete for utility customers should assure the lowest possible price, the commission says.

But the opposite has sometimes been true.

For eight hours last May, for example, the price of a megawatt of power in New England leaped from about $50 to almost $1,000. The region's electricity exchange attributes the spike to congested transmission lines, but has kept the identities of the high bidders secret.

Its own studies say that the exchange's rules make it possible to inflate prices artificially during periods of high demand and that at least one producer has manipulated prices in the past, though its identity was not disclosed.

Officials of other exchanges all said they had strict rules to ensure that capacity is not withheld from the market to inflate prices artificially.

But critics of the current system have found ammunition in a study at Carnegie Mellon University by Sarosh N. Talukdar, who used computer models to simulate a market in which 10 utilities bought electricity and 10 producers sold it.

In that experiment, the buyers and sellers learned to manipulate the price within 100 rounds of bidding, capturing from 50 percent to 90 percent of the prices an unregulated monopoly would have charged. Instead of falling, prices soared.

Earlier experiments at Cornell University and George Mason University found the same thing, with simulated trading by students, professors and even members of Congress.

Such high prices suggest collusion, which is illegal in real markets, but collusion was impossible in Professor Talukdar's experiments because the trades were made by simple computer programs, not humans.

"My studies show it is easy to learn from the signals given by others how to get the benefits of colluding without breaking the law," Professor Talukdar said.

"Economists have this faith in markets, this blind faith that markets are always a good thing," the professor said, "but the design of markets matters a great deal and the design must be verified to see if it really works as a free market."

Professor Frank A. Wolak, a Stanford University economist who favors competitive pricing, said the current mix of markets for wholesale power and regulated utilities to deliver them cannot produce the benefits of competition. And he warned that "even small flaws in the design of markets can cause enormous harm to consumers in very little time."

Why have prices not fallen in the electricity market, when prices dropped sharply after competition was introduced in other previously regulated industries?

Rising fuel costs are one major reason. But the electricity market also turns out to be different in some fundamental ways from other kinds of markets. Efforts to induce competition, the critics say, have failed to properly take that into account.

In the markets for everything from stocks and commodities to real estate, airline trips and trucking services, for example, buyers always have the option to walk away from a deal — whether the purchase be company shares, frozen pork bellies, houses, plane tickets or space in a tractor-trailer.

DOJ_NMG_0096765

But many utilities in about half the states, including New York, California, Connecticut, Illinois, Maryland and Texas, must buy power every day — usually because they were encouraged or forced by regulators to sell their own generating plants and no longer produce electricity themselves.

And every utility must buy power at some point, to meet peak demand on hot summer days.

Unlike the stock market, where vast numbers of strangers buy and sell, the electricity markets involve a relative handful of buyers and sellers. In New Jersey, for example, just 10 generators won bids this year to supply a third of the state's base load of power for the next three years at prices 55 percent higher than the previous year's three-year bid.

Similarly, California has 1,400 power plants, but ownership of those plants is so concentrated that just six generating companies in that state can set an artificially high price of electricity virtually all the time, research by Carnegie Mellon University shows.

Moreover, in many markets some buyers and sellers are related, a corporate parent owning generating plants that sell to a sister utility. Often the bidders are brokers, including Wall Street investment houses like Goldman Sachs and Morgan Stanley, and that arrangement hides the identity of the real power generators.

Trades also repeat each day, which means that those that generate power learn from not just what the weather report says about demand for power, but from the trading patterns of their competitors in producing power and the utilities that buy it.

Another important aspect is secrecy. Individual stock investors can make sure they got a fair price by checking the prices paid just before and after their trade. But the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission and the electricity exchanges stamp many trading records confidential.

The federal commission's spokesman, like those for several of the exchanges on which electricity is bought and sold, said that market monitors employed by the electricity exchanges ensure the integrity of the trades. But utility customers have challenged whether the monitors are blind to price rigging and errors.

Another factor is the very nature of electricity, which must be produced, transmitted and consumed in an instant. Car makers can cut production when vehicles do not sell. Investors who hold too much of a particular stock can sell it in blocks over time to get the best price. But electricity cannot be held in inventory.

Finally, the electricity market appears to be particularly balanced on a fine edge. The Chadbourne Park law firm, in a newsletter for investors in electricity generating stations, cautioned that tiny changes in generating capacity could make them rich or wipe them out. It concluded that having 2 percent more generating capacity than a market needed to meet demand would mean "very low electricity prices," while a 2 percent shortage of electricity would cause "significant price spikes," which means outsize profits for power plant owners.

Citgo Brings Discounted Heating Oil To Region (WP)

By Steven Mufson

The Washington Post, November 21, 2006

At 10 a.m. today, Minnie Davis, a 65-year-old widow who lives with three of her grandchildren on North Capitol Street, is scheduled to get some unusual visitors -- the Venezuelan ambassador, the chief executive of Citgo Petroleum and former congressman Joseph P. Kennedy II.

The occasion: The arrival of a Venezuelan-backed program to bring 7.5 million gallons of deeply discounted heating oil to as many as 37,000 low-income households in Maryland, Virginia and the District and free heating oil to some homeless shelters.

The program has the blessings of Venezuela's populist President Hugo Chavez, who has used it to demonstrate that he cares about the poor in the United States as well as Venezuela -- while tweaking President Bush, who he called "evil" in a September speech at the United Nations.

Many people have dismissed the assistance as a publicity stunt, but for some, it will have a real impact nonetheless.

Last year, working through Kennedy's Citizens Energy, the program reached people in Massachusetts and other parts of the Northeast. Now the program has been extended to the nation's capital.

It works like this: Citgo, a wholly owned subsidiary of Petroleos de Venezuela SA, is providing heating oil at a 40 percent discount to Citizens Energy, which Kennedy started during the oil shock of the late 1970s to help low-income people grapple with high energy costs. His company then provides up to 200 gallons of discounted heating oil not only to the very poor but also to people who earn too much to qualify for federal heating oil assistance but who still earn little enough to be struggling.

DOJ_NMG_0096766

Citizens Energy is targeting 400,000 households in 16 states. If Citizens Energy reached all the target households, Citgo's discount -- about $1 a gallon -- would be worth $40 million. But because most people do not know they are eligible or how to take advantage of the program, the actual number who end up receiving aid might be a little more than a tenth as much.

Is it genuine concern on the part of Citgo and Chavez, or is it a public relations stunt?

"It's not only morally righteous, it's good business," said Kennedy in a telephone interview yesterday. "When you're selling to the world's largest market a gigantic percentage of your overall sales in crude oil, you take a little percentage and show that you have concerns about how low-income people are going to keep up with the enormous price of keeping warm."

That doesn't appear to be self-evident to other oil companies or members of the Organization of the Petroleum Exporting Countries. Kennedy said yesterday that he had written to every OPEC member and every major oil company but that Citgo was the only one that agreed to help.

At the same time, Kennedy said, "when you really stop and think about it, last year, Venezuela sold the United States 556 million barrels of crude oil and product. We are now topping off one-half of 1 percent, which they are selling at 40 percent off, which is effectively last year's full price. Let's keep things in some perspective."

David McCollum, a spokesman for Citgo of Houston, said the company initiated the program after members of Congress appealed after Hurricane Katrina sent prices soaring last year.

Though it might seem odd that Venezuela -- where per capita income is only about $4,810, a little more than one-tenth of U.S. per capita income -- would be giving aid to the United States, McCollum said that the heating oil assistance would not be depriving Venezuelan citizens.

"The product we are using is heating oil, and obviously it is never used in Venezuela," he said. "It's not that cold. So we're not taking anything away from the people of Venezuela."

He said the company expected the program to cost Citgo, which refines and markets oil products in the United States only, between 1 and 3 percent of the company's profit if everyone eligible took advantage of the offer.

Slain Journalist's Family Files $20 Million Lawsuit (WP)

By Henri E. Cauvin

The Washington Post, November 21, 2006

The children of slain New York Times reporter David E. Rosenbaum filed a $20 million lawsuit yesterday against the District and Howard University Hospital, claiming that their father was a victim of official negligence and medical malpractice.

Filed in D.C. Superior Court, the lawsuit comes less than a month after a jury convicted a 42-year-old man of murdering Rosenbaum during a robbery. The other suspect in the case had pleaded guilty shortly before the two were to go on trial.

The crime occurred on a quiet Northwest Washington street in a usually safe part of the city, stunning the neighborhood and many people who had known Rosenbaum. He was 63 and had just retired after three decades at the Times. Days later, questions surfaced about the emergency care he received at the scene on Gramercy Street and at Howard University Hospital, where he died Jan. 8, two days after the attack.

Those questions led to one damning revelation after another. Rosenbaum was misdiagnosed as a drunk. The ambulance bypassed the closest hospital because one of the emergency medical technicians had personal business to attend to near Howard. At Howard, Rosenbaum was not seen by a physician for more than 90 minutes and was not given a neurological evaluation until he had been there almost four hours, the lawsuit says. Daniel and Dorothy Rosenbaum say in their suit that these actions contributed to their father's death.

"If any one of them had done their job properly, this wouldn't have happened and he'd be alive," Patrick Regan, the lead attorney for the family, said yesterday during a news conference.

A spokeswoman for the D.C. attorney general said city lawyers are reviewing the suit, and a spokeswoman for Howard University Hospital did not respond to a call seeking comment.

DOJ_NMG_0096767

The District's handling of the case has drawn rebukes from city leaders, including Mayor-elect Adrian M. Fenty (D), who met last week with the family and pledged yesterday to fix the problems highlighted by Rosenbaum's death.

"Every District resident deserves to be safe and protected by our police and emergency personnel," Fenty said, adding that he would support efforts by the police, fire and emergency medical service "to hold personnel accountable in all areas of performance."

The D.C. inspector general's office, in a report released in the summer, found what it called "apathy, indifference and complacency" in the agencies involved.

Family members were particularly disturbed by the failings of the police department.

More than a month before Rosenbaum was attacked, a retired police officer doing renovation work on a townhouse in Southeast Washington was attacked. But the police did not treat the beating as a crime and did not follow up on a promising lead -- calls made on the victim's cellphone soon after it was taken from him in the attack.

Officials learned later that the calls were made to the houses of the two men ultimately convicted of killing Rosenbaum: Percey Jordan, who was found guilty by a jury last month, and his cousin, Michael Hamlin, who pleaded guilty in September.

When Jordan was arrested in connection with Rosenbaum's death, the victim of the earlier robbery realized that he had been attacked by the same man.

Rosenbaum's family members said their suit is about changing the culture that led to the series of errors.

"Things are broken in the city," Marcus Rosenbaum, Rosenbaum's brother, said yesterday. "They are broken in Howard University Hospital. And something needs to be done to see that they get fixed."

He said that monetary damages are a means to that end: "When you sue, all you can sue for is money, and we wanted to get people's attention."

Rosenbaum Family Files Suit Against City, Hospital (WT)

By Matthew Cella

The Washington Times, November 21, 2006

The family of David E. Rosenbaum yesterday filed a $20 million lawsuit claiming that negligence by the District and Howard University Hospital contributed to the journalist's death after he was robbed and beaten in January.

"We see this lawsuit as a way that we can put some pressure on both the city and on Howard University Hospital to fix the things that are broken," said Marcus Rosenbaum, the victim's brother.

The first hearing in the case is scheduled for February before Superior Court Judge Robert Morin.

Mr. Rosenbaum, 63, was robbed and beaten Jan. 6 while walking near his Northwest home. He died two days later.

The lawsuit follows closely the findings of the city's inspector general, who issued a report in June citing an "unacceptable chain of failure" in the response.

According to the report, responding D.C. police officers failed to recognize that a crime had occurred, did not search the victim for identification and did not write an incident report.

The report said firefighters who responded to the scene did not assess or treat Mr. Rosenbaum correctly. They detected the odor of alcohol and discounted other potential causes of Mr. Rosenbaum's symptoms because of it.

In addition, the ambulance was delayed when the crew got lost on the way to the scene from Providence Hospital in Northeast, and the ambulance driver decided to take Mr. Rosenbaum to Howard University Hospital instead of the closer Sibley Memorial Hospital because Howard was nearer to her home.

The report also said Howard University Hospital workers failed to properly triage Mr. Rosenbaum when he was brought in, and they failed to follow their own procedures for monitoring patients for signs of trauma.

Police closed the case one week later with two arrests.

Percey Jordan Jr., 42, was convicted last month on nine charges, including first- and second-degree murder while armed, robbery and credit-card fraud. He faces life in prison without the possibility of release when he is sentenced on Jan. 12.

DOJ_NMG_0096768

Michael C. Hamlin, 24, pleaded guilty to charges including second-degree murder and agreed to testify against Jordan as part of a plea deal. Hamlin, who would have faced life in prison, faces a maximum of 60 years in prison when he is sentenced Dec. 19, but he likely will receive a more lenient sentence.

The Rosenbaum family also accused police of failing to investigate a similar attack against a former police officer in which Jordan and Hamlin were the chief suspects. That attack occurred about two months before Mr. Rosenbaum's death.

Mayor-elect Adrian M. Fenty said yesterday that he will "support every effort" by the D.C. police and fire department "to hold personnel accountable in all areas of performance."

Mayor Anthony A. Williams yesterday issued a two-sentence statement that repeated nearly word for word parts of statements he issued Jan. 19 and June 16.

"My heart goes out to all of the family and friends of David Rosenbaum. This was a terrible tragedy, and last January the city lost a good man and a great reporter," Mr. Williams said. "I want everyone who lives and works in the District to have the utmost confidence that our policies and procedures are the best they can be to ensure our safety."

Reporter's Kin Sue City And Hospital (NYT)

By The New York Times

The New York Times, November 21, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 20 — The family of a retired reporter for The New York Times who was fatally beaten in January near his home here sued the District of Columbia and Howard University Hospital on Monday, contending that he would be alive but for their negligence.

The suit, seeking $20 million, blames the city's Police and Fire Departments and the hospital for the death of the reporter, David E. Rosenbaum, 63, who was beaten on the head by two robbers on the night of Jan. 6. An inquiry established that Mr. Rosenbaum was at first presumed to be intoxicated and so was not treated with urgency. He died of brain injuries two days later in the hospital.

The inquiry, by the inspector general's office of the district, found that "multiple individual failures" and "alarming levels of complacency" among police officers, firefighters, ambulance technicians, doctors and nurses caused inexcusable delays in treating Mr. Rosenbaum.

The men held in the case, Percey Jordan Jr. and his cousin Michael Hamlin, were arrested soon after surveillance cameras photographed them using Mr. Rosenbaum's credit cards. Mr. Jordan, 42, was convicted of murder, robbery, conspiracy and credit-card fraud last month. Mr. Hamlin, 24, had pleaded guilty earlier to similar charges and testified against his cousin. The men face decades in prison when they are sentenced.

Small Mistakes Cause Big Problems (USAT)

By Brad Heath

USA Today, November 21, 2006

If you're reading this in New York, you're probably too drunk to drive.

That's because lawmakers accidentally got too tough with a get-tough drunken-driving law, inserting an error that set the standard for "aggravated driving while intoxicated" below the amount of alcohol that can occur naturally.

The one-word mistake makes the new law unenforceable, says Lt. Glenn Miner, a New York State Police spokesman. However, drivers with a blood-alcohol content of 0.08% or higher can still be prosecuted under other state laws.

In the legislative world, such small errors, while uncommon, can carry expensive consequences. In a few cases around the nation this year, typos and other blunders have redirected millions of tax dollars or threatened to invalidate new laws.

In Hawaii, for instance, lawmakers approved a cigarette-tax increase to raise money for medical care and research. Cancer researchers, however, will get only an extra 1.5 cents next year — instead of the more than $8 million lawmakers intended. That's because legislators failed to specify that they should get 1.5 cents from each cigarette sold, says Linda Smith, an adviser to Gov. Linda Lingle.

DOJ_NMG_0096769

When such mistakes happen, they often come during the last-minute rush of legislative sessions, says Bruce Feustel, a senior fellow at the National Conference of State Legislatures. What's important, he says, is that lawmakers can fix them before they cause any harm.

Courts generally intercede only in the most obvious cases, says University of Notre Dame law professor John Nagle. If judges tried to change every legislative error, Nagle says, "you get the courts trying to figure out what they think is a mistake that might not be a mistake at all."

New York's mistake came in a bill meant to set tougher penalties and curb plea bargains for drivers well above the legal intoxication standard. Instead of specifying blood alcohol as a percentage, as most drunken-driving laws do, New York set its threshold as 0.18 grams — "so low you can't even measure it," Miner says.

Lawmakers plan to fix the mistake the next time they convene, says Mark Hansen, a spokesman for the state Senate's Republican majority. He says it's not clear how the mistake happened, or why nobody caught it before legislators voted.

The latest gaffe was in Arizona, where a misplaced period on the state's ballots raised questions about a cigarette tax voters approved Nov. 7. The law called for an increase of 80 cents per pack, but the ballot had .80 cents per pack.

The state plans to start collecting the tax when the vote is final, "but who knows what might happen?" says Arizona Revenue Department spokesman Dan Zemke.

"Somebody might go to court and say that's enough to throw the whole thing out."

Winner Named For Florida Seat; Loser Files Suit (NYT)

By Terry Aguayo

The New York Times, November 21, 2006

MIAMI, Nov. 20 — A Republican House candidate was named the winner on Monday in a disputed race in Sarasota where thousands of votes may have been lost by electronic machines, and the Democratic candidate immediately sued for a new election.

The Republican, Vern Buchanan, won by 369 votes in the Nov. 7 election, according to results confirmed by the Florida Elections Canvassing Commission, which is made up of Gov. Jeb Bush; Tom Gallagher, the state chief financial officer; and Senator Daniel Webster of Winter Garden, all Republicans. The results, which fill the seat given up by Representative Katherine Harris, a Republican, were confirmed in a machine recount and a manual one.

But the losing candidate, Christine Jennings, argued in documents filed in Leon County Circuit Court in Tallahassee that touch-screen voting machines had malfunctioned and not registered votes for her.

More than 18,000 Sarasota County residents who cast votes in other races on the ballot did not register votes in the House race. Hundreds of voters said they had had trouble casting a vote for Ms. Jennings, the complaint said.

If the votes were never recorded by the machines, they would not have been detected in the recount. The state also conducted an audit of the electronic voting machines.

"The voters of Sarasota and of the entire country deserve answers as to what went wrong," Ms. Jennings, a banker, said at a news conference. "This is not about Democrats; this is not about Republicans."

Several voter rights groups are joining Ms. Jennings's battle and said they planned to file a lawsuit on Tuesday to call for a new vote.

"The vote totals in the certification are wrong because they do not include thousands of legal votes cast in Sarasota County but not counted due to the pervasive malfunctioning of electronic voting machines," the candidate's complaint reads.

Mr. Buchanan, a car dealer, called the action a delay in the process and a challenge to a lawful election.

"The votes have been counted, recounted, and counted again," Mr. Buchanan said. "It is time for Christine Jennings to put the interests of the public before her own self-interests and concede this election."

Republican Declared Winner In Fla. House Race (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, November 21, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0096770

TALLAHASSEE, Nov. 20 -- Florida officials certified Republican Vern Buchanan on Monday as the winner of the House seat being vacated by Rep. Katherine Harris (R). The loser immediately sued for a new election, arguing that touch-screen voting machines had malfunctioned.

Christine Jennings contested her 369-vote loss in the 13th District, asking a judge to order a new election because of problems in Sarasota County, where more than 17,000 voters who cast ballots in other races Nov. 7 did not do so in the congressional contest.

That rate is nearly six times as high as it is in the other counties in the congressional district or on Sarasota's paper absentee ballots, Jennings says. Though she lost in the four other counties in the district, she did well in Sarasota County, winning there by six percentage points.

Buchanan, a wealthy auto dealer, said that there was no evidence of machine malfunctions. He attributed the huge Sarasota undervote to angry voters turned off by negative campaigning.

"I guess the theory is if you don't win, sue," he said, urging Jennings to concede and "stop listening to the high-price lawyers and out-of-town special-interest groups."

The state is conducting an audit of the Sarasota voting machines separate from the recount and legal challenge.

In 2001, as Florida's secretary of state, Harris had pushed for an election overhaul that outlawed punch-card ballots and required counties to use touch-screen devices or optical scan machines that read paper ballots.

Meanwhile, an unofficial tally in New Mexico's 1st District shows Rep. Heather A. Wilson (R) winning her race against Patricia Madrid by 879 votes, out of more than 210,000 cast. The results were scheduled to be finalized late Monday.

Three other House races remain unresolved:

Â· In Ohio's 2nd District, a few counties began counting provisional and absentee ballots in the race between Rep. Jean Schmidt (R) and Victoria Wulsin. Schmidt led by about 2,800 votes, though nearly 9,000 votes could remain to be counted in the district.

Â· In Ohio's 15th District, Rep. Deborah Pryce (R) was ahead of Mary Jo Kilroy by more than 3,500 votes. About 19,000 ballots remain to be counted, with results expected next week.

Â· In North Carolina's 8th District, election officials were recounting votes that last week gave Rep. Robin Hayes (R) a 339-vote lead against Larry Kissell. Kissell is considering a hand recount.

Democrat's Challenge In Fla. 13 Focuses On Undervotes (CQ)

By Rachel Kapochunas

Congressional Quarterly, November 21, 2006

Florida election officials on Monday declared Republican Vern Buchanan as the winner of the race in the state's southwestern 13th District. But Democratic nominee Christine Jennings is formally challenging the results, arguing that voting machine errors in one county account for Buchanan's apparent lead.

The office of Florida Republican Secretary of State Sue M. Cobb certified the results of a manual recount of ballots that gave Buchanan a 369-vote edge over Jennings, a former bank president, in the race to succeed two-term GOP Rep. Katherine Harris. Buchanan, a wealthy auto dealer, has maintained a narrow lead throughout the initial vote count and two recounts.

But Jennings is refusing to concede. At a press conference this morning in Tallahassee, Jennings' campaign announced it was officially contesting the election results — and that it had filed a complaint in a Florida circuit court, citing "statistical and eyewitness evidence of significant machine malfunctions."

At issue are more than 18,000 "undervotes" — cast ballots on which voters declined to choose either Buchanan or Jennings — in Sarasota County, the most populous county in the 13th District. The undervote rate there was much higher than in any of the other counties in the 13th.

Jennings defeated Buchanan in Sarasota County, 53 percent to 47 percent. Democrats argue that if the undervote rate in Sarasota County was comparable to the undervote rate in the other counties, Jennings surely would have beaten Buchanan.

DOJ_NMG_0096771

Kathy Dent, the Republican supervisor of elections in Sarasota County, and others have suggested that the campaign's negative tone may have turned people away from participating in this race. Other analysts say that voters might have overlooked the 13th District contest because of where the candidates' names were placed on Sarasota County ballots.

But Jennings' attorney Kendall Coffey said Monday that the machines were at fault and needed to be examined. "This is clearly a case of machine error — not ballot design error and not voter error," Coffey said.

Buchanan's campaign, meanwhile, said in a statement Friday — entitled "The Myth of the Missing Votes" — that undervoting is fairly common. It noted that there were more than 12,000 undervotes in Sarasota county in the 2004 contest between Harris and Democratic nominee Jan Schneider, though the percentage of Sarasota-area voters who undervoted in the 13th District race in 2004 was much lower than in the Buchanan-Jennings race.

The Florida Secretary of State's office was supposed to commence an audit of Sarasota County's voting systems, but that has been delayed. Jennings' camp filed an emergency petition Nov. 13 to secure voting machines and data involved with the audit. Then, the campaigns were supposed to identify staff members who would participate in the audit; Jennings' campaign on Friday accused Buchanan of "dragging his feet" by "delaying" the hiring of experts to participate on their behalf.

Jennings' campaign said the Florida Secretary of State's office "will not work with the Jennings campaign either" as a result of the breakdown, according to a release Friday. But the secretary of state's office has repeatedly said it will cooperate with both campaigns.

Buchanan and Republican officials have publicly called on Jennings to concede. The People For the American Way Foundation and other organizations sympathetic to Jennings have called for a new election. Both Buchanan and Jennings have participated in freshman orientation activities.

GOP Holds House Seat Of Katherine Harris (USAT)

USA Today, November 21, 2006

Republicans retained the congressional seat of Rep. Katherine Harris, state election officials ruled Monday. Republican Vern Buchanan was certified the winner over Democrat Christine Jennings by 369 votes.

Jennings immediately filed a lawsuit seeking a new election because of alleged irregularities. She cited Sarasota County, where more than 17,000 ballots cast in other races Nov. 7 on the touch-screen voting machines did not indicate a vote in the House contest.

Buchanan said there was no evidence of machine malfunctions. Harris lost her bid for the Senate.

Three House races remain undecided.

•In Ohio's 2nd District, Republican Rep. Jean Schmidt led Democrat Victoria Wulsin by 2,800 with nearly 9,000 votes possibly still uncounted.

•In Ohio's 15th District, Republican Rep. Deborah Pryce led Democrat Mary Jo Kilroy by more than 3,500 votes. About 19,000 ballots remain to be counted. Results are expected next week.

•In North Carolina's 8th District, election officials were recounting votes that last week gave Republican Rep. Robin Hayes a 339-vote margin over Democrat Larry Kissell.

Judge: Military may treat detainee's heart

The military is not required to send a Guantanamo Bay detainee to a civilian hospital for medical treatment, U.S. District Judge Paul Friedman ruled. The decision means terrorism suspect Saifullah Paracha must choose between having a cardiac catheterization to detect heart problems such as blockages performed at the U.S. military base in Cuba or not at all.

Doctors at Guantanamo successfully completed the same procedure in 2003, the Justice Department said. Paracha, 59, had argued that if something goes wrong, doctors must perform emergency heart surgery. The wealthy Pakistani businessman and television producer wanted to be transferred to a hospital in the USA or Pakistan.

Paracha is being held for allegedly helping al-Qaeda. His son, Uzair, was sentenced in July in federal court in New York to 30 years in prison on similar charges.

Clinton Won Easily, But Bankroll Shows The Toll (NYT)

By Anne E. Kornblut And Jeff Zeleny

DOJ_NMG_0096772

The New York Times, November 21, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 20 — She had only token opposition, but Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton still spent more on her re-election — upward of $30 million — than any other candidate for Senate this year. So where did all the money go?

It helped Mrs. Clinton win a margin of victory of more than 30 points. It helped her build a new set of campaign contributors. And it allowed her to begin assembling the nuts and bolts needed to run a presidential campaign.

But that was not all. Mrs. Clinton also bought more than $13,000 worth of flowers, mostly for fund-raising events and as thank-yous for donors. She laid out $27,000 for valet parking, paid as much as $800 in a single month in credit card interest and — above all — paid tens of thousands of dollars a month to an assortment of consultants and aides.

Throw in $17 million in advertising and fund-raising mailings, and what had been one of the most formidable war chests in politics was depleted to a level that leaves Mrs. Clinton with little financial advantage over her potential rivals for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination — and perhaps even trailing some of them.

The campaign's financial record has fueled some criticism among Democratic activists and prompted concern among Mrs. Clinton's supporters, including complaints from some of her fund-raisers that her top aides exercised a lack of discipline.

As of mid-October, when her campaign last filed a disclosure statement with the Federal Election Commission, the senator had about $14 million on hand. That figure did not take into account spending or fund-raising in the final three weeks of the campaign, although the final tally is not expected to change much.

The Democratic Daily, a liberal Web site, accused Mrs. Clinton of "blowing a shameful $36 million" on a shoo-in campaign. The only other Senate candidate to come close to her spending level was Senator Rick Santorum, Republican of Pennsylvania, who spent about $24 million unsuccessfully defending his seat.

Mrs. Clinton's cash on hand is certainly less than the $20 million to $30 million some of her advisers early this year predicted she would have in the bank as she moved from her Senate re-election toward a decision about a presidential campaign. She is now in the same ballpark as two fellow Democrats, Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts, who had $13.8 million in his account as of Sept. 30, according to election commission records, and Senator Evan Bayh of Indiana, who had $10.6 million. The law allows money left in a Senate campaign fund to be transferred to a presidential campaign.

Aides to Mrs. Clinton said she was not available for comment. Asked whether she was satisfied with the way the money had been spent, and whether the campaign's expenditures were within the norms of politics today, the executive director of her campaign organization, Patti Solis Doyle, replied in an e-mailed statement: "We're very pleased with the outcome of this election: the bottom line is victory with 67 percent of the vote, a substantial increase among independents and Republicans, and a list of several hundred thousand donors, beneficial in this and future campaigns."

Yet the way she spent the money troubled some of Mrs. Clinton's supporters, many of whom have been called on repeatedly over the years to raise and give money for Bill Clinton's two presidential campaigns, his legal expenses, his library, his global antipoverty and AIDS-fighting program and now his wife's political career. One Clinton supporter said it would become harder to tap repeat donors if it appeared that the money was not being well spent.

Nonetheless, the senator is among the most formidable fund-raisers in her party and could raise a large amount of money quickly if needed.

Since 2001, when she took office, Mrs. Clinton has spent at least $36 million on her re-election. For 2005 and 2006 through Oct. 18, she spent $29.5 million; a final tally will not be available until next month.

At that level, she spent nearly twice as much as Senator Charles E. Schumer, her Democratic colleague from New York, did in his 2004 re-election campaign, when he spent $15.5 million and won 71 percent of the vote, four points more than Mrs. Clinton won this year.

For her money, Mrs. Clinton also won a slightly smaller percentage of the vote in New York this year than did Eliot Spitzer in his successful race for governor. Mr. Spitzer, who raised nearly $41 million for his campaign, won 69 percent of the vote.

Mark Penn, Mrs. Clinton's pollster and longtime adviser, received at least $1.1 million. Mandy Grunwald, her longtime communications strategist, received more than $930,000. Hudson Media Partners, an offshoot of the Glover Park Group consulting firm where two prominent Clinton advisers, Howard Wolfson and Gigi Georges, work, received nearly $200,000.

DOJ_NMG_0096773

Campaign aides said much of the consulting work went toward building a donor list that would be vital in a presidential race. But they did not specify the work done by each of the consultants or say exactly how much of the money they received went to preparing for a presidential run rather than Mrs. Clinton's Senate re-election. And the figures have raised eyebrows among the people who raise money for her.

"We're not in this business to make consultants rich," said one fund-raiser for Mrs. Clinton who was granted anonymity in order to speak freely about the direction of the campaign.

"The wasting of money — it drives everybody crazy," the fund-raiser said. "She'd better get a handle on this if she is going to run for president."

Beyond the level of spending, there is also some concern within the Clinton camp about the adequacy of the controls on what is being spent.

A close friend of Mrs. Clinton, Maggie Williams, received a $37,500 consulting fee, paid to her firm, Griffin Williams Critical Point Management, at the end of July.

Asked what the payment was for, Mrs. Clinton's campaign aides checked and subsequently responded that the payment had been a mistake. They said it should have been for less than $5,000 to reimburse Ms. Williams, who served as chief of staff to Mrs. Clinton in the White House, for travel costs. They said Ms. Williams would return the extra money. Ms. Williams, who was said by Mrs. Clinton's aides to be traveling, did not return a call to her office.

"Donors, like voters, increasingly expect candidates to exercise fiscal discipline," said Mark McKinnon, an adviser to Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona and a possible presidential candidate, and a veteran of President Bush's two penny-pinching campaigns for the White House.

Political campaigns are expensive affairs for any candidate, especially those running in a state as big as New York. Some of Mrs. Clinton's expenditures, including the more than $10 million for direct mail fund-raising solicitations, will pay off if she runs for president by giving her an expanded list of individual donors around the nation.

She has now amassed a database that includes several hundred thousand new donors, 90 percent of whom contributed $100 or less, her advisers said. Under the new campaign finance law, such small donors are considered crucial to raising the large sums of money needed for a presidential campaign.

Other types of expenses are seen by campaigns as necessary good-will gestures toward donors and other supporters; Mrs. Clinton's campaign cited this in justifying the roughly $51,000 she spent on professional photographers to provide pictures of her with guests. The candidate also sought to generate good will among her fellow Democratic candidates by giving more than $2.5 million to the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee and other party groups.

Candidates routinely use campaign money for all types of expenses. Representative Corrine Brown, Democrat of Florida, spent $24,000 of her campaign money this year on flowers; her campaign said she sent them to the families of constituents who died. Representative Richard W. Pombo, Republican of California, spent $17,250 on balloons for a single event in July.

Mrs. Clinton's aides offered varying explanations for her spending record. Some, speaking on the condition of anonymity because they are barred from discussing Mrs. Clinton's intentions for 2008, said much of the spending amounted to an investment in voter and fund-raising databases that could form the basis of a presidential campaign. Others said the money went to ensuring as convincing a victory as possible.

"We in fact did what we said we would do, which was raise it for a campaign in 2006," said Ann Lewis, the communications director for her campaign.

The most expensive components of any political campaign are often direct mail solicitations and television advertising, and Mrs. Clinton paid Media Strategies Research, a Democratic firm in Denver, $1.58 million in the third quarter of the year alone. She spent at least $7 million on advertising over all.

Yet Mrs. Clinton has also continued to travel and entertain in style. Around $160,000 was spent on private jet travel for her and her advisers in 2006. Her catering and entertaining bill was at least $746,450, with tabs ranging from a $124,155 bill at the New York Hilton to a $2,500 bill for a backroom fund-raiser at Ben's Chili Bowl, the famous Washington hot dog shop.

Women's Report Card For 2006 Vote (CSM)

DOJ_NMG_0096774

By Linda Feldmann

The Christian Science Monitor, November 21, 2006

WASHINGTON

When the winners of the Nov. 7 elections are sworn in in January, Democratic women - and some Republicans - will have cause to cheer: The House will have its first female speaker, Nancy Pelosi (D) of California. Congress will have its largest corps of women ever - 16 in the Senate and at least 71 in the House, from both parties.

And in the states, women will hold nine governorships, tied with the record set in 2004, and other elective statewide jobs that could position them for higher office. Sarah Palin (R) will become Alaska's first woman governor. For the first time, the chair of the National Governors Association will be a woman, Gov. Janet Napolitano (D) of Arizona.

In state legislatures, a record 2,426 women were general-election candidates, and unofficial results show 1,735 winning, which would be a record. In addition, women appear set to build on their record number of top leadership spots in state legislatures.

Women voters were also pivotal this year. While a majority of both women and men nationwide voted Democratic on Nov. 7 - 56 percent of women and 51 percent of men - the gender gap proved decisive for Democrats in a handful of key Senate races.

In Virginia, where Democrat Jim Webb beat Republican incumbent George Allen by a fraction of a percent, 55 percent of women voted for Mr. Webb versus 45 percent of men. In particular, it was women of color who made the difference.

In Montana, where race was not a factor, 52 percent of women voted for the Democrat, Jon Tester, versus 48 percent of men. Mr. Tester beat incumbent Sen. Conrad Burns (R) by just a few thousand votes.

In Missouri, 51 percent of women voted for Democrat Claire McCaskill, who beat incumbent Sen. Jim Talent (R), while only 46 percent of men did. As in Virginia, it was African-American women who made the difference.

Was this another Year of the Woman? Not exactly. Back in 1992, women made stunning gains, jumping from 32 to 54 House members and from two to six senators. Since then, the gains have been steady. The Senate is now at a record 16 women, and women in the House have averaged an increase of one or two seats per year. This year, the increase in the House was a little larger than usual - at least four seats. (In Louisiana, the Dec. 9 runoff between two Democrats, Rep. William Jefferson and challenger Karen Carter, could put another woman in the House. In Florida, Vern Buchanan (R) was certified the winner Monday in his tight race against Democrat Christine Jennings, but Ms. Jennings is suing.)

Ultimately, women remain far from achieving equality. In the next Congress, the record 87 women members will represent 16 percent of the 535 seats. In state legislatures, women currently hold 1,686 of the 7,382 seats, or 22.8 percent. In statewide elective executive office - positions such as governor, attorney general, and secretary of state - women hold 78 of the 315 positions, or 24.8 percent. (The figure will drop to 76 in January.)

The key, say women political activists, is that most of the numbers continue to head upward. "And certainly, 2006 is the year of the woman leader," says Democratic pollster Celinda Lake, pointing to Ms. Pelosi and the incoming state legislative leaders. In addition, California's two Democratic woman senators will chair committees starting in January, with Dianne Feinstein running the Rules Committee and Barbara Boxer running Environment and Public Works.

At EMILY's List, a political action committee that helps Democratic woman candidates who support abortion rights, 2006 was by far the group's busiest year. The group endorsed, funded, and advised a record number of candidates, including 19 women who were Democratic nominees for Republican-held House seats. Of those, 16 were in races considered competitive by the nonpartisan Cook Political Report. So far, with four races still undecided, only two women have won, a point that has raised eyebrows. Among the 36 Democratic men running in competitive, Republican-held districts, 22 won.

Many of the most highly touted EMILY's List candidates - including Tammy Duckworth of Illinois, Diane Farrell of Connecticut, and Lois Murphy of Pennsylvania - did not win.

Did gender play a role in any of the races? Officials at EMILY's List say it's impossible to say, but they are now analyzing each contest in depth. Three of the still-undecided races involve two woman candidates, so gender could not be a factor there. On a Seattle Times blog, debate raged last week over why Democratic challenger Darcy Burner lost narrowly to Rep. David Reichert (R). Times reporters cited e-mails from Ms. Burner, who suggested that being female hurt her - especially at a time of war.

DOJ_NMG_0096775

Woman political activists say that the big picture is what counts - and in the end, a record number of women will take seats in Congress come January. The increasing ranks of women at lower levels of government mean that the farm team for future, higher-level races is growing, they add.

Still, building toward gender equality remains a steep climb. "If it were easy to get women elected, we wouldn't need to exist," says Ramona Oliver, a spokeswoman for EMILY's List. "And trying to get newcomers elected on top of that is probably the toughest job in politics."

Kansas Republican Eyes Presidential Bid (AP-Y)

By Sam Hananel

AP, November 21, 2006

Sen. Sam Brownback, who is considering a White House bid in 2008, said Monday the Republican field has room for a "full-scale Ronald Reagan conservative" and pledged to make a final decision next month.

The Kansas senator said he was not discouraged from running by the Democrats' strong gains in this month's midterm elections, including majority control of the House and Senate.

"It does not make it less likely," he said in an interview. "I really believe that the basic conservative ideas and ideals we re not repudiated. Our execution was."

A more daunting challenge for Brownback are the better known potential candidates. Arizona Sen. John McCain and former New York City mayor Rudy Giuliani have set up presidential exploratory committees. Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney and Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., also are weighing bids.

"I think there's room for a full-scale Ronald Reagan conservative in the field," Brownback said. "I fully agree that other people have much higher name identification than I do. No question about that. But I think what you have to look at is the policy positions they get out once you have an effective campaign."

Brownback, who was elected in 1996, is a forceful foe of abortion and embryonic stem-cell research. He also has taken a prominent role in the fight against genocide in Sudan's Darfur region.

Brownback has made several trips to Iowa, New Hampshire, Michigan and other states that hold early presidential nominating contests. While national polls show McCain and Giuliani running strong, similar polls have shown Brownback in the low single digits.

He dismisses the early surveys.

"Where are my positions and others versus the base of the party?" he asked.

Dueling Conservatives (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, November 21, 2006

Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona and a likely 2008 presidential candidate, seemed to struggle yet again to firm up his position with the right on Sunday, as he faces the prospect of a primary fight with, among others, Gov. Mitt Romney of Massachusetts.

Mr. McCain, far right, appearing on “This Week” on ABC, said he thought Roe v. Wade, the Supreme Court decision that established a constitutional right to abortion, should be overturned. But he sometimes strayed from the orthodoxy of social conservatism. He presented himself as a supporter of the “don’t ask, don’t tell” policy imposed by President Bill Clinton in 1993 to allow gay men and lesbians to serve in the military. He said he did not believe homosexuality was “a sin.” And while he said he opposed same-sex marriage, he seemed to countenance civil unions.

And how did Mr. Romney spend his Sunday? He announced that he would ask his state’s highest court to order a question banning same-sex marriage onto the ballot if legislators failed to do so.

Romney Prepares To Run For President (FT)

By Rebecca Knight

Financial Times, November 21, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0096776

Mitt Romney, the outgoing governor of Massachusetts, appears to be on the verge of confirming what many political observers have long speculated: he intends to seek the Republican party's presidential nomination in 2008.

Mr Romney – who first drew national attention when he took over leadership of the struggling 2002 Salt Lake City Winter Olympic Games – convened a meeting of his top advisers and leading supporters at the weekend to discuss the potential launch of his White House bid. According to an aide to his Commonwealth Political Action Committee, the gathering was "to thank those who have been supporters" over the past year.

The governor has always been coy about his presidential ambitions. But an aide to the committee said he planned over the coming holidays to discuss a possible presidential run with his family and will "make a decision one way or another after the first of the year".

Mr Romney has recently added several influential political consultants to his roster including Alex Castellanos, a veteran Republican image-maker known for his take-no-prisoners television commercials against Democratic candidates. Mr Castellanos has produced ads for President George W. Bush and presidential candidate Bob Dole, among others.

In addition, Mr Romney's PAC has hired Sally Bradshaw, one of the top political advisers to Governor Jeb Bush of Florida, and Barbara Comstock, a one-time strategist for the Republican National Committee.

The high-profile recruits and last weekend's talks come at time when the field of Republican hopefuls is thinning. Senator John McCain of Arizona is still widely considered the frontrunner but the demise of Senator George Allen, Republican of Virginia, who had been considered a leading 2008 presidential contender until a string of slip-ups over the summer, is considered a boon to a potential Romney candidacy.

In spite of the more open playing field, many political observers, including Charles Stewart, a political science professor at MIT, are sceptical about Mr Romney's chances. "The thing about nominations is that it comes down to popular appeal and the judgment of professionals," he said.

While Mr Romney succeeds at portraying himself as a "solid, good guy", Prof Stewart said he loses points with professionals for the way he has treated Massachusetts "as a political whipping boy". In various out-of-town speeches, Mr Romney has portrayed the state's liberalism as a foil to cast himself as a conservative fighting blue-state waste, according to Prof Stewart.

"He is running against Massachusetts by playing to his conservative base at the expense of the state where he is governor," he said.

Ahead To 2008 (WT)

By Rick Amato

The Washington Times, November 21, 2006

As the line of Republican candidates running for the White House in 2008 begins to form, there is one candidate making preparations to run whose name voters outside of San Diego and Washington will be hard-pressed to recognize, but that could change in time. I'm speaking of the outgoing chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, California Rep. Duncan Hunter.

It is easy to dismiss Mr. Hunter's chances. After all, not since James Garfield in 1880 has a sitting member of Congress been elected to the White House, and then of course, there's that whole name recognition thing. However, there is something interesting about Mr. Hunter that should not be overlooked. He is a social conservative in what is expected to shape up as a socially moderate Republican field. Historically, social conservatives have done very well with voters in early primary states such as Iowa and South Carolina. (Mr. Hunter introduced H.R. 552 the Right to Life Act, which proposes to "implement equal protection for the right to life of each born and preborn human person."). He is further to the right on social issues than either John McCain, Rudy Giuliani or Mitt Romney.

A Vietnam veteran, Mr. Hunter was first elected to Congress in 1980, when he won in a long-shot bid over 18-year Democratic incumbent Lionel Van Deerlin. When asked why he is up to the challenge of a presidential run Mr. Hunter told me, "because I believe national security and a strong military are more important issues today than ever before. The Iranians and North Koreans are acquiring more advanced weapons systems, China is an emerging superpower and, we are living in an increasingly dangerous world. America is headed in to a new era, an era of terrorists with high technology. My message will be one of 'peace through strength.' I encourage voters to examine my record and consider my experience as chair of Armed Services and my work on national security issues."

DOJ_NMG_0096777

On Iraq, Mr. Hunter points to a pattern he says America has followed for the past 60 years, "My campaign message on Iraq will consist of a three-step process: Establish a free government, which we've done, establish a military that will protect that government, and then leave Iraq."

Regarding Iraq, Mr. Hunter provided me with a letter he recently wrote to President Bush urging the president "to accelerate the process of deploying Iraqi forces to security environments that force them to engage in difficult military operations. Such operations will allow the forces to become battle-hardened ... as the battle in Iraq has intensified, so has the need to send Iraqi battalions into the heart of battle."

On the issues of border security and illegal immigration, Mr. Hunter has been a vocal critic and an advocate of tougher illegal immigration laws. "I don't look at the border as an immigration issue, I look at it as a national security issue. After we built the border fence along the San Diego-Tijuana region, smuggling and drugs were reduced in that area by 90 percent. The president just signed the 700-mile border fence bill, which I wrote on the House side. We simply have to have better border security."

Mr. Hunter expects to formally announce his candidacy sometime after the first of the year. History suggests that voters in early primary states will recognize and embrace a message of peace through strength, conservative social values and conservative illegal immigration policy. Now Duncan Hunter is hoping they recognize his name.

Rick Amato is a radio talk-show host and political commentator.

Out Of The Bush Family Shadow (LAT)

By Peter Wallsten

The Los Angeles Times, November 21, 2006

MIAMI — Her father left the White House 14 years ago, and her brother is midway through his second term as president. But Dorothy Bush Koch is only now stepping into the spotlight with a new book about the first President Bush and about her family.

And she has a few gently pointed words to say about life as the lone daughter in the country's most powerful political family.

Introducing her book at a Miami event on Sunday, "Doro," as she is known to her siblings, said it was nearly impossible to convince strangers that the generation of George W. Bush, Jeb, Neil and Marvin also included her.

"It's as if they are finding out about the fifth Beatle," she said.

After Jeb Bush, the brother who is also Florida's governor, introduced her at Miami Book Fair International, Koch added bluntly: "Thank you, Jeb, for letting people know that I actually do exist.

"The traditional path to making a name for yourself in our family is running for elective office, and I couldn't do that because, for one thing, all the really good offices were taken," Koch said wryly.

Koch lives in the Maryland suburbs of Washington and devotes much of her time to raising money for causes (including her relatives' political campaigns). She is a mother of four. Her husband, Robert, is the president of the San Francisco-based Wine Institute, a lobbying group for the wine industry.

Koch's book walks through the life and times of her father, George H. W. Bush, a war hero at age 20 after he was shot down fighting the Japanese in 1944.

He went on to serve in Congress, run the CIA, head the Republican National Committee and win election as vice president for eight years and president for four.

Koch worked on the book for two years, conducting 135 interviews with friends, family and even political opponents of her father, including the man he beat for the presidency in 1988, Michael Dukakis.

One intriguing element of Koch's presentation Sunday, though, was what she implied but did not directly state about the contrasting images of the family's two presidents, one of whom is known as the consummate diplomat and the other who has labeled himself the "war president."

Twice on Sunday, she noted that among the accomplishments she most admired about her father was his ability to manage the end of the Cold War "without a shot being fired."

DOJ_NMG_0096778

The book aims to cement the legacy of the country's 41st president as a war hero and thoughtful world leader, but it comes as the 43rd president is struggling to preserve his own legacy amid an increasingly violent Iraq war — a war that many say his father would not have waged.

The book also comes as the current President Bush, in trying to find his way forward in Iraq, is increasingly reaching back to his father's foreign policy team for advice and leadership.

The title of Koch's book, "My Father, My President: A Personal Account of the Life of George H. W. Bush," suggests that Koch does have her favorite between the family's two presidents.

Though much has been made of whether the current President Bush has accomplished more than his father — winning two terms in the White House and toppling Saddam Hussein — Jeb Bush spoke Sunday of how he never aspired to outdo his father.

Instead, he was haunted by the desire to live up to his dad's example.

"If you start with the premise that your dad is as perfect as a person can be — and, typically, guys try and aspire to be like their dad … think about how traumatic that's been," he said.

"But I figured out if I could be half as good and kind and generous and compassionate as my father, then that would be pretty good," he added.

"And once I figured that out, I stopped worrying about getting therapy."

When a questioner at the Sunday event asked about the two presidents' differing decisions on Iraq, Koch instinctively deferred to her brother, and he deferred to well-worn family talking points.

"When the current president and President 41 are together, we're talking about sports and we're talking about our families," the governor said. As for their approaches to Iraq, Jeb Bush added: "It's never come up, to be honest with you."

Gov. Bush said Koch's 586-page book would probably serve as the official presidential memoir. He said their father did not intend to write his own.

As any loyal daughter would, Koch seeks to convey the record as she and her family see it.

Writing about the famous 1988 Willie Horton presidential-campaign ad, Koch lauds it as an effective portrayal of Dukakis' support of a weekend furlough program for violent criminals. Horton, an African American, was serving a life sentence for murder when he committed a rape while released for a weekend furlough.

Democrats and civil rights leaders called the ad race-baiting. It took on new resonance last month, when the Republican Party aired a controversial attack ad against a black Senate candidate in Tennessee.

The former president told his daughter that critics were wrong about the Willie Horton ad.

"I felt we did the right thing," he said, adding later: "It was definitely a crime issue."

Koch did convince the two presidents to reflect a bit on their relationship with each other. The current president said his father had been paying too much attention to attacks coming from Democrats these days, whereas the elder Bush said: "I know George is strong and can take it, too — but it still burns the hell out of me."

Inside The Beltway (WT)

By John Mccaslin

The Washington Times, November 21, 2006

Overt review

"Katie Couric's The Brand New Kid" made its world premiere at the Kennedy Center during the weekend, and while the "CBS Evening News" anchorwoman says she was unable to make the opening performance, Valerie Plame of CIA-leak fame was in the audience and sends her rave reviews.

"I got a note from Valerie Plame, who said she really liked it," Miss Couric told Inside the Beltway by telephone yesterday from New York. "She wrote, 'It was so well done and enjoyable for all of us. It teaches important values. And fun songs. Good work!' "

DOJ_NMG_0096779

The musical, playing at the Kennedy Center's Family Theatre through Dec. 17, is based on a children's book Miss Couric authored in 2000, titled "The Brand New Kid." It centers on a second-grader who enrolls in a new school, only to taunted by the other children. The teasing stops when the new arrival is befriended by one of the school's more popular students.

"I was going to go to opening night, but my daughters, typical, had plans, so I'm going to take them another time. I'm excited to do it," said Mrs. Couric, adding that the opportunity for the book to be made into a musical "was a pleasant surprise."

"And of course the Kennedy Center -- you can't do much better than that," she said.

Mrs. Plame and her husband, former ambassador Joseph C. Wilson IV, are parents of twins, a boy and girl, born in 2000.

Death notice

"Your item must have hit a raw nerve this time," writes Washington resident Jesse H. Merrell, who had called our attention Friday to a $75 fine levied against Luther L. Miller of Garfield Street Northwest -- who, according to a D.C. government notice put his trash containers "out for collection @ the wrong time or place."

Mr. Merrell has written repeatedly to the city's fathers, informing them that his old neighbor "Luther L. Miller is dead -- has been for nearly 30 years."

He once enclosed a copy of Mr. Miller's death certificate, but similar notices and fines addressed to Mr. Miller kept arriving at his neighbor's old house. Mr. Merrell even offered to drive Mayor Anthony A. Williams to the Old Stone Church Cemetery in Lewisburg, W.Va., to see for himself that Mr. Miller in no way, shape or form could be emptying his trash.

"On Feb. 2, 2002 -- after an unbelievable fourth letter -- I wrote and asked if I took you to see his tombstone in Lewisburg, would that help?" Mr. Merrell wrote to the mayor.

Now, we are pleased to report that Luther L. Miller might finally be resting in peace.

"I got a call from an aide to the mayor this afternoon," says Mr. Merrell, "thanking me for bringing it to their attention. I felt like saying I had been bringing it to their attention for some time, but was polite and let it go. He said he was going to ... get it corrected. I'm not holding my breath, however."

Read about baseball

We couldn't help but be amused yesterday when President Bush, visiting a pair of faux Indonesian classrooms in Jakarta, was asked by a small boy what his hobbies had been when he was growing up.

Observed the White House pool report: "Bush didn't miss a beat: 'Baseball. I liked baseball. That was my hobby. Sports.' Then, perhaps realizing that sports was the wrong thing to push in a classroom, even a fake one, the president added: 'The best thing that I did was to learn how to read.' Continuing in that vein, the last thing we heard before being pushed out was Bush cautioning the kids that 'there are people who watch TV too much.' "

Offer a toast

Craig Wolf, who served as counsel to the Senate Judiciary Committee and specifically its chairman, Sen. Orrin G. Hatch, Utah Republican, has become the new president and CEO of the Wine & Spirits Wholesalers of America.

"We are entering a dynamic era, and the membership has every confidence that Craig ... will effectively advance the wine and spirits wholesalers' interests to policy-makers and the general public during this period of increasing attacks seeking the deregulation of alcohol in this country," says association Chairman Stan Hastings.

We might also mention that Mr. Wolf was once a federal and state prosecutor, and he is also a captain in the U.S Army Reserve Judge Advocate General's Corps.

•John McCaslin, whose column is nationally syndicated, can be reached at 202/636-3284 or jmccaslin @washingtontimes.com.

Bush Gets A Dose Of Democracy On Visit To Indonesia (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, November 21, 2006

BOGOR, INDONESIA — In the last overseas stop of his five-day Asian tour, President Bush met here Monday with President Susilo Bambang Yudhoyono, the first directly elected president of the nation with the world's largest Muslim population.

DOJ_NMG_0096780

The visit came after a week of demonstrations against Bush, and its brief length, 6 1/2 hours, reflected security concerns in a country where terrorists have staged large-scale and deadly attacks.

About 2,000 protesters from Muslim, student, and labor groups showed up to protest U.S. policies in Iraq and Afghanistan, saying it was Bush who was spreading terror. In Surabaya, East Java, about 100 students were reported to have clashed with police at a McDonald's after staging a protest at the U.S. Consulate. No arrests were reported.

Bush cited the demonstrations as evidence of Indonesia's democracy, saying, "It's not the first time, by the way, where people have showed up and expressed their opinion about my policies."

Indonesia, where Islam is firmly rooted and democracy is still emerging, is a religious and political laboratory for the policies Bush says are the answer to Islamic-based terrorist movements. The president put Indonesia on his agenda for a trip, which began Thursday in Singapore and then went to Vietnam for an economic meeting of Pacific Rim leaders, to support Yudhoyono "as a moderate and progressive leader," said Derek Mitchell, a Pentagon official during the Clinton administration.

Indonesia had not done as much as Bush might have wanted to impose the rule of law, but there was "a sense that this is moving in the right direction," said Mitchell, who specializes in Asia and is a senior fellow at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, a Washington think tank.

Nearly 90% of Indonesia's 238 million people are Muslims. That amounts to approximately one-sixth of the Muslim world. After four decades of authoritarian rule, the nation's first democratic elections were held seven years ago; Yudhoyono was elected in 2004.

"The elections were open, the elections were clean, the elections were fair. And you elected a good president who is working hard to — in a tough job," said Bush of Yudhoyono at the news conference in one of the nation's six presidential palaces.

Indonesia is an equatorial archipelago made up of more than 17,000 islands, 6,000 of them inhabited, covering an area roughly three times that of Texas. It has a long history of ethnic strife along with the more recent onset of Islamic terrorism.

It is a base of the terrorist organization Jemaah Islamiah and has increasingly cooperated with the U.S. in counter-terrorism efforts, particularly in the wake of bombings in 2002 and 2003. The targets have included a nightclub frequented by tourists in Bali and a Marriott hotel in Jakarta.

The president flew by helicopter to Bogor from the Halim Perdanakusuma International Airport air base near Jakarta, 35 miles to the north, rather than traveling by motorcade.

The flight took him over the crowded capital's outer reaches, above roofs of crinkled metal and others of tile atop small, squat homes and trash heaps spilling out of backyards under lush, tropical growth.

He landed near the grounds of the 150-year-old Greek Revival-style palace, which is generally used for ceremonial purposes and other government functions.

Its 70 acres of lawns and giant ficus trees, behind high walls and in some locations rolls of new razor wire, harbor a herd of 600 white-spotted miniature deer, descendants of animals brought here from India several centuries ago for the hunting pleasure of a Dutch governor-general.

Bush made the short trip from the Marine One helicopter landing zone to the palace in an armored Chevrolet Suburban that bore neither the U.S. or Indonesian flags nor the presidential seal.

As he hopped with both feet from the high-riding vehicle, his image on a television screen prompted boos — and a few calls of "terrorist" — from some of the Indonesian reporters awaiting the news conference.

After dinner with Yudhoyono, Bush set out for Hawaii. He is scheduled to return to Washington tonight.

Bush Ends Trip At Careful Stop In Indonesia (NYT)

By David E. Sanger

The New York Times, November 21, 2006

BOGOR, Indonesia, Nov. 20 — President Bush made a six-hour, carefully orchestrated visit to Indonesia on Monday, praising the country's first directly elected president and seeking to defuse the widespread anger here, in the most populous Islamic country, over the continued American presence in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0096781

Mr. Bush, whose visit to Indonesia three years ago was consumed with talk of counterterrorism, this time appeared focused on fighting bird flu, bolstering a small program to aid Indonesian schools and promoting growth.

And in an afternoon of meetings at an ornate presidential palace that is a legacy of Dutch colonial rule, Mr. Bush held a closed-door session with what the White House called "civic leaders" of Indonesia.

Protestors and their "Stop Bush Now" placards could get no place near the Bogor palace, which is an hour outside of Jakarta and heavily protected by troops and fences. But Mr. Bush turned the Jakarta protests into a example of how far Indonesia has come in allowing free expression.

"It's not the first time, by the way, where people have showed up and expressed their opinion about my policies," Mr. Bush, looking tired at the end of a grueling trip, said with a smile. "But that's what happens when you makes hard decisions."

State Department surveys show that the percentage of Indonesians who say they have a favorable view of the United States has declined to 30 percent, from 75 percent six years ago.

The Indonesian president, Susilo Bambang Yudhoyono, gave only the most gentle public prod to Mr. Bush, talking about a "proper timetable" for withdrawal from Iraq, but then echoing Mr. Bush's view that the timetable had to be linked to national reconciliation there and the training of new security forces.

When a reporter asked Mr. Yudhoyono whether he had urged Mr. Bush to begin a withdrawal of forces from Iraq, Mr. Bush interjected: "I'll be glad to answer it for him — no, no he didn't. But he can answer it for himself."

In Mr. Bush's struggle to demonstrate that he can still achieve his initial objective in Iraq — a stable, democratic government in a demographically diverse Islamic nation — he often holds up Indonesia as an example of success and proof that Islam and democracy are compatible.

Since Suharto's departure from power in 1998, a real democracy has begun to take root. In its recent report card on the country, Freedom House judged that "the political system is open and democratic in its basic structures," even while some of its institutions still "function poorly or are sanctuaries of undemocratic and abusive behavior."

But to Mr. Bush, Indonesia's greatest accomplishment has been to suppress extremist groups, especially Jemaah Islamiyah, considered an affiliate of Al Qaeda.

"I believe the vast majority of people want to live in moderation and not have extremists kill innocent people," he said at a news conference in the ornate receiving rooms of the palace.

Despite the country's recent progress, however, Mr. Bush once again did not stay the night in Indonesia, at the insistence of the Secret Service. On his previous visit, he stopped in Bali, a Hindu resort island in a nation of Muslims, and held what turned out to be a contentious session with Indonesian scholars and religious scholars. He was criticized after that visit for failing to come to the heart of Indonesia.

So on Monday he flew into the airport in Jakarta, the capital. But he never ventured into the city. Instead, he stayed behind the fenced wall of the palace compound, save for his helicopter ride from and to the airport, where Air Force One was standing by for the trip onward to Hawaii.

Protestors were kept away by troops and rolls of barbed wire. In Jakarta, the authorities appeared to have jammed some cellular telephone networks.

At one point during the news conference, Mr. Bush was asked to describe the risks of adding more forces to Iraq, a step that Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona, is pressing.

Mr. Bush, who has described in detail the risks of pulling out of Iraq too soon, sidestepped the question. "I haven't made any decisions about troop increases or troop decreases, and won't until I hear from a variety of sources, including our own United States military," he replied.

Among the groups expected to present their recommendations to the president are the joint chiefs of staff and a bipartisan study group led by a former secretary of state, James A. Baker III, and a former congressman, Lee H. Hamilton.

So far, Mr. Bush has used those groups' ongoing studies to justify declining to talk about his plans for the Iraq mission. "There's no need to comment on something that may not happen," he said. "But if it were to happen, I will tell you the upsides and the downsides."

DOJ_NMG_0096782

Bush Brushes Off Protests Over Middle East (FT)

By John Aglionby In Bogor, Indonesia

Financial Times, November 21, 2006

US President George W. Bush on Monday dismissed suggestions he should alter his policies to win over opponents in the Muslim world, insisting his desire to promote democracy and freedom were echoed by the majority of people around the world.

Speaking during a seven-hour visit to Indonesia, the world's most populous Muslim nation, at the end of his Asian tour, Mr Bush welcomed the fact that thousands of people had been demonstrating for days across the sprawling archipelago against his visit and policies in Iraq and the Middle East.

"I applaud a society where people are free to come out and express their opinion," he told a press conference with his host, President Susilo Bambang Yudhoyono. "It's not the first time people have shown up to express their views on my policies. That's what happens when you make hard decisions."

People should instead appreciate the message he was trying to spread around the world, Mr Bush said. "I believe people desire to live in a free society," he said. "People want to live in moderation and not have extremists kill innocent people. Our policies are to promote that kind of government. Democracies yield peace. Democracies don't kill each other. To say democracy is anti-religious is wrong. It's the opposite of that."

Indonesia's transition from a dictatorship in 1998 to its currently directly-elected president is considered one of the world's best democracy success stories.

The vast majority of Indonesian Muslims are moderate but it is also the home of extremist groups who carried out at least one major terrorist attack each year between 2002 and 2005, including two bombings on the tourist resort island of Bali that killed more than 220 people.

Anti-Bush demonstrations have been thousands strong in the last few days, small by Indonesian standards, and the vast majority have passed off without incident.

Protesters were kept well away from Mr Bush but he received strong face-to-face criticism in a meeting with nine Indonesian civil society leaders.

"I wanted to tell him that he has to take a different approach to the Middle East and to Iraq," said Ysuni Sabi, from Aceh province. "He's not going to get peace unless he's harder on Israel and more accommodating towards Palestine."

The president's bilateral talks covered general matters such as promoting cooperation in trade, investment, health, education, alternative fuel technology and military links. No new initiatives were announced.

Mr Bush said the two leaders did not discuss a dispute involving Exxon Mobil's right to develop a gas field near the Natuna islands in the South China Sea. Jakarta has said Exxon had forfeited its right to the block while the company insists its contact expires in 2009. The two sides have agreed to negotiate to try and reach a common position that is likely to involve adjusting the share of profits each side receives.

Mr Bush also said he had not decided whether to adjust troop levels in Iraq.

"I haven't made any decisions about troop increases or decreases, and won't until I hear from a variety of sources, including our own United States military," he said.

Bush Calls Indonesian Protests A Good Thing (USAT)

By David Jackson

USA Today, November 21, 2006

BOGOR, Indonesia — President Bush was due to arrive in Hawaii today, ending a five-day trip during which he talked with world leaders about stopping North Korea's nuclear weapon's program.

In Indonesia, the last stop on the trip, several thousand anti-American protesters that included hard-line Islamists staged demonstrations Monday against U.S. policy in Iraq. Bush said the protests were symbolic of the kind of free expression the United States is trying to establish in Iraq.

"Indonesia is an example of how democracy and modernization can present an alternative to extremism," Bush said after meeting with President Susilo Bambang Yudhoyono in a 19th-century palace built by the nation's Dutch former colonial rulers.

DOJ_NMG_0096783

“To say spreading democracy is anti-religious — it's the opposite of that. Democracy means you can worship any way you choose, freely,” he said.

Before Indonesia, Bush visited Singapore and Vietnam, where he discussed free trade and measures aimed at reining in North Korea's nuclear weapons program. Bush spent a little more than six hours here amid tight security before flying to Hawaii, where he is to have breakfast with U.S. troops.

In a meeting with reporters in Indonesia, Bush said he has not decided about future troop levels in Iraq and is still consulting with advisers. The administration is also awaiting the report from a special committee on Iraq led by former secretary of State James Baker and former U.S. representative Lee Hamilton.

Indonesia replaced a dictatorship on its own in the late 1990s, so it's not a good example for Iraq, said William Liddle, an Ohio State University specialist on Indonesia.

“The Indonesians created this for themselves; they weren't occupied by somebody,” said Liddle of the country that consists of more than 17,000 islands.

Derek Mitchell, an Asia specialist with the Center for Strategic & International Studies in Washington, said the Islamic Middle East doesn't consider Indonesia as a model. “They see them as outliers,” he said.

Indonesia has 190 million people and 87% are Muslim, the State Department said. The country is having troubles with militant Islam. The State Department says the Indonesian Islamic militant group Jemaah Islamiyah has been behind four terror attacks that killed more than 240 people since 2002.

On Iraq, Yudhoyono said the “global community” needs to help strengthen the Baghdad government before the United States can leave.

Indonesian attitudes toward the United States have gone up and down during Bush's presidency, according to the Pew Global Attitudes Project.

In 2002, a year after the 9/11 attacks, 61% of Indonesians held a favorable view of the United States, according to Pew. That dropped to 15% in 2003 after the U.S. invasion of Iraq, and then rose to 38% in 2005 after the United States helped Indonesia recover from the December 2004 tsunami that killed 167,000 Indonesians.

U.S. Urges IAEA To Deny Iran Reactor Aid (AP)

By George Jahn, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 21, 2006

The United States said Monday it would accept Iran's request for U.N. aid on seven nuclear projects but urged the International Atomic Energy Agency to deny assistance for a plutonium-producing reactor that can be used to make a bomb.

The decision reflected U.S. recognition that it was futile to try to block IAEA help to Iran on all eight projects because of opposition by most of the agency's 35-nation board. It also appeared prompted by an IAEA ruling that neither the reactor nor the other projects posed a proliferation threat.

Some diplomats accredited to the Vienna-based U.N. nuclear watchdog agency also suggested it could reflect a U.S. decision to tread relatively lightly while Washington weighs the possibility of direct dialogue with Iran on reducing violence in Iraq. The diplomats spoke on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to speak publicly about the closed meeting.

U.S. officials declined comment.

"We are prepared to join consensus" on approving the seven other requests from Iran if the agency's board agrees to deny aid to Iran on building the Arak research reactor, said Gregory L. Schulte, the chief U.S. delegate to the IAEA.

But Schulte suggested there would be no compromise on Arak, describing it as being "capable of producing plutonium for one or more nuclear weapons each year," once completed, likely in the next decade.

"Given past board decisions, continued questions about Iran's nuclear program, and the risk of plutonium being diverted to use in a weapons, the United States joins with others who cannot approve this project," he said. His comments to the closed committee meeting on IAEA technical aid to member countries were made available to The Associated Press.

The council's main concern is Iran's defiance of a demand that it freeze uranium enrichment, but the Arak heavy water reactor is also worrying because of its ability to produce plutonium.

DOJ_NMG_0096784

A Security Council resolution in July demanded that Iran stop all enrichment-related activities. But it did not specifically mention Arak, saying only that Tehran had to stop all "reprocessing activities."

The European Union also urged the board to refuse approving aid for the Arak project once it moves from its committee meeting to a full session on Thursday.

"Our concern is that such a reactor would in the future produce significant quantities of plutonium and would involve a significant proliferation risk," an EU statement said.

Canada and Australia also urged that help on Arak be denied, said a diplomat coming out of the closed meeting.

In contrast, Russia and China — the key blockers of tough U.N. Security Council sanctions on Iran backed by the U.S. and some European allies — suggested they had no objections to IAEA help on Arak, said the diplomat. Cuba went the furthest, demanding that the board approve the Arak project, she said.

Normally, the United States is at the forefront in demanding tough action against Tehran for defying U.N. Security Council demands that it freeze uranium enrichment.

But with council agreement on sanctions bogged down because of Russian and Chinese efforts to block severe punishment, diplomats said the Americans took a back seat at the Vienna meeting. Instead, France took the lead on demands that all eight Iranian projects be reviewed and possibly refused.

In Tehran, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad — whose country sees the United States and Israel as its greatest enemies — was cited on the Web site of Iran's Broadcasting Company as saying the Islamic republic would succeed in developing a full nuclear program, despite "pressure by the U.S. and Israel."

Even nonaligned nations traditionally supportive of Iran were likely to approve some form of denying Iran help for Arak, but the other seven projects were less controversial.

One asks for help in developing nuclear capabilities for medical use. Another seeks legal aid for the Russian-built Bushehr reactor, which even the Americans have accepted as not posing a threat to nuclear proliferation. And the five others ask for assistance in administrative or safety aspects of nuclear power, according to a list made available to the AP.

Denying Iran help with Arak — where it is seeking agency assistance to make sure the reactor is environmentally safe — would do little to slow construction of that facility or affect Tehran's other potential avenue to weapons production — uranium enrichment. Still, it would maintain at least symbolic pressure even amid the Security Council deadlock.

Ali Ashgar Soltanieh, Iran's chief delegate to the IAEA, said his country's request would benefit the international community by increasing outside involvement in Arak.

"By adopting this project, the agency's presence ... will be much more," he said.

Report: Israeli Spies Active In Iran (JERP)

The Jerusalem Post, November 21, 2006

Iran has developed and tested a trigger device for a nuclear bomb, Israeli agents stationed there have told the White House, according to a report published in The New Yorker Monday morning.

35 nations meet on denying Iran technical help for building plutonium-producing reactor

According to the report, written by Seymour M. Hersh, the White House received the information but did not pass it on to the CIA.

The report also stated that in the past six months, Israel and the United States had been working together to support a Kurdish resistance group known as the Party for Free Life in Kurdistan.

The group had been conducting clandestine cross-border forays into Iran, as "part of an effort to explore alternative means of applying pressure on Iran," Hersh said he was told by a government consultant with close ties to the Pentagon civilian leadership. The government consultant reportedly said Israel was supplying the Kurdish group with "equipment and training." The group had also been given "a list of targets inside Iran of interest to the US." An Israeli government spokesman denied that Israel was involved.

The Israeli intelligence presented a stark contrast to recent CIA estimates on Iran's nuclear program, which claimed that Teheran was far from attaining a nuclear bomb.

DOJ_NMG_0096785

The New Yorker article seemed to suggest that there was a difference of opinion between the CIA, the White House and the Pentagon regarding the progress of Iran's nuclear weapons program.

The CIA's opinion was based on technical information gathered from satellites and other hi-tech devices that suggested high levels of radiation had not been detected.

However, the White House and the Pentagon dispute the CIA's findings. Pentagon officials have urged that the Israeli intelligence be given due consideration and said data gathered by satellites and ground sensors was insufficient. They added that more emphasis should be given to information supplied by agents.

"We live in an era when national technical intelligence" - data from satellites and on-the-ground sensors - "will not get us what we need. HUMINT [human intelligence] may not be hard evidence by that standard, but very often it's the best intelligence we can get," said a Pentagon consultant.

The White House reportedly was refusing to reveal to the CIA the source of the Israeli information, the location of the site of the experiments, or the number of tests that had been carried out.

"The problem is that no one can verify it," a former senior intelligence official told Hersh. "We don't know who the Israeli source is. The briefing says the Iranians are testing trigger mechanisms" - simulating a zero-yield nuclear explosion without any weapons-grade materials - "but there are no diagrams, no significant facts. Where is the test site? How often have they done it? How big is the warhead - a bread box or a refrigerator? They don't have that."

And yet, the official said, the report was being used by White House hawks within the administration to "prove the White House's theory that the Iranians are on track. And tests leave no radioactive track, which is why we can't find it." Still, he said, "The agency is standing its ground."

Talk Of Another Middle East Preventive War Is Folly (FT)

By Gideon Rachman

Financial Times, November 21, 2006

James Baker will have heard many views as he prepares his much awaited report on Iraq. But he is unlikely to have heard anything as strikingly original as the suggestions offered to him by Ali G when Mr Baker gave the comedian an interview a couple of years ago.

The self-styled spokesman for youth suggested to Mr Baker that it might be problematic that Iran and Iraq had such similar names. Wasn't there a real danger, he asked, that an order might be issued to an American pilot and "the geezer don't hear it properly and bomb Iran not Iraq"? "No danger," replied the former secretary of state evenly.

But now, as he settles down to draft his report, Mr Baker might reflect that perhaps Mr G was on to something. It turns out that there is a country in the Middle East that is bent on developing nuclear weapons, which is funding terrorism and de-stabilising the region and which has a dangerously erratic president. But that country's name is Iran – not Iraq. Maybe America and its allies invaded the wrong place by mistake?

Some of the neo-conservatives who pressed hardest for the invasion of Iraq seem to have reached this conclusion. In an article for Foreign Policy magazine that is almost as surreal as an Ali G interview, Joshua Muravchik of the American Enterprise Institute acknowledges a whole string of errors and misapprehensions that lay behind the decision to invade Iraq. But then – with scarcely a pause for breath – he urges President George W. Bush "to bomb Iran's nuclear facilities before leaving office".

It would be easy to dismiss these views as ravings from a discredited ideological sect. But that would be a mistake. In recent months, I have heard senior British and French diplomats also discuss the possibility that Iran's nuclear ambitions might ultimately have to be dealt with by military action. The problem is that most people who follow the issue closely believe that Iran is, indeed, intent on developing nuclear weapons – and some argue that it is only a year or so away from crossing the threshold at which possession of the bomb becomes inevitable.

America could well make a big new effort to negotiate with Iran in the wake of the Baker report. If that fails, sanctions could be wheeled out. But, realistically, neither course is likely to divert Iran away from its nuclear ambitions.

The rise of President Mahmoud Ahmadi-Nejad has also darkened the outlook. Even Kofi Annan, the United Nations secretary-general, was unsettled by a meeting with the Iranian president in Tehran last August. According to one person present at the meeting, Mr Ahmadi- Nejad explained that the US and Britain were still enjoying the benefits of winning the second world war and then added: "We will cut them down to size."

DOJ_NMG_0096786

By combining Holocaust denial with talk of a world without Israel or the US and a determination to develop nuclear weapons, Iran's president has put his country into considerable danger. President Bush has said that: "You have got to assume that leader, when he says he would like to destroy Israel, means what he says." Angela Merkel, the German chancellor, has compared Mr Ahmadi-Nejad's rhetoric to that of Hitler, adding that: "In the early 1930s, many people said that it is only rhetoric."

But there is a problem with the oft-stated argument that the Iranian president must be taken at his word. For if you were to take Mr Ahmadi- Nejad literally, you would have to believe that Iran does not have a nuclear-weapons programme – for that is what he says. The Iranian president can hardly be accused of explicitly threatening to nuke Israel, given that Iran denies having a nuclear-weapons programme in the first place.

So we are back to the balance of probabilities. The Atlantic Monthly recently ran a poll of 38 of America's leading foreign policy experts, ranging from neo-cons to liberals. One of their questions was whether they "thought it likely that Iran would use its nuclear weapons offensively, either by directly attacking other countries or by passing the weapons to terrorist groups"? The majority – 86 per cent of the sample – said they thought this unlikely.

But even if the risk that Iran would actually use a nuclear weapon is very small, some argue that it cannot be lived with. This argument is what Dick Cheney, vice-president, has called "the 1 per cent doctrine". If there is a 1 per cent chance that America's enemies might use a nuclear weapon, the US must act as if it was a 100 per cent certainty.

It sounds like a tough-minded way of preventing the very worst from happening. But on many occasions in the past 60 years, the US and its allies have had to live with a more than 1 per cent chance that their adversaries might use nuclear weapons – the Cuba missile crisis for example. On all these occasions, the Americans wisely steered away from preventive war. Even Winston Churchill, the neo-cons' hero, spent the 1930s arguing for re-armament – not for a first strike on Nazi Germany.

One influential advocate of bombing Iran accepts that it is very improbable that the Iranians would actually use nuclear weapons. His concern is that, once Iran had nuclear weapons, it would embark on an uninhibited pursuit of regional hegemony – supporting terrorism and insurgencies across the Middle East and seeking to control the global oil market.

These are all serious and worrying possibilities. If they could be averted by the fabled "surgical strike" on Iranian nuclear facilities, modelled on the Israeli raid on Iraq's nuclear programme in 1981, such a course would be worth considering. But almost nobody thinks that it would be possible to dispose of Iran's nuclear facilities so easily. They are thought to be dispersed widely around the country and buried underground. Military experts talk of the need for hundreds or thousands of bombing raids, stretched over many days – and even that might merely set back Iran's nuclear programme a few years.

Iran would also certainly retaliate. It could unleash Shia militias on allied troops in Iraq, encourage Hizbollah and Hamas to stage new attacks on Israel and block the Strait of Hormuz, through which 40 per cent of the world's oil flows. So military strikes that were launched because of the fear of the destabilising effects of a nuclear Iran would have created the very instability and bloodshed that they were meant to avert. If Iraq has taught America and its allies anything, it is that it is much easier to start a war in the Middle East than to finish one.

Israel Orders Investigation Of Bomb Use In Lebanon (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, November 21, 2006

JERUSALEM, Nov. 20 — The Israeli military chief of staff, Lt. Gen. Dan Halutz, ordered an inquiry on Monday to determine whether the armed forces had followed his orders when it used large numbers of cluster bombs during the monthlong war with Hezbollah in Lebanon this summer.

Several human rights groups have criticized Israel's use of cluster bombs in the fighting, saying they were dropped in or near populated areas.

Cluster bombs are not prohibited in warfare, but much controversy surrounds them, because they contain many small "bomblets" that explode over a wide area and may strike unintended targets. In addition, some bomblets do not explode when they hit the ground and effectively become land mines that can be detonated by civilians long after the fighting has stopped.

DOJ_NMG_0096787

General Halutz visited an army base on Monday and told Army Radio that "one of the things that must be investigated is the way in which the orders were given and implemented."

He said: "Were the orders explicit? I believe they were. Now all we need to do is to see whether we had or did not have departures from the commonly accepted rules of use."

The general did not specify what orders he gave regarding cluster munitions, and it was not clear whether he prohibited them, or placed certain restrictions on their use. General Halutz, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Defense Minister Amir Peretz have all faced widespread criticism over the war, which many Israelis feel was mismanaged. There have been calls for General Halutz to resign, but he has said he has no plans to quit.

The military said Maj. Gen. Gershon Hacohen would head the investigation.

The Lebanese say they are still suffering numerous wounds and deaths caused by bomblets detonated by civilians since the war, more than three months ago. So far, thousands of unexploded bomblets have been found at hundreds of sites in Lebanon, according to Lebanese officials and international groups searching for them.

The United Nations Mine Action Coordination Center has estimated that Israel fired as many as four million cluster submunitions, and that up to one million may not have detonated. Israel fired many of the munitions with its Multiple Launch Rocket System, which can fire 12 rockets in a minute.

Hezbollah has also been accused of using cluster munitions among the 4,000 rockets it fired into Israel during the fighting, which began July 12 and lasted until Aug. 14.

In a statement, the Israeli military said that cluster munitions used in Lebanon were directed only at "legitimate military targets" and that after the fighting ended Israel provided maps to the United Nations forces to assist in finding unexploded bomblets.

Israel has received cluster munitions from the United States for many years, and also makes its own. In August, the State Department began investigating whether Israel used cluster bombs in Lebanon in violation of secret agreements that restrict their use.

In a separate development, an aide to the Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, said the president's Fatah movement had suspended talks with the militant faction Hamas on a national unity government. "We would say talks are suspended now," the aide, Nabil Amr, told a news conference in the West Bank city of Ramallah.

However, Prime Minister Ismail Haniya, of Hamas, said in the Gaza Strip that "talks are continuing on the highest level."

Fatah and Hamas have been talking for months but have been unable to reach an agreement on a new government, which would seek to win a restoration of international aid that was cut after Hamas came to power in the spring elections. The most recent discussions have sought to establish a cabinet of professionals and technocrats who are not linked directly to either Hamas or Fatah.In an Israeli airstrike on Monday night, two Hamas militants traveling in a car in Gaza City were killed, and several passers-by were wounded, Palestinian medical officials said. In the West Bank, a 17-year-old Palestinian youth who approached soldiers brandishing a gun, which turned out to be fake, was also killed, [a news agency] reported.

Murder Update (WSJ)

By Michael Young

The Wall Street Journal, November 21, 2006

BEIRUT -- The Syrian regime is discovering what a nuisance Rafik Hariri, the late Lebanese prime minister, can be. Last Friday, the U.N. Security Council approved a draft plan for a mixed Lebanese-international court to try those responsible for Hariri's assassination on Feb. 14, 2005. Damascus, the main suspect in the crime, is palpably anxious. That anxiety played out in Lebanon 10 days ago, when six ministers named by pro-Syrian politicians resigned rather than take part in Beirut's formal endorsement of the tribunal proposal. The plan was subsequently passed by a reduced Lebanese government, but the full approval process is not over.

Five of the six ministers who resigned were appointed by or affiliated with the two main Shiite parties, Hezbollah and the Amal movement, while the sixth is Lebanese President Emile Lahoud's man. Their resignations came amid a struggle for power between pro-Syrian groups and the anti-Syrian parliamentary and cabinet majority -- dating back to the summer war between Israel and Hezbollah. While some saw the outcome of the conflict as a victory for the militant Shiite group, that was hardly the case. Israel displayed incompetence, but Hezbollah found itself militarily neutralized in its vital space of south Lebanon, at least for now. The Lebanese army and international peacekeepers are deployed in the border area, and Hezbollah cannot impose a new war on its battered Shiite community, which continues to suffer the consequences of Israel's terrible retribution.

DOJ_NMG_0096788

With little room to maneuver in the south, Hezbollah has tried to compensate in Beirut by demanding greater representation in the cabinet. The anti-Syrian majority has resisted this, arguing that the government performed well last summer, making change unnecessary. The real issue, however, is the return of Syrian hegemony. Hezbollah and its allies want enough ministerial seats so they can veto decisions they dislike that go to a cabinet vote. By so doing, they can continue to protect Syria in the Hariri investigation, and also block the majority's policies that they don't like. A final U.N. report is due out on Hariri's killing in the coming months (the chief investigator, Serge Brammertz, has until mid-2007 to publish his findings), and Hezbollah fears that any accusation against Syria might also be turned against itself. * * *

All this has significant repercussions for the U.S., particularly after the Democratic midterm elections victory. Syria never accepted its forced withdrawal from Lebanon last year, and has worked tirelessly since then to reimpose its writ here. Now there is new hope in Damascus: Influential American voices are suddenly suggesting a reversal of course toward Iraq's neighbors. It was music to Syrian President Bashar Assad's ears to hear James Baker, the Republican co-chairman of the Iraq Study Group, advocating dialogue with Syria and Iran in an interview last month: "I don't think you restrict your conversations to your friends." The Iraq Study Group's report, expected in the coming weeks, will possibly include such an invitation. Syria's Lebanese foes fear they will pay if the U.S. and Damascus cut a deal.

If so, it wouldn't be the first time for Mr. Baker. In 1990, he was a leading light in President George H.W. Bush's administration, which ceded Lebanon to Syria in exchange for President Hafez Assad's agreement to be part of the international coalition against Iraq. An inveterate "realist," Mr. Baker is not likely to balk at negotiating with Mr. Assad if it means the U.S. can buy some peace of mind as it transforms its presence in Iraq. His proposal is unpopular at the White House, and last week Mr. Bush made that known to Mr. Baker and his colleagues. However, because of his electoral defeat, the president, pressed by a Congress avidly searching for new ideas, might find less latitude to ignore Syria down the road.

Unless, of course, the U.N. incriminates Syrian officials in the Hariri murder. That Mr. Assad realizes the fatal implications of this connection was evident when British Prime Minister Tony Blair recently sent a senior adviser, Sir Nigel Sheinwald, to Damascus for a chat. The visit, reportedly approved by Washington, aimed to see if Syria could be enticed away from Iran. If The Economist is correct, and the magazine spoke to Mr. Sheinwald upon his return, the Syrian president has four conditions: an end to the Hariri investigation, a guarantee that the U.S. would not undermine his regime, a return of Syrian influence in Lebanon, and the handing back of the Golan Heights, occupied by Israel in 1967. No doubt Mr. Assad would demand much the same from the U.S. if it ran to Damascus to "engage" him on Iraq, assuming the Syrian leader would consider conceding to Washington in a moment of strength what he refused when he was weak.

There seems to be a consensus in the U.S., whether in Congress or in the administration, that there is no going back on upholding Lebanese sovereignty or in finding Hariri's killers. But it is not clear to many in Washington that asking Syria and Iran for help in Iraq, if that's what the Iraq Study Group advises, will drastically limit the administration's ability to deny both countries' gains in Lebanon. For Syria and Iran, Lebanon is vital in their broader quest for power in the Middle East. They will collect there on whatever is offered to the Americans in Iraq, and the retreating administration already has far fewer means to prevent this.

Mr. Baker and his fellow realists, custodians of stalemate in their own way, want the U.S. to return to its previous approach to the region, where interests defined behavior more than values -- particularly democracy. But if engagement with Syria, or even Iran, is on the cards, then the U.S. might have to surrender the one genuine triumph it can point to after Mr. Bush formulated a democratic project for the Middle East: the peaceful, popular overthrow by the Lebanese of Syria's debilitating domination. The U.S. might also find itself having to relinquish that all-too-rare happening in the region: a vigorous international legal process that promises to punish a state-sponsored crime. Yielding on Lebanon will not advance American interests; it will only damage them more, turning the severe setbacks in Iraq into a full-scale regional rout.

Wherever one stands in the spectrum of U.S. foreign-policy thinking, the Hariri tribunal is a mechanism that should satisfy all. Democracy defenders see in it an institutional means of buttressing Lebanon's independence from Syria -- presuming that

DOJ_NMG_0096789

U.N. investigators demonstrate Syrian involvement in Hariri's elimination. Realists will gain a splendid stick with which to force Syrian compliance with American priorities elsewhere in the Middle East, including Iraq. The court's mandate does not oblige presidents to put in an appearance (though there is no immunity from crime, meaning they can be sentenced in absentia), so Mr. Assad can be destabilized if his involvement is proven, but not necessarily forced from office. It would make him conveniently vulnerable to outside coercion.

That's why events in Lebanon are so important. Syria's Lebanese allies are trying to undermine the Hariri investigation from within, and are expected to escalate their efforts very soon, maybe even this week. It makes no sense for the U.S. to hand them more ammunition by prematurely transacting with Mr. Assad before the U.N. completes its task and assigns responsibility for the assassination.

Mr. Young, a Lebanese national, is opinion editor at the Daily Star newspaper in Beirut and a contributing editor at Reason magazine.

Pessimism Deepens In Postwar Lebanon (WP)

By Anthony Shadid

The Washington Post, November 21, 2006

BEIRUT -- A racket filled the air outside Mohammed Jassar's shop in a swath of Beirut devastated in this summer's war with Israel. Hammers delivered a cadence to the clamor of bulldozers, saws and drills trying to rebuild. The noise was almost as loud as the invective these days in Lebanese politics, paralyzing a country that has never quite known peace. Jassar has had enough. Three weeks, he blurted. After that, he'd decide whether to leave Lebanon.

"This is a country scared of its future," he said.

Lebanon has emerged from the 33-day war with Israel only to find itself lately in one of the most pronounced political crises it has experienced in a generation. At first glance, the issues dividing it are somewhat arcane: the legitimacy of an international tribunal to try those suspected of killing former prime minister Rafiq al-Hariri in 2005, and the representation in the cabinet for the opposition, which comprises Hezbollah, another Shiite Muslim faction and a Christian ally. But the stakes are far higher, in effect the future of the country: What groups and their patrons -- the United States, France, Syria or Iran -- will guide Lebanese politics?

There is a cinematic quality to the events, a commotion that resembles a film's opening credits: snippets of hurried conversation, incendiary news broadcasts, glimpses of politically loaded posters draped over streets, and a pessimism, deep and intransigent, that has become a national pastime.

"This is what is so tragic about it," said Fawwaz Traboulsi, a historian and professor at Lebanese American University. "We've been reduced to people who are frightened by the worst and hoping for something that might be less bad."

Lebanon is blessed and cursed by its diversity. The logic of coexistence among 18 religious sects, often with their own readings of history, dictates a tolerance and occasional cosmopolitanism that stands out in an Arab world becoming ever more atavistic and resentful. On display these days in Beirut, though, is that diversity's more menacing side.

On television, a Christian-owned station has introduced broadcasts with the ominous phrase: "Is it the silence before the storm?" Another station, loyal to Hariri's son Saad, a key figure in the governing coalition, has shed any pretense of objectivity, airing footage of this summer's war. A voiceover asks: "Who was responsible?" What does it matter? We won, answers Hezbollah's station, al-Manar.

Hezbollah's iconography still adorns the city, depicting "The Divine Victory" and "Victory from God." One poster portrays Israeli soldiers crying. "The invincible army," it mocks. Along the city's fault lines, the Hezbollah icons mix with posters hung by Hariri's followers. "We will not forget," they read over portraits of Lebanese killed since 2005 in a string of assassinations that many here blame on Syria, an ally of Hezbollah.

"Everyone is hanging up a picture," one resident quipped as he saw a poster unfurled.

Vitriol has reigned on talk shows since Hezbollah first threatened mass demonstrations last month to topple the government of Prime Minister Fouad Siniora, and everyday conversations are punctuated with talk of emigration. A new word has entered political discussions: Does Lebanon stand on the brink of "Iraqization"?

DOJ_NMG_0096790

Some shop owners say customers have stocked up on milk, rice and other staples. And, if it could get any grimmer, a statement attributed to al-Qaeda announced the network's arrival in Lebanon "to work on destroying this corrupt government which takes orders from the American administration."

"Pity Lebanon," said Ali Zein, a store owner in the city's southern suburbs, whose 5-year-old son, Mohammed, plied the sidewalk in his toy car. "People are living like there's always a crisis. If it's not war, it's protests. If it's not protests, it's war."

He shook his head when asked the last time the country felt settled.

"We're always between stability and chaos," he said.

This month's crisis erupted after two ministers from Hezbollah, three other Shiites and an allied politician resigned from Siniora's cabinet on Nov. 11. The resignations followed the breakdown of talks on granting Hezbollah and its allies greater representation, a move that would effectively give Hezbollah a veto over government decisions.

On Sunday, Hezbollah's leader, Hasan Nasrallah, said the government now faced a choice: either resign in favor of what he called a national unity government or hold early parliamentary elections. If neither demand is met, he said, his followers have planned days, even weeks, of protests to topple a government he said was beholden to the United States. Hezbollah's critics, such as Druze politician Walid Jumblatt, have described the campaign as a backdoor coup d'etat.

But memories of the 15-year civil war that ended in 1990 remain vivid, and even the politicians responsible for fueling the current crisis have warned against events spiraling out of control. Nasrallah called civil strife a red line and repeatedly insisted protests would be peaceful. Jumblatt ruled out counter-protests that might ignite clashes in the streets. "Let them assume responsibility for this," he said.

"The street in Lebanon is not a normal street, where the people go down to voice their objections or demands," Talal Salman, the editor of the Beirut daily as-Safir, who has long advocated Hezbollah's cause, wrote Monday. "Rather, it is a space for confrontation."

Still reeling from this summer's war and mired in economic troubles, Beirut shows little sign of enthusiasm for the kind of demonstrations Salman fears. But Lebanese politics are defined by a certain inertia, with perhaps six sectarian leaders, nearly all dating from the civil war, often counting on their most devoted constituents to conflate their own survival with their leaders' ambitions. An editorial cartoon in the London Arabic daily Asharq al-Awsat on Monday showed two men fighting on a paved road sweeping them toward a waterfall.

"It's not in my hands. Really, I don't know what's happening in this country," said Sami Khreis, 22, who owns a store in Beirut's Shiite Muslim southern suburbs. "Everyone has their grievance, everyone has their gang. What do I tell you?"

The sounds of reconstruction echoed off the street; it was the only work in town, he said. Hezbollah had given him two crisp $100 bills to repair his window shattered by an Israeli bombing. But he was still grim.

"Nobody knows what's going to happen. But everyone knows it will be something new. Maybe peace, but I don't think so. I think we're at the doorstep of something else." He arched his thick eyebrows. "I think so, but God willing, no."

Across town in Aisha Bakkar, a traditional Sunni neighborhood, a cheerful and charming Mohammed Saidoun held court in his Future Cafe, adorned with pictures of Hariri, his son Saad and black-and-white shots of the Beirut of 65-year-old Saidoun's childhood. He spoke low, in almost conspiratorial tones, a holdover from his days as a Tammany Hall-style enforcer for Sunni leaders in the neighborhood.

"The politicians talk, and the people get more tired," he said. "The war started 31 years ago, and it's still going on."

Saidoun retains strong ties to Saad Hariri, the most influential Sunni leader, and patron after patron entered the cafe to ask for favors. At one point, a group of young boys passed through, asking for copies of the posters that read: "We will not forget." "Give them three or four," he ordered an assistant. He lamented how so many young men were stopping by, asking whether he could help them purchase weapons.

"There's not a youth in Beirut who doesn't want a gun," he said, shaking his head. "They're scared."

He worried about protests, sure that no one would emerge victorious from a confrontation. But if Hariri's son -- "Sheik Saad" to Saidoun -- ordered his followers into the streets, the choice for him was an easy one.

"Bottom line, if Sheik Saad tells me to demonstrate, I will, along with my family, friends and everybody I know."

"Sheik Saad," he said, "is my soul."

DOJ_NMG_0096791

Palestinian Unity Government Talks Stall (AP)

By Mohammed Daraghmeh, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 21, 2006

The rival Hamas and Fatah parties froze talks Monday on forming a Palestinian unity government, Fatah officials said, a new setback in efforts to form a more moderate coalition acceptable to the West.

The deep differences raised questions about the ability of the sides to reach a deal that could end months of painful economic sanctions that have bankrupted the Palestinian government and caused widespread hardship in the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

The sudden announcement of a breakdown came after months of negotiations that appeared to be heading toward formation of a Cabinet of independent experts to replace the Hamas-led body. Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas of Fatah met late Sunday with Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of the ruling Islamic group Hamas in Gaza, and officials said the session was cordial.

But Abbas aide Nabil Amr said Monday that the talks had reached a standstill.

"We would say talks are suspended now," he told a news conference. "What we have agreed upon is only the first mile over the 1,000-mile road."

It wasn't clear whether the suspension was the sign of a real crisis or simply a negotiating tactic by Abbas' weakened Fatah Party.

Hamas officials denied any serious trouble. "Talks are continuing on the highest levels," Haniyeh said.

However, no new talks were scheduled.

The two sides earlier agreed on a U.S.-educated academic as the candidate for prime minister to replace Haniyeh, and crafted a foundation for a joint government that would leave negotiating with Israel up to Abbas, while Hamas would deal with day-to-day issues.

Hamas won parliamentary elections and took office in March. The U.S. and Europe then cut off aid to the Palestinian government, labeling Hamas a terror group for its history of suicide bombings and other attacks against Israelis.

The West insists that before it would restore aid, the Palestinian government had to recognize Israel, renounce violence and accept past peace accords. Hamas refused — its ideology does not accept the existence of a Jewish state in an Islamic Middle East.

Even if the sides reach agreement, it remains unclear whether the "division of labor" formula, with the moderate Abbas handling diplomacy while Hamas sticks to its hard line, would be acceptable to the West.

Hamas political leader Khaled Mashaal held talks overnight in Damascus, Syria, with Abbas envoy Ahmed Qureia, but the meeting focused on proposals for bringing Hamas into the PLO, a separate issue that has long been under discussion without progress.

Relations with Israel have deteriorated since Hamas took office, especially after Hamas-linked militants captured an Israeli soldier in a cross-border raid in June.

In London, Israel's Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni said Monday that Syria was the reason talks between the Palestinian factions have been troubled. Whenever Hamas has shown signs of cooperation with Abbas, Syria has sent messages saying "don't do it," she said.

"It is not even about a Syrian interest," Livni told an audience at the International Institute for Strategic Studies. "They want to dictate the Palestinian conflict.

She also said Syria was interfering with efforts to release the captured soldier. She said any time the two sides got close to a deal, "the order came from Syria saying not to release him."

Israel has been carrying out a military offensive in the Gaza Strip since the capture, while Palestinian militants continue to fire homemade rockets into southern Israel, launching at least nine rockets Monday. No injuries were reported. Last week, an Israeli woman was killed in a rocket attack.

After nightfall Monday, two Hamas militants were killed in an Israeli airstrike on a car in Gaza City, Hamas officials said. The Israeli military said it targeted a car carrying "terrorist activists." Hamas threatened revenge.

DOJ_NMG_0096792

Following the airstrike, Palestinians streamed to a house in Gaza City after they said the owner, a Hamas activist, received a warning from Israel that the house was to be targeted in an attack. Such demonstrations foiled three previous Israeli attacks on houses in recent days.

Last week, Israeli forces wrapped up a deadly, destructive sweep through the northern Gaza town of Beit Hanoun in an unsuccessful attempt to stop the rocket barrages. The next day, errant Israeli shells killed 19 members of a Gaza family.

U.N. High Commissioner for Human Rights Louise Arbour began a trip to the region by visiting Beit Hanoun. "I'm basically here to express my concern and bring some comfort, I hope, by showing these victims that the world has not abandoned them," she said. The commission has voted to condemn Israel for the shelling.

She also called on Palestinians to stop firing rockets into Israel and said the perpetrators of rocket attacks should be held accountable.

Israeli Map Says West Bank Posts Sit On Arab Land (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, November 21, 2006

JERUSALEM, Nov. 20 — An Israeli advocacy group, using maps and figures leaked from inside the government, says that 39 percent of the land held by Israeli settlements in the occupied West Bank is privately owned by Palestinians.

Israel has long asserted that it fully respects Palestinian private property in the West Bank and only takes land there legally or, for security reasons, temporarily.

If big sections of those settlements are indeed privately held Palestinian land, that is bound to create embarrassment for Israel and further complicate the already distant prospect of a negotiated peace. The data indicate that 40 percent of the land that Israel plans to keep in any future deal with the Palestinians is private.

The new claims regarding Palestinian property are said to come from the 2004 database of the Civil Administration, which controls the civilian aspects of Israel's presence in the West Bank. Peace Now, an Israeli group that advocates Palestinian self-determination in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, plans to publish the information on Tuesday. An advance copy was made available to The New York Times.

The data — maps that show the government's registry of the land by category — was given to Peace Now by someone who obtained it from an official inside the Civil Administration. The Times spoke to the person who received it from the Civil Administration official and agreed not to identify him because of the delicate nature of the material.

That person, who has frequent contact with the Civil Administration, said he and the official wanted to expose what they consider to be wide-scale violations of private Palestinian property rights by the government and settlers. The government has refused to give the material directly to Peace Now, which requested it under Israel's freedom of information law.

Shlomo Dror, a spokesman for the Civil Administration, said he could not comment on the data without studying it.

He said there was a committee, called the blue line committee, that had been investigating these issues of land ownership for three years. "We haven't finished checking everything," he said.

Mr. Dror also said that sometimes Palestinians would sell land to Israelis but be unwilling to admit to the sale publicly because they feared retribution as collaborators.

Within prominent settlements that Israel has said it plans to keep in any final border agreement, the data show, for example, that some 86.4 percent of Maale Adumim, a large Jerusalem suburb, is private; and 35.1 percent of Ariel is.

The maps indicate that beyond the private land, 5.8 percent is so-called survey land, meaning of unclear ownership, and 1.3 percent private Jewish land. The rest, about 54 percent, is considered "state land" or has no designation, though Palestinians say that at least some of it represents agricultural land expropriated by the state.

The figures, together with detailed maps of the land distribution in every Israeli settlement in the West Bank, were put together by the Settlement Watch Project of Peace Now, led by Dror Etkes and Hagit Ofran, and has a record of careful and accurate reporting on settlement growth.

The report does not include Jerusalem, which Israel has annexed and does not consider part of the West Bank, although much of the world regards East Jerusalem as occupied. Much of the world also considers Israeli settlements on occupied land to be illegal under international law. International law requires an occupying power to protect private property, and Israel has always asserted that it does not take land without legal justification.

DOJ_NMG_0096793

One case in a settlement Israel intends to keep is in Givat Zeev, barely five miles north of Jerusalem. At the southern edge is the Ayelet Hashachar synagogue. Rabah Abdellatif, a Palestinian who lives in the nearby village of Al Jib, says the land belongs to him.

Papers he has filed with the Israeli military court, which runs the West Bank, seem to favor Mr. Abdellatif. In 1999, Israeli officials confirmed, he was even granted a judgment ordering the demolition of the synagogue because it had been built without permits. But for the last seven years, the Israeli system has done little to enforce its legal judgments. The synagogue stands, and Mr. Abdellatif has no access to his land.

Ram Kovarsky, the town council secretary, said the synagogue was outside the boundaries of Givat Zeev, although there is no obvious separation. Israeli officials confirm that the land is privately owned, though they refuse to say by whom.

Mr. Abdellatif, 65, said: "I feel stuck, angry. Why would they do that? I don't know who to go to anymore."

He pointed to his corduroy trousers and said, in the English he learned in Paterson, N.J., where his son is a police detective: "These are my pants. And those are your pants. And you should not take my pants. This is mine, and that is yours! I never took anyone's land."

According to the Peace Now figures, 44.3 percent of Givat Zeev is on private Palestinian land.

Miri Eisin, a spokesperson for Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, said that Israeli officials would have to see the data and the maps and added that ownership is complicated and delicate. Baruch Spiegel, a reserve general who just left the Ministry of Defense and dealt with the separation barrier being built near the boundary with the West Bank, also said he would have to see the data in detail in order to judge it.

The definitions of private and state land are complicated, given different administrations of the West Bank going back to the Ottoman Empire, the British mandate, Jordan and now Israel. During the Ottoman Empire, only small areas of the West Bank were registered to specific owners, and often villagers would hold land in common to avoid taxes. The British began a more formal land registry based on land use, taxation or house ownership that continued through the Jordanian period.

Large areas of agricultural land are registered as state land; other areas were requisitioned or seized by the Israeli military after 1967 for security purposes, but such requisitions are meant to be temporary and must be renewed, and do not change the legal ownership of the land, Mr. Dror, the Civil Administration spokesman, said.

But the issue of property is one that Israeli officials are familiar with, even if the percentages here may come as a surprise and may be challenged after the publication of the report.

Asked about Israeli seizure of private Palestinian land in an interview with The Times last summer, before these figures were available, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said: "Now I don't deny anything, I don't ignore anything. I'm just ready to sit down and talk. And resolve it. And resolve it in a generous manner for all sides."

He said the 1967 war was a one of self-defense. Later, he said: "Many things happened. Life is not frozen. Things occur. So many things happened, and as a result of this many innocent individuals on both sides suffered, were killed, lost their lives, became crippled for life, lost their family members, their loved ones, thousands of them. And also private property suffered. By the way, on all sides."

Mr. Olmert says Israel will keep some 10 percent of the occupied West Bank, including East Jerusalem, possibly in a swap for land elsewhere. The area Israel intends to keep is roughly marked by the route of the unfinished separation barrier, which cuts through the West Bank and is intended, Israel says, to stop suicide bombers. Mr. Olmert, however, describes it as a putative border. Nearly 80,000 Jews live in settlements beyond the route of the barrier, but some 180,000 live in settlements within the barrier, while another 200,000 live in East Jerusalem.

But these land-ownership figures show that even in the settlements that Israel intends to keep, there will be a considerable problem of restitution that goes beyond the issue of refugee return.

Mr. Olmert was elected on a pledge to withdraw Israeli settlers living east of the barrier. But after the war with Hezbollah and with fighting ongoing in Gaza, from which Israel withdrew its settlers in the summer of 2005, his withdrawal plan has been suspended.

DOJ_NMG_0096794

In March 2005, a report requested by the government found a number of illegal Israeli outposts built on private Palestinian land, and officials promised to destroy them. But only nine houses of only one outpost, Amona, were dismantled after a court case brought by Peace Now.

There is a court case pending over Migron, which began as a group of trailers on a windy hilltop around a set of cellphone antennas in May 1999 and is now a flourishing community of 50 families, said Avi Teksler, an official of the Migron council. But Migron, too, according to the data, is built on private Palestinian land.

Mr. Teksler said that the land was deserted, and that its ownership would be settled in court. Migron, where some children of noted settlement leaders live, has had "the support of every Israeli government," he said. "The government has been a partner to every single move we've made."

Mr. Teksler added: "This is how the state of Israel was created. And this is all the land of Israel. We're like the kibbutzim. The only real difference is that we're after 1967, not before."

But in the Palestinian village of Burqa, Youssef Moussa Abdel Raziq Nabboud, 85, says that some of the land of Migron, and the land on which Israel built a road for settlers, belongs to him and his family, who once grew wheat and beans there. He said he had tax documents from the pre-1967 authorities.

"They have the power to put the settlement there and we can do nothing," he said. "They have a fence around the settlement and dogs there."

Mr. Nabboud went to the Israeli authorities with the mayor, Abu Maher, but they were told he needed an Israeli lawyer and surveyor. "I have no money for that," he said. What began as an outpost taking 5 acres has now taken 125, the mayor said.

Mr. Nabboud wears a traditional head covering; his grandson, Khaled, 27, wears a Yankees cap. "The land is my inheritance," he said. "I feel sad I can't go there. And angry. The army protects them."

Bomb Kills 8, Injures 60 On India Train (AP)

By Manik Banerjee, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 21, 2006

A bomb exploded and tore through two cars of a passenger train Monday in a remote area of eastern India, killing at least eight people and wounding about 60 others, officials and Indian media said.

Suspicion for the blast in West Bengal state quickly fell on two groups: communist rebels active in wide swaths of rural India or militants fighting for an independent homeland in the neighboring state of Assam.

A spokesman for Northeastern Railways, T. Rabha, told The Associated Press that the bomb had been planted in one of train's cars and exploded about 6:20 p.m. near the Belacoba station, about 345 miles north of Calcutta.

The blast was so powerful it blew away the side and roof of one of the cars, the Press Trust of India reported.

At least six passengers died at the scene and 53 others were wounded, Rabha said, adding that the death toll could rise because some of those injured were in serious condition. PTI, citing railway police official Tushar Bhattacharya, later reported that the death toll had climbed to eight with about 60 wounded.

Witnesses said there was a flash followed by a deafening explosion. There were two small explosions immediately afterward, PTI reported.

"Some of the passengers jumped out of the coach in panic, while many received burns," PTI quoted witnesses as saying.

Prasad Ranjan Roy, Home Secretary of West Bengal state, said initial suspicion pointed to either Maoist rebels or Assamese militants. He suggested the blast could be the work of the relatively small Kamtapur Liberation Organization, an Assamese group tied to the larger United Liberation Front of Asom.

But, he cautioned: "We are trying to get details."

Although the Maoists are active in the area, they rarely attack civilians.

The Assamese separatists, in contrast, do target civilians and have intensified their attacks since the federal government ended a temporary six-week cease-fire on Sept. 24 amid deadlocked peace talks.

DOJ_NMG_0096795

The insurgents have been fighting since 1979 for Assam's independence, saying India's central government — 1,000 miles to the west — exploits the northeast's rich natural resources while doing little to improve its poor infrastructure or to alleviate widespread unemployment.

They have been known to plant bombs in cities and towns, attack police and military posts, and blow up oil pipelines. At least 10,000 people, most of them civilians, have died in Assam since the insurgency began.

Apart from the rebellions in Assam, dozens of other insurgencies have festered for years across India's six other northeastern states. Nearly all are fighting for autonomy or independent homelands for the region's indigenous peoples, most of them ethnically closer to Burma and China than to the rest of India.

Mumbai's train network was targeted July 11 when seven bombs exploded on crowded commuter trains, killing more than 200 people. Thirteen men have been arrested in the bombings. Police suspect the bombs were planted in overhead luggage racks inside the coaches.

Associated Press Writer Wasbir Hussain in Gauhati contributed to this report.

U.S. Sets Jan. 1 Deadline For Sudan To Act On Darfur (WP)

By Glenn Kessler And Nora Boustany

The Washington Post, November 21, 2006

Andrew Natsios, the U.S. special envoy to Sudan, said yesterday that the Bush administration will resort to an unspecified "Plan B" if the Sudanese government does not agree by Jan. 1 to complete negotiations on an expanded international peacekeeping force for its troubled Darfur region.

Khartoum has adamantly rejected a U.N. Security Council resolution calling for a U.N.-led force, so the Bush administration and the United Nations have backtracked and instead sought to win the government's agreement for a hybrid force of African Union and U.N. troops. U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan announced last week that Sudan had agreed in principle to such a joint force but that numerous issues must be resolved before Khartoum gives final approval.

The Sudanese government claimed yesterday that the tentative agreement was a "diplomatic victory," but the official news agency, SUNA, minimized the role of the United Nations, saying only that the world body would provide "assistance." The agency said the government objects to the overall size of the force and has questions about the appointment of the force commander.

The AU currently has 7,000 ill-equipped troops in Darfur, an area the size of France, and the U.N. resolution passed in August calls for as many as 22,500 military and police personnel. The agreement announced by Annan would allow for as many as 17,000 troops and 3,000 police.

Natsios, speaking to reporters, declined several times to explain what he meant by "Plan B," saying he was not trying to make a threat. "On January 1st, either we see a change or we go to Plan B," Natsios said, explaining that on that day the AU's mandate will expire and Annan will step down as secretary general. He also noted that Congress will shift from Republican to Democratic control in January.

The United States has repeatedly dangled incentives to Sudan if it helps end the violence in Darfur. "Plan B is a different approach to this," Natsios said, adding that it is "open-ended."

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice warned in September that Khartoum faces "a choice between cooperation and confrontation." U.S. officials have said that, besides new sanctions, the United States could take action against top Sudanese officials who have been implicated in what the United States has labeled acts of genocide in Darfur or could establish a "no-fly zone" to thwart Sudanese military attacks against the civilian population.

The Darfur conflict broke out in early 2003, when African rebel groups attacked police stations and military outposts. The United Nations and human rights groups accuse the central government of supporting a militia known as the Janjaweed in an effort to crush the rebellion. About 2,000 villages have been destroyed across Darfur, as many as 450,000 people have died, and more than 2 million people have been left homeless since the crisis began.

Natsios rejected Khartoum's claims that a U.N.-led international force would mean a return to colonialism. "We have a humanitarian and human rights agenda in Darfur, and that's it," he said. "We want this resolved because the human cost of this has been so horrific."

DOJ_NMG_0096796

Earlier, at a meeting at the Brookings Institution, Natsios was confronted by an official from the Sudanese Embassy who said that Sudan has "every single right to be suspicious about these things because of broken promises of the U.S. government and the international community over there."

Natsios responded: "We have suspicions, too. We suspect there are people in the regime who believe a military solution is necessary." He noted that three times in the past three weeks, unarmed civilians have been brutally attacked, and he cited one incident that left 200 dead, mostly women and children.

"If a pattern develops, then a more confrontational approach will take place," Natsios said. "The United States will not accept any of this other process if it is simply a disguised attempt to avoid dealing with the reality of what is happening to people on the ground."

Many analysts believe that Khartoum has become emboldened to resist international pressure because of its increasing oil wealth. China, which holds veto power on the U.N. Security Council, is a major investor in Sudan's petroleum industry.

But during the Brookings meeting, both Natsios and Jean-Marie Guahenno, U.N. undersecretary general for peacekeeping, said the Chinese representatives at the talks last week, held in the Ethiopian capital, Addis Ababa, had signaled that their country was taking a more constructive approach.

Guahenno cautioned that the stability from the Horn of Africa to the Sahel band to the west to Niger is at risk if the Darfur crisis begins to spill across borders.

"There is a lot at stake," he said. "There is the local-national dimension of nomads versus agriculturalists, of Arabs versus Africans. When all these tensions become part of the narrative, it will be very dangerous."

U.S. Threatens 'Plan B' If Sudan Ignores Deadline (AFP)

AFP, November 21, 2006

The US envoy to Sudan warned Khartoum to meet a January 1 deadline for full acceptance of a UN plan to deploy international peacekeepers to Darfur or face tougher action to end atrocities in the war-torn region.

"There's a point, January 1st, either we see a change or go to Plan B," Andrew Natsios, President George W. Bush's special envoy to Sudan, told reporters.

Natsios, who helped negotiate a tentative agreement last week for sending a joint African Union-United Nations force to Darfur, said the Khartoum government had yet to give its approval for the timing, size and command structure of the peacekeeping operation.

He refused to elaborate on what Plan B would entail if no response was forthcoming by January 1 beyond saying it's "a different approach" to the negotiated deployment of peacekeepers.

"I think making threats is not a wise thing to do," he said when pressed to provide details. "I'm not going to go into that."

Human rights groups and former US officials have called for unilateral military action, possibly by NATO forces, if Sudan continues to refuse the deployment of a robust peacekeeping force to Darfur, where more than 200,000 people have died in three-and-a-half years of ethnic civil war.

Other options for action include sanctions targeting companies owned by ruling party officials, financial action against foreign firms operating in Sudan and efforts to prosecute government leaders for crimes against humanity.

Natsios said the January 1 deadline was non-negotiable since that is when the mandate expires for an African Union force which has been unsuccessfully trying to end the fighting in Darfur.

"There is no other force after that from anywhere," he said.

UN Secretary General Kofi Annan, the architect of the latest peacekeeping deal, also steps down on January 1 and is committed to enacting the arrangement before leaving office, he said.

"If we want to get this resolved, then January 1st needs to be the deadline," he said.

The UN Security Council passed a resolution in August demanding the deployment of some 20,000 UN troops to take over from the under-funded and ill-equipped African Union force in Darfur.

But President Omar al-Beshir, whose government is accused of backing Arab militia responsible for most of the atrocities in Darfur, refused to accept the UN deployment.

DOJ_NMG_0096797

Amid a new wave of massacres in the region, Annan brokered an agreement in principle with Sudan last week to deploy a hybrid force that would primarily involve African soldiers but with UN logistical support and a joint command.

But Sudanese officials have since sent mixed messages about whether they fully accepted the deal.

Natsios said Washington had sent a clear signal to Sudan's leaders that further attacks on civilians in the region would not be tolerated.

"There is an issue we're not negotiating, and that is the atrocity issue -- human rights abuses are not negotiable," he said.

Even if Khartoum agrees to the revised UN package, it will take months to deploy thousands of peacekeepers to the remote region, he said.

The war in Darfur erupted in February 2003 when rebels from minority tribes took up arms to demand an equal share of national resources, prompting a heavy-handed crackdown from government forces and a proxy militia called the Janjaweed.

According to the UN, more than 200,000 people have died and 2.5 million more have been displaced in three years of fighting.

Sudan Hails New Peacekeeping Agreement (AP)

By Alfred De Montesquiou, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 21, 2006

President Omar al-Bashir's government on Monday hailed a new agreement with the United Nations over peacekeepers in Darfur as a diplomatic breakthrough for Sudan, but said serious differences remain over the force's makeup and command.

It was the first official word by Khartoum of its acceptance of the deal, announced Thursday in Addis Ababa. But there were signs the government might still resist hopes for a robust U.N. deployment to bring an end to the continuing bloodshed.

U.N. chief Kofi Annan said the deal calls for a mixed U.N.-African Union force of up to 20,000 troops. If so, that would mean a dramatic reversal of Khartoum's staunch resistance to deploying any U.N. troops in Darfur

But the Sudanese cabinet statement on Monday spoke only of U.N. "assistance" to the African force and depicted the agreement as a defeat for a Security Council resolution that called for a peacekeeping force fully under U.N. control.

The cabinet, which gathered Sunday, "backed the outcome of the (Sudanese) government meetings ... concerning the provision of a package of assistance from the U.N. to the African Union," the official SUNA news agency said.

SUNA said al-Bashir and his government "showed happiness over what it sees as a diplomatic victory" over advocates of the Security Council resolution on Darfur.

The agency said the president and his ministers still differ with the U.N. on whether the force commander should be from the African Union, or simply from the African continent. The cabinet also has objections to the overall size of the force, SUNA said.

But the government decided these issues are "a technical matter that could be resolved, and not a political one," the news agency said.

The comments could signal that Sudan will try to reduce the U.N. role in the peacekeeping force. But they could also be part of an effort by the government to save face, after abandoning its earlier position that U.N. troops were unacceptable.

Al-Bashir is scheduled to visit Libya Tuesday for a meeting on Darfur hosted by Libyan leader Moammar Gadhafi. Delegations are expected from Sudan, Chad and Egypt.

Gadhafi on Sunday denounced any deployment of U.N. troops in Sudan as "colonialism," and said the Sudanese army could do a better job than peacekeepers at stopping the violence in Darfur.

"The presence of international forces in Darfur would be a new return to colonialism," he said. "... Since when were the colonialist powers concerned about us? In the past, they treated us like animals and took us as slaves in their ships."

The African Union force of 7,000 currently in the Darfur region has not been able to stop the bloodshed. More than 200,000 people have been killed and 2.5 million driven from their homes in years of fighting.

When the deal was announced last week, the U.N. and AU said that all parties, including Sudan, had agreed in principle on a mixed force.

DOJ_NMG_0096798

Under the agreement, the joint U.N.-AU statement said, troops for the force would be drawn from African countries to the extent that was possible. But, the statement added, "backstopping and command and control structures will be provided by the UN."

Sudanese Foreign Minister Lam Akol later insisted Khartoum had never agreed to a "mixed force" but instead to one in which AU soldiers and command would merely receive support from the U.N.

Samani al-Wasila, a Sudanese state minister for foreign affairs, repeated Monday in Cairo that the agreement "does not give the right to the international troops to intervene in the region."

Sudanese hard-liners have fiercely opposed any U.N. presence in Darfur, and at one point al-Bashir said he would personally lead armed resistance to U.N. peacekeepers.

This stance appeared to soften in recent days.

In the official army newspaper Al-Quwat Al-Musalaha, Ibrahim Ahmed Omar, the spokesman for al-Bashir's National Congress Party, suggested indirectly that the party had accepted that the U.N. will at least partly direct the peacekeeping force in Darfur.

"We will not accept that the U.N. have the full command of the African Union force in Darfur," he was quoted as saying.

But some U.N. officials worry Khartoum was only buying time to let its army and militia conduct mount more attacks in the region.

Another official, U.N. humanitarian chief Jan Egeland said Sunday that army support for the janjaweed milita has only increased and that the forces are still killing civilians daily. The Sudanese government denied the claim.

Associated Press Writer Mohamed Osman in Khartoum and Salah Nasrawi in Cairo contributed to this report.

Boy's Wish: Kill Them All (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof

The New York Times, November 21, 2006

GOZ BEIDA, Chad

"If I had a gun," Ismail Hassan said venomously from his hospital bed, "I would shoot Arabs."

"Surely not women and children?" I remonstrated.

"Every one of them," Ismail snarled.

Ismail is a 15-year-old boy, and that conversation underscores how Chad is falling off a cliff, with escalating hatreds, violence and insecurity. He is a member of one of the black African tribes now being hunted down by the Sudanese-sponsored janjaweed Arab militia, at first in Darfur alone and now in Chad as well.

After the janjaweed attacked his village and shot his father, Ismail raced forward to cover his father's body with his own. That courage didn't move the janjaweed, who simply shot Ismail as well.

The genocide that started in Darfur in 2003 is now threatening to topple the governments of Chad and the Central African Republic. If these two countries collapse into chaos and civil war for years to come, then neighboring countries like Cameroon and Niger will be threatened as well — and the death toll triggered by the Darfur genocide will eventually number in the millions.

None of this was — or is — inevitable. In late 2003 and early 2004, some Republican appointees in the Bush administration (particularly in the Agency for International Development) were among the first to push for a government response to the slaughter in Darfur, but the White House wasn't interested.

Then in 2004, Colin Powell boldly used the "genocide" label to describe Darfur, over initial Pentagon and White House objections, and several of his aides drafted a set of policy options to confront the genocide. Those included pushing the French to use fighter aircraft from their base in Chad to intimidate the janjaweed, pushing Egypt to be more involved, recruiting peacekeeping troops from Pakistan and Bangladesh, and generally using American diplomatic muscle to push harder for a solution.

None of those things happened, partly because of reluctance from the White House and Pentagon, and partly because of resistance from France and other countries. So the genocide in Darfur has steadily expanded.

DOJ_NMG_0096799

Arabs here in Chad repeatedly complain now that the black Africans steal their cattle, poison their wells, occupy their land, and shoot at them. I don't see much basis to those charges, for the Arabs have assault rifles and rocket-propelled grenades (supplied by the Sudanese), while the black Africans have bows and arrows, but this narrative is widely held among Arabs.

"We consider them our enemies and they consider us their enemies," said Brahim Wadia, the patriarch of a group of Arabs who were grazing their cattle on what had been a black African farm. "So each side will shoot the other and kill the other."

Mr. Brahim and most members of his entourage were light-skinned, and they were civil to me (considering it white solidarity?). But that same morning nearby, several black Africans who tried to recover food from their burned and abandoned village were shot dead.

One person in Mr. Brahim's party was a boy of about 13 with black skin who looked unlike the others. He appeared physically unable to speak, and it wasn't clear if he had been hired as a herdsman or captured in a raid and enslaved.

The most common question I get from readers about Darfur is: What can I do? The simplest answer is to write or call the White House and members of Congress. (See how your representative does on the issue at www.darfurscores.org). Imagine if Mr. Bush had made Darfur an important issue at the Asian summit meeting last week, if he had returned via Cairo for a meeting with Arab leaders, if he had dispatched Condi Rice to Chad to shore it up.

Beyond pushing our own government, we can write the embassies of countries like France and Egypt that could play especially crucial roles. The same is true of China, which provides Sudan the guns used to shoot children like Ismail. We in the news business, including Arab and European television networks, could use a few pokes to appreciate that genocide is newsworthy.

The heroic efforts of aid groups in Darfur and Chad — 13 aid workers have been killed in Darfur since May — deserve support as well. (I list some groups active in Darfur in my blog, nytimes.com/ontheground.) The aid workers risk their lives daily to try to save people, putting up with janjaweed, scorpions, camel spiders and pit toilets inhabited by bats. They can use our backup.

Loose-cannon Kadafi (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, November 21, 2006

LIBYAN DICTATOR Moammar Kadafi might have given up his quest for weapons of mass destruction, but the fallout from his mouth can still threaten millions.

Kadafi on Sunday dropped a bomb on the extraordinarily sensitive negotiations to resolve the humanitarian crisis in Sudan's Darfur region, urging his fellow tyrants in Khartoum to reject a deal to send United Nations troops to the troubled area. "Western countries and America are not busying themselves out of sympathy for the Sudanese people or for Africa but for oil and the return of colonialism to the African continent," he bellowed.

Not only is this absurd — the U.N. already has 10,000 peacekeepers in southern Sudan sent in 2005 to stabilize a separate conflict there, and to date they haven't seized any Sudanese oilfields or founded any colonies — it's reckless. The Sudanese government's fears of ulterior motives by the international community have for years prompted it to block efforts to send U.N. troops to Darfur, where government-armed militias have slaughtered hundreds of thousands and displaced millions more. Though the cabal in Khartoum is probably more worried about international prosecution for war crimes than about colonialism, such views have provided it with political cover and support throughout the Arab world. And Kadafi enjoys considerable clout in Africa because of his oil wealth and status as a conflict mediator.

A deal to finally end the atrocities in Darfur is teetering on a knife's edge. Last week, Khartoum and international negotiators seemed to have accepted a compromise agreement under which a hybrid U.N. and African Union force of about 20,000 would replace the 7,000 African Union troops now in Darfur. Yet since then, the Sudanese government has sent mixed signals about whether it would really acquiesce.

There is reason to fear that Sudan is only stalling for time. In recent weeks it has restricted aid organizations and journalists from traveling in Darfur while launching a new military offensive that has killed hundreds of civilians there. Meanwhile, the mandate for the existing African Union force expires Dec. 31; if no deal to augment and replace it has been reached by then, the killings will doubtless intensify.

DOJ_NMG_0096800

Before an international force can be mobilized, there are still delicate political decisions to be made, such as whether it would be empowered to protect villagers or simply monitor the carnage. To resolve them will require an unusual degree of unity among players as diverse as the Arab League and the U.N. Security Council. That's tough enough to achieve without a loose cannon like Kadafi flapping his gums.

Why Only Darfur? (WP)

By Anne Applebaum

The Washington Post, November 21, 2006

There was a photograph: a weeping Sudanese woman, standing before a freshly dug grave. There were statistics: 400,000 people dead, 2.5 million driven from their homes, "untold thousands" raped. There was an appeal: "Innocent civilians are being slaughtered in Darfur. You can end it," and a Web address, http://www.dayfordarfur.org.

This advertisement -- which appeared on a full page of the International Herald Tribune last week, and previously in Le Monde, the Guardian, and many other newspapers in Europe and the United States -- was truly arresting. But what really made me look twice was the slogan across the top: "When all the bodies have been buried in Darfur, how will history judge us?"

"How will history judge us?" Like much of the grass-roots campaign that has sprung up to oppose the genocide in Darfur, this slogan is intended to evoke the genocides of the recent past. Earlier this fall 120 survivors of the horrors of the Holocaust, Cambodia, Rwanda and Bosnia signed an open letter calling for a U.N. peacekeeping force in Sudan. The stunning variety of organizations that have joined the Darfur campaign -- they range from Amnesty International to the World Evangelical Alliance to the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum -- also speaks to the evocative nature of the Sudanese conflict.

And their call upon the witness of history has made an impact. Indeed, it is fair to say that were it not for the Christian, Jewish, human rights, genocide-prevention groups and others that have been talking about Sudan with such dedication, the massacres of Darfur might not be on the international agenda at all. The ads and the rallies got "people in the street talking about something that happens far away," as an activist at Global Day for Darfur told me. Public interest has forced politicians to act.

The result: The United Nations is trying to form a multilateral peacekeeping brigade in Darfur, and the White House and Tony Blair are involved, too. And yet -- it is not simple to explain why this particular grass-roots action has been so successful. After all, Darfur is not the only place in the world where there has been mass murder, even ethnic mass murder, on a large, historically familiar scale. The North Korean regime has for years run concentration camps, directly modeled on the camps of Joseph Stalin's Soviet Union. But though there is excellent documentation of Pyongyang's camps -- the U.S. Committee for Human Rights in North Korea even has satellite photographs on its Web site -- and though some religious and university groups have made an effort, the level of interest, and therefore perhaps of U.N. involvement, is much lower.

The same is true of arbitrary arrests in Iran, some of which have also targeted particular ethnic groups for intimidation or elimination. For that matter, Saddam Hussein's use of chemical weapons to murder tens of thousands of Kurds never caught the popular imagination, not before the war and not afterward.

I can offer no scientific explanation as to why the tragedy of Darfur conjures up the specter of history's judgment and why other tragedies do not. But the answer must lie in the fact that this conflict has so few strategic or geopolitical implications. Because it seems to be in no one's "interest" to do so, a call for U.N. intervention in Darfur surely feels -- at least to Americans and Europeans who haven't followed China's involvement in Sudan's oil industry -- like an act of real charity, and not more evidence of the West pursuing its interests.

Equally important is the fact that Sudan plays no real role in Western domestic politics. Any discussion of North Korea will still evoke the Cold War, any conversation about Iran must touch on radical Islam. By contrast, when most of us look at Sudan, all we see is what Jan Egeland, the U.N. humanitarian coordinator, last weekend called "acts of inexplicable terror."

Taking a stand against genocide in Sudan does not require anyone to take a parallel stand on communism, the war on terrorism or the war in Iraq. It does not imply that you are left-wing, right-wing, pro- or anti-Bush. Once the United Nations is there, this may change: The U.S. intervention in Somalia immediately politicized what had also appeared to be an apolitical conflict. But at the moment, it is still possible to think of Darfur as an appropriate target for neutral humanitarianism.

DOJ_NMG_0096801

None of this, I should emphasize, is meant to disparage the work of the extraordinary Darfur coalition, which has pushed an obscure and terrible war into the international spotlight. Nor do I mean to deny that "history will judge us," for surely it will. But when future generations look back on this era, they will judge us not only for how we responded to the most primitive and the most apolitical of horrors. They will also judge us by the consistency with which Western and international institutions battled sophisticated totalitarianism in all its forms: That is, they will judge us by the United Nations' application of its own declarations on human rights, by America's ability to live up to the rhetoric of its leaders, by Europe's willingness to stand behind its stated values.

The creation of an international coalition to end genocide is a stunning achievement, but its goals are still not deep or broad enough.

Muslim Birthrate Worries Russia (WT)

By Michael Mainville

The Washington Times, November 21, 2006

MOSCOW -- Low domestic birthrates and rising immigration from the former Soviet republics are producing explosive growth in Russia's Muslim community, which is on a track to account for more than half the population by midcentury.

"Russia is going through a religious transformation that will be of even greater consequence for the international community than the collapse of the Soviet Union," said Paul Goble, a specialist on Islam in Russia and research associate at the University of Tartu in Estonia.

Two decades ago, the Sobornaya Mosque was the only Islamic house of worship allowed in the Soviet Union. It stood largely empty, filling only with the occasional large foreign delegation from an Islamic country.

Today, it is one of four mosques in Moscow serving a Muslim population of about 2.5 million. On Fridays and holy days, it overflows with worshippers, leaving many to kneel on newspapers outside, their foreheads pressed against the concrete.

As in many countries with growing Islamic populations, tensions are also on the rise. Many ethnic Russians fear their country is losing its traditional identity, while many Muslims are offended by widespread discrimination and a lack of respect for their faith.

Russia's Muslim community is extremely diverse, including Volga Tatars, the myriad ethnicities of the North Caucasus and newly arrived immigrants from Central Asia. But they all share birthrates that are far higher than Russia's ethnic Slavs, most of whom are Orthodox Christians.

Russia's overall population is dropping at a rate of 700,000 people a year, largely because of the short life spans and low birthrates of ethnic Russians. According to the CIA World Factbook, the national fertility rate is 1.28 children per woman, far below what is needed to maintain the country's population of nearly 143 million. The rate in Moscow is even lower, at 1.1 children per woman.

Russia's Muslims, however, are bucking that trend. The fertility rate for Tatars living in Moscow is six children per woman, Mr. Goble said, while the Chechen and Ingush communities are averaging 10 children per woman. At the same time, hundreds of thousands of Muslims from Tajikistan, Uzbekistan and Kazakhstan have been flocking to Russia in search of work.

Russia's Muslim population has increased by 40 percent since 1989, to about 25 million. By 2015, Muslims will make up a majority of Russia's conscript army and by 2020 one-fifth of the population.

"If nothing changes, in 30 years, people of Muslim descent will definitely outnumber ethnic Russians," Mr. Goble said.

For many Slavic Russians, the prospect of becoming a minority in their country is terrifying.

"Russia is historically a Slavic, Orthodox Christian land, and we need to make sure it stays that way," said Alexander Belov, the head of the Movement Against Illegal Immigration, an increasingly powerful lobby that has organized dozens of rallies in recent months.

Attacks on mosques have been on the rise, and in September an imam in the southern city of Kislovodsk was fatally shot outside his home. During days of rioting in August, mobs chased Chechens and other migrants out of the northwestern town of Kondopoga.

Sensing the nationalist mood, Russian authorities have begun to crack down with laws designed to defend Orthodox Christianity and restrict the activities and movement of Muslims.

DOJ_NMG_0096802

Most Muslims living in Russia are not immigrants, but natives of lands seized by the expanding Russian empire. Islam is recognized as one of Russia's official religions, along with Orthodox Christianity, Judaism and Buddhism.

But few nationalists distinguish between immigrants from ex-Soviet countries and non-Slavic Russian citizens. Mr. Belov, for example, said non-Slavs should be restricted from living in "traditional Russian lands."

"The Muslims of Russia have roots here. We have been part of Russia for centuries," countered Rusham Abbyasov, a spokesman for Russia's Council of Muftis, which represents Islamic spiritual leaders in the country. "It is not right to say that Russia is a Christian country. These people either don't know the history, or they are ignoring it."

Mr. Goble said that after decades of Soviet religious repression, most Muslims in Russia are secular. But with interest in Islam surging, they are open to being influenced by extremist ideas, "especially if they feel excluded from Russian society."

Western governments should encourage Russia to integrate Muslims into society and avoid discrimination, he said. "When Muslims are in the majority in Russia, they'll remember whether we spoke out for their rights or failed to."

A Bid To Bring The Female Voice To Islamic Law (CSM)

By Ben Arnoldy

The Christian Science Monitor, November 21, 2006

NEW YORK

For centuries, devout Muslims have looked to the fatwa - an opinion based on religious reasoning of a learned individual or committee - for direction on how to resolve moral dilemmas ranging from the mundane to the sublime. And for centuries, Muslim women have conceded the ground, for the most part, to the men who issue these opinions.

That's beginning to change.

Meeting in New York over the weekend, Muslim women from 25 countries began laying groundwork for the first international all-female council formed to issue fatwas. Their idea: to ensure that women's perspectives on Islamic law become part of religious deliberation in the Muslim world - particularly on issues such as domestic violence, divorce, and inheritance.

"There's this growing sense on the part of literate Muslim women ... that there is a vital need for women to confront the Islamic tradition and to work on a par with men in interpreting the sources," says Ann Mayer, an expert in Middle Eastern law at the University of Pennsylvania's Wharton School of Business. "Otherwise you end up with a very sexist bias in the readings."

The number of women officially sanctioned to issue fatwas is hard to pin down, but certainly tiny. The emergence of such women, known as muftias, usually makes headlines: A religious school in India installed three in 2003, and the Turkish government last year hired two assistant muftias, its first. Governments and schools try to license who can issue fatwas, but Islam stipulates only certain prerequisites, such as knowledge of the Koran and Arabic. As a result, the ranks of unofficial authorities are deeper and the barriers to women surmountable.

Whether the opinions of a women's council will carry any weight, especially in conservative cultures, is another matter.

Its advent is proving to be controversial even among Muslim women who share many goals of those launching the council.

"Advancing the idea of reinterpreting the texts has to be done, but I am totally against this initiative because it will have negative effects," says Rebab al-Mahdi, a political scientist at the American University in Cairo. It will be portrayed as part of "a Western cultural invasion," she adds. "This is what conservative clerics always say, and people listen."

For others, doubt is mingled with hope.

"I share some cynicism, but at the same moment, symbols are sometimes important," says Pakistani-born Asma Barlas, a politics professor at Ithaca College in New York and a prominent advocate of jettisoning what she calls male-centric and incorrect interpretations of the Koran. "These little steps, ... even if they don't change anything, do send a message that women are getting together and trying to make their voices heard."

The group is also up against the inertia of tradition. Throughout history, few Muslim women were prominent jurists, though scholars are uncovering more, including, some say, Aisha, the prophet Muhammad's wife. Some question whether much within the religion is open to new interpretation and, by extension, reform. Others note that fatwas are nonbinding and may have little effect on civil law and state judgments.

Still, Muslim women have recently brought change by citing the Koran and other Islamic sources:

DOJ_NMG_0096803

• In Malaysia, a group called Sisters in Islam used Koranic scholarship to rebuff efforts to exclude Muslims from a domestic-abuse law.

• In Saudi Arabia, an effort this summer to push women further back at a crowded holy site in Mecca was thwarted with the help of a female Islamic scholar's arguments.

• In the United States, the forthcoming English translation of the Koran by a woman, the first ever, finds an alternate meaning in a verse widely interpreted to give husbands authority to beat their wives as a last resort.

The New York gathering, called the Women's Islamic Initiative in Spirituality and Equity, plans to seat the new council - perhaps seven members - within a year. Drawn from diverse schools within Islam, the members will be versed in Islamic law. The group also plans to give scholarships for more women to pursue advanced training - open to women in places like Morocco, Egypt, and Iran - in an effort to broaden the qualified pool.

"Islam is a religion of law, and it is important to express the principles of social justice within the framework of Islamic law," says Daisy Khan, executive director of the American Society for Muslim Advancement and leader of the effort. "This is why we need muftias, in order to do that. Otherwise, it falls on deaf ears."

Traditionally, religious legal authority was local, vested in muftis and other leaders who attained their status via government appointment or community esteem. But today's global communications are challenging that, as more Muslims seek religious opinions far and wide through the Internet. The women's council takes advantage of this: Its members will be in different places, taking questions and conferring over the Web.

Given this wider marketplace of ideas, the new council's credibility will be determined by the quality of its legal reasoning, and whether its logic strikes a chord, say several scholars and observers.

"There is a sense among many Muslims - particularly, but not exclusively, women - that Islamic jurists are out of touch, that their guidance is not adequate to the modern world. And if this shura council succeeds in bridging that gap, it may be speaking to an audience that doesn't currently consider itself bound by the pronouncements of existing groups," says Kecia Ali, assistant professor of religion at Boston University.

"But this is going to be a tremendously challenging task because religious authority, even scholarly authority, has always been contested," she adds. "It is in matters related to women, marriage, sexuality that Muslim intellectuals on both conservative and modernist sides of the spectrum have chosen to wage their epic battle."

For others, the council has a credibility problem right out of the gate. "It should not have happened in New York, because it will set back the agenda of women given the current political upheaval [over the Iraq war]," says Mohammad Reda, a Syrian-American Muslim in the Boston area often sought out for his religious opinions. He supports the idea that "women should stand up and give their own opinions on women's issues," but says American efforts to force change in the Muslim world, as in Iraq, mean reformers now must avoid links to the US. The New York conference used money from nongovernmental foundations, some based in the US.

Conference attendees say a muftia council could prompt wider support for women's struggles. "The women who we're trying to help, for them religion is very important," says Zainah Anwar, head of the Malaysian group Sisters in Islam. "It's empowering for them to know that their desire to not be beaten by their husband can actually be justified in the name of Islam."

Unelected Mexican Leftist Claims Office (AP)

By Mark Stevenson

AP, November 21, 2006

Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador launched a parallel government Monday and prepared to swear himself in as Mexico's "legitimate" president, a ceremony the leftist hopes will keep alive protests to undermine the man who officials say defeated him at the polls.

The inauguration ceremony is the latest chapter in Lopez Obrador's unsuccessful battle for the presidency. He claims fraud and dirty campaign tactics were responsible for President-elect Felipe Calderon's narrow victory in the July 2 vote, and his parallel government could spend the next six years calling for street protests that have already dented the economy and prompted travel warnings from the U.S. Embassy.

DOJ_NMG_0096804

While the red-green-and-white presidential sash to be draped across Lopez Obrador's shoulders Monday will lack legal recognition, he hopes to assume the moral leadership of millions of poor Mexicans.

Based in Mexico City, Lopez Obrador's parallel government has its own Cabinet, but it will not collect taxes or make laws and relies on donations to carry out its plans.

One of its first orders of business will be trying to prevent Calderon's Dec. 1 inauguration.

"We're not going to give the right free rein," Lopez Obrador said in a final stop in the southeastern state of Veracruz this weekend. "We're going to confront it."

Thousands of Lopez Obrador's supporters were gathering in the afternoon in Mexico City's main Zocalo plaza, carrying signs lashing out against not only Calderon but the Roman Catholic Church and mainstream media.

"Calderon will have to be retrained or will have to go," said Maria de Lourdes Carranza, 50, a Mexico City office worker.

Marco Ramirez, 34, a university researcher watching the crowd from a sidewalk cafe, said he believed many of the demonstrators were receiving money from the Mexico City government, which is run by Lopez Obrador's Democratic Revolution Party.

"This affects the country's image," he said. "It puts out a very bad image."

It remains to be seen whether Lopez Obrador can keep up the momentum. Some members of his leftist Democratic Revolution Party, or PRD, have already expressed disagreement with Lopez Obrador's strategy of using Congress — where the PRD is now the second-largest force — as an arena for protests rather than negotiations.

Writing in the Mexico City daily Reforma, columnist Armando Fuentes described Lopez Obrador's "swearing in" ceremony as "laughable" and "a circus act, a farce."

But Oscar Aguilar, a political science professor at the Iberoamerican University, cautioned that the leftist could successfully undermine Calderon.

"The problem is that he's not a Don Quixote because the social and political conditions are fertile ground for this kind of leadership," Aguilar said. "Many of the poor ... see this type of leadership as a solution."

Protesters have held the center of the southern city of Oaxaca for months, demanding Gov. Ulises Ruiz's ouster, despite the presence of federal police. Many worry that Lopez Obrador will follow suit and renew street protests, including those in which his supporters seized Mexico City's center for nearly two months this summer.

Some citizens appear to be tiring of political unrest.

This month, Mexico City was rattled when several bombs exploded at political offices and banks. No one was injured, and a small, radical group not tied to Lopez Obrador claimed responsibility.

The violence has affected one of the country's main sources of income. Revenue from tourism was down 4.3 percent in the first nine months of 2006, as compared to 2005.

President Vicente Fox cautioned in a speech Monday that "the electoral process is the path that Mexicans have to preserve a peaceful, orderly, civilized and pluralistic public and political life."

Some of Lopez Obrador's closest aides have suggested they will follow Bolivia's example and try to use protests to force Calderon from office, as demonstrators did with a succession of leaders there. Lopez Obrador has not ruled that out.

"Nobody wants violence in our country, but there are people who give grounds for violence," Lopez Obrador said last week. "There are a lot of people who say that, after July 2, the path of electoral politics in no longer viable."

Yes, He Lost Mexico's Vote, So He's Swearing Himself In (NYT)

By James C. Mckinley Jr.

The New York Times, November 21, 2006

MEXICO CITY, Nov. 20 — Don Quixote, move over. The losing leftist candidate for president swore himself in on Monday as "the legitimate president of Mexico" before a huge crowd of his avid fans, ignoring rulings by federal electoral authorities and the courts that he narrowly lost the election last July.

DOJ_NMG_0096805

The candidate, Andrés Manuel López Obrador, a former Mexico City mayor who took on Mexico's entrenched oligarchy, chose the anniversary of the Mexican revolution for the event. He has continued to assert that his opponents used fraud to deny him victory.

Appearing on a stage in the historic Constitution Plaza, with Mexican flags and an enormous eagle banner behind him, Mr. López Obrador promised to goad the government of the president-elect, Felipe Calderón, a conservative from the National Action Party of President Vicente Fox, into adopting his proposals.

About 100,000 people crowded into the square and roared with approval when a copy of the traditional green, white and red presidential banner was placed across his chest.

"We are assembled here to confront a fraudulent election," he said, "and to take on a regime of corruption and privileges, to start the construction of a new republic."

Mr. López Obrador maintains that powerful business leaders colluded with Mr. Fox's party to mount a smear campaign depicting him as a dangerous leftist totalitarian. He also says Mr. Fox's party made a pact with the centrist former governing party, the Institutional Revolutionary Party, to defeat him in northern states.

Both accusations are true to a degree, but the nation's highest electoral court ruled that those actions were not enough to skew the election results. Mr. Calderón, 44, a former energy minister, won by 240,000 votes.

Mr. López Obrador, who is 53, said he intended to have members of his Democratic Revolution Party introduce legislation in Congress, then use public pressure to force the laws through. Among his proposals are measures to break up near monopolies, improve health care, raise the minimum wage and cut government salaries.

He said he intended to continue touring to promote his ideas.

Earlier in the day, Mr. Fox took a veiled swipe at Mr. López Obrador at an event marking the anniversary of the 1910 revolution, saying society should never permit strongmen and populists to trample civil liberties. "Elections are the path that Mexicans have to preserve a political and public life that is plural, peaceful, orderly and civilized," he said.

It remained to be seen if Monday's political theater was a graceful exit for a candidate who could never acknowledge defeat, or truly the start of a unified left-wing movement to challenge the oligarchy of politicians and business executives who have controlled the country for a century.

The crowd was smaller than at Mr. López Obrador's previous rallies, and divisions have appeared in his party. Some supporters have threatened to storm the dais to try to prevent Mr. Calderón from taking the oath of office on Dec. 1, while others are negotiating with his party, hoping to get the new president to adopt part of their agenda in return for political peace.

Forming a shadow government is astute politically, some analysts said, because it could keep Mr. López Obrador in the public eye during Mr. Calderón's six-year term and set up a possible run in 2012.

Most of the people who turned out to support him, however, have high hopes that he will somehow deliver on his campaign promises despite losing. "He is our last hope," said Consuelo Sánchez Quiroz, a 64-year-old retired hotel worker. "Fox and Calderón are both for the businessmen."

But others saw the ceremony on Monday as a grand romantic gesture, something Don Quixote could relate to. "It's something that goes beyond material things, it's something more spiritual," said Beatriz Ramírez, a 54-year-old psychologist, "to believe in the future, in a more equal society, to believe that some day it will become reality."

Mexican Leftist Declares Himself 'President' (LAT)

By Héctor Tobar

The Los Angeles Times, November 21, 2006

MEXICO CITY — Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador, the leftist who claims to have been cheated out of victory in July's presidential election, took an "oath of office" Monday as the "legitimate president" of Mexico in an elaborate ritual his many detractors here ridiculed as a farce.

The ceremony in this capital city came less than two weeks before the inauguration of the man who officially won the election, conservative Felipe Calderon. As many as 100,000 people attended the event, in which Lopez Obrador, the city's 52-year-old former mayor, also swore in a six-man, six-woman shadow Cabinet.

DOJ_NMG_0096806

"It is an honor to be the legitimate president of Mexico and above all the leader of free men and women like you," Lopez Obrador told the crowd after leftist senator and human rights activist Rosario Ibarra de Piedra placed a "presidential sash" over his shoulder.

Lopez Obrador has styled himself as the defender of this nation's impoverished majority. His self-coronation wasn't the first time in Mexico's tumultuous history that a losing candidate had proclaimed himself the "legitimate president" (three did so between 1910 and 1940), and it may not augur well for Mexico's future political stability.

"He is not doing this to make sure that Calderon governs in the name of the poor. He's trying to make sure that Calderon can't govern at all," Denise Dresser, a political analyst here, said of Lopez Obrador's decision to create a parallel government. "He is leading many Mexicans to believe that change in this country cannot occur through peaceful means."

On Sept. 5, after weeks of partial recounts and legal pleadings alleging fraud, Mexico's highest electoral court proclaimed Calderon the winner of the presidential election by 234,000 votes, or 0.56 percentage point.

Calderon did not comment Monday on his rival's inauguration. The newspaper Reforma published a poll that found two in three Mexicans believed Lopez Obrador had "little or no" credibility. But one in five respondents thought he was right to proclaim himself president.

Lopez Obrador urged his followers not to recognize Calderon's government.

"We are congregated here because in the face of the electoral fraud of July 2, we have decided to abolish the regime of corruption and privilege," he said. "We will begin the construction of a new republic."

Monday's swearing-in took place amid a festive atmosphere in Mexico City's central plaza, the Zocalo, with a contingent of invited foreign dignitaries that included Brazilian community activists and the Cuban singer Silvio Rodriguez.

Supporters chanted "Presidente!"

"I'm here because I voted for him and because I believe he is the legitimate president of Mexico," said Josafat Lagos, 56, an accountant. "The hope of the people is that he will be a counterbalance to the abuses and corruption of the powerful."

On Friday, Ruben Aguilar, spokesman for outgoing President Vicente Fox, said he did not believe many Mexicans would see Lopez Obrador as the "legitimate president."

"The citizens of this country won't be fooled," Aguilar said. "This is a mature society. The people voted … they made their decision."

Lopez Obrador's critics in Mexico and abroad denounced his decision to proclaim himself president as a dangerous farce — the "Republic of the Ugly Duckling," some commentators here have called it.

Much of the Mexican media, and many political observers, lambasted the inauguration as a "caricature" and the desperate act of an egomaniac.

"Lopez Obrador has become a parody of himself, a bad joke," said Jaime Sanchez Susarrey, a Guadalajara professor and author. "He's lost a great deal of legitimacy, even among his own supporters."

In an interview published Monday in the daily newspaper La Jornada, Lopez Obrador said he didn't care about "the attacks and jokes of the right," because he would rule "in the name of the people" against a "neo-fascist regime that only benefits a privileged minority."

Calderon, Lopez Obrador said, is "a puppet, a little manager at the service of the powerful, who will always be rejected by the people."

Legislators of Lopez Obrador's leftist Democratic Revolution Party, or PRD, have promised to prevent Calderon from being inaugurated before a joint session of Congress on Dec. 1, much as they kept Fox from delivering his state of the nation address in September.

Calderon has resisted pleas from Fox and others that he take the oath of office at another location. His attempts to negotiate with legislators of the PRD have been rebuffed. A showdown in the halls of Congress appears inevitable.

Lopez Obrador will support his "government" through popular donations. He said Monday that its main activities would consist of proposing legislation to Congress and monitoring the actions of the Calderon administration.

DOJ_NMG_0096807

Calderon will face numerous challenges to his authority, including popular movements led by charismatic radicals in the southern states of Oaxaca and Chiapas. Drug cartels often operate with impunity in border cities such as Nuevo Laredo and the impoverished southern states of Guerrero and Michoacan.

"Calderon is going to have to prove, in a short time, that free markets and liberal democracy still work," Dresser said. "If he doesn't, he's going to have someone on the streets [Lopez Obrador] pointing out that they don't work."

Mexico's long history is dotted with parallel Congresses and parallel presidencies, many of which have arisen in times of social conflict and change.

In the 20th century, three men called themselves "president-elect" or "provisional president" after what they said were fraudulent elections: Francisco I. Madero in 1910, Jose Vasconcelos in 1929 and Alfredo Almazan in 1940.

Of those, only Madero eventually took office, after issuing the call to arms on Nov. 20, 1910, that sparked the Mexican Revolution.

After two years in office, Madero was assassinated in a coup d'etat.

AMLO's Antics (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 21, 2006

When Mexico's hard-left presidential candidate Andres Manuel López Obrador lost the country's most closely contested election in history in July, those who know him warned he would not go away, no matter the cost to the nation. AMLO -- as the Mexican press calls him -- is proving them right.

Yesterday was the 96th anniversary of the Mexican Revolution. But Mexicans didn't get to celebrate in the nation's capital with their traditional parade of horses and revolutionary period costumes. President Vicente Fox canceled the event to avoid a confrontation with AMLO. The endlessly sore loser from the Revolutionary Democratic Party chose the same venue to stage a farcical self-swearing-in ceremony, declaring himself Mexico's next president. This was the third time since July that AMLO and his PRD derailed a Mexican tradition.

Mr. Fox understands the risks AMLO poses to his legacy and to the country. Yesterday while honoring Mexican martyr and hero Francisco Madero, Mr. Fox unmistakably spoke to the Mexican people about the tactics of AMLO: "[Madero] taught us that society must never permit, under any circumstances, that our liberties be violated by caciques (bosses) and caudillos."

That's a direct verbal challenge. But in practice, Mr. Fox has largely appeased AMLO's bullying. This may have encouraged PRD circus acts such as yesterday's. Worse, it may have emboldened the more extreme elements in Mexican politics that have been holding the southern city of Oaxaca hostage since May. The next test of Mexico's rule of law will come December 1 when president-elect Felipe Calderón is supposed to be sworn in. Hard liners are already pledging to crash the event. Perhaps this time Mexico's elected leadership will draw a line in the sand.

Traditional Ways Spread AIDS In Africa, Experts Say (NYT)

By Elisabeth Rosenthal

The New York Times, November 21, 2006

NKOLONDOGO, Cameroon — When Innocent Zamba Manga was born this summer, doctors advised his mother, Marise, who is H.I.V. positive, not to breast-feed, because nursing can pass the virus that causes AIDS from mother to child. Mother and baby left the hospital with bottles and formula supplied by a Catholic charity.

But the very next week, the proud parents took their baby to the father's village in the south of Cameroon, to take part in a traditional birth and naming ceremony. Custom required the new mother to nurse little Innocent, so she did. And she continued for two weeks.

"Why would you risk his health in this way?" scolded Dr. Suzie Tetang Moyo, sighing deeply in frustration when she saw the parents recently at her clinic on a dirt road here in this rural district north of the capital, Yaoundé.

As researchers spend more time studying Africa's overwhelming pediatric AIDS problem, they are finding that the routes of transmission may be different than in the industrialized countries, and that strategies for preventing the disease's spread must be adapted to local realities.

In developed countries, the only real risk factor for children is that they can get H.I.V. from their mothers at birth.

DOJ_NMG_0096808

But here, researchers have come to agree, a host of traditional ceremonies and practices are creating transmission routes unique to Africa — dangers that have, up to now, been ignored.

There are naming ceremonies, like Innocent's, that require nursing. But there is also a host of potentially even more hazardous moments, such as when body fluids of different people are mixed.

In scarification ceremonies for ethnic identification and cutting for ritual healing, blades are used in sequence again and again. There is also the practice of communal breast-feeding a single baby by numerous women, common in many tightly knit villages.

In a country like Cameroon, where more than 5 percent of the population and 11 percent of pregnant women are infected with H.I.V. — the vast majority unknowingly — such practices could lead to a wildfire spread.

"If we are only biology, biology, biology, then we are only doing half of our mission," said Marcel Manny Lobe, director of the new International Reference and Research Center for H.I.V.-AIDS in Yaoundé. "We need also to do the sociology and anthropology and then make biological interventions."

Researchers here and elsewhere in Africa are just beginning to study the role of these common traditional practices of rural Africa, to determine if they account for a small or large portion of H.I.V. transmission. "We don't know enough about this important topic, but there is no doubt that traditional practices are spreading H.I.V. It's a growing concern," said Dr. Edward J. Mills, an epidemiologist at McMaster University in Hamilton, Ontario, who has done extensive work in South Africa.

"Unaids has been ignoring it," he said, referring to the United Nations agency that deals with the disease. "I think it's because people think it's culturally insensitive to talk about. Even if it turns out to be only a minor amount, it's a preventable amount so we really need to address it."

In Batié, a village three hours from Yaoundé, most people go to both traditional healers and medical doctors, and traditional treatments often involve blades to cut the skin.

On a recent afternoon, Berlin Simeu, a villager, visited the darkened hut of Sop Kamtchewo, a healer, in a ceremony intended to ward off illness and witchcraft.

With a razor blade that had been wrapped in a sheet of paper, the healer made three short cuts on his patient's body — one each on his wrist, back and shoulder. A fruit was placed on the wounds to draw out any bad influences.

It was unclear whether or how the blade would be cleaned before its next use.

Yves Moumbe, a doctor in Batié, said that almost all of his patients with H.I.V. went to traditional healers before they saw him.

"It is not clear if they are using any sterile technique at all," Dr. Moumbe said. "They don't have much knowledge of H.I.V. and how it is spread. So it could be a serious problem."

An estimated 70 percent of Africans use traditional healers as their primary source of health care, a function of tradition and availability.

In Africa, there is one medical doctor for every 40,000 people, but one traditional healer for every 500.

In one small survey, 50 percent of ritual healers were H.I.V. positive, doctors at the International Reference and Research Center for H.I.V.-AIDS in Yaoundé said.

"We're used to saying this is all about sexual intercourse, but now we have to remind people it can be elsewhere in the body, and there are other dangers as well," said Bertrice Mabule, who started the Children's Education and Health Foundation to promote H.I.V. awareness in Batié.

A 2004 study in the journal Tropical Doctor by Dr. Etete J. Peters at the University of Calabar in southeastern Nigeria concluded that there was "a serious risk inherent in the practices of Nigerian traditional healers" because of "the continuous usage of unsterilized instruments and cross contamination of patients' blood and body fluid in their practices."

Though Dr. Peters has continued to work with the healers, he said there was little financing to carry out H.I.V. sensitization campaigns directed at this group, so "such awful practices persist in Nigeria and Africa in general."

In much of rural Cameroon, tiny scars are made to identify members of different ethnic groups, with large numbers of children scarred simultaneously.

DOJ_NMG_0096809

"You see them everywhere, three lines on a cheek, on the forehead — the Pygmies make slashes between the eyebrows," said Serge Florent Moudt, an H.I.V. educator who works at the Center in Yaoundé as well as in the West Province, his home. "It's a real worry."

If just one child in a village had H.I.V., a common blade could spread the virus to dozens who come after him. The same is true for group circumcisions.

"There are traditionally African aspects of this fight," said Jean Stéphane Biatcha, executive secretary of African Synergy, an AIDS prevention group. "We're taking the message to rural areas where traditions are very strong, and you have to work carefully and slowly."

Another traditional practice that government officials acknowledge could be spreading HIV is communal breast-feeding, the norm in many rural villages.

Polygamy is legal in Cameroon, and a chieftain might have 30 or 40 wives, Mr. Biatcha said, because wealthy men routinely marry the wives of male relatives who have died. It is common for the wives — or even friends — to help out by nursing each other's infants. In fact, it is an essential service if a mother has to go to work or take a trip into the city.

But again, in a country where studies have found that 11 percent of women of child-bearing age are infected with H.I.V., the practice presents an open conduit for childhood infections.

Mr. Biatcha said people were generally unaware of such risks, so the first step was information.

In the last few years, an increasing number of medical doctors have warmed to collaborating with the traditional healers, to encourage safe practice and to use them as AIDS educators.

"We have to open a dialogue with the traditional healers," said Dr. Mills, the epidemiologist. "They may well be spreading H.I.V., but instead they could be part of the solution."

Nepali King Faulted In Dissident Crackdown (WT/AP)

By Binaj Gurubacharya

The Washington Times, November 21, 2006

KATMANDU, Nepal -- A government commission investigating Nepal's bloody crackdown on pro-democracy demonstrators blamed the violence on King Gyanendra and recommended punishing him, officials said yesterday.

The findings by the panel investigating the crackdown are a further blow for the king, who has seen his status plummet since the uprising forced him to give up absolute power, and an ominous portent for the centuries-old institution of the monarchy in this Himalayan nation.

After receiving the commission's report, Prime Minister Girija Prasad Koirala vowed to punish those held culpable for the crackdown, in which hundreds were injured and hundreds detained, with some claiming torture.

Commission member Harihar Birahi said that as chairman of the Cabinet at the time of the crackdown, the king was responsible for the harsh treatment of the protesters, who eventually forced Gyanendra to cede power and reinstate parliament after 14 months of direct rule by the monarch.

Holding Gyanendra guilty thrusts the future of the Nepalese monarchy back under the spotlight. The landmark case marked the first time a monarch faced investigation in this country where kings -- thought by tradition to be reincarnations of the Hindu god Lord Vishnu -- have held near-absolute power.

The commission did not recommend a punishment, and Nepal has no laws addressing crimes committed by a king.

A yet-to-be elected constituent assembly is expected to decide the monarchy's fate. Centrist parties favor a constitutional monarchy with a ceremonial role for the king, while the Maoist rebels -- who are in peace talks with the government -- want to abolish the monarchy.

Gyanendra has already been stripped of his powers, command over the army and his immunity from prosecution.

Several people who worked under the king during the period of direct rule that ended in April were interrogated by the commission.

The commission also sent written questions to Gyanendra, but the king did not respond.

DOJ_NMG_0096810

Besides Gyanendra, the commission also found 201 officials in the king's administration responsible for the bloody crackdown. They included the chiefs of police and the armed forces.

Gyanendra's reign has been filled with turmoil that began on his ascent to power in 2001, after the death of his brother, King Birendra, in a bizarre palace massacre.

After becoming king, he remained unpopular with the people. Taking direct control of the government in 2005 eroded most of his remaining support.

A Discredit To The United Nations (NYT)

The New York Times, November 21, 2006

The old, unreformed United Nations Human Rights Commission was selective and one-sided, but occasionally managed to do some good work. That may be more than can be said for its successor body, the Human Rights Council, born earlier this year of a weak-kneed compromise from which the United States stood honorably apart. If this is the best the U.N. can do at reforming itself, it isn't worth the effort.

The council is new, but its deliberations have already fallen into a shameful pattern. When it comes to the world's worst and most consistent human rights violators, like China, Iran, North Korea, Myanmar and Sudan, there has been a tendency to muffle words and conclusions and shift the focus from individual and political rights to broader economic and social questions.

But when it comes to criticizing Israel for violations committed in a wartime context that includes armed attacks against its citizens and soldiers, the council seems to change personality, turning harshly critical and uninterested in broader contexts.

As the council prepares to resume deliberations next week, an ad hoc coalition of human rights violators is pushing for an end to the practice of singling out individual countries for special criticism and follow-up investigations.

Those critical reports and follow-ups were the most useful thing the old unreformed commission used to do. The problem was that many other deserving targets were shielded by their diplomatic allies. Moving away from the practice altogether would be a decided step backward.

To inspire respect and support, the United Nations must be more than a self-protective club of sovereign states. The test of that is whether it is willing to defend the basic human standards embodied in a succession of United Nations declarations and conventions. The new Human Rights Council now seems headed for a failing midterm grade.

Political Poison (WP)

The Washington Post, November 21, 2006

FOR THE PAST 15 years it has been commonly assumed that Russian leaders gave up the Soviet practice of murdering political dissidents, inside and outside of the country. Maybe not. British authorities say they are investigating the apparent poisoning of Alexander Litvinenko, an outspoken critic of Russian President Vladimir Putin, who is fighting for his life in a London hospital after ingesting highly toxic thallium. A former agent of the KGB secret service and its successor, the Federal Security Service (FSB), who sought asylum in Britain six years ago, Mr. Litvinenko had alleged that the agency maintained a secret poisons laboratory. Along with many others, he also charged that the Kremlin was behind the 2004 poisoning of Ukraine's pro-Western president, Viktor Yushchenko.

There's no concrete evidence as yet that the FSB or Mr. Putin is behind the poison attacks -- but there is plenty of reason for suspicion. Mr. Litvinenko was investigating the recent murder of the country's best known opposition journalist, Anna Politkovskaya, who was gunned down in her apartment building on Oct. 7. She, too, was hospitalized in 2004 and said she believed she had been poisoned. Ms. Politkovskaya's editor at the newspaper Novaya Gazeta, Yuri Shchekochikhin, died after a suspected poisoning three years ago. No one has been arrested in these murders, but Mr. Putin publicly disparaged Ms. Politkovskaya while implausibly charging that his political enemies were somehow behind her death.

Former colleagues of Mr. Putin in the KGB don't doubt who is responsible. One, Oleg Kalugin, pointed out that the president pushed the Russian parliament to authorize the secret service to take action against "terrorists" outside the country. Another, Oleg Gordievsky, the former KGB chief in Britain, told the Times of London that he believed the attack was "state-sponsored" and was carried out by another former Russian agent. We trust that the British authorities will vigorously investigate the attack on Mr. Litvinenko -- who is now a British citizen -- and that Prime Minister Tony Blair will take seriously the possibility that a colleague in the Group of Eight sanctioned a political murder attempt in London.

DOJ_NMG_0096811

While Mr. Litvinenko's story was emerging over the weekend, President Bush was pictured exchanging jollities with his "friend Vladimir" at a summit in Vietnam. Does Mr. Bush regret having given so much support to a leader who has dismantled his country's nascent democracy and whose opponents keep turning up in hospitals and morgues? If so, he's keeping his own secret.

DOJ_NMG_0096812

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 21, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

AG Pushes Domestic Wiretapping (DENP) ... 4
Gonzales Pronounces Supermax Safe (RMN) ... 4
Supermax Still Not Super Secure (RMN) ... 5
Judge Rejects Request For NSA Documents (AP) ... 5
Human-rights Groups Back Dems' Detainee Law Overhaul (HILL) ... 6
Top-Secret Torture (WP) ... 7
Reno Files Challenge To Terror Law (AP) ... 7
Islamic Charity Tries Anew To Lose Label (AP) ... 8
No Transfer For Guantánamo Detainee (AP) ... 9
2nd Man Charged In Terrorism TV Case (NSDY/AP) ... 9
Prodi Removes Top Intelligence Chiefs (FT) ... 10
The Curse Of Rendition (FT) ... 10
Germany Detained Six In Terror Inquiry (NYT) ... 11

Homeland Response:

Military Documents Hold Tips On Antiwar Activities (NYT) ... 12
6 Imams Removed From Twin Cities Flight (AP) ... 13
Learn The Rules Before You Go (USAT) ... 13
Fliers Aren't Giving Thanks For Fickle TSA Rules, Screeners (USAT) ... 14
A Pointed Reminder For Security Screeners (WP) ... 15
Chemical Weapons' Disposal Delayed (USAT) ... 15

War News:

Bush Denies Decision On Altering Iraq Troop Levels (FT) ... 16
Bush Weighs Next Step On Troops In Iraq (AP-Y) ... 16
Pentagon May Suggest Short-Term Buildup Leading To Iraq Exit (WP) ... 17
U.S. Considers Large, Temporary Troop Increase In Iraq (NYT) 19
Bush Says No Decision Yet On Troop Levels In Iraq (WP) ... 20
In Indonesia, Bush Defends His Iraq Policy (MCT) ... 21
Bush Says He's Still Weighing New Moves In Iraq (WSJ) ... 22
Bush Pressured To Come Up With New Iraq Strategy (USAT) .. 23
Obama Urges Gradual Withdrawal From Iraq (CHIT) ... 23
Obama Urges Gradual Withdrawal From Iraq (AP-Y) ... 24
Obama Calls For Pullout In Iraq (LAT) ... 25
The Only Real Option: Leave Iraq Now (WP) ... 26
The Lingo Of Vietnam (WP) ... 27
The Story Behind The Iraq Study Group (WP) ... 28
Rising Price Of The War On Terror (CSM) ... 28
'War On Terror' Could Last 30 Years Or More (AFP) ... 29
Iraqi President Accepts Iran's Invitation For Weekend Talks (USAT/AP) ... 30
Syria And Iraq Restore Ties Severed In The Hussein Era (NYT) 30
Iraq To Restore Long-Severed Relations With Neighbor Syria (WP) ... 31
Iraq President To Hold Talks With Iran (FT) ... 33
Iraq Considers Three-way Talks With Iran And Syria (LAT) ... 33
Iraq, Iran And Syria Set For 3-way Talks (WT) ... 35
U.S. Should Lead Iraq Summit (LAT) ... 35
Next Move In Iraq? (USAT) ... 36
Syria Lends A Hand (WSJ) ... 37
Don't Trade Iran For Iraq (HILL) ... 38
An Iraqi Solution, Vietnam Style (NYT) ... 39
Flaws Cited In Effort To Train Iraqi Forces (WP) ... 40
Force Multiplier (WSJ) ... 42
Iraq Resumes Diplomatic Ties With Syria (AP-Y) ... 43
Spoofer Of Iraq's Chaos Becomes Another Victim (WP) ... 44
Banned Iraqi Television Station Illicitly Back On The Air (MCT) .. 45
British PM Visits Troops In Afghanistan (AP) ... 46
Troops Will Stay, Blair Pledges (WT/AP) ... 47
Taliban Drug Trade: Echoes Of Colombia (CSM) ... 47

DOJ:

GAO Reports Progress On Info Classification At Justice, FBI (FCW) ... 48

Corporate Scandals:

Prosecutors Drop Lay Appeal (HC) ... 49
Head Of Cyberonics Resigns As Options Inquiry Expands (NYT) 49
Fortunate Ones (USAT) ... 51
Capital One Ex-CFO Resolves Charges (WP) ... 56
South Korean Prosecutors Indict Lone Star, KEB (WSJ) ... 56
SEC Filings Show New Chairman Got Options 3 Years Before Joining Board (USAT) ... 57
Sumner Redstone's Nephew Sues Over Management Of Family Trusts (WSJ) ... 58
Paulson Criticizes Regulation (USAT) ... 59
Paulson Urges Flexible Market Regulation (FT) ... 60
Paulson Says Business Is Over-Regulated (WP) ... 61
SEC To Undergo Further Scrutiny From Congress (WSJ) ... 62

Criminal Law:

Criminal Network To Catch Crooks In Cyberspace, FBI Goes Global (WSJ) ... 62
Gangsters Who Targeted Blacks Get Life (AP) ... 64
Government Backs Off Prison Restrictions (AP-Y) ... 65
G.O.P. Fund-Raiser Sentenced For Embezzlement In Ohio (NYT/AP) ... 65
Married Aleppo Man Held In W. Va. Death (PPG) ... 66
FBI Recovers Stolen Goya Painting (NSDY/AP) ... 67
A Phone Call Leads The F.B.I. To A Stolen Goya (NYT) ... 67
Goya Is Found After The FBI Is Tipped Off (NYS) ... 68
Oil's Well That Ends Well For Stolen Goya (NYDN) ... 69
Million-Dollar Painting Recovered (ABC) ... 69
Stolen Goya Painting Recovered (CNN) ... 69
Alleged Agent's Confession Allowed At Trial (MH) ... 70
Former Daley Aide Gets Almost 4 Years For Hiring Fraud (AP) ... 71
Former Patronage Chief Sentenced To 46 Months (CHIST) ... 72
Bus Union Official Faces New Charges (NYT) ... 72
FBI Busts Union's Boss On School Bus Shakedown Rap (NYDN) ... 73
Jeffs' Preaching Will Be Dissected Word By Word (SLT) ... 73
Jeffs Preliminary Hearing Today (DESERET) ... 74
Polygamists Fight To Be Seen As Part Of Mainstream Society (WP) ... 75
Motel Room Was Often Site Of Polygamist Rites (AP) ... 77
Many DNA Matches Aren't Acted On (USAT) ... 77
In New Orleans, Rust In The Wheels Of Justice (NYT) ... 80
A Good Chief Goes (WP) ... 82

Civil Law:

Lawyers Argue Validity Of '98 Online Law (AP-Y) ... 82
Closing Arguments In Internet-porn Trial (PHI) ... 83
Smokers Sue Tobacco Company For Lung Scans (LAW) ... 84
Billion-Dollar BofA Ruling Struck Down (LAW) ... 84
Court Rules On Internet Defamation Liability (LAT) ... 85
California Court Reverses Internet Liability Case (WSJ) ... 86

Civil Rights:

Dems To Target Political 'Robo Calls' (USAT) ... 86
Suburban Atlanta Police Ask DA's Office To Review Officer Shootings (AP) ... 87
Officer In Taser Case Identified (LAT) ... 88
Federal Judge Rejects Las Vegas Ban On Feeding Homeless In Parks (AP) ... 89
An Opening On Abortion? (WP) ... 90

Antitrust:

Muni Cloud Hovers Over Investors (WSJ) ... 91
Private Cash Fuels Boom In Takeovers (LAT) ... 91
Ready To Deal: $60 Billion In Two Days (WSJ) ... 93
Smaller Rival In Agreement To Acquire Copper Giant (NYT) ... 95
Mattel Says It Really Owns The Bratz That've Given Barbie Such A Bad Time (WSJ) ... 95
Cephalon Used Improper Tactics To Sell Drug, Probe Finds (WSJ) ... 97
LSE Shuns 'final' £2.7bn Nasdaq Bid (FT) ... 98
LSE Rebuffs Offer By Nasdaq Valuing Firm At $5.1 Billion (WSJ) ... 99
London Exchange Rejects Nasdaq's $5.1 Billion Offer (WP) ... 100
British Shun A New Offer By Nasdaq (NYT) ... 101
Curtain Rises On Final Act In LSE Drama (FT) ... 102

Environment/Indian Affairs:

Snowmobile Plan Proposed For Yellowstone (AP-Y) ... 103
Yellowstone Plans To Retain Current Snowmobile Limit (NYT) 104
Environmentalists Seek Marine Protection For Parts Of Northwest Atlantic (FINDLAW/AP) ... 104
Letters (WSJ) ... 105
Navajos' Desert Cleanup No More Than A Mirage (LAT) ... 107

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Senators To FBI: Get A VCF Refund (GCN) ... 112
DrugNet, Chapter 3: The PowerPoint (PHI) ... 113
Texas Man Pleads Guilty To Pot Charges (AP) ... 116
115 Charged In Prescription-drug Sweep (LCJ) ... 117
70 Seized In E. Kentucky Drug Sweep (LEXHL) ... 117
Drug Sweep Nets More Than 50, Including 2 Pharmacists (AP)117
Bonds' Personal Trainer Back In Prison (AP) ... 118
27 Face Charges In Mississippi Drug-trade Ring (WT) ... 118
Agents Credited For Drug Busts (BSH) ... 119
Police Find One Completed IED, Components For More Explosive Devices (DLYSENT) ... 119

Immigration:

Arizona Growers Race Against The Clock To Find Winter Harvest Workers (USAT) ... 119

Tax:

IRS Links Increased Revenue To More Audits (WP/AP) ... 121

Congress-Administration:

GOP Leaving Spending Bills To Democrats (AP-Y) ... 121
Fiscal Battle Lines Drawn (HILL) ... 122
The Economic Front (WSJ) ... 123
Pelosi: Relieving Middle Class Tops List (AP-Y) ... 124
Democratic Leadership Spotlights Middle Class (WT) ... 125
Rebalancing Act Democrats Target Wealth Gap And Hope Not To Hit Economy Divide Between Rich And Poor Continues To Widen; Spurs 'Robin Hood' Plans Can Growth Benefit Workers? (WSJ) ... 125
Washington Wire (WSJ) ... 128
Pelosi-Harman Friction Strains Democrats' Unity (LAT) ... 129
Democrats Plan Series Of Votes On Ethics Reforms (WP) ... 131
Has Gates Learned His Lesson? (LAT) ... 132
Democratic Leaders Reject Idea Of Draft (WP) ... 134
Rangel's Call For New Military Draft Rebuffed (WT) ... 135
Rejecting The Draft (NYT) ... 135
Democrats' Rx? Generics (WSJ) ... 136
Intelligence Panel Staffer Reinstated (WP) ... 137
Same Old Party (NYT) ... 138
A Familiar Number (NYT) ... 139
Behind Democrats' Climb In Mountain West (USAT) ... 139

DOJ_NMG_0096814

Traditionally Republican States Show They're Open To Democrats (MCT) ... 141
Is The South Truly A Dead Zone For Democrats? (NYT) ... 142
Dems' Senate Grip Will Rely On 3 New Hybrids (USAT) ... 144
Dems Return To Power With A Long Wish List (USAT) ... 144
Push To Add Real Estate Funds To Savings Plan Is Rebuffed (WP) ... 145
Textile Fiasco (WSJ) ... 146

Other News:

Leading Economic Indicators Inched Higher In October (WSJ) 147
Is The Worst Over For The Housing Bust? (WSJ) ... 148
Homes' Losing Streak To Continue (USAT) ... 149
Wall St Plays It Safe As Deals Surge (FT) ... 149
The Dow Slips In Rare Interruption Of Record Surge Of Past Six Weeks (WSJ) ... 151
Merger Monday (WSJ) ... 151
Flaws Seen In Markets For Utilities (NYT) ... 152
Citgo Brings Discounted Heating Oil To Region (WP) ... 154
Slain Journalist's Family Files $20 Million Lawsuit (WP) ... 155
Rosenbaum Family Files Suit Against City, Hospital (WT) ... 156
Reporter's Kin Sue City And Hospital (NYT) ... 156
Small Mistakes Cause Big Problems (USAT) ... 157
Winner Named For Florida Seat; Loser Files Suit (NYT) ... 157
Republican Declared Winner In Fla. House Race (WP/AP) ... 158
Democrat's Challenge In Fla. 13 Focuses On Undervotes (CQ)158
GOP Holds House Seat Of Katherine Harris (USAT) ... 159
Clinton Won Easily, But Bankroll Shows The Toll (NYT) ... 160
Women's Report Card For 2006 Vote (CSM) ... 161
Kansas Republican Eyes Presidential Bid (AP-Y) ... 162
Dueling Conservatives (NYT) ... 163
Romney Prepares To Run For President (FT) ... 163
Ahead To 2008 (WT) ... 164
Out Of The Bush Family Shadow (LAT) ... 164
Inside The Beltway (WT) ... 166
Bush Gets A Dose Of Democracy On Visit To Indonesia (LAT) 167
Bush Ends Trip At Careful Stop In Indonesia (NYT) ... 167
Bush Brushes Off Protests Over Middle East (FT) ... 168
Bush Calls Indonesian Protests A Good Thing (USAT) ... 169
U.S. Urges IAEA To Deny Iran Reactor Aid (AP) ... 170
Report: Israeli Spies Active In Iran (JERP) ... 171
Talk Of Another Middle East Preventive War Is Folly (FT) ... 171
Israel Orders Investigation Of Bomb Use In Lebanon (NYT) ... 173
Murder Update (WSJ) ... 173
Pessimism Deepens In Postwar Lebanon (WP) ... 175
Palestinian Unity Government Talks Stall (AP) ... 176
Israeli Map Says West Bank Posts Sit On Arab Land (NYT) ... 177
Bomb Kills 8, Injures 60 On India Train (AP) ... 179
U.S. Sets Jan. 1 Deadline For Sudan To Act On Darfur (WP) ... 180
U.S. Threatens 'Plan B' If Sudan Ignores Deadline (AFP) ... 181
Sudan Hails New Peacekeeping Agreement (AP) ... 182
Boy's Wish: Kill Them All (NYT) ... 183
Loose-cannon Kadafi (LAT) ... 184
Why Only Darfur? (WP) ... 184
Muslim Birthrate Worries Russia (WT) ... 185
A Bid To Bring The Female Voice To Islamic Law (CSM) ... 186
Unelected Mexican Leftist Claims Office (AP) ... 188
Yes, He Lost Mexico's Vote, So He's Swearing Himself In (NYT)188
Mexican Leftist Declares Himself 'President' (LAT) ... 189
AMLO's Antics (WSJ) ... 191
Traditional Ways Spread AIDS In Africa, Experts Say (NYT) ... 191
Nepali King Faulted In Dissident Crackdown (WT/AP) ... 192
A Discredit To The United Nations (NYT) ... 193
Political Poison (WP) ... 193

Online Version

Visit www.bulletinnews.com/justice for searchable archive, interactive story index, and links to complete stories where appropriate.

DOJ_NMG_0096815

TERRORISM NEWS:

AG Pushes Domestic Wiretapping (DENP)

By Felisa Cardona, Denver Post Staff Writer

Denver Post, November 21, 2006

The U.S. attorney general says the Democrats' victory won t deter the White House on the issue.

Speaking Monday to The Denver Post editorial board, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales discusses the need for warrantless eavesdropping to fight terrorism. "We've done a lot to make America safer, but it's not safe," he said. (Post / John Prieto)

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales reiterated his support for a domestic wiretapping program to fight terrorism during a visit Monday with The Denver Post editorial board.

"We've done a lot to make America safer, but it's not safe," Gonzales said when asked about the need for warrantless eavesdropping. "Fundamentally, the world is different today. My 14-year-old son will grow up in a different world than I grew up in. It's much more likely there will be a terrorist attack in this country. I never worried about a terrorist attack as a boy."

Gonzales said the Bush administration would not be deterred by the Democratic takeover in Congress but that he hoped new congressional leaders would be as willing to avoid a confrontation on national security as he is.

"I'm not going to prejudge," Gonzales said of the possibility of trying to convince the new Congress. "We are going to work as hard as we can to avoid the kind of crisis you referred to."

Gonzales said the Bush administration's anti-terrorism efforts since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks have improved intelligence gathering, especially between nations.

"The unsung story of this is our relationships with our foreign partners," Gonzales said. "The level of cooperation is outstanding, and it's made a big difference now that we are able to analyze plots. We have to be right 100 percent of the time; they (terrorists) only have to be right one time."

Gonzales also spoke about the issues with security at the Supermax prison in Florence and said he considered the problems "a priority."

He acknowledged that more staffing and security measures, such as increased monitoring of the perimeter of the prison, are necessary.

A recent report on prison security at Supermax showed that inmates were communicating with each other and with outsiders by telephone without those conversations being screened.

Gonzales said that in the past month, seven new employees, including guards, were hired to ease staffing concerns. He said part of the problems with security have to do with a lack of Arabic translators, an issue he says plagues all levels of government.

While the prison may not have Arabic translators on hand to monitor live inmate phone conversations, the calls are taped and reviewed later, Gonzales said.

"It's intolerable to have dangerous people in our prisons communicating with each other," he said.

Staff writer Felisa Cardona can be reached at 303-954-1219 or fcardona@denverpost.com.

Gonzales Pronounces Supermax Safe (RMN)

By Sara Burnett, Rocky Mountain News

Rocky Mountain News, November 21, 2006

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales acknowledged today there have been problems at Supermax prison in Florence but said steps have been taken to improve security and make sure the community is safe.

"I think it's a safe facility," Gonzales said during a meeting with the Rocky Mountain News editorial board. "Have mistakes been made? Have there been some problems there? No question about it, like there are at every facility. But we've taken steps to address them."

Gonzales said the Department of Justice has added 11 new employees at Supermax, and that seven more positions will be filled "as soon as we can." The 18 new employees would bring the facility to 208 — still short of the 240 employees it had when the prison opened in 2004.

Supermax, the nation's highest-security prison and home to inmates such as 9/11 conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui, also has addressed problems with inmate mail and phone calls not being monitored, Gonzales said.

DOJ_NMG_0096816

He said a "large portion" of phone calls are being monitored as they occur, and others are recorded and later reviewed by translators. All mail is being viewed, he said.

In September, a Justice Department inspector general's report criticized the prison for not properly screening terrorists' mail and other communications. Gonzales today called that situation "intolerable" and said steps were taken to correct it.

"We spend a lot of taxpayer dollars in the investigation and prosecution of these kinds of dangerous criminals, and to have them locked up and to still present a danger to the American citizen is not right," he said.

Residents and local law enforcement also have expressed concern about the safety of the prison's perimeter, and about local police not being able to communicate via radio with prison guards.

Gonzales said he has asked the director of the U. S. Bureau of Prisons to look into those concerns as well.

Supermax Still Not Super Secure (RMN)

Rocky Mountain News, November 21, 2006

Messages monitored, but not in real time

In a meeting with News editors and writers on Monday, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales delivered both good news and bad news about the security of communications flowing to and from inmates at the Supermax lockup in Florence.

On the plus side, Gonzales said that every communication with prisoners, by mail or telephone, is now reviewed. Mail is read and telephone messages are either monitored on the spot or recorded and eventually translated.

That's a dramatic improvement. A report by the department's inspector general published earlier this fall found that less than half of inmate phone calls at Supermax were monitored, and during a test period a mere 1.8 percent of mail to and from the prisoners was checked by law enforcement officials.

The "eventually translated" part, however, is the bad news. While the AG asserted that the goal was to monitor all communications in "real time," it's not happening now. The Bureau of Prisons lacks enough translators to interpret messages as they come and go. Which means that instructions to terror networks or outside criminal enterprises could be flowing freely for days, weeks or months (more like months, as we'll explain below) before potentially lethal plans are derailed.

A shortage of Arabic-language translators with the proper security clearance has plagued every intelligence bureau, law enforcement agency and military service since 9/11. Gonzales said as much on Monday.

Even so, any time lags in translation are troubling. Supermax houses the most dangerous criminals in the custody of U.S. law enforcement. These inmates - among their ranks are several plotters of the 1993 World Trade Center bombing and an alleged mastermind of jihadist terror attacks in Spain - pose a unique danger to the outside world. Translating and decoding the contacts these prisoners have with the outside world should have a special urgency.

Until recently, however, deciphering those messages was a low priority for the feds. The IG report said the FBI attempted to produce translations from intercepted letters within 60 days, which is already far too long. In actuality, it could take between six and 18 months to get a useful translation, the report added.

Given the wide latitude Congress has granted the administration to wage the war on terror, not to mention the expansive surveillance powers the White House has asserted on its own, such delays are indefensible.

In our conversation Monday, Gonzales agreed. But he still needs to push his department to finish the job of ending the security risk at SuperMax.

Judge Rejects Request For NSA Documents (AP)

AP, November 21, 2006

WASHINGTON — The National Security Agency is not required to release details about its secret wiretapping program, a federal judge said Monday.

The People for the American Way Foundation, a liberal advocacy group, sued to obtain records under the Freedom of Information Act. The group sought to find out how many wiretaps were approved and who reviewed the program.

President Bush has acknowledged the existence of the program, which he calls the Terrorist Surveillance Program. The National Security Agency monitors phone calls and e-mails between people in the U.S. and people in other countries when a link to terrorism is suspected.

Civil liberties group criticize it as an expansion of presidential power, and a federal judge has said it is unconstitutional. The Justice Department says it is a necessary tool to fight terrorism.

The NSA denied the request for documents, saying the records would jeopardize national security. The advocacy group argued that the law can't be used to protect the government from disclosing details about illegal programs.

U.S. Judge Ellen Segal Huvelle disagreed, saying that even if the program is ultimately determined to be illegal, it doesn't change the fact that the materials are classified and are not covered by the Freedom of Information Act.

DOJ_NMG_0096817

Human-rights Groups Back Dems' Detainee Law Overhaul (HILL)

By Roxana Tiron

The Hill, November 21, 2006

Some human-rights groups are hoping that the Democrats' takeover of Congress will provide the necessary momentum to overhaul the controversial new legislation governing military tribunals.

One of the groups' main goals is to restore habeas corpus rights to military detainees held at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

The writ of habeas corpus would allow the prisoners to have the legal basis of their detention reviewed in court to determine whether they should be released from custody.

"I expect that there will be a serious, bipartisan effort to try and correct some of the more confusing and flawed elements of the Military Commissions Act," said Tom Malinowski, the advocacy director of Human Rights Watch. "The most promising effort would be the one to restore habeas corpus rights to detainees, because it is such a fundamental right."

Sen. Chris Dodd (D-Conn.), a 2008 presidential hopeful who come January will be the second-ranking Democrat on the Foreign Relations Committee, introduced a bill that would amend existing law, including providing habeas corpus protections to military detainees.

Dodd is the first to take direct aim at the controversial tribunal bill, which President Bush signed into law in October.

Sen. Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.), the incoming chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, said he too is in the process of drafting "major changes" to the legislation, including instituting habeas corpus rights for detainees.

Right after the Democrats take over the majority in early January, the Pentagon must report on the new procedures involved in the military commissions to the Senate and House Armed Services committees.

The Democrats may be able to corral enough bipartisan support to push for changes to the law, Malinowski predicted.

"Depending on how they frame [the legislation], they may be able to get some moderate Republicans [to support it]," he said.

One of those centrists is Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), who introduced an amendment when Congress was considering the military tribunal bill in late September that would have reinstated habeas corpus rights. That amendment failed by three votes. Democrats could also enlist the help of Sens. John Sununu (R-N.H.) and Gordon Smith (R-Ore.), who also support reinstating habeas corpus rights.

But Senate Democrats could have a tough time gathering enough support to stave off a White House veto. The Senate passed the military commissions bill by a vote of 65 to 34.

While changing the new law is important, that is not the only remedy, said Elisa Massimino, Washington, D.C. director of Human Rights First.

"We need more oversight and there would need to be hearings held on who exactly is held at Guantanamo Bay," said Massimino.

Oversight hearings into the use of controversial, alternative interrogation techniques, such as those the CIA uses against high-value terrorist suspects, are also imperative, said Massimino.

The confirmation hearings of Robert Gates, outgoing Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld's replacement to head the Pentagon, likely will provide more clues about how Democrats will change laws governing the treatment of military detainees.

Republican presidential hopeful Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) worked hard to pass the Detainee Treatment Act of 2005, which prohibits cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment for all prisoners, despite opposition from the White House and many in his party.

Even before Democrats won the midterm election, Sen. Carl Levin (D-Mich.) had been asking for internal White House legal memos on the administration's interpretation of laws governing detainee treatment.

"Now he can really force these things," Massimino said of Levin, who will be the chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee in January.

Malinowski said he is particularly interested in the Department of Justice memo that specifies what interrogation techniques, including those the CIA uses, are legal in the administration's view.

"They are going to fight tooth and nail not to give that out," he said.

Several House Democrats are following their Senate counterparts' lead and have started considering changes to the military tribunal legislation.

"It is being put together at the committee level right now," said Rep. Neil Abercrombie (D-Hawaii), a veteran of the House Armed Services Committee, who will be a subcommittee chairman in January.

DOJ_NMG_0096818

"I will support any legislative activity to throw that act out at best, and at a minimum reconfigure it to include habeas corpus and other aspects to conform to our constitutional imperative," Abercrombie told The Hill. "At the first legislative opportunity, the issue surrounding military commissions will be taken up."

The committee is considering passing legislation to expedite the judicial review of the new military tribunal law to determine its constitutionality. It's the same provision Dodd included in his bill overhauling the law.

Rep. Ike Skelton (D-Mo.), who will take over the armed services panel next year, said he thought the new law was "unconstitutional."

Meanwhile, Rep. Solomon Ortiz (D-Texas), the third-ranking Democrat on the panel, said he expects to have to deal with the military tribunal legislation one way or the other.

"I am pretty sure it is going to be challenged [in the courts]," he said.

But committee Democrats likely will have a tough opponent in Rep. Duncan Hunter (R-Calif.), who as current chairman played a part in drafting the legislation and who will be the panel's ranking member next year.

"I think it is a solid act," Hunter said yesterday in an interview with reporters. "We should start prosecuting instead of second-guessing."

House Democrats may face larger hurdles than their Senate colleagues in trying to change the tribunal legislation. The House passed the Military Commissions Act by a vote of 253 to 168.

Top-Secret Torture (WP)

The Washington Post, November 21, 2006

The Bush administration claims detainees can't disclose how they were treated.

BURIED WITHIN a recent government brief in the case of Guantanamo Bay inmate Majid Khan is one of the more disturbing arguments the Bush administration has advanced in the legal struggles surrounding the war on terrorism. Mr. Khan was one of the al-Qaeda suspects who was detained in a secret prison of the CIA and subjected to "alternative" interrogation tactics -- the administration's chilling phrase for methods most people regard as torture. Now the government is arguing that by subjecting detainees to such treatment, the CIA gives them "top secret" classified information -- and the government can then take extraordinary measures to keep them quiet about it. If this argument carries the day, it will make virtually impossible any accountability for the administration's treatment of top al-Qaeda detainees. And it will also ensure that key parts of any military trials get litigated in secrecy.

Mr. Khan is one of 14 people transferred to Guantanamo earlier this year from the CIA's secret prison program. After his transfer, lawyers seeking to represent him asked for an order granting them access on the same terms as lawyers representing other detainees. The government objected on two main grounds. It contended that the court lacks jurisdiction because of two new laws that strip federal courts of authority over detainee matters. That may well be correct, and Judge Reggie B. Walton agreed last week that any consideration of counsel access should wait until the court of appeals rules on the jurisdictional question.

But the government also argues that Mr. Khan is different from previous Guantanamo inmates; their lawyers are cleared to see information classified at the "secret" level. The CIA program, however, involves top-secret information, so lawyers for Mr. Khan would have to be cleared at a higher level -- and access would have to take place under more restrictive circumstances.

The trouble is that at least some of the secrets the government is trying to protect are the very techniques used against people such as Mr. Khan -- and its means of protecting them is to muzzle him about what the CIA did to him. CIA official Marilyn A. Dorn said in an affidavit that Mr. Khan might reveal "the conditions of detention and specific alternative interrogation procedures." In other words, grossly mistreating a detainee now justifies keeping him quiet.

The problem with this argument is not just its Kafkaesque sheen. If the courts accept it, it would have vast practical implications. The integrity of any military trials of the high-value detainees will depend on their excluding evidence obtained by unduly coercive means. By the logic of the government's argument, however, all of that litigation will have to take place in secret. Detainees are also supposed to be able to appeal their status as enemy combatants to the federal appeals court here in Washington. The government's logic would all but assure that the bulk of any such appeal would be secret as well. So accepting this theory would mean that no claim of torture could be resolved in a transparent and accountable fashion. Given the importance of open trials for the high-value detainees, it's hard to imagine a principle that would more thwart the effort to bring them credibly to justice.

Reno Files Challenge To Terror Law (AP)

By Matt Apuzzo, The Associated Press

AP, November 21, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0096819

WASHINGTON (AP) — Former Attorney General Janet Reno and seven other former Justice Department officials filed court papers Monday arguing that the Bush administration is setting a dangerous precedent by trying a suspected terrorist outside the court system.

It was the first time that Reno, attorney general in the Clinton administration, has spoken out against the administration's policies on terrorism detainees, underscoring how contentious the court fight over the nation's new military commissions law has become. Former attorneys general rarely file court papers challenging administration policy.

Suspected al-Qaida sleeper agent Ali Saleh Kahlah al-Marri is the only detainee being held in the United States.

The former prosecutors challenged the Justice Department's right to bring al-Marri before a military commission.

A citizen of Qatar, he was arrested in 2001 while studying in the United States. He had faced criminal charges until authorities designated him an enemy combatant and ordered him held at a naval base in South Carolina.

The Justice Department said in court papers last week that a new anti-terrorism law strips detainees such as al-Marri of the right to challenge their imprisonment in court.

"The government is essentially asserting the right to hold putative enemy combatants arrested in the United States indefinitely whenever it decides not to prosecute those people criminally — perhaps because it would be too difficult to obtain a conviction, perhaps because a motion to suppress evidence would raise embarrassing facts about the government's conduct, or perhaps for other reasons," the former Justice Department officials said.

Some of the eight attorneys named in the document are now in private practice and represent detainees at the military base in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. Most served under President Clinton, though the list includes former U.S. Attorneys W. Thomas Dillard and Anton R. Valukas, who served under President Reagan.

"The existing criminal justice system is more than up to the task of prosecuting and bringing to justice those who plan or attempt terrorist acts within the United States — without sacrificing any of the rights and protections that have been the hallmarks of the American legal system for more than 200 years," the attorneys wrote.

The al-Marri matter is before the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Richmond, Va., and is one of three appeals court cases that will help determine the scope of the new military commissions law. That law allows the CIA to use tough — but undefined — interrogation techniques and says detainees may not use civilian courts to challenge their imprisonment.

Human rights groups have challenged the law. The former prosecutors wrote that they worried the government would increasingly use the law to avoid criminal trials "and the rights associated with them, such as the defendant's right to counsel and the government's obligation to prove guilt beyond a reasonable doubt."

The government was standing behind its position, Justice Department spokeswoman Kathleen Blomquist said in a statement Monday night.

"These are complex and difficult legal issues, and while we respect the right of other legal minds to be heard on these issues, we believe we are on firm legal footing in this case as both the magistrate judge and district court concluded," Blomquist said.

Last weekend, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales defended the nation's handling of the detainees. He said they are afforded more rights than required.

"What is extraordinary, in other words, is how much — not how little — our law protects enemy combatants," he said.

Islamic Charity Tries Anew To Lose Label (AP)

By Matt Apuzzo, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 21, 2006

WASHINGTON — A Missouri-based Islamic charity accused of being part of an international terrorist organization tried to distance itself in federal court Monday from a Sudanese group suspected of financing al-Qaida.

The Treasury Department considers the Islamic American Relief Agency, of Columbia, Mo., to be an arm of the Islamic African Relief Agency, a Sudanese group accused of providing financial support to Osama bin Laden, al-Qaida and Hamas.

The FBI raided the charity's office in Missouri and the homes of people affiliated with the group nationwide. Since then, the 20-year-old charity has been unable to raise money.

Attorney Shereef Hadi Akeel told the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit that the charity was not part of the Sudanese group. The organizations have independent leaders and separate bank accounts, he said.

If the two groups were the same, Akeel said, when the Missouri group wanted to move money into Sudan, it would have simply transferred it. Instead, he said the charity sought U.S. permission.

A federal judge rejected the group's lawsuit in 2005, finding enough evidence to support the Treasury Department's decision. The three-judge appeals panel seemed hesitant to reject that finding Monday, asking few questions and noting that it would need to see clear evidence to overturn the agency's decision.

DOJ_NMG_0096820

The Justice Department pointed to the Missouri charity's own tax and corporate documents, which list the charity as a chapter or affiliate of the Sudanese group.

Akeel said that in the world of aid organizations, charities in the U. S. frequently partner with groups in impoverished areas.

The judges heard both public and classified testimony Monday and did not rule on the case.

No Transfer For Guantánamo Detainee (AP)

By Matt Apuzzo

AP, November 21, 2006

WASHINGTON - The U.S. military is not required to send a Guantánamo Bay detainee to a civilian hospital for medical treatment, a federal judge said Monday, leaving the prisoner to choose between having a heart procedure performed at the military base or not at all.

Saifullah A. Paracha, a 59-year-old multimillionaire Pakistani businessman and television producer, argued that the procedure was too risky to be handled anywhere but in a cardiac unit. He asked to be transferred to a hospital in the United States or Pakistan.

The procedure, called cardiac catheterization, is used to detect heart problems such as blockages. A doctor inserts a plastic tube into a vein and slides it into the heart or nearby coronary arteries to measure blood pressure or oxygen levels.

If something goes wrong, Paracha's attorney said, doctors could need to perform emergency heart surgery.

Doctors successfully completed an identical procedure at Guantánamo Bay in 2003, the Justice Department said. Special medical equipment and personnel were available, attorneys said, making transferring Paracha an unnecessary security risk.

JUDGE AGREES

U.S. District Judge Paul L. Friedman agreed, saying the government regularly decides how best to treat civilian prisoners inside the United States and judges rarely intervene.

Paracha twice met with Osama bin Laden, but his attorney said it was in hopes of landing a television interview. Paracha, who lived in the United States for 16 years, denies making investments for al Qaeda, translating statements for bin Laden, joining in explosives-smuggling or recommending that nuclear weapons be used against U.S. soldiers.

Doctors will not perform the procedure without Paracha's consent. Attorney Gaillard Hunt said Paracha, who has a history of heart problems, may decide not to be treated if the procedure is done at the base.

"That's true of any prisoner anywhere," Friedman replied. ``There are lots of people who aren't detainees anywhere who choose not to have procedures done that their doctors believe should be done. If that's his choice, that's his choice."

Friedman said he was troubled by Hunt's claims that military officials shackled Paracha's hands and feet to his hospital bed during previous medical tests and did not release him even to eat.

ATTORNEYS' WARNING

In legal documents, Paracha's attorneys said there would be diplomatic consequences in Pakistan if he died.

"His death in U.S. captivity would be a blow to American prestige in that area, even under the best of circumstances," attorneys wrote. ``If anything happened to him while he was being treated in an irregular or inadequate facility, the reaction would be unpredictable."

Paracha's attorneys can appeal Friedman's ruling.

In July, his son, Uzair Paracha, was convicted of agreeing to help an al Qaeda operative with terrorist designs sneak into the United States. A U.S. District Court judge in New York sentenced the son to 30 years in federal prison.

2nd Man Charged In Terrorism TV Case (NSDY/AP)

By Larry Neumeister, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, November 21, 2006

NEW YORK -- A man was charged Monday with supporting terrorists by enabling customers to obtain satellite broadcasts of a Hezbollah television station, the second person accused in a case that has drawn scrutiny over how far the government can go in claiming someone is aiding terrorist groups.

Saleh Elahwal, 53, of Matawan, N.J., and Javed Iqbal, 42, of Staten Island, could each face up to 110 years in prison if they are convicted of all 11 counts in a rewritten indictment unsealed Monday in U.S. District Court in Manhattan. They pleaded not guilty.

Lawyers for both declined to comment outside court. Prosecutors said weeks ago they planned to bring additional charges as they as they collect evidence and build a case.

DOJ_NMG_0096821

Iqbal, a Pakistani businessman, was charged in August with helping his customers receive broadcasts of al Manar, which was designated by the U.S. government this year as a global terrorist entity. At the time, the charges against him carried a potential prison term of five years.

Al Manar, launched in 1991, features news programming that promotes Hezbollah's positions and shows statements from the terror group and speeches from its leader, the government has said.

As part of their probe, FBI agents searched two storefronts in Brooklyn where Iqbal worked and at his residence, where multiple satellite dishes helped him distribute the broadcasts to New York-area customers through a Brooklyn company called HDTV Limited, prosecutors said.

The indictment accused the men of carrying out the scheme from September 2005 through August.

Iqbal's representatives criticized the government's case after his August arrest, saying his First Amendment rights were violated.

Prodi Removes Top Intelligence Chiefs (FT)

By Tony Barber

Financial Times, November 21, 2006

Three top intelligence officials were removed on Monday in the most abrupt shake-up of Italy's espionage community since the current structures were established almost 30 years ago.

The government of Romano Prodi removed the chief of the national military intelligence agency, whom prosecutors want to put on trial for involvement in the suspected kidnapping by CIA agents of an Egyptian imam in February 2003.

It also replaced the head of the domestic secret service and the chief of an intelligence co-ordinating committee that reports to the political authorities.

The shake-up signalled the determination of the centre-left prime minister to assert his authority in this most delicate of policy arenas.

Pino Sgobio, a communist parliamentarian and member of Mr Prodi's ruling coalition, said he hoped that the new intelligence chiefs would work in a transparent manner "after the recent dark years of their predecessors".

The most damaging affair concerns Nicolò Pollari, the head of Sismi, the military intelligence service. Prosecutors plan to ask a judge to try him on charges of involvement in the abduction of Osama Mustafa Hassan Nasr in Milan almost four years ago.

The prosecutors allege that the imam, a terror suspect also known as Abu Omar, was kidnapped by a team of CIA agents and sent to Egypt for interrogation under the US administration's programme of "extraordinary rendition".

The prosecutors suspect Mr Pollari co-operated in the CIA operation, of which they say they have extensive proof in the form of transcripts of intercepted telephone calls, photographs and other material.

Mr Pollari denies the allegation and told a parliamentary committee in August he had not authorised any action contrary to Italian law.

At the time of the imam's abduction, Mr Pollari reported to the centre-right government of Silvio Berlusconi, Mr Prodi's predecessor, who was a fervent supporter of the US "war on terror".

Some intelligence experts say it is doubtful that the CIA did not seek at least tacit approval from Mr Berlusconi's government for the operation, but the former premier and his political allies deny prior knowledge of the kidnapping.

In a sign that Mr Prodi wants to keep a close eye on an affair that goes to the heart of US-Italian relations, his office said Mr Pollari had not been sacked but had been assigned an undisclosed "important special post" reporting directly to the premier.

Mr Pollari, 63, was replaced as head of Sismi by Bruno Branciforte, 59, a naval intelligence expert. At Sisde, the domestic secret service, Mario Mori, 67, was replaced by Franco Gabrielli, 46, who is highly regarded for having recently dismantled a Red Brigades terrorist cell.

Since the creation of Italy's democratic political system in the late 1940s, the intelligence services have played a prominent and often bitterly criticised role in battling home-grown terrorism, of the extreme-left and extreme-right varieties.

Various acts of far-right terrorism that took place from the late 1960s to the 1980s were attributed to rogue elements in the secret services, and judicial inquiries into these events were sometimes obstructed by the agencies.

The Curse Of Rendition (FT)

Financial Times, November 21, 2006

The decision yesterday by the government of Romano Prodi, the Italian prime minister, to sack his country's head of military intelligence and two other spy chiefs is yet another reminder of how leading European countries have colluded in the shameful and destructive practice of "rendition" - a programme run by the US Central Intelligence Agency to kidnap and transport beyond the reach of the law suspects in the "war on terror".

DOJ_NMG_0096822

Prosecutors suspect Nicolò Pollari, head of Italy's Sismi agency, of involvement in the CIA's abduction in Milan of Osama Hassan Mustafa Nasr in February 2003. The radical Egyptian cleric was then flown to Cairo where he claims - credibly, given Egypt's human rights record - to have been tortured.

While there may well be other motives behind Rome's move - allegations that an associate of Mr Pollari attempted to smear Mr Prodi, fears for the safety of Italian troops in Iraq, Afghanistan and Lebanon and a wish to embarrass Silvio Berlusconi, the previous Italian prime minister, are all adduced as possible reasons - this looks like a rare attempt to hold someone to account for "rendition".

The word itself - which ranks with euphemisms such as "friendly fire" or "collateral damage" - is perversely misleading. Behind its bogus legalism lies a practice of lawlessness, captured in chilling detail in a Council of Europe report last June, implicating more than a dozen European countries.

These countries, among them Britain, Germany, Spain, Poland, Sweden and Turkey, stand accused of complicity in kidnapping and the outsourcing of torture to friendly despots, at a network of secret sites for "ghost prisoners" denied legal process.

The unusual detail of the Council of Europe report and newspaper accounts provoked a storm of bluster and obfuscation, masking panic at the leakiness of the intelligence services that provided most of the information and a determination to shoot the messenger rather than heed the message.

The message could not be clearer. It is a capitulation by liberal societies to their enemies, a surrender of the rule of law to jihadi totalitarianism, to sink into such practices - whatever semantic evasions are used to describe them. As the Financial Times has persistently argued: we should not need to make the case against torture. It is morally depraved. It corrodes the society that condones it. It elicits largely worthless information. Full stop.

It is hard to exaggerate the extent to which policies such as "rendition" and the abuses practised at Abu Ghraib and Guantánamo have handed propaganda triumphs to the jihadis - harder still to undo the damage to US and western reputations. A start might be made if those high up the chain of command - such as Donald Rumsfeld, the now defenestrated US defence secretary - were called to account for their actions. Italy may have started this process.

Germany Detained Six In Terror Inquiry (NYT)

By Mark Landler

The New York Times, November 21, 2006

FRANKFURT, Nov. 20 — German authorities, investigating an alleged plot to hide an explosive device aboard a passenger jet here last summer, detained six men on Friday on suspicion of belonging to a terrorist group.

All but one of the men was released the following day, the federal prosecutor in Karlsruhe said on Monday.

But German authorities said they are investigating additional people whom they believe sought to bribe an employee at Frankfurt Airport to place a bomb aboard the plane in luggage.

The plot was in its very early stages, the prosecutor said, and it may have foundered because of a dispute over how much to pay the airport employee. He was operating inside the security zone at the airport, which is Europe's third busiest after Heathrow, serving London, and Charles de Gaulle, serving Paris.

A spokesman for the prosecutor did not disclose the identity or nationalities of the suspects. German news organizations, citing unnamed police officials, reported that the men were from the Middle East, possibly from Jordan. The newspaper, Die Welt, said on its Web site that the target was the Israeli state airline El Al.

Police also raided several houses and apartments on Friday in several towns in west central Germany. The man who remains in custody is being questioned on a separate matter, the prosecutor said.

Germany has been on edge about a terrorist attack since August, when two bombs in suitcases were placed on trains near Cologne but failed to detonate. Police arrested a Lebanese student in Germany, who told them he was angry about cartoons in Danish papers that lampooned the Prophet Mohammed.

Security at European airports has come under heightened scrutiny since August, when police in Britain foiled a plot to carry explosives in liquid form on to airliners bound for the United States.

Last month, citing security risks, French authorities stripped access badges from 72 Muslim workers at Charles de Gaulle Airport north of Paris, because the workers had either traveled to Pakistan or Afghanistan, or were suspected of having ties to extremist Islamic groups.

Robert A. Payne, a spokesman for Fraport, which operates the Frankfurt airport, declined to comment.

DOJ_NMG_0096823

A German expert on terrorism, Rolf Tophoven, said the report of the alleged Frankfurt plot was alarming because it suggested that terrorists were seeking ways around the tight security checks that are now common at major airports.

"This is a new tactical development, because they tried to infiltrate the security infrastructure by hiring a person who had access to the airfield and aircraft," Mr. Tophoven said. "You can protect an airfield with electronic fences and X-rays, but you can't protect against human weakness."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Military Documents Hold Tips On Antiwar Activities (NYT)

By Eric Lichtblau And Mark Mazzetti

The New York Times, November 21, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 20 — An antiterrorist database used by the Defense Department in an effort to prevent attacks against military installations included intelligence tips about antiwar planning meetings held at churches, libraries, college campuses and other locations, newly disclosed documents show.

One tip in the database in February 2005, for instance, noted that "a church service for peace" would be held in the New York City area the next month. Another entry noted that antiwar protesters would be holding "nonviolence training" sessions at unidentified churches in Brooklyn and Manhattan.

The Defense Department tightened its procedures earlier this year to ensure that only material related to actual terrorist threats — and not peaceable First Amendment activity — was included in the database.

The head of the office that runs the military database, which is known as Talon, said Monday that material on antiwar protests should not have been collected in the first place.

"I don't want it, we shouldn't have had it, not interested in it," said Daniel J. Baur, the acting director of the counterintelligence field activity unit, which runs the Talon program at the Defense Department. "I don't want to deal with it."

Mr. Baur said that those operating the database had misinterpreted their mandate and that what was intended as an antiterrorist database became, in some respects, a catch-all for leads on possible disruptions and threats against military installations in the United States, including protests against the military presence in Iraq.

"I don't think the policy was as clear as it could have been," he said. Once the problem was discovered, he said, "we fixed it," and more than 180 entries in the database related to war protests were deleted from the system last year. Out of 13,000 entries in the database, many of them uncorroborated leads on possible terrorist threats, several thousand others were also purged because he said they had "no continuing relevance."

Amid public controversy over the database, leads from so-called neighborhood watch programs and other tips about possible threats are down significantly this year, Mr. Baur said. While the system had been tightened, he said he was concerned that the public scrutiny had created "a huge chilling effect" that could lead the military to miss legitimate terrorist threats.

Mr. Baur was responding to the latest batch of documents produced by the military under a Freedom of Information Act request brought by the American Civil Liberties Union and other groups. The A.C.L.U. planned to release the documents publicly on Tuesday, and officials with the group said they would push for Democrats, newly empowered in Congress, to hold formal hearings about the Talon database.

Ben Wizner, a lawyer for the A.C.L.U. in New York, said the new documents suggested that the military's efforts to glean intelligence on protesters went beyond what was previously known. If intelligence officials "are going to be doing investigations or monitoring in a place where people gather to worship or to study, they should have a pretty clear indication that a crime has occurred," Mr. Wizner added.

The leader of one antiwar group mentioned repeatedly in the latest military documents provided to the A.C.L.U. said he was skeptical that the military had ended its collection of material on war protests.

"I don't believe it," said the leader, Michael T. McPhearson, a former Army captain who is the executive director of Veterans for Peace, a group in St. Louis.

Mr. McPhearson said he found the references to his group in the Talon database disappointing but not altogether surprising, and he said the group continued to use public settings and the Internet to plan its protests.

"We don't have anything to hide," he said. "We're not doing anything illegal."

The latest Talon documents showed that the military used a variety of sources to collect intelligence leads on antiwar protests, including an agent in the Department of Homeland Security, Google searches on the Internet and e-mail messages forwarded by apparent informants with ties to protest groups.

DOJ_NMG_0096824

In most cases, entries in the Talon database acknowledged that there was no specific evidence indicating the possibility of terrorism or disruptions at the antiwar events, but they warned of the potential for violence.

One entry on Mr. McPhearson's group from April 2005, for instance, described a protest at New Mexico State University in Las Cruces at which members handed out antimilitary literature and set up hundreds of white crosses to symbolize soldiers killed in Iraq.

"Veterans for Peace is a peaceful organization," the entry said, but added there was potential that future protests "could become violent."

6 Imams Removed From Twin Cities Flight (AP)

By Steve Karnowski, ASSOCIATED PRESS WRITER

AP, November 21, 2006

MINNEAPOLIS -- Six Muslim imams were removed from a US Airways flight at Minneapolis-St. Paul International Airport on Monday and questioned by police for several hours before being released, a leader of the group said.

The six were among passengers who boarded Flight 300, bound for Phoenix, around 6:30 p.m., airport spokesman Pat Hogan said.

A passenger initially raised concerns about the group through a note passed to a flight attendant, according to Andrea Rader, a spokeswoman for US Airways. She said police were called after the captain and airport security workers asked the men to leave the plane and the men refused.

"They took us off the plane, humiliated us in a very disrespectful way," said Omar Shahin, of Phoenix.

The six Muslim scholars were returning from a conference in Minneapolis of the North American Imams Federation, said Shahin, president of the group. Five of them were from the Phoenix-Tempe area, while one was from Bakersfield, Calif., he said.

Three of them stood and said their normal evening prayers together on the plane, as 1.7 billion Muslims around the world do every day, Shahin said. He attributed any concerns by passengers or crew to ignorance about Islam.

"I never felt bad in my life like that," he said. "I never. Six imams. Six leaders in this country. Six scholars in handcuffs. It's terrible."

Ibrahim Hooper, spokesman for the Washington-based Council on American-Islamic Relations, expressed anger at the detentions.

"CAIR will be filing a complaint with relevant authorities in the morning over the treatment of the imams to determine whether the incident was caused by anti-Muslim hysteria by the passengers and/or the airline crew," Hooper said. "Because, unfortunately, this is a growing problem of singling out Muslims or people perceived to be Muslims at airports, and it's one that we've been addressing for some time."

Hooper said the meeting drew about 150 imams from all over the country, and that those attending included U.S. Rep.-elect Keith Ellison, D-Minneapolis, who just became the first Muslim elected to Congress. Shahin said they went as far as notifying police and the FBI about their meeting in advance.

Shahin expressed frustration that - despite extensive efforts by him and other Muslim leaders since even before the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks - so many Americans know so little about Islam.

"If up to now they don't know about prayers, this is a real problem," he said.

Reached by cell phone just after his release, Shahin said he didn't know where they would spend the night or how they would try to get back to Phoenix on Tuesday. Hooper said US Airways refused to put the men on another flight.

Hogan said more information would likely be released Tuesday.

The other passengers on the flight, which was carrying 141 passengers and five crew members, were re-screened for boarding, Rader said. The plane took off about three hours after the men were removed from the flight.

Learn The Rules Before You Go (USAT)

By Kip Hawley

USA Today, November 21, 2006

At the Transportation Security Administration, our primary mission is to ensure the security of air travel. We use many layers to accomplish this, the most visible layers occurring when passengers go through the security line. TSA and our partners in law enforcement, airlines and airports handle the security work, but we also depend on travelers to be active participants by being prepared when they arrive at the airport.

Passengers can have a huge impact in making the process go smoothly and quickly for everyone. Take a minute to learn the rules before going to the airport (www.TSA.gov). The new liquid rules are simple: Put them in a checked bag, or put travel-size items in a baggie and put that in a bin at the checkpoint. 3-1-1 is the rule: containers 3 ounces or less, in a 1-quart zip-top bag, one per passenger.

DOJ_NMG_0096825

This process is based on serious science and security reasoning. It assures that a completed bomb is not brought through. Liquids (and everything else) sold after the checkpoint have a separate security system that allows them to be brought on planes safely.

Please respect the job our security officers are doing on your behalf. They use their training and experience to sort out threats among the busy flow of travelers. It is a demanding job and requires intense focus while working pleasantly with the public. The checkpoint is not the place to debate the merits of various security measures.

The discretion carried out by our 43,000 Transportation Security Officers may mean that passengers might occasionally encounter slightly varying decisions at security checkpoints. Our goal is common sense security. To avoid absurd situations resulting from a mechanical enforcement of the rules, TSA entrusts its security officers to make decisions based on their training and judgment.

TSA and travelers partner every day to make the security process efficient. During the holiday period, we ask for a little extra preparation and patience as our security officers focus their efforts on protecting you.

Kip Hawley is the administrator of the Transportation Security Administration.

Fliers Aren't Giving Thanks For Fickle TSA Rules, Screeners (USAT)

USA Today, November 21, 2006

Thousands of infrequent fliers will take to the skies this Thanksgiving week, giving the government's latest rules for what can be carried on board an unparalleled stress test. A word of warning: Be prepared.

Since a plot to bomb jetliners with liquid explosives was broken up in London last August, flying has proved a little less convenient and a lot more confusing.

Initially, liquids and gels in carry-ons were banned. With passengers carrying less, they got through inspections and boarding quicker, but plenty complained about being left without toothpaste, cosmetics and such.

So in September, the Transportation Security Administration relaxed the rules, allowing fliers to carry on 3-ounce containers of toiletries, liquids and cosmetics in a 1-quart plastic bag. That made travel more convenient but also more confusing. The rules are so complicated that they aren't applied consistently.

Some curious results have followed.

Last Wednesday, according to dotcom executive Sandra Jerez, screeners at New York's LaGuardia Airport confiscated two 3-ounce bottles of breast milk she wanted to carry on board. She had pumped the milk while on a business trip to take home to her 5-month-old son.

The New York screeners were wrong. As long as the milk was in the right size bottles, it should have been allowed.

Also wrong was the advice Jerez received earlier in the day from screeners at Washington's Reagan National. They said the answer would depend on the screeners' discretion.

“The rules should be the rules,” Jerez said. “Shouldn't they?”

Absolutely. Fliers can live with restrictions, but only if they can understand what the restrictions are.

Also this month, computer instructor Gene Henriksen was told that he couldn't carry on 2-ounce unmarked bottles of toiletries at airports in Newport News, Va., and Atlanta because the bottles weren't labeled. That's incorrect.

When Henriksen called the TSA's helpline, he was told it was “up to the local agent.”

Wrong, again.

While TSA screeners must make judgment calls — and fliers must comply — screeners should be reading from the same playbook, and that playbook needs to be simple enough that it's easily understood.

It isn't. It's also a moving target. Earlier this month, when the European Union issued carry-on rules quite similar — but not identical — to U.S. rules, several airlines published the “updated” rules on their websites, saying passengers could bring 100 milliliters or 3.4 ounces of liquids on board. According to a Northwest Airlines spokesman, the airline was simply following up on a TSA security directive.

The slight change muddied the issue for no good reason. Screeners are eyeballing the containers, not measuring them; 100 milliliters is merely a common size in Europe.

The TSA is now asking airlines to simplify their message, using 3 ounces. Good move. But whether everyone is ready for the busiest travel weekend of the year is very much in doubt.

Passengers and screeners alike will have to give a little. That bottle of mouthwash isn't really worth arguing about, is it? Given the hassle, is it even worth carrying on board?

More than anything, flying this week requires 3 ounces (or 100 milliliters, if you like) of common sense.

DOJ_NMG_0096826

A Pointed Reminder For Security Screeners (WP)

By Michelle Boorstein

The Washington Post, November 21, 2006

Feel frustrated when a jangling bracelet or pocket full of coins sets off security screeners as you make your way into a government building? Consider the Sikhs, whose religion requires them to always wear a dagger.

The centuries-old requirement has collided with beefed-up, post-Sept. 11 rules that no longer allow people to leave legal weapons and other banned items with security guards working in such buildings as courthouses and federal offices. In two dozen cases in the past two years, Sikhs have been arrested, threatened with arrest or harassed in disputes with guards over the ceremonial kirpan, according to the Sikh American Legal Defense and Education Fund.

In an effort to bridge the culture-security gap, the Homeland Security Department and the Sikh legal group yesterday unveiled a poster meant to help screeners through these interactions. The poster, which will be distributed to federal facilities across the country, shows photos of different kirpans, ranging from a symbolic necklace some women wear to the more common three- to six-inch daggers, as well as full-on swords. Sikhs often wear them under their clothing, bound to them by a cloth body holster.

The kirpan, one of five items baptized Sikhs are required to wear, is meant as a reminder of the duty to uphold justice. The others are reminders of other things: the kesh, or Sikhs' uncut hair, to live as God created you; kanga, a wooden comb, to remain neat; kara, a bracelet, to do good deeds; and kachera, or large underwear, to remain chaste and faithful sexually.

"These articles are a constant reminder to me of what my duties are," said Manjit Singh, co-founder and chairman of the legal fund.

Although Sikhs still can't take the wooden- or steel-handled knives -- which sometimes have blunted tips -- into government buildings, the poster tells security workers how to navigate the situation.

"Respectfully ask if a Sikh is carrying a kirpan. If so, request to inspect the kirpan," the poster reads. "If a kirpan must be confiscated, explain the reason(s) why and handle the kirpan with respect and care."

Sikhs are accustomed to packing their kirpan in their luggage when they fly. They also went through a similar education campaign after Sept. 11 about the turbans Sikh men are required to wear. Turbans are often made of 20 feet of fabric, and taking them off and putting them on are elaborate processes.

"For Sikh Americans, this is a huge and significant accomplishment," Singh said of the poster, which tells screeners to "show respect to all variations of faith."

Chemical Weapons' Disposal Delayed (USAT)

By Peter Eisler

USA Today, November 21, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Pentagon has extended its timeline to destroy its aging chemical weapons arsenal until 2023, despite concerns by Congress and watchdog groups that the stockpiles raise the risk of an accident or theft by terrorists.

The new schedule, outlined in Pentagon documents obtained by USA TODAY, means the military won't eliminate its stocks of deadly nerve gases and skin-blistering agents until 11 years after the 2012 deadline set by the international Chemical Weapons Convention. The U.S. government had already asked for a five-year extension from an earlier 2007 deadline.

Communities near the seven sites where weapons are stockpiled have long complained about the delays. Congress echoed those concerns this year, when it called eliminating the stockpiles “a homeland security imperative” and directed the Pentagon in a defense bill to “make every effort” to destroy them by the convention deadline or “soon thereafter.”

Pentagon spokesman Chris Isleib said the delay is the result of several factors, including technological challenges in developing and building disposal plants, regulatory delays, and safety and security issues. Even so, he said the military remains committed to the job and that the war in Iraq has not drained money from the effort.

“Destroying these weapons safely is not a fast or simple process,” Isleib said.

Disposal facilities, mostly incinerators, are operating at five sites. The new Pentagon plan, however, would slow construction and operating schedules for two remaining plants near Pueblo, Colo., and Richmond, Ky. Those plants, which will neutralize chemical agents instead of burning them, won't finish that work until 2020 and 2023, respectively, the plan shows.

The Pentagon “is again backsliding on its commitment,” Sen. Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., said in a statement.

The projections “are simply unacceptable,” he said. “They would subject the people living near (stockpiles) to the dangers of chemical weapons until well into the 2020s.”

DOJ_NMG_0096827

The military has destroyed 41% of its 31,500-ton chemical arsenal, which includes weapons such as rockets and caches of raw chemical agents. A Pentagon report in April showed that projected costs for destroying all stockpiles have climbed from $2 billion in 1986 to $32 billion today.

Critics say the plan to slow spending and stretch construction at the remaining disposal plants will raise costs and create needless risks of an accidental chemical release or terrorist attack.

"To intentionally put tens of thousands of Americans at an unnecessary risk by continuing to store these weapons is reprehensible," said Craig Williams of the Chemical Weapons Working Group, a Kentucky-based coalition of citizen groups from stockpile sites. "Not only are they ignoring our international treaty obligations, they are undermining the military's … obligation to protect U.S. citizens."

WAR NEWS:

Bush Denies Decision On Altering Iraq Troop Levels (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo In Washington

Financial Times, November 21, 2006

George W. Bush said he had made no decisions on altering troop numbers in Iraq on Monday following reports that the Pentagon was considering a temporary boost to curb sectarian violence in Baghdad.

The Washington Post reported on Monday that a Pentagon team reviewing Iraq policy was considering several options, including a temporary troop increase to accelerate the training of Iraq forces and curb sectarian bloodshed.

"I haven't made any decisions about troop increases or troop decreases,'' Mr Bush said in Indonesia.

In addition to the Pentagon policy "scrub" – which is being overseen by the uniformed military – the White House has ordered a review to consider new policies to address the Iraq chaos, which has claimed the lives of 2,855 US soldiers and tens of thousands of Iraqi civilians.

The Iraq Study Group, a Congress-mandated review led by James Baker, former secretary of state, and Lee Hamilton, former Democratic congressman, is next month expected to produce its recommendations for a policy shift on Iraq. In addition to recommending a boost in support for training Iraqi troops, its report is expected to call for the White House to talk to Iran and Syria – which the Pentagon has accused of fomenting parts of the insurgency – about finding ways to stabilise Iraq.

While the Pentagon is still completing its review, General John Abizaid, the top US commander in the Middle East, last week told Congress he believed the US had the correct number of troops in Iraq. His comments drew criticism from John McCain, widely seen as Republican frontrunner for the 2008 presidential race, who said he was disappointed that the military was pursuing a course of "status quo".

In the wake of their US mid-term election victory, Democrats have argued that the US public voted for change in Iraq, which they say should equate to troop withdrawals, a move that Gen Abizaid last week said would exacerbate sectarian violence in Iraq. Some influential Republicans such as Mr McCain and Lindsey Graham, the South Carolina senator, want the White House to increase troops in Iraq.

Over the past couple of weeks, however, Mr McCain has hinted that he may support withdrawing from Iraq if the White House does not boost troops to a level he believes necessary to achieve success in Iraq. He has said it would be "immoral" to send troops back to Iraq if US policy is simply going to result in delaying defeat.

Bush Weighs Next Step On Troops In Iraq (AP-Y)

By Terence Hunt

AP, November 21, 2006

President Bush said Monday he isn't ready to decide between rival calls to increase or scale back U.S. troops in Iraq. Unruffled by street protests against his policy, he said they were a healthy sign of democracy in this Muslim nation.

Facing growing disapproval at home for the Iraq war, Bush heard no criticism or demands for troop cuts from Indonesian President Susilo Bambang Yudhoyono. The Indonesian leader said the "global community must be also responsible in solving the problems in Iraq" along with the United States.

Awaiting the results of a Pentagon review and recommendations from a special commission exploring Iraq options, Bush refused to tip his hand about any change in the level of American forces in Iraq, now at more than 140,000.

Back in the U.S., the Republican chairman of the House Armed Services Committee said more Iraqi troops should be pushed to the front lines. "We need to saddle those up and deploy them to the fight," primarily in Baghdad, said Rep. Duncan Hunter of California.

DOJ_NMG_0096828

Prominent Democrats have called for a timetable for troop withdrawals. Some Republicans — notably potential Republican presidential candidate John McCain — are urging a heavy buildup of forces to quell the violence in Baghdad.

"I haven't made any decisions about troop increases or troop decreases, and won't until I hear from a variety of sources," Bush said, standing alongside Yudhoyono at a news conference in the presidential palace.

Asked specifically whether there were any risks in increasing U.S. troops, Bush said, "There's no need to comment on something that may not happen. But if it were to happen, I will tell you the upsides and downside."

A study of options is under way by a Pentagon group for Gen. Peter Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. Those options include sending more U.S. troops, reducing the force but staying longer or simply pulling out, The Washington Post reported Monday.

Indonesia was the last foreign stop on Bush's eight-day, postelection journey that also has taken him to Singapore and Vietnam. He met in Hanoi with world leaders to seek a common strategy for talks aimed at encouraging North Korea to abandon its nuclear weapons program.

Concerns for Bush's safety in Indonesia were heightened after police warned of an increased risk of attack by al-Qaida-linked militants. Bush is widely disliked in this country because of strong U.S. support for Israel and because of the invasions of Iraq and Afghanistan.

Demonstrations by Islamic hard-liners, students, housewives and taxi drivers have been staged every day this month and nearly 10,000 protesters turned out on Monday, some holding banners that read "Bush is a terrorist!" and "You're not welcome here!"

Bush was unruffled. "People protest, that's a good sign," he said. "It's a sign of a healthy society."

Countering arguments about his goals in the Middle East, Bush said that "to say spreading democracy is anti-religious — it's the opposite of that. Democracy means you can worship any way you choose, freely."

Yudhoyono said any long-term solution in Iraq should involve a national reconciliation, the strengthening of Iraq's government and the involvement of other countries. "We have to combine all those three solutions before actually the United States can determine what the possible policies" should be for withdrawal from Iraq, he said.

Bush's visit was limited to about six hours in the hill town of Bogor, south of Jakarta. Thousands of police and rifle-carrying soldiers patrolled the streets near the presidential palace.

Before an elegant dinner, Bush and his wife, Laura, stopped by a mock classroom in a tent on the palace grounds to showcase U.S. aid for Indonesia's education programs. Chatting with youngsters, Bush was asked about his favorite hobby as a child.

"Baseball. I liked baseball. That was my hobby — sports," he said, before reaching for a more inspirational answer. "The best thing I did was to learn how to read."

Bush returns home to a growing debate about the war, now in its fourth year and with a U.S. death toll of more than 2,860. McCain has called for sending in 20,000 more U.S. troops to curb rising sectarian violence. Bush noted that Pace, the Joint Chiefs chairman, was at work on a thorough review of options for Iraq.

According to senior officials on Pace's staff, the general has asked the group to look at what is going right or wrong in the military conduct of the entire global war on terror and what options are available to make progress.

Indonesia has suffered a string of terrorist attacks against Western interests since 2002, including nightclub and restaurant bombings on the resort island of Bali and blasts at the Australian Embassy and the J.W. Marriott Hotel in the capital.

More than 240 people were killed, many of them tourists, by the attacks blamed on the Southeast Asian terror network Jemaah Islamiyah. While the group has been crippled by hundreds of arrests in recent years, one of its alleged leaders and most deadly operatives, Noordin Top, remains at large.

Bush arrived in Bogor by helicopter in a slashing rain and was driven to the palace in a limousine that bore no U.S. flag. Rather than spend the night, Bush was left for Hawaii where he will have breakfast Tuesday with U.S. troops and visit the U.S. Pacific Command. He will be in Washington on Wednesday for the annual appearance with a Thanksgiving turkey before retiring to the presidential retreat at Camp David for the holiday.

Pentagon May Suggest Short-Term Buildup Leading To Iraq Exit (WP)

By Thomas E. Ricks, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, November 21, 2006

The Pentagon's closely guarded review of how to improve the situation in Iraq has outlined three basic options: Send in more troops, shrink the force but stay longer, or pull out, according to senior defense officials.

DOJ_NMG_0096829

Insiders have dubbed the options "Go Big," "Go Long" and "Go Home." The group conducting the review is likely to recommend a combination of a small, short-term increase in U.S. troops and a long-term commitment to stepped-up training and advising of Iraqi forces, the officials said.

The military's study, commissioned by Joint Chiefs of Staff Chairman Gen. Peter Pace, comes at a time when escalating violence is causing Iraq policy to be reconsidered by both the White House and the congressionally chartered, bipartisan Iraq Study Group. Pace's effort will feed into the White House review, but military officials have made it clear they are operating independently.

The Pentagon group's proceedings are so secret that officials asked to help it have not even been told its title or mandate. But in recent days the circle of those with knowledge of its deliberations has widened beyond a narrow group working for the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

"Go Big," the first option, originally contemplated a large increase in U.S. troops in Iraq to try to break the cycle of sectarian and insurgent violence. A classic counterinsurgency campaign, though, would require several hundred thousand additional U.S. and Iraqi soldiers as well as heavily armed Iraqi police. That option has been all but rejected by the study group, which concluded that there are not enough troops in the U.S. military and not enough effective Iraqi forces, said sources who have been informally briefed on the review.

The sources insisted on anonymity because no one at the Pentagon has been permitted to discuss the review with outsiders. The review group is led by three high-profile colonels -- H.R. McMaster and Peter Mansoor of the Army, and Thomas C. Greenwood of the Marine Corps. None of them would comment for this article.

Spokesmen for the chairman and vice chairman of the Joint Chiefs did not respond to calls or e-mails seeking comment.

"Go Home," the third option, calls for a swift withdrawal of U.S. troops. It was rejected by the Pentagon group as likely to push Iraq directly into a full-blown and bloody civil war.

The group has devised a hybrid plan that combines part of the first option with the second one -- "Go Long" -- and calls for cutting the U.S. combat presence in favor of a long-term expansion of the training and advisory efforts. Under this mixture of options, which is gaining favor inside the military, the U.S. presence in Iraq, currently about 140,000 troops, would be boosted by 20,000 to 30,000 for a short period, the officials said.

The purpose of the temporary but notable increase, they said, would be twofold: To do as much as possible to curtail sectarian violence, and also to signal to the Iraqi government and public that the shift to a "Go Long" option that aims to eventually cut the U.S. presence is not a disguised form of withdrawal.

Even so, there is concern that such a radical shift in the U.S. posture in Iraq could further damage the standing of its government, which U.S. officials worry is already shaky. Under the hybrid plan, the short increase in U.S. troop levels would be followed by a long-term plan to radically cut the presence, perhaps to 60,000 troops.

That combination plan, which one defense official called "Go Big but Short While Transitioning to Go Long," could backfire if Iraqis suspect it is really a way for the United States to moonwalk out of Iraq -- that is, to imitate singer Michael Jackson's trademark move of appearing to move forward while actually sliding backward. "If we commit to that concept, we have to accept upfront that it might result in the opposite of what we want," the official said.

The Pentagon official said this short-term boost could be achieved through three steps: extending the tours of duty of some units already in Iraq, sending other units there earlier than planned and activating some Army Reserve units.

The group concluded that such a step might be necessary because it is concerned that the continuing violence is undercutting the Iraqi government's credibility. "Folks increasingly realize that if violence can't be contained, the spiral downward will continue, the national government will lose the effectiveness it has . . . . and then all bets will be off," the official said.

Also, it would take months to prepare and implement the expansion of the program to train and advise Iraqi forces, he noted. The military would have to find those additional advisers, prepare them for the deployment, get infrastructure in place to house and feed them, order and ship equipment for them to use, and recruit additional Iraqis for them to train.

"The 'Go Long' approach is one that can work if there is sufficient strategic patience, resources appropriated and [if] leadership executes effectively," a military intelligence official said.

Another potential obstacle to the "Go Long" option is that it runs counter to the impulse of many congressional Democrats to find a way to get out of Iraq quickly. Planners envision taking five to 10 more years to create a stable and competent Iraqi army. Because it wouldn't lead to a swift exit, some Democrats could criticize this option as a disguised version of "staying the course."

On the other hand, the hybrid version of "Go Long" may be remarkably close to the recommendation that the Iraq Study Group, led by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former representative Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.). That group's findings, expected to be issued next month, are said to focus on changing the emphasis of U.S. military operations from combating the insurgency to training Iraqis, and also to find ways to increase security in Baghdad and bring neighboring countries into talks about stabilizing Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0096830

The Pentagon group has given a thumbs-down to what it considered variants of withdrawal, such as pulling U.S. units out of the cities and keeping them in isolated enclaves, where they would not interact with the Iraqi population but would be available to combat major insurgent offensives and also to protect the government against coups.

Army Gen. John P. Abizaid, the top U.S. military commander for the Middle East, expressed a similar view last week when he told the Senate Armed Services Committee that he thinks that immediate troop withdrawals would increase the violence in Iraq.

U.S. Considers Large, Temporary Troop Increase In Iraq (NYT)

By David S. Cloud

The New York Times, November 21, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 20 — Pentagon officials conducting a review of Iraq strategy are considering a substantial but temporary increase in American troop levels and the addition of several thousand more trainers to work with Iraqi forces, a senior Defense Department official said Monday.

The idea, dubbed the "surge option" by some officials, would involve increasing American forces by 20,000 troops or more for several months in the hope of improving security, especially in Baghdad. That would mark a sharp rise over the current baseline of 144,000 troops.

But some officials and senior military officers are arguing against the idea, saying that it could undercut a sense of urgency for Iraqi units to take on a greater role in fighting the insurgency and preventing sectarian attacks. Gen. John P. Abizaid, the head of the United States Central Command, told Congress last week that the military was stretched so thin that such an increase could not be sustained over the long term.

"There are people who believe that a short-term surge would have a beneficial impact, but there isn't universal agreement on that yet," said the senior official, who said that President Bush was scheduled to be briefed in the next several weeks on the developing options, which were first reported Monday in The Washington Post.

There is far more consensus within the Pentagon on the need to increase the number of American trainers, more than 3,000 of whom are working with Iraqi Army, police and border units. General Abizaid endorsed that idea in general terms in testimony before the Senate Armed Services Committee last week.

A Pentagon strategy review, ordered by Gen. Peter Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, is backing the idea, as is a separate panel studying Iraq options, led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III, the senior official said.

The number of American advisers, who generally work in 11- to 13-member teams attached to Iraqi units, is likely to end up being doubled, the officials said.

To do that, officials are considering whether they could convert American soldiers in combat units already in Iraq into advisers, working alongside Iraqi security forces, the senior official said. That would reduce the number of Americans exclusively available for combat, but it would enable the advisers' ranks to be increased rapidly, instead of the months it would take to train additional advisers in the United States.

In addition, placing more experienced troops with Iraqi soldiers would augment the Iraqi units' combat power, the official said.

The Pentagon review is being conducted by more than a dozen officers who have served in Iraq and are regarded as some of the military's most experienced thinkers about the problems there. The group appears to have rejected other more radical options, including a rapid withdrawal of American troops from Iraq and a major long-term increase in troop levels, the senior official said.

Some Pentagon officials took issue Monday with the idea that the relatively low-ranking group composed largely of colonels would be drafting options for switching course in Iraq. A Pentagon spokesman, Bryan Whitman, said the group was not charged with developing formal recommendations but rather with giving its views to other members of the Joint Staff.

His comments appeared aimed, at least in part, at reasserting in public the role of the Joint Chiefs, who have been criticized by retired military officers for deferring too much in developing Iraq strategy to Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, who has announced his resignation.

"They're not working on any specific product or report," Mr. Whitman said of the group. "They're providing unfettered views and fresh views." He added that recommendations for shifting strategy would be made by General Pace, "whose job is to advise the president."

DOJ_NMG_0096831

The senior Pentagon official said that increasing the number of American combat troops for an indefinite period "is not on the table." Nor is there active discussion of a rapid troop drawdown advocated by some Democrats, the official said, an approach the official called "turning off the lights and going home."

Though a temporary increase of about 20,000 American troops is under consideration, the plan envisions the additional troops staying only until security conditions improve. After that, troop levels could come down, as better-trained and equipped Iraqi units took on a larger security role.

But even that option would not be easy to accomplish without putting more strain on already-strapped Army and Marine combat units. Officials said it could be done by extending the tours of some units already in Iraq, speeding up the deployment of other units scheduled to go, and activating more reserve units.

"The fact of the matter is that the United States military does have the ability to put more troops on the ground if we need to have more forces on the ground," Mr. Whitman said.

Temporary spikes in troop levels have succeeded in tamping down insurgent violence in Iraq in the past. But several Pentagon officials say they are not sure that the Army can achieve the same results against attacks fueled increasingly by sectarian tension. An increase in American forces this year to more than 140,000 from 128,000 has failed to stem the spike in sectarian attacks, they noted.

Representative Duncan Hunter, a California Republican who is losing the chairmanship of the Armed Services Committee at the end of the year, said at a news conference that rather than sending more American troops, he favored redeploying Iraqi units from largely calm areas to Baghdad and other violence-ridden sections of the country.

"The idea of having the Iraqi battalions that we've stood up and trained 50 to 100 miles away, in areas that are peaceful, simply staying in their barracks while we put together new rotations of Americans to take their place, simply doesn't make sense," he said.

Bush Says No Decision Yet On Troop Levels In Iraq (WP)

By Michael A. Fletcher

The Washington Post, November 21, 2006

BOGOR, Indonesia, Nov. 20 -- President Bush said Monday that he had made no decisions about altering the number of U.S. troops in Iraq, noting that there are "a lot of suggestions" still being evaluated.

"I haven't made any decisions about troop increases or troop decreases, and won't until I hear from a variety of sources, including our own United States military," Bush said. "They will be bringing forth the suggestions and recommendations to me here as quickly as possible."

Bush made his remarks during a news conference here following a meeting with Indonesian President Susilo Bambang Yudhoyono, near the end of an Asian trip that included a stop at the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation forum in Vietnam.

While Bush would not comment on whether he should adjust troop levels, Yudhoyono said the United States should consider disengaging from Iraq, but only in conjunction with increased international cooperation to stabilize and rebuild the country.

"The global community must be also responsible in solving the problem in Iraq," Yudhoyono said. "It is not only the responsibility . . . of the United States."

Several reviews of U.S. options in Iraq are expected to begin recommending changes in the Bush administration's policy -- a process likely to be encouraged by Democrats who won control of the House and Senate in elections this month.

One review, being conducted by the Pentagon, has laid out three basic options: a quick withdrawal, a significant increase in the number of U.S. troops, and an intermediate option that would require an increase in troops, if only for the short term.

Even with the endorsement of a Pentagon panel, or that of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, headed by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former representative Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.), any increase in troops would be controversial, particularly because Democrats in recent months campaigned on the need for a plan to decrease U.S. exposure in the country.

Bush's visit to the world's most populous Muslim nation brought him in close proximity to the anti-American anger that has intensified across the Islamic world since the 2003 U.S. invasion of Iraq. In the days before his arrival, several thousand demonstrators took to the streets in nearby Jakarta to protest Bush's visit, as well as U.S. foreign policy. Other protests were held in cities across the country.

There were reports of threats against the president's party, and security was tight for his arrival. Bush shrugged off the protests, saying: "I applaud a society where people are free to come and express their opinions."

The president did not see any of the protests. After his arrival at the airport in Jakarta, he flew by helicopter to meet with the Indonesian president, even as thunderstorms pounded the area.

DOJ_NMG_0096832

Bush's entire 6 1/2-hour visit to this country, the world's fourth-largest, was confined to the gated and heavily guarded Bogor Palace, an elegant 19th-century compound used for presidential events.

While Bush may be unpopular among many Indonesians, his administration has promoted increasingly close relations with the government here. After Congress suspended military assistance programs with Indonesia in 1992 and again in 1999 in response to human rights violations in East Timor, the programs were restored last year.

Meanwhile, the two nations have cooperated closely on anti-terrorism efforts. Indonesia has been the scene of deadly terrorist assaults, including bombings in Bali in 2002 and 2005 and two others in Jakarta in 2003 and 2004. The United States was also among the first nations to respond following the devastating 2004 tsunami that killed tens of thousands in Indonesia, and it is helping develop an early-warning system for the massive waves.

Before arriving here, Bush spent half a day in Ho Chi Minh City, where his focus remained on the new Vietnam. Rather than taking in any of the sites associated with the Vietnam War, the president visited a research institute working to prevent the spread of avian flu and AIDS. Bush also toured the stock market there, before meeting with business people -- some of whom returned to Vietnam after living in the United States.

"I am amazed at the size of the growth and the fact that there are people beginning to realize dreams," Bush said, praising the nation's recent strong economic development.

When the president arrived in Ho Chi Minh City from Hanoi on Sunday night, Air Force One suffered a brake malfunction upon touchdown, causing a safety system to blow the valves out of six of the plane's tires. While the mishap posed no danger to the president, it almost caused him to use a smaller backup plane for his trip here.

But Air Force mechanics were able to make repairs in time for the president's flight. After his news conference, Bush and first lady Laura Bush were the guests at a dinner, the final official event of Bush's trip to Southeast Asia. Afterward, the president departed for Honolulu, where he was to have breakfast with troops Tuesday and receive a briefing from military commanders before returning to Washington.

In Indonesia, Bush Defends His Iraq Policy (MCT)

By Ron Hutcheson

McClatchy Newspapers, November 21, 2006

BOGOR, Indonesia - With President Bush beside him, the president of the world's most populous Muslim nation called Monday for other countries to help stabilize Iraq and for developing a timetable for withdrawal of U.S. troops.

At a joint news conference, Indonesian President Susilo Bambang Yudhoyono didn't specify which countries should be brought in to help, but he emphasized that "the global community must be also responsible in solving the problems in Iraq."

While he mentioned that the U.S. should work toward "a proper timetable" for "the disengagement of U.S. military forces and other coalition forces from Iraq," he implicitly rejected calls for an abrupt pullout, and Bush said Yudhoyono hadn't urged him to do that.

Bush defended his Iraq policy and didn't rule out sending more U.S. troops to join the approximately 140,000 currently in Iraq.

"I haven't made any decisions about troop increases or troop decreases and won't until I hear from a variety of sources, including our own United States military," he said. He said he hopes to get recommendations from the Pentagon "as quickly as possible."

Of the three obvious options - sending significantly more U.S. troops to Iraq, staying the course or withdrawing immediately - only one has much support, however. The U.S. doesn't have enough troops to increase its presence significantly, and there's wide agreement that a hasty retreat would only leave a bigger mess. So support is coalescing around alterations to the current strategy, perhaps adding 20,000 to 50,000 more troops for a limited time, then beginning a drawdown.

Bush's visit to Indonesia on the final leg of a six-day Asia tour sparked days of protests that continued as he met with Yudhoyono behind the heavily guarded gates of a presidential palace. Bush said he wasn't bothered by protests against him.

"It's to Indonesia's credit that it's a society where people are able to protest and say what they think," Bush said. "It's not the first time, by the way, where people have showed up and expressed their opinion about my policies. But that's what happens when you make hard decisions."

Helmeted police stood shoulder to shoulder to block off streets near the meeting site in Bogor, about 45 miles south of Jakarta. Nearby businesses were forced to close for the day.

The protesters didn't get near the sprawling country estate, and Bush avoided any encounters by traveling by helicopter from the Jakarta airport. The chopper landed at the colonial-era palace in a driving rainstorm, punctuated by at least one lightning strike.

DOJ_NMG_0096833

Both leaders seemed eager to avoid any friction during the seven-hour visit, which was intended to strengthen relations and showcase Indonesia as a model Muslim democracy.

Bush came to Indonesia after wrapping up a weekend trip to Vietnam with a trip to the Ho Chi Minh City stock market, a museum tour and a briefing on efforts to combat AIDS and avian flu. Bush banged a gong to open a trading session at the fledgling stock market.

The market offers investors fewer than 60 stocks and mutual funds, but its mere existence symbolizes the economic changes that are transforming communist Vietnam.

After a quick tour of a history museum, Bush and his wife, Laura, stood in the steaming heat and watched a colorful performance by Vietnamese drummers and dancers. Four shimmering dragons, each propelled by two young boys beneath elaborate sequined costumes, snaked through a flag-waving drill team.

Earlier in the day, White House aides scrambled to come up with alternative travel arrangements after Air Force One suffered six flat tires upon Bush's arrival. A malfunction in the aircraft's braking system overheated the tires, causing their valves to blow out.

The safety feature is intended to prevent a more dangerous tire blowout. Air Force mechanics fixed the problem in time for Bush's departure. The president was scheduled to layover in Hawaii Monday night before returning to Washington on Tuesday.

Bush Says He's Still Weighing New Moves In Iraq (WSJ)

By Yochi J. Dreazen

The Wall Street Journal, November 21, 2006

BOGOR, Indonesia -- President Bush, facing mounting calls to change course in Iraq, said he is still considering sending more American troops to try to quell the violence there.

Speaking to reporters here, Mr. Bush made clear he also is considering withdrawing some troops and said he wouldn't make final decisions until he received recommendations from U.S. military commanders and other government officials currently conducting sweeping reviews of U.S. policy on Iraq.

Mr. Bush specifically cited the work being done by Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, who is making a thorough review of options for Iraq.

"I haven't made any decisions about troop increases or troop decreases, and won't until I hear from a variety of sources, including our own United States military," Mr. Bush said.

The top general in the region told Congress last week that more troops might be necessary in the near term to boost training of the Iraqi military and police. Mr. Bush has often said he would send additional U.S. troops to Iraq if senior commanders there requested them, but his comments yesterday took on additional political significance because of the raging debate in Washington about whether to begin leaving Iraq.

Many leaders of the new Democratic majorities in the House and Senate have coalesced around a proposal for a "phased withdrawal" from Iraq that would begin early next year. Arizona Republican Sen. John McCain has been urging the White House to go in the other direction by significantly ramping up the U.S. military presence in Iraq. Mr. McCain argues that deploying thousands of additional American troops there could help pacify Baghdad and curb the country's sectarian violence.

Mr. Bush made the comments following a series of meetings here with Indonesian President Susilo Bambang Yudhoyono, the leader of the world's most populous Muslim country. The visit took place under extraordinarily tight security because of concerns that home-grown Islamic militants would try to strike Mr. Bush. Thousands of protesters took to the streets to register their opposition to Mr. Bush's visit.

Mr. Yudhoyono declined to call for a U.S. withdrawal or criticize the broader American-led nation-building effort there. Instead, the Indonesian leader appeared to endorse many aspects of the Bush administration's current strategy for Iraq. White House officials were pleasantly surprised by Mr. Yudhoyono's moderate tone, as the war is so unpopular in Indonesia.

In his own comments, Mr. Yudhoyono stressed the importance of bolstering Iraq's national government, finding a way of reconciling the country's feuding sectarian groups and enlisting the international community to rebuild the country when the fighting eventually stops -- though he didn't offer any assistance from Indonesia.

The two leaders' comments about Iraq underscored the agonizing questions facing policy makers. Mounting public fury in the U.S. over Mr. Bush's handling of the invasion and subsequent occupation cost Republicans their control of Congress this month, and even Mr. Bush's closest political allies say he needs to chart a new course on Iraq if he hopes to salvage the remaining two years of his presidency.

Both supporters and opponents of the war agree there are few easy -- or bloodless -- ways of winding down the troubled U.S. effort.

DOJ_NMG_0096834

Leading Democrats have rallied around a proposal from Michigan Sen. Carl Levin that calls for beginning troop withdrawal within four to six months. A rising number of Republicans also have begun arguing U.S. forces should start returning home next year.

The comments from Mr. McCain have garnered wide attention, shifting the terms of the debate away from a focus on a troop drawdown to the far more complex question of whether and how to add forces.

The debate will come to a head in coming weeks when the Iraq Study Group, a bipartisan team led by former Secretary of State James Baker and former Rep. Lee Hamilton, makes its prescriptions for resolving the situation in Iraq.

Bush Pressured To Come Up With New Iraq Strategy (USAT)

By Matt Kelley And Barbara Slavin

USA Today, November 21, 2006

WASHINGTON — Increased pressure from Congress and high level studies commissioned by the Pentagon and the White House are prodding President Bush to significantly change strategy in Iraq for the first time since the war began in March 2003.

A new Democratic majority in Congress, the imminent departure of Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and a recent flurry of high-level studies have made conditions ripe for change.

The Pentagon, State Department and White House are exploring options for changing course in Iraq. The Iraq Study Group, led by former secretary of State James Baker and former Indiana congressman Lee Hamilton, is preparing to present its recommendations next month.

Bush said he is still weighing options. “I haven't made any decisions about troop increases or troop decreases, and won't until I hear from a variety of sources,” Bush said Monday.

Many Democrats, buoyed by midterm election results, say leaving the current Bush administration policy unchanged is unacceptable.

“The idea that we're going to have 140,000 troops in Iraq this time next year is just not reasonable,” Sen. Joseph Biden, D-Del., said on NBC's Today show. Biden is in line to be the next chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

A look at the top options policymakers face:

·Adding troops. Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., has been one of the most prominent backers of beefing up U.S. forces in Iraq. McCain says more troops would help quell violence in Baghdad and eliminate the al-Qaeda-aligned insurgents in western Iraq.

“The consequences of failure are so severe that I will exhaust every possibility to try to fix this situation,” McCain, a GOP presidential hopeful in 2008, said Sunday on ABC's This Week.

Gen. John Abizaid, the commander of U.S. forces in the Middle East, told McCain at a Senate Armed Services Committee hearing last week that adding a large number of troops would stretch military resources and undercut efforts to have the Iraqi military take more responsibility for security.

·Repositioning troops and changing their missions. This could involve having more U.S. troops acting as advisers to Iraqi units, something Abizaid and other military brass have said they support.

“It seems to me that the prudent course ahead is to keep the troop levels about where they are,” Abizaid said last week, and “increase the number of (U.S.) forces that are with Iraqi security forces to make them better, more confident.”

U.S. advisers to Iraqi units generally work in teams of 10 to 15 for each Iraqi battalion of 400 to 600 troops. Abizaid says he wants more trainers so they can work with smaller units.

·Beginning to withdraw troops. Leading Democrats, including Biden and incoming Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman Carl Levin of Michigan, support this idea. Levin argues that a “phased redeployment” of U.S. troops in the next four to six months would push the Iraqi government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to crack down on militias and make other tough political decisions that would lead to a reduction in violence.

Abizaid says a withdrawal would undercut the Iraqi military and lead to more violence.

·Talking with Iraq's neighbors, including Iran and Syria. Baker has met with Syrian and Iranian officials and says the Bush administration should, too. “Our panel thinks it's important that we talk to representatives of surrounding governments,” Baker said in an interview in September.

The Bush administration has accused Iran and Syria of contributing to the violence in Iraq and has not held high-level talks with either nation.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad on Monday invited top officials of Iraq and Syria to Tehran for talks.

Obama Urges Gradual Withdrawal From Iraq (CHIT)

By Christi Parsons And David Mendell

DOJ_NMG_0096835

Chicago Tribune, November 21, 2006

Amid intense speculation about whether he will run for president, Sen. Barack Obama on Monday used the spotlight to showcase his strategy for the war in Iraq, excoriating the Bush administration for its "misguided" war and describing a solution that includes dialogue with hostile nations in the region.

In his speech to the Chicago Council on Global Affairs, the Illinois Democrat said the U.S. should end its "coddling" of the Iraqi government by beginning a reduction of troops in the next four to six months and pressuring Iraqis to work out agreements among their warring factions.

"Our troops can help suppress the violence, but they cannot solve its root causes," Obama told members of the council. "And all the troops in the world won't be able to force Shia, Sunni, and Kurd to sit down at a table, resolve their differences, and forge a lasting peace."

Offering a few new specifics, Obama said he thinks Iraq should convene a regional conference that includes Syria and Iran, two countries with which the U.S. does not currently have diplomatic relations. He also said that, as the U.S. redistributes troops around the Middle East, some of them should be deployed to Afghanistan and northern Iraq.

Substantively, Obama's talk to the council was not markedly different from the one he gave there a year ago. He echoed many of the themes of that speech -- as well as from his highly publicized new book, "The Audacity of Hope." Politically, the plan he embraced positions him alongside many centrist Democrats in Congress who are calling for a slow and careful withdrawal of troops, rather than a quick exit or a build-up of military personnel in Iraq.

But while the speech was mostly the same, the environment in which he delivered it was radically different. Voters registered dissatisfaction with the Iraq war this month, handing Congress over to Democrats for a fresh start. Obama will serve on the Senate's Foreign Relations Committee as part of the new majority.

Perhaps of greater significance to the crowd at the Chicago Hilton on Monday is Obama's status as a possible presidential contender in 2008. The buzz surrounding his possible candidacy drew a large crowd and national spotlight to his speech. The council sold 1,400 tickets to the event, which meant organizers had to move it from the previously scheduled ballroom to a larger one.

"If we'd put this thing on for another senator, we could have held it in a phone booth," said Dick Longworth, a former Tribune reporter and senior fellow at the council, a non-partisan organization devoted to educating people about foreign affairs.

A year ago, Obama asked for a platform at the council to talk about a phased withdrawal from Iraq, much of it by the end of 2006 {ndash} a time frame he reiterated more recently in his book. Obama revised that time frame on Monday, saying he thinks the drawdown should begin within six months.

Though much of Monday's speech was devoted to criticizing the administration and the war, Obama said he thinks it's possible to "salvage an acceptable outcome." He suggests a redeployment of troops and stepped-up efforts to train Iraqi security forces, and says the U.S. should link economic aid to Iraq with "measurable progress on reducing sectarian violence."

Obama indirectly criticized a suggestion by Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) that the U.S. increase its troop levels in Iraq, saying there is little reason to believe that adding thousands of troops would achieve the desired results.

Afterward, Obama said he doesn't think that proposals to partition Iraq into three separate regions {ndash} Kurdish, Shiite and Sunni {ndash} would work if it were a U.S. initiative. Also, Obama told reporters he would not support a proposal to reinstate the draft.

Although the speech did not cover a lot of new ground, some in the audience said that made it more credible.

"What makes his speech even stronger in his case is the consistency and continuity from what he said a year ago," said Marshall Bouton, president of the council. "He's not a Johnny-come-lately to this debate. It locates him along with a lot of others, embracing a measured, thoughtful, multi-faceted approach."

Obama Urges Gradual Withdrawal From Iraq (AP-Y)

By Deanna Bellandi

AP, November 21, 2006

Democratic Sen. Barack Obama, who is contemplating a run for the presidency, on Monday called for a "gradual and substantial" reduction of U.S. forces from Iraq that would begin in four to six months.

Speaking to the Chicago Council on Global Affairs, Obama envisioned a flexible timetable for withdrawal linked to conditions on the ground in Iraq and based on the advice of U.S. commanders. He also called for intensified efforts to train Iraqi security forces, U.S. aid packages tied to Iraqi progress in reducing sectarian violence and new diplomacy with Syria and Iran.

"I believe that it remains possible to salvage an acceptable outcome to this long and misguided war," he said. "But I have to be honest today, it will not be easy. For the fact is that there are no good options left in this war."

DOJ_NMG_0096836

Obama was not in the Senate when President Bush sought and received support from Congress in 2002 to use military force against Saddam Hussein. But he has publicly opposed the war since then.

The results of this month's elections, the Illinois senator said, represented a repudiation of President Bush's policies. But he said the war has also ignited a new sense of isolationism among Americans that is risky in a post-Sept. 11, 2001, world.

"We can't afford to be a country of isolationists in the 21st century," he said, arguing that it is "absolutely vital that we maintain a strong and active foreign policy, relentless in pursuing our enemies and hopeful in promoting our values around the world."

Obama was careful not to set a specific timetable for withdrawal of troops or suggest troop levels.

"We cannot compromise on the safety of our troops, and we should be willing to adjust to realities on the ground," he said.

He proposed redeploying troops to Northern Iraq and to other countries in the region. He recommended boosting troop strength in Afghanistan, "where our lack of focus and commitment of resources has led to an increasing deterioration of the security situation there."

"For only through this phase redeployment can we send a clear message to the Iraqi factions that the United States is not going to hold together this country indefinitely — that it will be up to them to form a viable government that can effectively run and secure Iraq," he said.

Obama rejected proposals to add more troops to Iraq, an idea advanced by Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., saying that without Iraqi cooperation "we would only be putting more of our soldiers in the crossfire of a civil war."

Following the speech, Obama rejected the notion of reinstating the military draft, an idea put forth by Rep. Charles Rangel, D-N.Y. Obama said a volunteer military is adequate when the country has a national security strategy that makes sense.

"What I don't want ... is a situation in which we have bad strategies and we institute a draft simply to throw more bodies at a bad strategy. That is not going to work," he said.

Obama is one of several Democrats considering a run for the White House in 2008, which promises to be one of the most wide-open campaigns in decades. In recent polling, his numbers rival front-runner Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., but questions abound regarding his experience — he has served less than two years in the Senate. He said Monday he would decide in the next few months.

The first-term senator said the Iraq war has underscored one lesson: "We should be more modest in our belief that we can impose democracy on a country through military force."

Obama Calls For Pullout In Iraq (LAT)

By P.j. Huffstutter

The Los Angeles Times, November 21, 2006

CHICAGO — Sen. Barack Obama, the popular Illinois Democrat who is considering a run for the White House, said Monday that the U.S. should start withdrawing troops from Iraq in the next four to six months, redeploy some forces to Afghanistan and bolster efforts to train Iraqi police.

Obama criticized President Bush for pushing forward with a war that "would require an occupation of undetermined length, at undetermined cost, with undetermined consequences."

He also noted that a bipartisan congressional effort was needed to "reassert our authority to oversee the management of this war" and retain better oversight over military expenditures.

He suggested that the U.S. would benefit from improved diplomacy with Iran and Syria and that all withdrawal timetables should be tied to the advice of U.S. commanders on the ground.

"I believe that it remains possible to salvage an acceptable outcome to this long and misguided war," Obama said to a rapt audience of 1,400 at a meeting of the Chicago Council on Global Affairs. "But it will not be easy. For the fact is that there are no good options left in this war."

The speech was similar to one he gave here nearly a year ago. The council has become a stumping ground for politicians wanting to highlight their views on foreign policy.

In 2005, though, only a few hundred curious observers gathered to hear the freshman senator.

"As the size of this crowd attests, the interest in hearing Sen. Obama's views is now greater, much greater," council president Marshall M. Bouton told Obama. "So is interest in your possible run for the presidency for the United States of America."

But Obama avoided addressing that possibility, even when two audience members asked him about it after the speech.

Instead, he focused on the results of the recent midterm elections, describing them as a public repeal of White House policies.The war has created a dangerous culture of global isolationism among Americans, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0096837

"We need to maintain a strong foreign policy, relentless in pursuing our enemies and hopeful in promoting our values around the world," Obama said.

A Harvard-educated attorney and longtime Illinois resident who practiced civil rights law, Obama rose to national prominence after delivering an electrifying keynote address at the Democratic National Convention in 2004. He won the Senate seat that November with 70% of the vote.

Now the 45-year-old junior senator has emerged as a promising presidential candidate that neither the press nor the public can get enough of.

He's been mobbed by fans while touring to promote his new book, "The Audacity of Hope: Thoughts on Reclaiming the American Dream." Time magazine put him on its cover, next to a headline that read, "Why Barack Obama Could Be The Next President." Oprah Winfrey said she'd vote for him — even though he hasn't announced his intention to run.

Recent polls have showed Obama following Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y) as a favored Democratic presidential nominee, edging out former Vice President Al Gore and former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina.

"On the plus side, Obama's a fresh face and he's lived the American dream," said Dennis Goldford, politics professor at Drake University in Des Moines. "On the down side, it shows how thin the Democratic bench is and the old faces all have a lot of baggage."

Dozens of people at Monday's event in the Hilton Chicago clutched copies of Obama's book. Sharon Russell, an accountant who lives in Gary, Ind., took a vacation day and paid a $100 entrance fee to see him.

"I wanted to have a chance to see the man I think will be our next president in person," said Russell, 52. "I think he'd make an excellent leader, at a time when this country really needs one."

The Only Real Option: Leave Iraq Now (WP)

By Eugene Robinson

The Washington Post, November 21, 2006

Good lord, if even Henry Kissinger now says that military victory in Iraq is impossible, pretty soon George W. Bush really will be left with just Laura and Barney on his side.

The Decider Agonistes must be feeling betrayed and abused these days. British Prime Minister Tony Blair's admission that the war has been "pretty much of a disaster" was just a slip of the tongue, but the president must have felt it as a cut most unkind.

And Kissinger? The oracle who has been dropping by the White House regularly to whisper sweet nothings into the presidential ear, urging him to hang tough? The sage who wrote in August 2005 that "victory over the insurgency is the only meaningful exit strategy" is now listing Bush's conditions for withdrawal -- a stable government, ruling all of Iraq, with the ability to control the violence -- and pronouncing them unattainable. Will anyone be surprised if Henry the K soon reveals that he knew the whole thing was folly all along?

Meanwhile, the neocon architects of the war are making a spectacle of themselves in their undignified flight from the sinking ship. Richard Perle, Kenneth Adelman, Michael Rubin -- they all take pretty much the same line, which is that the invasion was a great and noble idea but that the White House and the Pentagon bungled it horribly.

Defections, recrimination and finger-pointing among the people who got us into this mess provide an amusing sideshow. But the main event is the mandate that midterm voters imposed this month, in no uncertain terms: Find a way out.

Sen. John McCain has planted his flag at one extreme of the debate, making the counterintuitive argument that the way to get out of Iraq is to send in a lot more U.S. troops who would stabilize the country as a necessary prelude to withdrawal. By "counterintuitive," I mean "divorced from reality as we know it." For one thing, the troops McCain wants to send do not exist -- the military is stretched paper-thin as it is, and I don't think Rep. Charles Rangel's proposal to reinstate the draft is going to get very far. For another, McCain doesn't specify how all those magically conjured reinforcements are supposed to accomplish such a mission.

In a sectarian civil war, the last place you want to stand is in the middle. Is the United States really going to choose sides and then lend a hand as Shiite or Sunni death squads go about their awful business?

At the other end of the debate is Rep. John Murtha, who says we should cut our losses and start pulling out. At least Murtha doesn't pretend we'd be leaving behind a secure, viable Iraq, because we wouldn't.

The new, post-midterm mainstream position in Washington is to support "phased withdrawals," with or without telling anyone in advance when a new phase will begin, and to involve "the neighbors," meaning Iran and Syria, in forcing Iraqi politicians to reach "a political solution." James Baker and his Iraq Study Group will probably come up with some variation of this scenario. But we should be honest and acknowledge that phased withdrawals, with or without a stated timetable, really mean just telling the Iraqis good luck and adios, drawing the whole process out in a belated attempt to save face.

DOJ_NMG_0096838

The president clearly doesn't want to hear any of this. The bizarre analogy he made in Hanoi -- comparing Iraq to Vietnam and saying, "We'll succeed unless we quit" -- doesn't even make sense in his own parallel universe. He should ask his friend Kissinger to tell him about that Ho Chi Minh guy whose picture is plastered all over Vietnam.

But while the Decider covers his ears and rewrites history, the center of gravity of the debate has shifted from whether we should get out of Iraq to how and when.

If we are ready to acknowledge, as Kissinger does, that the president's goals in Iraq will never be accomplished, then how do we justify the American lives that will be lost next year, next month or next week, while the phases of a face-saving withdrawal run their course?

If American troops begin pulling out tomorrow, Iraq surely will suffer a terrible spasm of bloody violence. But if we wait a year and then pull out, there is no reason to expect any different outcome. Quite the contrary: The longer we stay, the more lawless and chaotic the country becomes. And the more young Americans die in a war that no longer has an attainable goal.

The Lingo Of Vietnam (WP)

By Richard Cohen

The Washington Post, November 21, 2006

The way President Bush whisked through Vietnam -- oh, if only we had done the same 40 years ago -- it seemed as if he was feeling an obvious parallel with the war in Iraq. His aides, who somehow lose IQ points by mere proximity to the commander in chief -- national security adviser Stephen Hadley argued that Bush had "gotten a real sense of the warmth of the Vietnamese people" as he sped by in his motorcade -- insisted that no parallel existed. But these aides are dead wrong. There is this: I would have fought neither war.

Before you protest "of course, Cohen," let me explain that the "I" in the foregoing sentence is really four people. There is the "I" who originally thought the Vietnam War was morally correct, that the communists were awful people and that the loss of South Vietnam (the North was already gone) would result in a debacle for its people. That's, in fact, what happened. It was only later, when I myself was in the Army, that I deemed the war not worth killing or dying for. By then I -- the second "I" -- no longer felt it was winnable, and I did not want to lose my life so that somehow defeat could be managed more elegantly.

Things are precisely the same with Iraq, and here, too, I -- No. 3 -- originally had no moral qualms about the war. Saddam Hussein was a beast who had twice invaded his neighbors, had killed his own people with abandon and posed a threat -- and not just a theoretical one -- to Israel. If anything, I was encouraged in my belief by the offensive opposition to the war -- silly arguments about oil or empire or, at bottom, the ineradicable and perpetual rottenness of America.

On the contrary, I thought. We are a good country, attempting to do a good thing. In a post-Sept. 11 world, I thought the prudent use of violence could be therapeutic. The United States had the power to change things for the better, and those who would do the changing -- the fighting -- were, after all, volunteers. This mattered to me.

But these volunteers are now fighting a war few envisaged and no one wanted -- not I (No. 4), for sure. If at one time my latter-day minutemen marched off thinking they were bringing democracy to Iraq and the greater Middle East, they now must know better. If they thought they were going to rid the region of weapons of mass destruction and sever the link between al-Qaeda and Hussein, they now are entitled to feel duped by Bush, Vice President Cheney and others. The exaggerations are particularly repellent. To fool someone into sacrificing his life to battle a chimera is a hideous abuse of the public trust.

Daily I read the casualty list from Iraq -- and I invent reasons to make the deaths less tragic. This is a hopeless, maybe tasteless, task, but it matters to me if someone is a career soldier who knew what he was getting into as opposed to some naive kid digitally juiced on a computerized version of war -- or, even sadder, some guardsman who enlisted for God, country or spare cash, but not by any means for Baghdad. He's a volunteer, all right, but not for a war that didn't exist when he raised his right hand and took the oath.

My dauntingly knowledgeable Post colleague Thomas E. Ricks reports from the Pentagon that the military is now considering three options for Iraq: more troops, fewer troops (but for a longer time) and no troops at all -- the ol' cut and run. The missing option here is victory. Don't worry, it will be invented. "You have to define win," Lt. Gen. Raymond T. Odierno, who is about to return to Iraq, told the New York Times. Ah, just in the nick of time.

Where have we heard this sort of language before? It is the lingo of Vietnam. As with Vietnam, we are fighting now merely not to lose -- to avoid a full-fledged civil war (it's coming anyway) or to keep the country together, something like that. But not for victory. Not for democracy. All this talk of the Iraqis doing more on their own behalf is Vietnamization in the desert rather than the jungle. What remains the same is asking soldiers to die for a reason that the politicians in Washington can no longer explain. This, above all, is how Iraq is like Vietnam: older men asking younger men to die while they try to figure something out.

That's why Bush kept moving. He knows Vietnam is not just about the past. It's also about the future.

DOJ_NMG_0096839

The Story Behind The Iraq Study Group (WP)

By Lyndsey Layton

The Washington Post, November 21, 2006

On his third trip to Iraq, in September 2005, Rep. Frank R. Wolf (R-Va.) knew the American mission was imperiled.

"We were up in Tikrit and went to a hospital, and it was guarded with guns and security to the point they were pushing weapons into women's faces," Wolf said. "I saw we can't be successful if we're going into an operating room with pistols and weapons."

That's when the congressman from Vienna first began to think about the need for "fresh eyes" to scrutinize U.S. policy regarding Iraq. Quietly, he went to the White House and presented his plan: a bipartisan commission of well-respected policymakers to bore deeply into the Iraq dilemma and recommend solutions.

"If you ordered an Erector Set and you were trying to build it before Christmas and you got stuck and someone else came along, they might just see immediately what needs to be done," Wolf said. "Or if you had a health-care problem, you'd want a second opinion. It's all about fresh eyes on a target."

The result is the Iraq Study Group, led by Republican former secretary of state James A. Baker III and Democratic former congressman Lee H. Hamilton (Ind.), who was a vice chairman of the panel that investigated the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. The group has taken on greater relevance after midterm elections marked by widespread voter dissatisfaction with Iraq, and it will play a decisive role in reshaping the U.S. position on Iraq, according to lawmakers and administration officials.

Initially, the White House was cool to the idea, Wolf said. But he was able to win over Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice. Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld followed, as did national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley. "Rice's support was key," Wolf said. "But I had to have the support of everybody or there would be no way to do this."

The composition of the study group was also crucial.

"You had to get a group not connected to the administration, people who were not going to be campaigning and who could come to a consensus," he said. "We wanted a bipartisan group, people senior enough that they weren't looking to get placed in a law firm or good job. The test was: Do you love your country?"

The study group, composed of five Democrats and five Republicans, was created in March to assess the situation in Iraq, its impact on the surrounding region and its consequences for U.S. interests. The group's work has been guided by several smaller committees of experts on topics such as the economy and reconstruction, military and security, and political development.

Wolf got Congress to appropriate $1 million for the project. To select the panel's members, he turned to the U.S. Institute for Peace, an independent nonpartisan organization created and funded by Congress. One of its goals is to promote stability after a conflict.

"It's a tremendous dilemma, a difficult situation" in which Congress "was looking for alternatives and the fall election was reinforcing the polarization of attitudes," said Richard H. Solomon, president of the institute. "We were creating the study group to build a political middle."

Wolf said he hopes that the group's recommendations, expected to be delivered to President Bush and Congress next month, will reconnect a nation splintered by war.

"When our country is together, we're strong -- Truman and Roosevelt showed that," he said. "When we're divided, I think the country's going to be in trouble. I hope something good comes from this, that we can develop consensus."

Rising Price Of The War On Terror (CSM)

By Peter Grier

The Christian Science Monitor, November 21, 2006

WASHINGTON

Whether troop levels increase in coming months, or decrease, or stay the same, one aspect of the US military effort in Iraq is unlikely to change: It will be expensive.

The cost of combat in Iraq has now surpassed $300 billion, according to government estimates. Add in activities in Afghanistan, and the total price of the global war on terror is about $500 billion, making it one of the most monetarily costly conflicts in which the nation has ever engaged.

Now the Department of Defense is in the process of drawing up its follow-on request for the remainder of FY 2007. Reports indicate that the Pentagon could ask for $120 billion to $160 billion, which would be its largest funding request yet for the global war on terror.

DOJ_NMG_0096840

After they take control of Congress next year, Democrats will almost certainly investigate both the rate of Iraq spending and the manner in which it has been appropriated. Much of the war has been funded through supplementals, so-called emergency bills whose use in this case has become increasingly controversial in Congress.

"We're now at $507 billion for the global war on terror and counting, and almost all of that has been pushed through a process that doesn't give proper scrutiny to the budget. Are we spending it wisely?" says Gordon Adams, a fellow at the Woodrow Wilson International Center who was the senior White House official for national security budgets under President Clinton.

Last month, Congress approved $70 billion in spending intended to pay for operations in Iraq and Afghanistan through the first six months of fiscal 2007, which began Oct. 1 for the US government.

The size of the request under discussion reflects both the continued nature of the mission and past wear-and-tear. Both the Army and the Air Force need billions to replace expensive hardware worn out by the pace of warfare in Iraq.

Before the invasion of Iraq, the White House estimated that combat operations there would cost about $50 billion. That forecast, however, was based on a quick end to the war and a rapid drawdown of US troops.

Three years later, Iraq alone is costing the US some $8 billion a month.

Estimates of total spending vary, due to the fact that Department of Defense records on obligations do not provide comprehensive specifics, and the supplemental bills voted by Congress do not have the line-item details of regular sending bills.

Congressional Research Service figures puts the cost of Iraq, Afghanistan, and other war-on-terror activities at $507 billion. Of that, the Afghan campaign has cost at least $88 billion, according to CRS. Iraq accounts for the bulk of the rest.

The drain of continued fighting in Iraq has meant that the global war on terror has steadily moved up the list of the most costly conflicts in US history (in terms of money, not casualties). In 2005, it passed the Korean war's inflation-adjusted cost of $361 billion.

Next year it will almost certainly pass the Vietnam War's $531 billion, making it the second most expensive US war ever, behind World War II.

Given the uncertainty of troop levels, it is very difficult to estimate the US military's future costs in Iraq.

Overall, each individual soldier deployed in Iraq for a year costs about $275,000, according to CRS. The cost rises to $360,000 if required additional investments in equipment and facilities are added.

Using a scenario in which US troop levels fall to 73,000 by 2010, and then stay at that level, the Congressional Budget Office estimates that the cumulative cost of the global war on terror could reach $808 billion by 2016.

Meanwhile, the Pentagon and the Bush administration have continued the practice by which funding for the war on terror is requested in the form of supplemental appropriations. Supplementals are prepared much closer to the time when the money will actually be spent. The Vietnam War, for instance, was funded via supplementals at its outset. Later, Vietnam costs were folded into the regular budget process.

Supplementals provide much less detail as to where money will be spent than do regular budget documents, and receive less congressional oversight than do regular budget bills.

So far, the White House has shown little inclination to fund Iraq and Afghanistan via the regular budget, despite some pressure from Congress to do so. In addition, the nature of items paid for via these war spending bills may have begun to expand, to include items related to peacetime missions as well.

A Democratic-controlled Congress will almost certainly look for ways to increase pressure on the White House to abandon the flexibility and opaqueness of the emergency bill approach.

'War On Terror' Could Last 30 Years Or More (AFP)

AFP, November 21, 2006

The fight against terrorism could last 30 years or more, according to a report published by a British think tank that specialises in international security.

"There is every prospect of the 'war on terror' extending for 30 years or more," said the report by the Oxford Research Group.

"What is required is a complete re-assessment of current policies but that is highly unlikely, even with the recent political upheavals".

The US Democrats triumphed in legislative elections on November 7 in which they reclaimed the House and the Senate, at the expense of President George W. Bush's Republicans.

"Most people believe that the recent elections mark the beginning of the end of the Bush era but that does not apply to the war on terror," said Professor Paul Rogers, who wrote the report, in a statement.

"In reality there will be little change until the United States faces up to the need for a fundamental re-think of its policies".

DOJ_NMG_0096841

The report showed that the United States is now faced with a dilemma: if it withdraws from Iraq, insurgent groups will be able to operate freely in the biggest oil reserve in the world.

"If it stays, though, then US soldiers become an increasing magnet for radical factions, with Iraq becoming a training ground for new generations of paramilitaries, just as Afghanistan was in the 1980s against the Soviet occupying forces," the report said.

It said that the "fundamental mistake" was to remove the regime of president Saddam Hussein by force, which was a "gift" for Al-Qaeda and extremist groups because the deployment of 150,000 US soldiers in the heart of the Arab world is considered by many to be "an occupation force".

At the same time, the war in Afghanistan, that has so far lasted six years, has seen "a marked increase in Taliban activity at a time of record revenues from opium production" and the insurgency there "shows no sign of ending".

The importance of oil in the region "means that it would be entirely unacceptable for the United States to consider withdrawal from Iraq, no matter how insecure the environment".

Professor Rogers has since May 2005 been studying the situation in Iraq and its impact on other countries, including Afghanistan, Iran and the Middle East.

Iraqi President Accepts Iran's Invitation For Weekend Talks (USAT/AP)

USA Today, November 21, 2006

BAGHDAD — Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad invited his Iraqi and Syrian counterparts to a weekend summit in Tehran to tackle the chaos in Iraq, Iraqi lawmakers said Monday.

Iraqi President Jalal Talabani's spokesman Kamaran Qaradaghi said in a statement late Monday that the Tehran meeting will include Talabani and Ahmadinejad. He said Syrian President Bashar Assad would not attend, but that Talabani had accepted an invitation to meet with Assad in Damascus. No date was set.

A close parliamentary associate of Talabani told the Associated Press that the summit represents an attempt by Tehran to strengthen its position in the region and prevent the United States from dividing Syria, a predominantly Sunni Arab country, from its ally of convenience, Shiite Iran. The associate spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to discuss the matter with the media.

The State Department reacted with skepticism about Iran's intentions in Iraq, but said it was up to Iraq. “It's their call,” spokesman Tom Casey said in Washington.

“We have seen statements like this many times,” and there have been several high-level contacts between Iran and Iraq, Casey said. But Iran's statements of a desire to reduce violence in Iraq “have not been backed up by facts,” he said.

The diplomatic gambit coincided with a groundbreaking visit to Baghdad by Syrian Foreign Minister Walid Moallem, who was challenged over Damascus' role in supporting the Sunni insurgency.

“We object to any neighboring country that allows itself to be a base or a transit point for the terrorist groups that harm Iraq,” Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki said after meeting with Moallem.

The Iraqi government said diplomatic relations between the two countries, severed nearly 25 years ago, will be restored by today.

In the latest violence, Iraqi Minister of State Mohammed Abbas Auraibi, a member of Iraq's Shiite majority, said a roadside bomb hit his convoy as it was driving on a highway in eastern Baghdad, wounding two of his bodyguards.

Hakim al-Zamily, a Shiite deputy health minister, also escaped unhurt when gunmen fired on his convoy in Baghdad. Al-Zamily said two of his guards were killed.

The attacks came one day after suspected Sunni Muslim insurgents kidnapped Ammar al-Saffar, a Shiite deputy health minister, from his home in northern Baghdad.

Al-Saffar was snatched nearly a week after dozens of suspected Shiite militia gunmen in police uniforms kidnapped scores of people from a Ministry of Higher Education office in Baghdad. That ministry is predominantly Sunni.

For the second time in two days, coalition forces raided Baghdad's Sadr City Shiite stronghold, headquarters of a militia suspected of having carried out the mass kidnapping. No captives were found.

British and Iraqi forces also raided homes in southern Iraq and arrested four suspects in the kidnapping of four American security guards and their Austrian co-worker. No hostages were found.

Syria And Iraq Restore Ties Severed In The Hussein Era (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise

The New York Times, November 21, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0096842

BAGHDAD, Nov. 20 — Iraq re-established diplomatic relations with Syria on Monday, agreeing to restore an embassy in Baghdad after more than 20 years with no formal avenues of communication.

The step came on the second day of a two-day visit by Syria's foreign minister, Walid al-Moallem, who met with the Iraqi prime minister, Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, in the international Green Zone here.

As the United States undertakes a broad review of its role in Iraq, the neighboring countries of Iran, Turkey and Syria have stepped forward to try to position themselves in case of a major change in policy, leading to a recent flurry of diplomatic efforts. The countries are also concerned about the possibility of a political collapse as the Iraqi government sinks into paralysis with its two main sects stuck in a deadlock.

A government spokesman said President Jalal Talabani would travel to Iran for meetings with President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad over the weekend.

Syria cut off relations with Saddam Hussein's government in 1982 after siding with Iran in that country's war with Iraq. The break was complete: Iraqis could not travel to Syria, nor call on the phone. The countries re-established trade relations in 1997, and Iraqis could visit.

Now tens of thousands of Iraqis seeking to escape the violence that has consumed their country have fled into Syria, creating their own schools, neighborhoods and communities there.

Violence continued to claim Iraqi lives at a rapid pace. The authorities said 90 Iraqis were killed across Iraq on Monday, including 60 who were found dead in and around Baghdad. An elderly priest visiting a church in Naariya, an area in southern Baghdad, was kidnapped, a police official in the area said.

Among the dead was the host of a popular comedy show, Walid Hassan Jiaaz, who poked fun at post-invasion Iraqi life. He was shot dead by gunmen in western Baghdad. A deputy health minister, Hakim al-Zameli, a supporter of the Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr, escaped assassination when his convoy came under attack; two of his guards were killed.

A week after the mass kidnapping of employees at the Ministry of Higher Education compound in Baghdad, the fate of those still missing remain unclear. Interior Minister Jawad Bolani said the kidnapping had not been motivated by sectarian hatred, but gave no details on what might have been the reason for the act. He said a preliminary investigation showed that the kidnappers might have had help from someone inside the ministry.

During their meeting on Monday, Mr. Maliki used stern words in urging Mr. Moallem to take more serious steps in preventing Sunni militants from crossing into Iraq from Syria, the prime minister's office said.

"We want to set a kind of relation with them to protect our people from the violence that was coming from them," said a Shiite politician who had been involved in the talks. Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV, the chief spokesman for the American military command here, said Syrians made up about 20 percent of the 670 foreign fighters in custody in Iraq.

The United States withdrew its ambassador from Damascus in February 2005 after the assassination in Beirut of Rafik Hariri, the former Lebanese prime minister. But as the Bush administration considers policy alternatives in Iraq, allies like Prime Minister Tony Blair of Britain are encouraging it to reopen dialogue with Syria and Iran.

In some ways it has already started. Mr. Moallem met with former Secretary of State James A. Baker III, who is co-chairman of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, in a hotel in New York in September and discussed what role Syria could play in helping to stabilize Iraq, said the Syrian ambassador to the United States, Imad Moustapha.

Although the United States and Iran have been at odds over Tehran's nuclear program, Bush administration officials have signaled that they would be willing to discuss Iraqi issues. Last week in testimony before Congress, David Satterfield, the State Department's coordinator of Iraq policy, said that with respect to Iran, "we are prepared, in principle, to discuss Iranian activities in Iraq."

He added, "The timing of such a direct dialogue is one we still have under review."

At a news conference with one of Iraq's most powerful Shiite political leaders, Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, Mr. Moallem said relations between Iraq and Syria were still strained.

"I didn't come to Baghdad to satisfy the United States," he said. "I'm not a mediator for the United States in the region."

Iraq To Restore Long-Severed Relations With Neighbor Syria (WP)

By Nancy Trejos

The Washington Post, November 21, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov. 20 -- Iraq said Monday that it would restore diplomatic ties with neighboring Syria after a break of nearly a quarter-century in an effort to solidify links with a neighbor seen as a conduit for insurgents fueling the violence in Iraq.

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki made the announcement after a historic meeting with Syrian Foreign Minister Walid al-Muallem, who pledged his country's help in quelling the sectarian violence that threatens to propel Iraq into civil war. Maliki, for his part, pressed Syria to step up efforts to keep Sunni Arab fighters from crossing into Iraq to join the insurgency.

DOJ_NMG_0096843

"We refuse to let any regional neighbor countries become a passage or a headquarters for the terrorist organizations that hurt Iraq," he said in a statement after the meeting.

Syria and Iran, another neighbor, have offered to help bring stability to Iraq's fractured government, but the Bush administration has long-standing concerns about Iran's support for Shiite Muslim militias and Syria's failure to stop foreign fighters from joining the Iraqi insurgency.

The administration is under intense pressure to put aside those concerns and engage in talks with the two countries, even though it considers them adversaries. The Iraq Study Group, co-chaired by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former congressman Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.), is expected to recommend in an upcoming report that the United States start such a dialogue.

On Monday, reports surfaced of a possible weekend summit in Tehran involving the Iraqi and Syrian presidents, but U.S. and Iraqi officials quickly denied that any high-level three-way meeting would take place.

In Baghdad, a U.S. Embassy spokesman said Iraqi President Jalal Talabani had no intention of attending a meeting with both Iran and Syria. Maliki's close aide Hasan Suneid said Talabani had accepted an invitation from the Iranian government to visit Tehran, but he did not specify when that would take place. "Iran has a great wish to hold a peace summit with Syria and Iraq, but still it is just a thought," Suneid said, "and if it happened, we should study it very well."

The Associated Press reported Monday night that Talabani would meet with Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad this weekend but that Syrian President Bashar al-Assad would not attend.

State Department acting spokesman Tom Casey in Washington said that the administration welcomes "discussion and dialogue" among Baghdad, Tehran and Damascus because it wants Iraq to have strong relations with all its neighbors. But he also expressed doubts. "The problem is not what they say, but what they do," Casey said.

He added that "it's up to the Iraqi government to make the decision as to whether this is something useful for them or whether they would attend."

Muallem is the highest-level Syrian official to visit Iraq since the 2003 U.S.-led invasion. His visit marked a major step toward restoring ties between the two countries, which have been at odds since the 1980s, when Syria backed Iran in its war against Iraq.

But Syria's oversight of its borders has become a major point of contention. Muallem denied that Syria has allowed foreign Islamic fighters to infiltrate Iraq but also said that sealing the long, porous border is an impossible task.

At a briefing in Baghdad, Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell, a U.S. military spokesman, said that so far this year Iraqi security and coalition forces have killed more than 425 foreign fighters in Iraq and captured about 670. Of those detained, he said, more than 20 percent came from Syria.

Caldwell said the U.S. government is not accusing Syria of aiding the fighters, but added, "We don't know how much they have tried to preclude it from happening, though, either." Caldwell also responded to Muallem's comment this past weekend that if the United States were to establish a timetable for withdrawing troops, the violence in Iraq would decrease. He said Iraqi officials continue to ask for military help.

"There's that acknowledgment that there is a need right now in their minds for additional security, and that the coalition forces can help provide for them as they develop their forces or capabilities and exert their influence," he said.

The political developments came as violence continued to flare across the country.

A deputy health minister, Hakim al-Zamily, escaped an assassination attempt in Baghdad that killed two of his bodyguards. He was the fourth high-level government official, and the second deputy health minister, to be targeted by kidnappers or killers in recent days.

"I think the terrorists are trying to show that the situation in Iraq is unbearable and it cannot be solved by the government," said Ali Adib, a Shiite lawmaker. "They would like to show the Democrats that they control the situation and not the government."

In Kirkuk, a police captain said unknown gunmen had attacked a restaurant frequented by policemen and civilians, killing the restaurant's owner and another employee.

Unknown gunmen killed a Babylon University medical school professor as he and his driver traveled from Hilla to Baghdad. Iraqi army and police forces found 19 corpses in Latifiyah, south of Baghdad. The U.S. military also announced that a Marine was killed in action Sunday in Anbar province.

Iraqi government officials continued their investigation of a mass kidnapping at a Ministry of Higher Education building last week. Speaking at a news conference, Interior Minister Jawad al-Bolani said investigators are trying to determine whether the kidnappers were aided by people within the ministry. He also ruled out sectarianism as a motive because the victims came from different backgrounds.

Officials continued to contradict each other about the number of people who were kidnapped. The higher education minister said as many as 150 people were taken, while a government spokesman put the number at about 60.

DOJ_NMG_0096844

Staff writer Robin Wright in Washington, special correspondents Naseer Mehdawi and Saad al-Izzi in Baghdad and other Washington Post staff in Iraq contributed to this report.

Iraq President To Hold Talks With Iran (FT)

By Steve Negus, Gareth Smyth And Daniel Dombey

Financial Times, November 21, 2006

Iraqi President Jalal Talabani will travel to Iran this weekend for talks with his Iranian counterpart Mahmoud Ahmadi-Nejad, but his spokesman denied reports that a three-way summit including Syria's Bashar al-Assad was planned.

British government sources and news agencies had said yesterday that Iran was keen to host three-way talks, but Iraqi sources said there were no plans for such a meeting.

"President Jalal Talabani has plans to go to Tehran this weekend to meet with President Ahmedinijad. There is no talk of a trilateral summit," said presidential spokesman Hiwa Osman.

"President Talabani looks forward to meeting President al-Assad in Baghdad or Damascus in the near future," he said. US officials are reportedly planning an initiative to bring Syria and Iran into a broader regional effort aimed at curbing the violence in Iraq.

US and Iraqi officials have blamed Damascus and Tehran for fomenting disorder in Iraq. Iran has extensive influence with Shia parties in Iraq, reportedly subsidising groups such as the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq as well as breakaway factions of the Mahdi Army loyal to radical cleric Moqtada al-Sadr.

Tehran is also accused of supplying some of its clients with sophisticated weaponry and military expertise.

According to some analysts, Iran is trying to ensure that it has the capacity to cause severe problems for US forces in Iraq as a possible deterrent to US-led military efforts against its own territory.

International and domestic pressure is mounting on the Bush administration to open its own dialogue with Syria and Iran to find a common approach to restoring stability in Iraq.

Tom Casey, a spokesman for the US State Department, said there were no plans at present for direct contacts in Baghdad between the US and Iranian ambassadors.

Washington analysts say that while the US position in Iraq is weakening, Iran is asserting its influence. A trilateral summit, should it happen, could strengthen Iran's hand in shaping the agenda for eventual talks with the Bush administration.

Iraqi leaders frequently visit Tehran, but most of these are heads of specifically Shia religious parties with a tight bilateral relationship to Iran, and a wider summit specifically intended to discuss the promotion of stability in Iraq would be a diplomatic breakthrough.

Iraq Considers Three-way Talks With Iran And Syria (LAT)

By Solomon Moore

The Los Angeles Times, November 21, 2006

BAGHDAD — Iraqi leaders said Monday that they were seriously considering three-way talks with Iran and Syria, responding to an overture from Iran's president that raised new questions about the level of American influence here.

The talks would focus on how the two neighboring countries could help quell rising sectarian bloodshed in Iraq, according to Iraqi officials familiar with Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's offer.

The invitation to a summit is a further assertion of Iran's influence in Iraq, and it comes at a time when the U.S. government is sharply divided over whether to make an appeal of its own to Iran and Syria.

Influential figures in Washington have urged the Bush administration to talk to both countries in hopes of gaining their help to bring the violence in Iraq under control. But many of President Bush's advisors oppose the idea.

White House policy has been to isolate Iran to compel the government to abandon its nuclear enrichment program and to refuse to talk with Syria until it drops its support for what the United States considers terrorist groups.

As the debate continues in Washington, Iran has stepped forward.

Iraqi President Jalal Talabani plans to travel to Tehran on Sunday to meet with Ahmadinejad to try to iron out details of a possible three-way meeting, which would include Syrian President Bashar Assad, senior Iraqi officials said Monday. The move came as Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki and Syrian Foreign Minister Walid Moallem met in Baghdad and announced an agreement to reopen diplomatic relations, which were broken off in 1982.

In Washington, State Department spokesman Tom Casey sought to play down the significance of a possible three-way summit, contending that previous statements by Iranian and Syrian leaders had not proved productive.

DOJ_NMG_0096845

"What we'd like to see the Iranian government do is desist, first and foremost, from negative actions it's taken in Iraq," Casey said. "As we have always said with respect to the Syrians, you know, the problem is not what they say, the problem is what they do."

Syria has served as an entry point and refuge for Sunni Arab Muslim insurgents who have carried out a steady stream of attacks on U.S. forces and the fledgling Iraqi government since the American-led invasion in 2003.

Iran, a Shiite Muslim nation, has significant influence over the Shiite militias that have increasingly attacked Iraq's minority Sunnis.

Along with the debate over Iran and Syria, officials in Washington have been jousting over whether the U.S. should begin withdrawing troops from Iraq.

On Monday, Bush, speaking to reporters in Bogor, Indonesia, said he had made no decision about troop levels in Iraq and that he was waiting to hear from the Pentagon.

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), a probable 2008 GOP presidential candidate, has called for boosting the force beyond the 140,000 or so troops now in Iraq. Others want to establish a timetable to withdraw troops or to focus on the training of Iraqi security forces.

"I say go Iraqi," said Rep. Duncan Hunter (R-El Cajon), the outgoing chairman of the House Armed Services Committee. "It doesn't make sense to plan American deployments before you utilize all the Iraqi forces."

Senior Iraqi officials say Ahmadinejad's summit proposal was the impetus behind the meetings between Iraqi leaders and Syria's foreign minister, the highest-level talks between the two Arab neighbors since the U.S.-led invasion.

Ahmadinejad first proposed three-way negotiations last year but was refused by then-Prime Minister Ibrahim Jafari. Jafari and his advisors feared the United States would oppose giving Iran an intermediary role in Iraq and doubted Syria's intentions, sources said Monday.

"We said we had issues with Syria and felt that Iran could not be a mediator," said a high-ranking Iraqi official with knowledge of the discussions. "At the time, we said that the Syrians know what our expectations are and they needed to make the first move, which they have done by sending their foreign minister to listen to our grievances for their involvement in supporting what we consider terrorism."

The official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to discuss the Iranian proposal with the media, said Ahmadinejad had contacted Maliki last month to renew his invitation with a suggestion that he visit Iran on Nov. 5 — at the same time the Syrian president had scheduled a visit.

Iraqi leaders decided to delay negotiations until after the U.S. elections two days later in order to not affect the outcome, the official said.

The senior Iraqi official's account was confirmed by another high-ranking politician with knowledge of Iraq's foreign affairs.

Iran extended a third invitation to Iraq's political leadership Nov. 10, said Haider Abaidi, a prominent Iraqi legislator with close ties to Maliki.

"They suggested that the three countries should sit together to discuss the security situation in Iraq because both countries are interfering with Iraq's affairs," Abaidi said. "Both were denying this for a long time, but this time the Iranians went a step further and said: 'Why don't we talk everything over together? All three of us.' "

Ali Dabbagh, an Iraqi government spokesman, said Talabani's scheduled visit to Iran would capitalize on the momentum gained from the debate in the United States about opening a dialogue with Syria and Iran.

Abaidi said Iraq's main factions, the Sunnis, Shiites and Kurds, had discussed Iran's plan and had agreed, in principle, that it was worthwhile.

Three-way talks could boost Iran's regional sway and could also put the Bush administration in the awkward position of having to acknowledge the influence of a nation it once called a member of the "axis of evil" and a sponsor of terrorism.

"I think Iran wants to make sure that everyone understands that it holds a lot of the cards in Iraq, just as it did in Lebanon and Afghanistan," said Vali Nasr, author of "The Shia Revival" and an adjunct senior fellow at the Council on Foreign Relations.

"Iran is saying that Iran and Syria are two of the most important actors in Iraq, and if you want a solution in Iraq, or anywhere in the Middle East, you have to talk to them. It's a regional game they're playing, and they will not allow themselves to be left out."

David Aaron, director of the Rand Corp.'s Center for Middle East Public Policy, said Iran and Syria could demand a high price for their cooperation.

Syria may ask the Bush administration to drop its support for a United Nations investigation into Syria's alleged involvement in the slaying of former Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri in 2005.

And Iran may push the United States to abandon its opposition to its nuclear enrichment program.

But Nasr and Aaron contended that the initiative by Iran and Syria might also stem from broader national interests.

DOJ_NMG_0096846

"All of the neighbors have a stake in this country not blowing apart or having a major civil war, because they will all get dragged into it," Aaron said.

Iraq, Iran And Syria Set For 3-way Talks (WT)

By David R. Sands

The Washington Times, November 21, 2006

Iraqi President Jalal Talabani yesterday agreed to travel to Tehran this weekend for an unprecedented three-way summit with Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and Syrian leader Bashar Assad to deal with Iraq's raging insurgency.

The Bush administration repeatedly has refused to deal directly with the Iranian and Syrian leaders, and the meeting this weekend could be a move by Tehran and Damascus to pre-empt an expected shift in U.S. policy to find a regional solution to Iraq's woes.

Key Iraqi lawmakers yesterday confirmed reports swirling in the Arab-language press of the three-way summit, according to the Associated Press. Iran's invitation came as Syria and Iraq announced the restoration of formal diplomatic ties after a break of 24 years, capping an unexpectedly warm visit by Syrian Foreign Minister Walid al-Moualem to Baghdad this week.

"All three countries intend to hold a three-way summit to discuss the security situation and the repercussions for stability of the region," Iraqi lawmaker Ali al-Adeeb, a close aide to Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, told reporters in Baghdad.

Said Mr. al-Moualem, "The stability of Iraq is a very important part of the stability of Syria."

The United States has accused both Syria and Iran of backing groups trying to undermine Iraq's fledgling democratic government, citing in particular Tehran's ties to Shi'ite militias not under the control of Iraq's central government.

But there has been intense speculation about a change of course in Washington since the midterm elections and about the pending report from an independent panel looking into U.S. alternatives in Iraq.

Former Secretary of State James A. Baker III, a longtime adviser to the Bush family and head of the commission, met with Mr. al-Moualem for extensive talks in September. British Prime Minister Tony Blair, President Bush's closest ally in the Iraq war, also has lobbied for direct contacts with Syria and Iran.

The State Department said yesterday the United States did not feel "snubbed" in being excluded from the Tehran gathering, and that it was up to Iraq to determine its relations with its neighbors.

"If [the Iraqis] believe this is a positive opportunity for them, then they are more than welcome to go ahead," said spokesman Tom Casey. "They don't need our invitation or approval to do so."

U.S. military spokesman Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, briefing reporters in Iraq, said that between 70 and 100 foreign fighters are still crossing each month along the lengthy Syrian border.

Arab-language press accounts in recent days reported details of a far more extensive accord that could be on the table in Tehran.

Citing Iraqi government sources, the Baghdad newspaper Azzaman over the weekend reported that Mr. al-Moualem's visit was meant in part to discuss a "partnership" among Iraq, Iran and Syria and a series of coordinated steps to stabilize the security situation inside Iraq.

Under the accord, Iraq would repeal the law barring members of Saddam Hussein's Ba'ath Party -- who had close ties with their Syrian counterparts -- from government posts and would move to expel fighters from the anti-Iranian Mojahedin Khalq still based inside Iraq.

Both Syria and Iran would move to tighten their own borders against foreign fighters infiltrating into Iraq, and Iran would "deal with" al Qaeda figures inside its borders with suspected ties to terrorists in Iraq.

The announcement of the Tehran meeting came as at least four dozen Iraqis and a U.S. soldier and U.S. Marine were killed in sectarian and insurgent attacks.

Among the dead was Walid Hassan, one of Iraq's most popular comedians, whose weekly satirical television show "Caricature" mocked Iraqis, U.S. forces and anti-government groups alike. Mr. Hassan was shot by gunmen while driving in western Baghdad.

At least 47 American troops have been killed in Iraq since the beginning of the month.

·This article is based in part on wire-service reports.

U.S. Should Lead Iraq Summit (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, November 21, 2006

IRAN HAS INVITED TOP Iraqi and Syrian leaders to Tehran this weekend, but there are no Americans on the guest list. The omission is hardly a snub — U.S. diplomats probably wouldn't have much fun there anyway — but the talks underline the absurdity of the White House position, which is essentially to wait for a bipartisan commission to give it permission to sit down with some friends and enemies. Regional discussions about the future of Iraq are already happening. The U.S. should send out some invitations of its own.

DOJ_NMG_0096847

In some respects, this weekend's talks about ways of curbing the violence in Iraq are unremarkable. Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki visited Tehran in September, and the Syrians are frequent callers. The impending reestablishment of diplomatic relations between Iraq and Syria after a quarter of a century cements a growing bond.

The U.S. has reacted to the meeting with a kind of skeptical nonchalance (or vice versa). This reaction is understandable, but the overriding fact is that the situation in Iraq is untenable — to the U.S., its allies and its enemies.

Under such circumstances, it makes no sense to wait until January for former Secretary of State James A. Baker III to suggest that the U.S. open talks with Iran and Syria. Nor is it smart to commission national security advisor Stephen J. Hadley to write an alternative report that appears likely to be based on the self-justifying views of the very administration insiders who are responsible for the situation in Iraq.

The U.S., supporting the Maliki government, may or may not be able to broker a peace settlement between the warring Sunni and Shiite factions in Iraq. But it has a duty to the Iraqi people to keep the neighbors from rushing in to carve up their country.

U.S. officials say that Zalmay Khalilzad, the U.S. ambassador to Iraq, is authorized to talk to Iran, but only on the topic of ending violence in Iraq. They also say that Iran and Syria should show their concern for Iraq not through rhetoric but with action — such as cutting off their support for Iraqi militias and preventing terrorists from crossing their borders.

This is all true enough. But it also ignores the U.S.' responsibility for Iraq. One of the administration's goals in the war was to recalibrate the balance of power in the Middle East. In this it has succeeded spectacularly — but the new order may be even less to its liking.

President Bush need not wait for the release of a commission report to convene a conference and invite all of the key players in Iraq's future: Iraq, Iran, Syria, Turkey, Jordan, Saudi Arabia, as well as representatives of the Gulf Coordination Council, the European Union and the U.N. Agreeing on a mutual duty to respect and uphold Iraq's territorial integrity would be the first goal.

If the United States fails to act, diplomacy delayed may become diplomacy derailed.

Next Move In Iraq? (USAT)

By Wesley Clark

USA Today, November 21, 2006

The mission in Iraq is spiraling into failure. American voters have sent a clear message: Bring our troops home, but don't lose. That's a tall order both for resurgent Democrats, some of whom are calling for a quick withdrawal, and the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, which is presumably crafting new options.

Instead of cutting and running or staying the course, it is time for us to begin to redeploy. But how can we do this and improve our prospects for success?

First, we have to think past Iraq and above partisan politics, folding actions in Iraq into a strategy to protect broader U.S. interests throughout the region.

Neither the Bush administration's latest pronouncements nor the current political dialogue has adequately engaged these vital interests. The calamity in Iraq has hogtied the Bush administration, inviting disarray, if not instability, in neighboring countries that also require our attention.

U.S. interests include dissuading Iran from pursuing nuclear weapons and its hegemonic aspirations, providing security assurances for the rapidly developing Arab Gulf states and working with our friends in the Middle East to ensure access to oil resources and regional stability.

What about a timetable for U.S. troop withdrawals? Today, setting a rigid, Washington-driven timetable is an option, but a bad one. A precipitous troop reduction could have far-reaching effects: emboldening Iran, weakening U.S. security promises to friendly states, and even sparking military initiatives by other powers — Turkey or Iran — to deal with the resulting security vacuum. Our weakened position in Iraq also could undercut our leverage in the Israeli-Palestinian dispute.

What about imposing a tripartite division of Iraq? That would merely feed ethnic cleansing and likely lead to a wider, more intense conflict.

The right approach is a coordinated diplomatic, legal, economic and security campaign drawing upon broader dialogue in the region and intensified political work inside Iraq.

Here is how to do this:

·Establish an effective, sustained shuttle diplomacy within the region.

DOJ_NMG_0096848

·Form a high-level interagency diplomatic team, representing the White House and secretaries of State and Defense and led by an experienced, respected diplomat.

·Begin talks within Iraq, and with all its neighbors, based on a clear set of principles outlined by the team. The goal would be to seek the commitments necessary to achieve our aims inside Iraq and also advance U.S. interests in the region.

These principles could include: Iraq would remain whole; oil revenue would go to the Iraqi people based on a formula they determine; the rights and security of individuals must be protected; the United States would have no permanent bases in Iraq; the covert flow of military arms and equipment into Iraq would be halted; and the security needs of all states would be respected.

A permanent Gulf regional security dialogue could emerge that includes Syria and Iran, and the United States could undertake a role as regional security guarantor. Preliminary discussions should lead to a more intensive dialogue with Iran in which security assurances and nuclear programs are discussed.

In terms of diplomacy, our team would engage each state and party, solicit its views and challenge it to participate in moving forward, just as U.S. diplomat Richard Holbrooke did in the Balkans a decade ago. Next steps might include confidence-building measures, hosted discussions between factions, and perhaps one or more larger meetings to conclude firm commitments, timetables or sequence of events.

Of course there are no guarantees, but from such a dialogue should emerge a prescription for U.S. troop levels and activities consistent with our larger interests. Carrots and sticks could be employed. For instance, the factions could vow certain actions in return for U.S. assistance or troop deployments, or redeployments, and possible assistance from neighboring states.

Reaching an understanding on Iraq need not be a lengthy process, but the dialogue must be broadened in scope and participation to be effective. The aim would be a consensual solution underwritten by outside guarantors, not an imposed solution. And finally, military power would have a subordinated and supporting role.

Simultaneously, the United States would set about transforming its applied military power in Iraq into the useful diplomatic influence essential to addressing broader security concerns.

Ultimately, security in the Gulf and winning against al-Qaeda will require that we work with regional powers, promote stability and gradual transformation, and regain “strategic consent” for long-term U.S. assistance in the region. We must use the situation in Iraq to propel us toward this larger goal, and in doing so, we will also find the right way to wind down our deployment there.

The outline of what needs to be done is clear. But does the administration have the courage and foresight to do it, or will it continue to march into profound failure?

Retired general Wesley Clark, former Supreme Commander of NATO, is a senior fellow at UCLA's Burkle Center for International Relations.

Syria Lends A Hand (WSJ)

By Bret Stephens

The Wall Street Journal, November 21, 2006

Walid al-Moallem is a man lately in the news. On Sunday, the Syrian foreign minister paid a visit to Baghdad to pledge his cooperation with the Iraqi government and urge a timetable for American withdrawal. On Friday, the New York Times reported that Mr. Moallem had met in New York with James Baker's Iraq Study Group to explain why it is in Syria's "national interest to try to help stabilize the situation in Iraq." Earlier in the month, Mr. Moallem promised that Israel would "find Syria ready to resume peace negotiations."

Who is Walid Moallem? And, what's more to the point, would the U.S. be wise to "engage" him and his government in the cause of Mideast peace, as everyone from Mr. Baker to Tony Blair and Henry Kissinger is now urging?

In his memoir, former Mideast negotiator Dennis Ross describes Mr. Moallem as "a man of intellect and humor." But the Baathist apparatchik is shown in a different light in last year's Mehlis Report, which details the preliminary findings of the U.N. investigation into the Feb. 14, 2005, assassination of former Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri and 22 others. According to the report, Mr. Moallem met with Hariri two weeks prior to his assassination. An excerpt of their conversation:

Hariri: "I cannot live under a security regime that is specialized in interfering with Hariri and spreading disinformation about Hariri and writing reports to [Syrian President] Bashar Assad. . . . Lebanon will never be ruled from Syria. This will no longer happen."

Moallem: "We and the [security] services here have put you into a corner. Please do not take things lightly."

The exchange was secretly taped. The Mehlis Report notes that "the recorded interview clearly contradicts Mr. Al-Moallem's witness interview of 20 September 2005 in which he falsely described the 1 February meeting as 'friendly and constructive' and avoided giving direct answers to the questions put to him."

DOJ_NMG_0096849

Mr. Moallem would thus seem to be guilty of obstructing an ongoing criminal investigation, if not actually of conspiracy to murder. But leave these sticky details aside and consider the case for engaging the Syrians diplomatically.

At a simplistic level, the argument is: Where's the harm in talking? Oddly, the people who say this about Syria rarely make it in connection to, say, al Qaeda.

A more sophisticated view is that the administration is anyway not seriously interested in overthrowing Mr. Assad -- the Muslim Brotherhood might well end up taking over -- so it will need carrots as well as sticks to improve his behavior. The largest of those carrots, supposedly, is a promise not to seek regime change; another is to abandon the cause of a truly independent Lebanon; a third is to lean on Israel to abandon the Golan Heights in return for a peace treaty. In exchange, it is hoped, Damascus will start playing a constructive role in Lebanon, abandon its support for terrorist groups in Iraq and Palestine, and begin to step away from its alliance with Iran.

That's a nice scenario, assuming it's plausible. But note the contradictions. How can the U.S. use the threat of regime change to improve Syrian behavior if in the very act of engagement it demonstrates that it has no interest in regime change? And why should Syria quit making mischief among its neighbors if it is that very mischief that brings America to the table?

In other words, for either side to gain ground they have to abandon the very things that got them ground. The State Department might just be "creative" enough to do that, but the Assad family has long understood that the only leverage they exercise is negative leverage. That's why the current Syrian president's father, Hafez Assad, refused the return of the Golan Heights when it was offered to him in 2000, and why Bashar Assad once said that "it is inconceivable that Israel will become a legitimate state even if the peace process is implemented." (Emphasis added.)

One also must wonder why Damascus has chosen this moment to go on its charm offensive, when it is riding high on America's stalemate in Iraq and Hezbollah's victory over Israel. In the past, the Syrians have made concrete concessions only under the most severe pressure: first in 1998, when Turkey threatened to invade if Syria did not expel Kurdish terrorist leader Abdullah Ocalan; then in 2005, when the U.S. and France united to demand the Syrian army's withdrawal from Lebanon.

One view is that Mr. Assad, after giving both material and verbal encouragement to the Iraqi "resistance," has concluded that Iraq's chaos could spread to Damascus. Maybe. But exiled Syrian dissident Ammar Abdulhamid has another take. "The neocon/neorealist dichotomy has given hope to the Syrian regime that it can outwait Bush," he says. "The regime is in jubilant mode right now, and the Iraq Study Group is going to deliver another boost to it."

In this reading, Mr. Assad's strategy is to ingratiate himself just enough with the West to take the option of regime change permanently off the table. In the meantime, he continues to funnel arms to Hezbollah while counting on the Shiite group to block the Hariri probe from ever going to trial. As for Iraq, having done his bit to bleed U.S. troops for three years, Mr. Assad has concluded it's time to usher us out the Mideast door. Funny the overture should come right after the U.S. midterms.

In the summer of 2005, a senior administration official smugly noted that the Syrian regime was sinking on its own weight, as if on quicksand. Now the countries have traded places, and some would urge the administration to grasp the offered hand of the likes of Mr. Moallem. They should consider what that hand has done, and whether it will pull us up -- or sink us.

Don't Trade Iran For Iraq (HILL)

The Hill, November 21, 2006

A consensus seems to be developing that only a "regional solution" embracing Iran and Syria can extract the United States from Iraq without jeopardy to those who have stood with us and without damage to both our reputation and Bush's place in history.

But at what price? Nobody seems willing to say what "engagement" with Iran for a regional solution would entail. We cannot ask Iran's help while we bomb its nuclear reactors or impose tough sanctions on the country.

The price of Iranian cooperation will be complicity in Tehran's nuclear ambitions. Iran will gladly assure Bush it does not intend to develop an atomic weapon. But we shouldn't believe it.

By quitting Iraq with Iranian help, we let a regime get atomic weapons that has promised to wipe Israel off the map. By going hat in hand to Iran, we sacrifice Israel.

Israel will have only one course — to bomb Iran in hope of delaying its acquisition of nuclear weapons. Israel's nuclear deterrent will be of little use. Israel could easily be wiped out by a few dozen nuclear explosions, while Iran, widely dispersed demographically, would likely survive an Israeli attack with half or more of its population alive. Israel cannot bet that Iran's good sense or the Israeli deterrent will stop Tehran from using nuclear weapons. It will be forced to strike now.

An Israeli strike would produce waves of nationalist sentiment in Iran and inflame Arab hatred of the Jewish state. It is precisely what we don't need now in the Middle East.

Nor would an Israeli attack necessarily stop Iran getting nukes. If Iran gets the bomb, Tehran will not only wipe out Israel, but will cow non-nuclear neighbors and gain control over the Gulf.

DOJ_NMG_0096850

What should the U.S. do?

We need to organize a Buyers Club, a kind of reverse OPEC to shun Iranian oil until Tehran dismantles its nuclear effort. Iran sells 2.7 million barrels of crude each day. That is a relatively small share of the 90 million barrels of daily world output. Merrill Lynch predicts that world oil production will rise by 2.6 million barrels a day in 2007 (1.1 million from OPEC countries and 1.5 million from the rest of the world). Its two-year phase-out of reliance on Iranian oil is feasible.

Japan, Iran's biggest customer, trimmed its purchases of Iranian oil by 15 percent in March. The Buyers Club would have to help importers to make sure shortages don't develop in any one country. (The U.S. does not buy any Iranian oil.) Prices will rise somewhat, but this is a small price to pay to avoid a nuclear war.

And about Iraq? An Iranian bomb is no way to save face! We need to pull out of Iraq and understand that we have lost the war there. We are unable to fight for a nation unwilling to fight for itself. We must accept the loss of face, do our best to stabilize the nation, help it stand on its feet for another year or so, and then pull out.

But we must be sure not to accept the siren song, reportedly being pedaled by former Secretary of State James Baker, that we can have a regional solution by getting our two old friends, Iran and Syria, into the act. That way lies disaster!

Morris, a former political adviser to Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.) and President Bill Clinton, is the author of "Condi vs. Hillary: The Next Great Presidential Race." To get Dick Morris's columns e-mailed to you for free, please send him your e-mail address. His e-mail is dickmorris2006@aol.com

An Iraqi Solution, Vietnam Style (NYT)

By Mark Moyar

The New York Times, November 21, 2006

Quantico, Va.

IRAQ'S prime minister, Nuri al-Maliki, is now saying that he wants the United States to stand back and let him use Iraqi forces to restore order. Within six months, he asserts, the bloodletting will cease. The United States must give this proposal very serious consideration. Critics of America's current Iraq policy, particularly among the Congressional Democrats, have tended to concentrate on international diplomatic remedies. Experience, however, suggest that only the Iraqis themselves can end the chaos and violence.

The United States faced a very similar crisis a half-century ago. In 1955, the pro-American government of Ngo Dinh Diem sought to disband militias that belonged to religious sects, analogous to the Shiite militias in Iraq today. A self-interested faction controlled the South Vietnamese police, much as self-interested Shiites dominate the Iraqi police. In Vietnam as in Iraq, the only strong force not beholden to the sects was the army, and the army's leadership was not entirely loyal to the national government.

When the South Vietnamese sects defied the authority of the Saigon government in the spring of 1955, the American special ambassador, Gen. J. Lawton Collins, urged Diem to compromise with them. Efforts to suppress the sects by force, Collins warned, would alienate the Vietnamese people, unhinge the army and lead to disastrous civil warfare. This advice was based on the mistaken premise that political solutions suitable in the United States would likewise be suitable in any other country.

Diem rejected Collins's advice, and with good reason. In South Vietnam, as in other historically authoritarian countries, if the government failed to maintain a monopoly on power, it would lose prestige among its supporters and enemies. Only a strong national government could prevent the sects and other factions from tearing the country apart. While Diem was able to gain the submission of some groups by persuasion, others remained defiant.

In April 1955, fighting broke out between the South Vietnamese National Army and one of the militias. Diem sought to capitalize on the fighting to destroy the militia, which caused Collins to advocate Diem's removal. Other Americans predicted chaos and wanted to abandon South Vietnam altogether.

President Dwight Eisenhower, however, decided that Diem should be allowed to use the army against the militias. In Eisenhower's view, a leader who had the smarts and the strength to prevail on his own — even if it meant he discarded American advice — would be a better and more powerful ally than one who survived by doing whatever the United States recommended.

Through political acumen and force of personality, Diem gained the full cooperation of the National Army and used it to subdue the sects. Simultaneously, he seized control of the police by replacing its leaders with nationalists loyal to him. In a culture that respected the strong man for vanquishing his enemies, Diem's suppression of the militias gained him many new followers.

Diem went on to become a highly effective national war leader. When, in August 1963, he suppressed challenges to his authority from another religious group, he again experienced an upsurge in prestige. Some American officials and journalists, however, denounced him for what they mistakenly saw as counterproductive heavy-handedness, and the officials prodded South Vietnamese generals into overthrowing him.

DOJ_NMG_0096851

The South Vietnamese government rapidly deteriorated after the coup, in which Diem was assassinated. The new leaders were inept and tolerated strident opposition groups in order to satisfy the Americans. Violence proliferated among religious groups, and Viet Cong subversion accelerated.

South Vietnam's history recommends the pursuit of two objectives that American officials are now urging upon Prime Minister Maliki: subduing the Shiite militias and transferring control of the police from Shiite partisans to Iraqi nationalists.

In Iraq as in Vietnam, the leader best able to end the violence will be one who possesses a very keen understanding of the country's politics and can judge them better than outsiders can. Mr. Maliki has shown that he does not share America's views on how to deal with the militias and the police. Vietnam tells us that we should welcome his willingness to act on his own initiative, rather than being alarmed by it.

Just as Diem established himself because Eisenhower let him participate unhindered in a Darwinian struggle, we should give Mr. Maliki the chance to restore order as he sees fit, provided his government does not try to suppress the insurgency through wholesale violence against Sunni civilians, as some fear it will.

If we pull back our troops temporarily and let Mr. Maliki deal with Iraq's problems using Iraqi forces, we will be able to determine more quickly whether he can save his country as Diem saved his in 1955. We will see whether he has the political skills to cut deals with local leaders, the support of enough security forces to suppress those who won't cut deals, and the determination to prevent the obliteration of the Sunnis.

If he does not have these attributes, it is to be hoped that the Iraqi Parliament, the Council of Representatives, will exercise its constitutional right to remove the prime minister by a vote of no confidence. Perhaps there is a better prime minister out there. It is also possible that nationalists will try to stage a coup and install a more authoritarian, less sectarian government. We may decide to condone a coup if the situation becomes desperate enough. But we would be best advised to avoid orchestrating one as we did so disastrously in 1963.

The United States may ultimately find that no Iraqi leader can neutralize both the insurgents and the militias. The benefits of a self-sufficient Iraqi government are so great, however, that we must give Mr. Maliki the opportunity to try.

Flaws Cited In Effort To Train Iraqi Forces (WP)

By Thomas E. Ricks

The Washington Post, November 21, 2006

The U.S. military's effort to train Iraqi forces has been rife with problems, from officers being sent in with poor preparation to a lack of basic necessities such as interpreters and office materials, according to internal Army documents.

The shortcomings have plagued a program that is central to the U.S. strategy in Iraq and is growing in importance. A Pentagon effort to rethink policies in Iraq is likely to suggest placing less emphasis on combat and more on training and advising, sources say.

In dozens of official interviews compiled by the Army for its oral history archives, officers who had been involved in training and advising Iraqis bluntly criticized almost every aspect of the effort. Some officers thought that team members were often selected poorly. Others fretted that the soldiers who prepared them had never served in Iraq and lacked understanding of the tasks of training and advising. Many said they felt insufficiently supported by the Army while in Iraq, with intermittent shipments of supplies and interpreters who often did not seem to understand English.

The Iraqi officers interviewed by an Army team also had complaints; the top one was that they were being advised by officers far junior to them who had never seen combat.

Some of the American officers even faulted their own lack of understanding of the task. "If I had to do it again, I know I'd do it completely different," reported Maj. Mike Sullivan, who advised an Iraqi army battalion in 2004. "I went there with the wrong attitude and I thought I understood Iraq and the history because I had seen PowerPoint slides, but I really didn't."

Gen. John P. Abizaid, the top U.S. military commander for the Middle East, told Congress last week that he plans to shift increasing numbers of troops from combat roles to training and advisory duties. Insiders familiar with the bipartisan Iraq Study Group say that next month the panel will probably recommend further boosts to the training effort. Pentagon officials are considering whether the number of Iraqi security forces needs to be far larger than the current target of about 325,000, which would require thousands more U.S. trainers.

Most recently, a closely guarded military review being done for the Joint Chiefs of Staff laid out three options for Iraq. It appears to be favoring a version of one option called "Go Long" that would temporarily boost the U.S. troop level -- currently about 140,000 -- but over time would cut combat presence in favor of training and advising. The training effort could take five to 10 years.

DOJ_NMG_0096852

Despite its central role in Iraq, the training and advisory program is not well understood outside narrow military circles. Congress has hardly examined it, and training efforts lie outside the purview of the special inspector general on Iraq reconstruction. The Army has done some studies but has not released them. Even basic information, such as how many of the 5,000 U.S. military personnel involved are from the National Guard and Reserves, is unusually difficult to obtain.

But the previously unreported transcripts of interviews conducted by the Army's Combat Studies Institute at Fort Leavenworth, Kan., offer a view into the program, covering a time from shortly after the 2003 invasion until earlier this year.

One of the most common complaints of the Army officers interviewed was that the military did a poor job of preparing them. "You're supposed to be able to shoot, move and communicate," said Lt. Col. Paul Ciesinski, who was an adviser in northern Iraq last year and this year. "Well, when we got to Iraq we could hardly shoot, we could hardly move and we could hardly communicate, because we hadn't been trained on how to do these things." The training was outdated and lackadaisical, he said, adding sarcastically: "They packed 30 days' training into 84 days."

Sullivan, who advised three infantry companies in the Iraqi army, called the U.S. Army's instruction for the mission "very disappointing."

Nor were the officers impressed by some of their peers. Maj. Jeffrey Allen, an active-duty soldier, noted that all other members of his team were from the National Guard, and that his team was supposed to have 10 members but was given only five. He described his team as "weak . . . in particular the brigade team chief."

A separate internal review this year by the military's Center for Army Lessons Learned, based on 152 interviews with soldiers involved in the training and advisory program, found that there was "no standardized guideline" for preparing advisers and that such instruction was needed because "a majority of advisors have little to no previous experience or training."

Lt. Col. Michael Negard, a spokesman for the Multi-National Security Transition Command-Iraq, the headquarters for training, said he has not seen the Lessons Learned report and so does not know whether the training has been improved or standardized since that report was issued.

After arriving in Iraq, advisers said, they often were shocked to find that the interpreters assigned to them were of little use. Ciesinski reported that at his base in western Nineveh province, "They couldn't speak English and we would have to fire them."

Nor were there enough interpreters to go around, said Sullivan. "It was a real juggling act" with interpreters, he said, noting that he would run from the headquarters to a company "to borrow an interpreter, run him over to say something, and then send him back."

But he was better off than Maj. Robert Dixon, who reported that during his tour in 2004, "We had no interpreters at the time."

The Center for Army Lessons Learned study, whose contents were first reported by the Wall Street Journal, found one unit that learned after 10 frustrating months that its interpreters were "substandard" and had been translating the advisers' instructions so poorly that their Iraqi pupils had difficulty understanding the concepts being taught.

Trainers and advisers also reported major problems with the Army supply chain. "As an adviser, I got the impression that there was an 'us' and 'them' " divide between the advisers and regular U.S. forces, said Maj. Pete Fedak, an adviser near Fallujah in 2004. "In other words, there was an American camp and then, outside, there was a bermed area for the Iraqis, of which we were part."

Replacing basic office materials was one of the toughest problems advisers reported. "Guys would come under fire so they could get computer supplies, paper and things like that," Sullivan said. "It was a surreal experience."

Lt. Col. Paul Yingling, a staff officer with the 3rd Armored Cavalry Regiment in Iraq in 2005 and 2006 who worked with Iraqi units, came away thinking that the Army fundamentally is not geared to the task of helping the advisory effort.

"The thing the Army institutionally is still struggling to learn is that the most important thing we do in counterinsurgency is building host-nation institutions," he told the interviewers, "yet all our organizations are designed around the least important line of operations: combat operations."

Advisers found that the capabilities of Iraqi forces "ran the gamut from atrocious to excellent," as it was put by Lt. Col. Kevin Farrell, who commanded an armored unit in east Baghdad last year and this year.

Many worried that the Iraqi units being advised contained insurgents. An Iraqi National Guard battalion "was infiltrated by the enemy," said Maj. Michael Monti, a Marine who was an adviser in the Upper Euphrates Valley in 2004 and 2005.

Some advisers reported being personally targeted by infiltrators. "We had insurgents that we detected and arrested in the battalion that were planning an operation against me and my team," Allen said.

But Iraqi officers may have had even more to fear, because their families were also vulnerable. "I went through seven battalion commanders in eight weeks," Allen noted. Dixon reported that in Samarra both his battalion commander and intelligence officer deserted just before a major operation.

DOJ_NMG_0096853

Iraqis also had some complaints about their U.S. advisers, most notably that junior U.S. officers who had never seen combat were counseling senior Iraqi officers who had fought in several wars. "Numerous teams have lieutenants . . . to fill the role of advisor to an Iraqi colonel counterpart," the Lessons Learned report stated.

Farrell, the officer in east Baghdad, said some advisers were literally "phoning in" their work. Some would not leave the forward operating base "more than one or two days out of the week -- instead they would just call the Iraqis on cellphones," he said.

Dixon was grim about the experience. "Would I want to go back and do it again?" he asked. His unambiguous answer: "No."

Yingling came to a broader conclusion. He recommended an entirely different orientation in Iraq, both for trainers and for regular U.S. units. "Don't train on finding the enemy," he said. "Train on finding your friends, and they will help you find your enemy. . . . Once you find your friends, finding the enemy is easy."

Staff researcher Julie Tate contributed to this report.

Force Multiplier (WSJ)

By Hans Binnendijk And Bing West

The Wall Street Journal, November 21, 2006

The reassessment of U.S. strategy in Iraq should radically alter the combat mission of the American troops serving there. The key policy change is to embed five times as many U.S. combat advisers into Iraqi battalions. This will, on the one hand, reduce the size and casualties of U.S. forces, and on the other, strengthen the Iraqi army -- the only institution that can stop the creeping civil war. A war of that order will eventually degenerate into a regional catastrophe. The U.S. has three unpalatable choices: withdraw, choose sides or make a last effort to avoid it. Withdrawing now will trigger that war. Choosing sides with Shiites against Sunnis will label America as a murderer when the inevitable atrocities take place.

So what would comprise a serious final effort? The diplomatic elements include discussions with Syria and Iran, multilateral aid and enfranchising Sunnis by sharing oil revenues, amnesty and moderation of the de-Baathification rules.

But any diplomatic package will fail unless Iraq's security forces restore order. The only way to rapidly do that is to shift platoons from American battalions into 140 Iraqi army battalions and critical police stations. Currently the U.S. has about a dozen military advisers working in each Iraqi battalion. These advisers spend their time as managers. They are too few to give combat advice and moral reassurance out on the streets during daily operations.

As a result, Iraqi platoons, lacking self-confidence, restrict their patrolling in the dangerous areas where they are most needed. To infuse combat confidence in each Iraqi battalion, we propose embedding about 60 advisers -- by transferring a reinforced platoon from every U.S. infantry battalion in Iraq. Each American soldier and Marine so deployed would be a force multiplier, greatly increasing the effectiveness of the Iraqi soldiers. The total number of advisers would expand to 20,000, plus additional support. Air and artillery strikes would be on call. Additional U.S. battalions would be needed to provide Quick Reaction Forces should the embedded forces need them. Special Forces commandos would still seek out al Qaeda operatives anywhere. U.S. units would maintain security in parts of Baghdad and 10 other key cities.

The huge increase in advisers would be offset by a drawdown of American conventional battalions and base support units. American-only patrols are becoming counterproductive, with fewer direct enemy engagements, more sniper and IED attacks, and more alienated Iraqis. In return for the embedding, the U.S. would insist that Iraqi officers accused of malfeasance by their advisory teams be relieved of duty.

By shifting missions from American-only patrolling to embedded combat advisers, the overall U.S. troop requirement might be cut nearly in half during the coming year. But the effectiveness of the mission should increase, based on past experience. In Vietnam, the Marine Combined Action Platoon (CAP) program deployed over 100 squads to live in hamlets with Popular Force units. Large areas were patrolled at low cost and 60% of the Marines involved extended at the end of their tours. Last year in northwest Iraq, the American commander in al Qaim replicated the CAP experience by integrating his battalion into local police and army forces and driving al Qaeda out of the city.

Many U.S. commanders will resist a major structural change that breaks down battalion combat teams. The embedded units will patrol heavily in dangerous areas. The Iraqi Army has to take on the militias and the police units who side with them. If the U.S. dramatically increases the advisory effort, strengthening the army, the risk emerges of creating a strong man, not a Western-style democracy; yet given the consequences of failure, these risks must be taken.

Restoring security in Iraq trumps all else. In the spring of 2004, Lt. Gen. James N. Mattis, then commanding the Marine division in Anbar province, intended to initiate the combined platoon program on a major basis. The eruption of the extended battle for Fallujah precluded that. Combined platoons were a good idea 30 months ago; today, they are vital.

DOJ_NMG_0096854

Mr. Binnendijk is the Theodore Roosevelt professor at National Defense University. Mr. West is author of "No True Glory: A Frontline Account of the Battle for Fallujah" (Bantam, 2005).

Iraq Resumes Diplomatic Ties With Syria (AP-Y)

By Thomas Wagner, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 21, 2006

After nearly a quarter-century of severed ties, Iraq said Monday it will resume diplomatic relations with neighboring Syria — a move seen as a possible step toward stemming some of the unrelenting violence, which claimed another 100 lives.

The Iraqi and Syrian presidents also received invitations from Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad to a weekend summit in Tehran to tackle the chaos in Iraq, Iraqi lawmakers said. Iraqi President Jalal Talabani's spokesman said his boss would attend but that Syrian President Bashar Assad would not. The invitation was thought to be an attempt by Iran to counter U.S. influence in the region.

The announcement of restored Iraqi-Syrian ties came during a groundbreaking visit to Baghdad by Syrian Foreign Minister Walid Moallem, who was challenged over Damascus' role in supporting the Sunni insurgency.

"We object to any neighboring country that allows itself to be a base or a transit point for the terrorist groups that harm Iraq," Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki said after meeting with the Syrian envoy.

Al-Maliki told Moallem that Damascus should not let its disputes with the United States be played out in Iraq, where the chaos and bloodshed has become "a danger that threatens all, not Iraq only."

Asked about the Syrian's visit, State Department deputy spokesman Tom Casey said "the problem is not what they say but what they do."

"Certainly what we would like to see the Syrians do is take actions to, among other things, prevent foreign fighters from coming across the border into Iraq; and, again, to back up the positive words that they have with some real concrete steps," Casey said.

Moallem arrived in Iraq on Sunday in the first such high-level visit by a Syrian official since the fall of Saddam Hussein's regime in 2003. He was expected to return to Damascus on Tuesday.

"Diplomatic relations will be restored between the two countries during the visit," Iraqi government spokesman Ali al-Dabbagh said.

Syria broke diplomatic ties with Iraq in 1982, accusing Iraq of inciting riots by the banned Muslim Brotherhood in Syria. Damascus also sided with Iran in the 1980-88 Iran-Iraq war. Trade ties were restored in 1997.

More recently, Syria is widely believed to have done little to stop foreign fighters and al-Qaida recruits from crossing its border to join Sunni insurgents in Iraq. It also has provided refuge for many top members of Saddam's former leadership and political corps, which is thought to have organized arms and funding for the insurgents. The Sunni insurgency, since it sprang to life in the late summer of 2003, has been responsible for the vast majority of U.S. deaths in Iraq.

A U.S. soldier was killed by a roadside bomb in Baghdad on Saturday night and a U.S. Marine died during combat in Anbar province on Sunday, the military said, raising to at least 2,865 the number of U.S. service members who have died since the beginning of the Iraq war. This month in Iraq, 47 American service members have been killed or died.

The Iraqi death toll, meanwhile, rose to at least 1,371 for the first 20 days of November — the highest for any month since The Associated Press began tracking the figure in April 2005.

In all, 25 Iraqis were killed Monday in a series of attacks in Baghdad, Ramadi and Baqouba, police said. The bodies of 75 Iraqis who had been kidnapped and tortured also were found on the streets of the capital, in Dujail to the north of Baghdad and in the Tigris River in southern Iraq.

The Iraqi death toll this month is already well above the 1,216 who died in all of October, which had been the deadliest month in Iraq since the AP began its count.

The actual totals are likely considerably higher because many deaths are not reported. Victims in those cases are quickly buried according to Muslim custom and never reach morgues or hospitals to be counted.

Monday's civilian victims included Walid Hassan, an actor and comedian on Al-Sharqiyah TV who was shot while driving in western Baghdad. The motive for his slaying was unknown. Hassan had performed in a comedy series called "Caricature," which mocked coalition forces, insurgents, militias and Iraq's government.

Assailants also shot to death Fulayeh al-Ghurabi, a Shiite professor at Babil University in the province south of Baghdad, as he was driving home at midday, police said.

In addition to the victims of violence, countless Iraqis have had close calls with death. Among them were two government officials who escaped assassination attempts Monday.

DOJ_NMG_0096855

Minister of State Mohammed Abbas Auraibi, a member of Iraq's Shiite majority, said a roadside bomb hit his convoy at about 9:30 a.m. as it was driving on a highway in eastern Baghdad. Two of his bodyguards were wounded.

Hakim al-Zamily, a Shiite deputy health minister, also escaped unhurt when gunmen opened fire on his convoy in downtown Baghdad at noon, killing two of his guards, the minister said.

On Sunday, suspected Sunni insurgents kidnapped another deputy health minister, Shiite Ammar al-Saffar, from his home in northern Baghdad. Officials said the gunmen wore police uniforms and arrived in seven vehicles to abduct al-Saffar, who was believed to be the most senior government official kidnapped in Iraq since the war began in March 2003.

Al-Saffar was seized nearly a week after dozens of suspected Shiite militia gunmen in police uniforms kidnapped scores of people from a Ministry of Higher Education office in Baghdad. That ministry is predominantly Sunni.

Spoofer Of Iraq's Chaos Becomes Another Victim (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan

The Washington Post, November 21, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov. 20 -- For the last three years, Walid Hassan had an impossible task. He had to make war-weary Iraqis laugh. Week after week, the comedian and broadcaster found inspiration in the turmoil and bloodletting. On his weekend television show, "Caricature," he poked fun at the poor security, the long gas lines, the electricity blackouts and the ineffective politicians.

In Hassan's world, nothing was sacred. And many Iraqis adored him. In a nation bottled up with frustration, he was their release. They would recognize him on the streets and uncork their plights. He would listen, and turn them into satire.

On Monday, Hassan, 47, a father of five children, became a victim of the war and chaos from which he drew his inspiration. A Shiite Muslim, he was found in the majority-Sunni neighborhood of Yarmouk in west Baghdad with multiple bullet wounds to his back and head, according to police. He was last seen by witnesses in a black car with a driver and two other passengers.

"He was a star in the galaxy of Iraqi arts," said Ali Hanoon, the show's director. "Now, he's another sacrifice on the altar of this slaughtered country."

Hassan, who also produced a political show, was the latest casualty in the Iraqi media world, which has suffered heavily since the U.S.-led invasion of 2003 unleashed a wave of press freedom. So far, 133 reporters, cameramen and other media workers have been killed in Iraq, the vast majority of them Iraqi, according to Reporters Without Borders, a journalists advocacy group.

Hassan, described by friends as tall with gray-flecked hair and a warm smile, was the second employee of al-Sharkiya television, an independent channel owned by a London-based Iraqi businessman, to be killed this month. In January, a Sharkiya anchor escaped a kidnapping attempt by jumping out of the second-floor window of her apartment after masked men broke into her home.

On Monday, Hassan's family and closest friend struggled to comprehend his death. In today's Baghdad, filled with death squads and criminal gangs, there could be many reasons. Was he the victim of sectarian strife? Or was it a kidnap-for-ransom plot gone awry? Or did his broadcast cross one too many red lines?

What is clear is that Hassan was concerned about his life, said his friends. As he viewed the mounting death tolls, he often thought about when his turn would come, mirroring the views of many Iraqis, said Hanoon.

So, like most Iraqis, he made preparations for death. Last year he sold his car for $5,000 and used it to buy a piece of land for his family.

"I asked him, why you sold your car?" recalled Ali Jabbir, one of Hassan's co-actors on "Caricature."

"He said, 'If tomorrow comes and I die, at least I'll give a house to my kids.' And this was the concern of every Iraqi."

On Monday, Hanoon said he had spoken with Hassan's wife. She said her husband often reassured her that his fame would shield him from the violence unfolding outside.

"She told me he used to tell her, 'If people came and wanted to kill me, I would use reason with them. And I will tell them, why would you kill me? On what basis? And I would get out of it because I was so popular,' " Hanoon recounted.

After graduating from a fine arts college in Baghdad, Hassan worked as a civil servant in Nasiriyah. He took night courses in acting and art while working as a journalist for Iraq's state television. In the early 1990s, he came to Baghdad to pursue his dream of becoming a comedian. He got his break as a director of a candid camera program called "Tricks" that ran on state television, recalled Hanoon.

In the months after the U.S.-led invasion, when Iraq exploded with a constellation of television channels, Al-Sharkiya tapped Hassan and five other actors for "Caricature." In each 30-minute segment, the actors performed skits that often seemed like Iraq's version of "Saturday Night Live." Hassan's roles ranged from corrupt officials to brown-nosing bureaucrats.

DOJ_NMG_0096856

One skit was about a family who moved their home and all their belongings to an unknown location. By the end of the segment, they had grown long gray hair, their faces wrinkled with age. That's when the television viewers learned that the family was waiting in one of Iraq's notoriously long gas lines.

Last week, in his final role, Hassan played a man who made his way to the top of his company through connections, only to find out he was the wrong person for the job. Many viewers interpreted that as a slap at Iraq's unity government, in which sect and tribal allegiances are clearly visible in many ministries.

"The feeling Hassan had is the same that most people have, that Baghdad is withering," said Jabbir. "So we dealt with the diseases of society."

There was one sensitive issue they never played with: the sectarian strife disfiguring Iraqi society. "We always hated this subject," said Jabbir. "We believe the media should not provoke such strife. The goal is to put down such strife."

Hassan, his friends said, didn't perform his job for the money -- he earned a meager $400 a month and always found it hard to make ends meet.

On Monday, some of his co-actors on the show reflected on what drove Hassan to work on a show that could anger many powerful people.

"This was his own way to serve his country and his people, and this is the reason why Walid and us took that risk," said Bushra Ismael, a co-actor on "Caricature."

Hanoon said he wasn't certain whether the show would stay on the air.

"Since the program is a comedy, the laughter that will come out will be soaked with blood," said Hanoon.

Banned Iraqi Television Station Illicitly Back On The Air (MCT)

By Hannah Allam

McClatchy Newspapers, November 21, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq - When Iraqi government officials pulled the plug on al Zawraa TV earlier this month, they thought they'd finally stamped out a channel known for reporting live from "occupied Baghdad" and declaring Saddam Hussein's death sentence "a sad day for Iraq."

Two weeks later, however, the Sunni-owned station is back, and bloodier than ever.

"Virtuous clerics, tribesmen, merchants, farmers, work together as one hand to liberate Iraq," a crawl at the bottom of the screen urged Monday. Saddam-era martial music boomed as an insurgent video montage began: a sniper hitting an American soldier snacking on a sandwich, a U.S. Humvee bursting into flames as it hit a roadside bomb, Sunni Muslim militants vowing to overthrow Shiite leaders who are portrayed as agents of Iran.

"This is as violent as it gets," said Bassam al Husseini, the senior government adviser who'd sought the order banning the channel for its coverage of Saddam's trial. "Now they've become officially irhabiyah," he added, using the Arabic word for "terrorist."

Al Zawraa TV is the station of choice for nostalgic Baathists, militant Islamists, Iran-hating Sunnis and anti-American Arab nationalists. Driven underground by a court order on Nov. 5, the day Saddam was sentenced to death, the satellite news channel has re-emerged in recent days, broadcasting from an unknown location and devoid of any pretense of neutrality.

Its theme song is borrowed from an old Iraqi TV miniseries, and its content is unbroken, 24-hour insurgent propaganda.

"We'll fall man over man until our hair is gray, and this land will not be touched," the lyrics say, usually accompanied by startling footage of attacks on U.S. troops.

"I'm so happy to hear these nationalist songs again and to see the armed attacks against the Americans," said Tamam Abdul Samad, 28, a Sunni engineer from the southern Shiite city of Basra, which borders Iran. "When I hear it, I jump and dance. This channel represents Sunnis as well as patriotic Shiites." Al Zawraa's ability to broadcast round the clock in defiance of the government is yet another example of the increasing technological prowess of insurgents and their supporters. U.S. military officials sort through Internet sites, message boards, text messages and TV channels every week to monitor the ebb and flow of insurgent chatter. But that doesn't mean they're able to counter it.

"These extremist elements can literally go out and say what they want, post what they want," Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, spokesman for U.S.-led forces in Iraq, said at a news conference Monday. "They have absolutely no responsibility to the press or anybody else to come back and clarify it, validate it, justify it, to be held accountable to it. Whereas, in fact, it's the exact opposite for us."

Al Zawraa was launched in November 2005, the brainchild of Mishaan al Jubouri, a Sunni member of the Iraqi parliament who fled to Syria recently amid allegations of corruption. The station claims it won't run al Qaida videos and doesn't condone attacks on civilians; its allies are Iraqi nationalist fighters who strike only military and government targets, it says. In a telephone interview from Damascus, Jubouri said the main goal of the station is to urge resistance to what he calls the "U.S.-backed Safavid occupation," a reference to the Persian Shiite dynasty that ruled Baghdad in the late 16th and early 17th centuries. "Safavid" is now a common slur to describe the Shiites in charge of Iraq, many of whom spent years in Iran as exiles.

DOJ_NMG_0096857

"When we were broadcasting in public from inside Iraq, we had to respect Iraqi law. But when the Iraqi government broke the law and closed the channel for no legitimate reason, they turned us into a channel that broadcasts in secrecy," Jubouri said.

Jubouri said the station's Baghdad offices remain shuttered and his six correspondents on the run, roaming the Iraqi countryside in a satellite truck, from which they beam their programming to an Egyptian satellite distributor called Nilesat, which then retransmits the channel across the Middle East.

Jubouri said the new pro-resistance format has increased the number of viewers "100 times over." He said the channel receives thousands of e-mails and text messages every day.

"We are now broadcasting from places the Safavids can't reach," he boasted.

To many Sunni Iraqis, it's the perfect antidote to the Shiite-run stations that regularly deride Sunni clerics as terrorists, air interviews conducted in Persian-accented Arabic and support militias blamed for scores of sectarian killings.

In predominantly Sunni areas of Iraq, former military officers watch from cafes, and ordinary families tune in from home for the songs, speeches and spirit of the days when Iraq was a place of law and order, albeit one built under the crushing weight of a brutal dictatorship.

"This channel wasn't popular or aggressive before the decision to close it," said Jamal Abdullah, 29, a teacher from the Sunni insurgent stronghold of Fallujah.

(McClatchy special correspondents Mohammed al Dulaimy and Shatha al Awsy contributed to this report.)

British PM Visits Troops In Afghanistan (AP)

By David Stringer, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 21, 2006

British Prime Minister Tony Blair told soldiers fighting a resurgent Taliban that success in Afghanistan would be a step toward global security, and on Monday pledged Britain's commitment to the war-torn country "for as long as it takes."

Blair held talks in Kabul with President Hamid Karzai following a visit to meet hundreds of troops in the country's restive southern Helmand province — a former Taliban stronghold and hub of Afghanistan's heroin trade.

Blair paid tribute to the troops at Camp Bastion — Britain's main southern base.

"Here in this extraordinary desert is where the future of world security in the early 21st century is going to be played out," he said, speaking on a platform raised above a vast stretch of gray dust.

The visit was the British leader's first to Afghanistan since 2002. Britain has around 6,000 soldiers deployed in Afghanistan.

Blair told a joint news conference with Karzai at the presidential palace that British and NATO forces would likely remain in Afghanistan for years to prevent any return to power of the Taliban.

"We came to Afghanistan because the sickness and the evil that was here came to us," Blair said, referring to the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks on the U.S. "I don't believe there is an alternative but to fight this and to fight it for as long as it takes."

Blair's arrival followed a two-day visit to Pakistan, where he and Pakistani President Gen. Pervez Musharraf agreed to a package of joint ventures to tackle extremism and to aid neighboring Afghanistan.

Musharraf said Afghanistan needed a huge influx of reconstruction aid, similar to the U.S. Marshall Plan that helped rebuild Europe after World War II.

A total of 41 British soldiers have died in Afghanistan since the U.S.-led invasion in 2001 — including 36 killed since Britain's deployment to Helmand province in July, Blair's office said.

British troops moved into the former Taliban stronghold and global heroin hub as part of the NATO mission to subdue insurgents and allow reconstruction to expand.

"This is a fight of a different kind from anything we have faced as a country, certainly in the postwar years," Blair said in Helmand. "It is not the same as two major powers fighting each other. It's not like World War I or World War II."

After talking with the British leader, Maj. Andy Plewes said his company of commandos — newly arrived on a six-month tour — were eager to begin the job of ousting insurgents, but also to mend relations with local community leaders.

"They've trained back in Britain for it and are ready to get out into the villages, sit down for talks with tribal leaders and drink endless cups of green tea," Plewes said.

Nick Key, a regional coordinator for Britain's foreign office, said meetings with tribal leaders had led to the withdrawal of British forces from the district of Musa Qala — prompting claims soldiers were in effect forced into retreat and raised concerns the area could be exploited by Taliban fighters.

"We know we have to keep our eyes open and we do that," Key said, insisting the pullout had been at the request of local leaders and Karzai.

DOJ_NMG_0096858

Britain's Sunday Times newspaper reported Sunday that Taliban commanders had been discovered freely recuperating in the Pakistani city of Quetta following battles in Afghanistan with British forces.

"Fighting the British is as easy as eating a loaf of bread from my hand," the newspaper quoted an unidentified Taliban commander as saying. "Fighting the British is much easier than the Americans. They have no faith."

Troops Will Stay, Blair Pledges (WT/AP)

By David Stringer

The Washington Times, November 21, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan -- British Prime Minister Tony Blair yesterday pledged his nation's commitment in Afghanistan "for as long as it takes," telling British soldiers fighting the resurgent Taliban that success would help establish global security.

Mr. Blair said at a press conference with Afghan President Hamid Karzai at the presidential palace in Kabul that British and NATO forces likely would remain in Afghanistan for years to come to prevent the Taliban's return to power.

"We came to Afghanistan because the sickness and the evil that was here came to us," Mr. Blair said, referring to the September 11, 2001, attacks on the United States. "I don't believe there is an alternative but to fight this and to fight it for as long as it takes."

On his first trip to Afghanistan since 2002, Mr. Blair met with Mr. Karzai after visiting hundreds of troops at Britain's main southern base, Camp Bastion, in the restive southern Helmand province -- a former Taliban stronghold and hub of the country's heroin trade.

"Here in this extraordinary desert is where the future of world security in the early 21st century is going to be played out," Mr. Blair said.

Britain has about 6,000 troops deployed in the country.

Mr. Blair's arrival followed a two-day visit to Pakistan, where he and President Pervez Musharraf agreed to a package of joint ventures to tackle extremism and to aid war-ravaged Afghanistan.

Gen. Musharraf said neighboring Afghanistan needed a huge influx of reconstruction aid, similar to the U.S. Marshall Plan that helped rebuild Europe after World War II.

A total of 41 British troops have died in Afghanistan since the U.S.-led invasion in 2001 -- including 36 since Britain's deployment to Helmand in July as part of the NATO mission to subdue insurgents and allow the expansion of reconstruction.

"This is a fight of a different kind from anything we have faced as a country, certainly in the postwar years," Mr. Blair said in Helmand.

After talking with Mr. Blair, Maj. Andy Plewes said his company of commandos -- newly arrived on a six-month tour -- was eager to begin ousting insurgents and building relations with local community leaders.

"They've trained back in Britain for it and are ready to get out into the villages, sit down for talks with tribal leaders and drink endless cups of green tea," Maj. Plewes said.

British Defense Secretary Des Browne said last month that operations in Afghanistan had cost Britain $1.6 billion since 2001.

Aid for the region has included a program of loans amounting to about $190 apiece to farmers and rural workers, aimed at encouraging them to establish new businesses.

However, hopes of denting Afghanistan's narcotics trade were undermined by a bumper opium harvest this past season.

Taliban Drug Trade: Echoes Of Colombia (CSM)

By Gretchen Peters,

The Christian Science Monitor, November 21, 2006

KABUL, AFGHANISTAN

As Afghanistan's narcotics trade explodes past $3 billion a year, there is concern that the Taliban is becoming another FARC, Colombia's notorious leftist insurgent group that draws much of its funding from the drug trade.

The Taliban and FARC - the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia - both got their start protecting peasants from corrupt governments. There's evidence both initially fought narcotics traffic but then levied taxes on the trade for much-needed cash.

Over time, the FARC began to use its soldiers to protect shipments, and took over coca factories. They forced farmers under their control to grow coca. Eventually, they became self-sufficient and set up a parallel government in their semiautonomous zone. They now earn an estimated $500 million a year from cocaine.

That all sounds eerily familiar to police and military officials in Afghanistan. "There is no question at all that the Taliban has been increasingly involved both directly and indirectly in narcotics," says Seth Jones, an analyst at the Rand Corp.

DOJ_NMG_0096859

Evidence is growing that the Taliban and their allies are moving beyond taxing the trade to protecting opium shipments, running heroin labs, and even organizing farm output in areas they control. "It's reached the point where about half of the opium we seize in the provinces has some link to the Taliban," says Gen. Ali Shah Paktiawal, director of the anticriminal branch of the Kabul police.

Another senior Afghan security official says captured Taliban have confessed that most funding comes from drugs.

Afghan opium production, which mushroomed 59 percent in 2006, multiplied by 162 percent in southern Helmand Province, where Taliban ties to the trade are clearest. "People should be concerned about the FARCification of the Taliban," says a senior Western counternarcotics official, adding, "It does not take a lot of drug money to fund their terrorist operations."

British Prime Minister Tony Blair visited British troops in the province Monday and pledged to stay "as long as it takes" to prevent a return to power by the Taliban. British aid - $1.6 billion since 2001 - has included loans to farmers to start new businesses. But the country produced a bumper opium crop this past season, and is expected to do so again next year.

Many experts believe the Taliban has always been dependent on the poppy trade. Declassified US State Department records show that two major narcotraffickers now in US custody, Baz Mohammed and Bashir Noorzai, sat on the original five-member Taliban shura, or leadership council.

"The Taliban rose to power by co-opting Afghan heroin," says a US official.

Today there's raging debate among experts over how much the Taliban leadership depends on heroin for its financing. Some say that donations from wealthy Arabs and financial support from Pakistan make up a larger portion of the Taliban's financing than heroin. "I don't believe Mullah Omar and his top counsel are involved, but they have clearly allowed [trafficking] to happen," says the Western official.

Unraveling the truth is complicated by the fact that the Taliban is less of a unified movement today than it was at its start. Now, officials say, it's more a loose grouping of tribal leaders, businessmen, and regional warlords.

"There's a very small core of true believers still left in the Taliban," says a top US military official. "But our intel is that most of the guys are just in it to make a buck."

The evolution from holy warriors to heroin smugglers should come as little surprise, say experts. Terror groups from the IRA to the Tamil Tigers have raised funds through trafficking, along with other criminal activities. And the lure of the dollar often eventually warps original goals. That metamorphosis has already happened to one Afghan insurgent group, say experts. Hezb-Islami Gulbuddin, run by the fundamentalist Gulbuddin Hikmatyar, is now "a full-fledged smuggling organization," moving everything from heroin to people, says a US official.

There's fragmentary evidence that Osama bin Laden has instructed his people not to get wrapped up in narcotics, apparently fearing it would harm his movement. "Some say that Osama and his people have specifically stayed away from it," says the Western official.

The growth in smuggling complicates strategic response. "Strategic withdrawals," like the Pakistani retreat from troubled North Waziristan or the British pullback from Musa Qula in Helmand, for example, risk allowing criminal activity to flourish.

"This trade has strengthened the Taliban and greatly weakened the government's capacity," says Mr. Jones of Rand. "I'm not optimistic about where it's going."

Some US lawmakers say Washington must do more. Congressman Charles Schumer (D) of New York tagged a $700 million amendment to the defense appropriations bill to try and boost funding for Counter Narcotics in Afghanistan. It was later cut back to a total of $116 million.

DOJ:

GAO Reports Progress On Info Classification At Justice, FBI (FCW)

Federal Computer Week, November 21, 2006

A report from the Government Accountability Office says the Justice Department has significantly improved the way it handles classified information, but the agency has not corrected one of the most glaring problems: staff shortages.

Increased staffing was one of the recommendations made by the National Archives' Information Security Oversight Office, which reviewed security procedures at DOJ in July 2004 and April 2005. GAO was brought in this year to assess how well DOJ and its FBI component were following the recommendations.

The agencies have made a lot of progress in a lot of areas, according to GAO's report. "DOJ, however, has taken no action on the most important recommendation, addressing staff shortages, which continue to place its program at risk," the document states.

DOJ_NMG_0096860

Justice said it does not have the resources to address the staff shortages, according to the report. The department said it "is trying to address its resources constraints, a longstanding problem that GAO identified as early as 1993, by requesting additional funds from an administrative account in fiscal year 2007."

But Justice officials acknowledged they do not know precisely how many new employees they would need because they have not fully assessed those needs, the report said. "It also does not have a strategy that identifies how it will use additional resources to address remaining deficiencies," the report added.

Justice had taken action on five of 10 recommendations, "including fixing problems with outdated and insufficient training and insufficient monitoring of components' programs," GAO said.

The report found that five department components — the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives; the Criminal Division; the Drug Enforcement Administration; the FBI; and the U.S. Marshals Service — were experiencing problems designating sensitive but unclassified information.

The components had no specific guides to help employees determine when to use that designation, GAO found.

Justice said it is awaiting the results of an interagency working group charged with setting governmentwide standards for sensitive but unclassified information before it will consider making any changes to that category. The working group is expected to release its findings next month.

GAO found that the FBI had taken action on 11 of its 12 recommendations, including updating most of its guidelines on classifying documents and issuing new security regulations.

The report also noted that the bureau is revising its training and oversight activities. "If FBI completes all recommendations, this will help to lower program risk since it makes 98 percent of DOJ's classification decisions," it states.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Prosecutors Drop Lay Appeal (HC)

Houston Chronicle, November 21, 2006

Government withdraws notice to challenge ruling clearing record

Federal prosecutors on Monday had this to say about their intent to challenge a judge's decision to wipe out former Enron Chairman Ken Lay's convictions: Never mind.

Last week the Justice Department filed notice it would appeal U.S. District Judge Sim Lake's October decision to clear Lay's name. That filing came the same day two senators introduced a bill to allow crime victims to seek restitution when a convicted defendant dies before exhausting appeals.

Lake had based his ruling on precedent set by the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals — the same court that would have heard a challenge. But prosecutors filed court papers Monday that said the government would withdraw its appeal notice.

Monday's filing explained that last week's action came as the deadline for filing notice of appeal was about to expire.

Even though the Justice Department acknowledged helping draft the proposed legislation, prosecutors said in Monday's filing that last week's move was "protective" to ensure they met the deadline and could then review the bill to determine if it could help support an appeal.

"Having concluded that review, the government now moves to withdraw its notice of appeal," the filing said.

Samuel Buffone, who represents Lay's estate, declined comment.

Lay died in July, just six weeks after he was convicted of 10 criminal counts in separate cases. He had not been sentenced.

Lake's decision would force the government to sue in civil court to seek millions of dollars of Lay's alleged ill-gotten gains, because a conviction no longer exists for a criminal forfeiture.

The legislation, introduced last week by Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., and Sen. Jeff Sessions, R-Ala., members of the Senate Judiciary Committee, aims to clarify the legal procedures when a defendant dies before appeal.

Head Of Cyberonics Resigns As Options Inquiry Expands (NYT)

By Barnaby J. Feder

The New York Times, November 21, 2006

The tumultuous tenure of Robert P. Cummins as chairman, president and chief executive of the medical device maker Cyberonics has ended, the company disclosed yesterday.

DOJ_NMG_0096861

Mr. Cummins, 52, who is known as Skip, is a former venture capitalist who joined the board of Cyberonics in 1988 and became chief executive in 1995. He gained a reputation as one of nation's most passionate and intimidating business leaders in dealing with critics, regulators and investors.

Mr. Cummins had been under growing pressure since questions arose in June about the timing of stock options for 100,000 shares that were granted to him in 2004 just hours after a regulatory panel recommended approval of a Cyberonics implant to treat depression. Although none of the options vested immediately, their potential value soared when trading in the stock resumed the next day.

Scrutiny of the timing of the 2004 options grant expanded into internal and government investigations of whether Cyberonics was among the scores of technology companies that improperly manipulated options grants to ensure that executives would profit from them.

Cyberonics stock, which has been battered by the accounting questions and by the company's problems getting insurance coverage for its depression implant, soared yesterday after the company disclosed before trading began that Mr. Cummins resigned on Friday. The shares climbed as high as $26.45 before retreating to close at $24.17, up 12 percent for the day.

Cyberonics, based in Houston, also said that Pamela B. Westbrook, the chief financial officer, resigned Sunday and that Reese S. Terry Jr., the co-founder and former chief executive, would serve as interim chief executive.

In addition to the management changes, Cyberonics disclosed that its audit had concluded that dates on a number of options to Cyberonics employees had been improperly reported from 1999 to 2003. The company did not identify the employees. Investigations by the Securities and Exchange Commission and the Department of Justice continue.

In a news release and filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission, Cyberonics said that the questionable transactions might require it to restate earnings back as far as 2000 to account for an additional $10 million in expenses.

The business focus of Cyberonics is unlikely to change, but analysts said that the forced resignation of Mr. Cummins could clear the way for Cyberonics to be acquired by a larger device maker.

"Skip was the biggest barrier to the company being sold," said Thomas J. Gunderson, who follows the medical device industry for Piper Jaffray in Minneapolis. Speculation that such a deal might be struck intensified a week ago when Carl C. Icahn, the billionaire investor, disclosed that he had acquired a 2.4 percent stake in Cyberonics, sending the stock up 20 percent that day.

Cyberonics said in its S.E.C. filing that Mr. Cummins would receive $1.72 million in cash this week for resigning, along with a grant of 75,000 shares and accelerated vesting of outstanding options and restricted stock grants. The filing said Mr. Cummins would receive an additional 75,000 shares within one week of the filing by Cyberonics of its next annual report and a cash payment to cover taxes.

The severance package was criticized as "lavish" by Karen L. Finerman, president of Metropolitan Capital Advisors, an institutional shareholder that has nominated a competing slate of directors for the board of Cyberonics and owns 7.3 percent of the company's shares. Mr. Cummins could not be reached for comment.

Mr. Cummins was known for his tenacious focus on using the company's most important product, a pocketwatch-size electrical nerve stimulator, to treat drug-resistant depression. The disease, Mr. Cummins said, drove his mother and grandfather to suicide.

The $15,000 device is implanted in the chest and attached to the vagus nerve in the neck. The nerve is a major pathway into portions of the brain associated with a number of mental ailments.

Cyberonics first developed the stimulator to control epileptic seizures. But under Mr. Cummins, the company then went after the far larger market of severely depressed patients — four million in the United States alone — who fail to improve with drugs and electroshock therapy.

After months of controversy, Cyberonics gained regulatory approval for the depression treatment in 2005. Critics inside and outside the Food and Drug Administration said that Cyberonics had not conclusively shown the device worked on such severely depressed patients. They also said there was too little evidence that the reported benefits outweighed safety concerns.

Cyberonics has reported that more than 2,200 depression patients have received the implant. Far more patients though have been denied coverage for the procedure, which most insurers classify as experimental despite the regulatory approval. It costs about $25,000, not counting follow-up visits to psychiatrists for adjustments and monitoring.

Slower-than-expected growth led to a string of quarterly losses, layoffs and repeated misses of forecasts made to Wall Street, damaging the credibility of Mr. Cummins with investors who were already annoyed by his confrontational style. This month, Cyberonics said sales for the first half of its fiscal year through Oct. 27 were nearly $68 million, up 21 percent from a year ago, but that it could not predict when the company would return to profitability.

Cyberonics said yesterday that in addition to the management changes it had separated the chairman's job from the chief executive's and that Tony Coelho, a former Democratic congressman and a board member, had been appointed chairman.

DOJ_NMG_0096862

George E. Parker III, who had been head of human resources, was named interim chief operating officer, and John A. Riccardi, director of financial planning and analysis, became interim chief financial officer.

Fortunate Ones (USAT)

By Elliot Blair Smith

USA Today, November 21, 2006

Cyberonics says 4.2 million Americans' lives could improve with a medical implant device the company makes to treat severe depression and epilepsy. The FDA approved its product. But federal investigators are probing Cyberonics' compensation practices. This USA TODAY Special Report examines one company caught up in the nation's expanding stock-options scandal. The report explains how a few Cyberonics executives and directors made nearly $50 million in stock-trading profits while selling a money-losing device that remains controversial.

HOUSTON — Cyberonics said Monday that its chief executive and chief financial officer had resigned after an internal investigation found that unnamed insiders had incorrectly reported the dates of company stock options for years.

Cyberonics general counsel David Wise said in a filing to the Securities and Exchange Commission that the company had under-reported its executive compensation expense by about $10 million and would have to restate its financial statements going back to 1999.

The company's disclosures came at a time when one of the biggest financial scandals in years is sweeping U.S. corporate boardrooms. Federal authorities are examining at least 130 companies to determine whether insiders manipulated options-award dates to illegally profit from market gains, principally by backdating the options to an earlier date than issued to give themselves a head start on rising prices. To date, dozens of companies have announced executive departures or restatements after internal investigations. Two criminal cases are pending.

In June, Cyberonics said that it was one of the companies under investigation by the SEC and by the U.S. Attorney's office in Manhattan. The company also faces several options-related lawsuits by shareholders and is embroiled in a proxy fight with a large investor demanding substantial changes in the board's makeup and governance practices.

During three interviews with USA TODAY in August, former CEO Robert “Skip” Cummins — who quit Friday — defended Cyberonics and denied any wrongdoing. “We have nothing to hide,” Cummins said. But he deflected questions about the government and board probes. Company lawyer Wise said at the time that Cummins could not discuss the controversy. The company has declined to comment for this story.

Cummins had been directing Cyberonics' drive to win Medicare reimbursement for its medical devices to treat severe depression, a decision that he said could open up a $1 billion sales market for the company. Medicare's administrators have not yet ruled on the application.

Earlier, in June, former Cyberonics chief financial officer Pamela Westbrook, who resigned Sunday, told investors that “all stock options” issued by the company “are granted the day of approval and are priced at fair market value on the date of the grant.” Westbrook said the company “fully followed securities and accounting regulations.”

A USA TODAY investigation reveals that Cyberonics' board has engaged in a series of questionable practices to reward Cummins, certain directors and some executives with stock and options almost from its inception as a public company in February 1993. Among its practices, the company frequently issued stock options just before market-moving events that insiders participated in, including merger talks, regulatory milestones and earnings advisories. It also repeatedly issued options at the lowest or second-lowest monthly trading price, SEC filings show. On one occasion, management, including Cummins, and a director who serves on the compensation committee, bought company stock at a discounted price in which Cummins represented himself both as the CEO selling the shares and as an individual buying them.

Over the past year, academic research at several major universities has identified widespread problems in dating of stock options granted to company insiders. A joint study at Harvard and Cornell universities published last week estimated that about 850 CEOs at 720 companies benefited from opportunistic timing. The study, “Lucky CEOs,” said the findings reflect widespread governance problems.

A stock option entitles the holder to buy a share at a fixed price. Options typically are issued at the stock's current market value. It is not illegal to issue options at below-market prices, but a company must charge the discount against earnings, and the recipient must report the gain as income. Most options mature over several years, meaning they cannot immediately be converted to cash. But if the stock rises, the value of the options rises.

Since Cyberonics' founding, Cummins and the company have raised $175 million from investors. The company's loss through January was $186 million. Despite the perennial cash drain, company officers and directors have reaped $49.4 million in stock-trading profits from 1999 to present, including $22.5 million for Cummins, according to Thomson Financial, a financial information company.

DOJ_NMG_0096863

University of Michigan finance professor Nejat Seyhun, who analyzed all of Cyberonics' options grants since 2000 for USA TODAY, says the odds the award dates on some of the low-priced options occurred by chance range from one in 600 for Cummins to one in nearly 500,000 for the man who now replaces him as chairman: former U.S. congressman Tony Coelho, a longtime member of the board's compensation committee and a beneficiary of Cyberonics stock options.

After disclosing the government investigations, the board hired outside law firm Morgan Lewis & Bockius to probe its options practices. The Houston company, which employs more than 600, said Monday that neither its management nor auditors had closely reviewed the law firm's findings. But it installed Coelho as chairman and one of the company's founders, Reese Terry, as interim CEO. They declined to comment for this story.

In an interview, former SEC chairman Harvey Pitt, who reviewed some of Cyberonics' stock transactions described in this story, said, “There is something incredibly wrong with this picture even if one assumes no laws were broken.

“What you have here, it seems to me, is a system of granting options that are opportunistically timed with ultimately almost a $50 million payout to insiders from a company that hasn't earned a penny,” Pitt said. “The picture looks, on its face, rather tawdry.”

Cyberonics' triumph at bringing its medical technology to market, and Wall Street's rousing response, seemed to affirm its use of stock options to reward management for a job well done.

At a development-stage company such as Cyberonics, where revenue and profit were hard to come by, stock options enabled the market to set a large component of CEO pay without draining the corporate treasury. But for years, another debate has swirled around the company: about the safety and effectiveness of its medical implants.

The small, battery-powered device — surgically inserted in the chest at a cost of about $25,000 — sends electrical current to the brain through a nerve in the neck. Some medical researchers believe the electric stimulation wards off depression and seizures. But nobody knows for sure how Cyberonics' vagus nerve stimulation device affects the brain, and there are conflicting views among physicians, patients and regulators about how effective it might be.

In July 1997, the FDA approved Cyberonics' implants to treat a form of epilepsy. To date, that product has been implanted in more than 40,000 epilepsy patients. In July 2005, agency administrators overruled the objections of their own staff investigators to approve the implants to treat depression, as well. The device has been implanted in about 1,600 depression patients, many of them during company-paid clinical trials.

Cyberonics estimates as many as 4 million severely depressed Americans could benefit from the product, a U.S. patient base 20 times larger than its potential U.S. epilepsy patient base. First, the company must persuade Medicare to pay for the procedure for depression, as it does for epilepsy.

How Cyberonics proceeds without Cummins remains to be seen.

On Monday, Karen Finerman, president of Metropolitan Capital Advisors, an investment group that owns 7.3% of Cyberonics stock, acknowledged “we don't know” what effect Cummins' departure will have on the company's Medicare application. But Finerman welcomed Cummins' departure, saying, “This is a step in the right direction of very necessary corporate governance changes that we've been asking for. It is a step. There is more to do.” Metropolitan is leading a proxy fight to shake up the board.

Investors bid up company shares by 12% to $24.17 at the close of trading Monday.

For Cummins, the personal setback is only the latest in a history of large challenges. In the small Pennsylvania town of Grove City, where he grew up, his parents married and divorced each other three times. To distance himself from the domestic discord, Cummins said during an interview, he lived with his paternal grandmother.

Jeff Lumley, Cummins' best friend during high school, says now, “He knew there was a better way of life than what he had, and I think that was a motivating force for him to work hard and achieve his goals — his success — always pushing hard to be better.”

An athletic scholarship to Dartmouth College was Cummins' ticket out of town. The two-time All-Ivy-League linebacker repaid his tuition by punishing opponents. “Skip was one tough son of a gun,” says Dartmouth coach Buddy Teevens, a freshman quarterback during Cummins' senior year. “He was extremely competitive.”

Cummins earned an MBA at the University of Illinois and took jobs in venture capital that carried him from Chicago to New Canaan, Conn., where a firm he joined, Vista Partners, invested in Cyberonics at its founding. Cummins joined Cyberonics' board in June 1988.

But less than two years after taking the company public, Cyberonics' founders realized they did not have the resources required to get through the legal and regulatory obstacles ahead of them. Over several months, the company approached 70 potential investors with hardly a nibble of interest, according to its SEC filings. By June 1995, $100 invested in the company's IPO was worth $33. The board fired its CEO and hired Cummins.

DOJ_NMG_0096864

“He was aggressive. He was a hardworking guy. And suddenly he comes up through the ranks and sees this opportunity and steps in, never having had the benefit of that formal training (in managing a company that) you really need,” says venture capitalist Bill Mullaney, one of Cyberonics' early investors. “I saw him as a guy who would step in on an interim basis.”

In taking the job, Cummins' mission was to complete the sale of Cyberonics to St. Jude Medical, a big medical device manufacturer with which the board had launched merger talks in June 1995. But the new CEO and board also initiated a practice that would prove troublesome in the future: granting attractive options on fortunate dates.

On Oct. 11, 1995, Cyberonics' board awarded Cummins options on 50,000 shares at $4.70 a share, lower than all but one price the stock closed at that month, and near a six-month low. As investors anticipated a merger agreement with St. Jude, the stock quickly rose 54% from the grant price to $7.25 in November 1995, before the deal unraveled. Had the merger gone through, Cummins' options would have vested immediately. At $7.25 a share, he would have pocketed $127,500 on the options issued in October, company filings show.

Timing options grants to profit from future events is called “spring loading.” Spring loading “is not illegal,” says Mark Poerio, co-chairman of the Paul Hastings law firm's executive compensation practice and a member of the firm's Stock Option Task Force. But, he says, the practice is “viewed poorly” by regulators and shareholders “as an unfair form of executive enrichment.”

Cyberonics and St. Jude renewed their courtship a few months later. On June 1, 1996, six weeks before shareholders convened to vote on the revised merger at $7 a share, the board awarded each non-employee member options on 2,000 shares at $4 a share. That was a 26% discount from the market price and a 43% discount from the merger price. The prospective gain on the options amounted to $6,000 for each director. Cummins' prospective gain on his options issued in October 1995 was now $115,000.

Cyberonics' shareholders approved the proposed merger. But St. Jude walked away again.

In early 1997, Cummins said in an interview, he visited Coelho near Washington to offer him a seat on Cyberonics' board.

The onetime House Democratic party whip had resigned from Congress in June 1989 after failing to disclose on his congressional financial statement a “junk” bond investment he obtained on favorable terms. But he remained a power broker. And he had epilepsy, an illness Cyberonics sought to treat.

Coelho accepted Cummins' invitation, though he was busy leading the upcoming U.S. delegation to the 1998 world's fair in Portugal. On March 7, 1997, Coelho was granted options on 35,000 shares at $4.63 a share but missed two of Cyberonics' next four board meetings, SEC filings show. By year's end, the stock more than tripled to $15.25 a share.

Coelho's stewardship at Expo '98 met with scathing criticism by the State Department's inspector general, which, in a September 1999 report, held him responsible for “questionable payments” on a luxury hotel, car and driver for himself and for a $300,000 personal loan from a Portuguese bank under terms for which the U.S. government feared it was liable. The inspector general referred its findings to the Justice Department, which brought no charges.

Meanwhile, Coelho became a member of the board's compensation committee, which oversees the company's stock-option plans and sets the CEO's compensation. He continues to hold that job, along with being the board's lead director, serving as the primary liaison between directors and the CEO. Coelho did not respond to requests for comment for this story.

Insurance reimbursement specialist Michael Strauss joined the board a few weeks after Coelho and was appointed to lead the audit committee that has been investigating the company's options.

About the same time, a firm Strauss founded, Covance Health Economics, began collecting $1.6 million in consulting fees from Cyberonics over three years, including $511,459 the first year. Cyberonics did not disclose the related-party transaction — involving dealings between insiders — to the SEC for 2½ years. Strauss had no comment.

Also in March 1997, Cyberonics sold stock at the discounted price of $4.44 a share — lower than any price the stock closed at in the month — to an investment group led by New York investment firm Clark Estates. One of Cummins' Dartmouth classmates, Kevin Moore, was senior vice president of Clark Estates. Its $6.8 million investment gave it a 9.2% stake in the company.

Cyberonics described the private placement as having been based on “arm's-length negotiations between the company and the lead investor.” It is not unusual for a company to give a large institutional investor a discount when buying stock during a recapitalization of the company. But Cummins, two vice presidents and another new board director, Baylor College of Medicine neurologist Stanley Appel, participated in the investment as individuals. They bought 82,627 shares at the discounted price. Cummins signed the sale agreement on behalf of Cyberonics as CEO and himself as a buyer of the shares, according to an SEC filing the company made in April 1997.

Former SEC attorney Ronald Mueller, an expert on securities law and disclosure, says the transaction “raises a potential conflict of interest.”

Former SEC chairman Pitt says, “If Cummins is on both sides of the transaction, it's not a potential conflict of interest. It's just a conflict.”

DOJ_NMG_0096865

Moore, now a director, did not respond to requests for comment. Appel, who was about to join Cyberonics' compensation committee at the time of the investment and who remains a director and compensation committee member, declined to comment.

Pitt says that Coelho's initial failure to attend board meetings for which he was compensated also raises governance concerns: “If you have a director who doesn't attend meetings, you don't really have a director. You have a face and a name but no substance.”

And Pitt says the fact that Strauss, the audit committee's chief, received business benefits and stock options from Cyberonics could have compromised the board's investigation. “How is he going to be able to blow the whistle, if that's required, without blowing the whistle on himself?” Pitt says. “What you've got is somebody who may have an economic incentive in the outcome.”

Driven by FDA approval of the vagus nerve stimulation device for epilepsy treatment in July, the Clark Estates shares more than tripled in value by year's end, closing 1997 at $15.25 a share. The 40,000 shares Appel purchased at a discount rose by $432,400 by year's end, a calculation of his investment shows. Cummins' 35,500 shares bought at a discount rose by $383,755.

Among the lucrative options grants overseen by Coelho and Appel's compensation committee, according to Cyberonics' annual proxy filings:

·In March 1999, Cummins received options on 100,000 shares at $8, the stock's second-lowest closing price that month. The stock rose 99% by year's end and nearly tripled in two years. Cummins did not report receiving these options for two years, according to Equity Incentive Analytics, a stock-tracking service.

·In June 1999, when independent business consultant Alan Olsen joined the board, he was awarded options on 50,000 shares at $11.63, the stock's lowest closing price that month. By year's end, the stock had risen 37%. Olsen is a member of the audit committee that investigated the options grants. He had no comment.

·In January 2000, new manufacturing Vice President Richard Kuntz received options on 150,000 shares at a price lower than all but one closing price that month. In July 2001, new marketing Vice President Michael Cheney got options on 150,000 shares at the stock's lowest closing price that month. In August 2001, new chief medical officer Richard Rudolph got options on 150,000 shares at the lowest closing price that month. And in October 2001, new sales Vice President David Erinakes got options on 50,000 shares at the lowest price that month.

·In June 2001, Cummins got options on 150,000 shares at $12.80, the month's low and the lowest price it traded at for the rest of the year. CFO Westbrook got 15,000 options at the same price, the same date. By year's end, the shares rose 107% in value to $26.53 a share.

University of Michigan finance professor Seyhun has developed a statistical program to assess the likelihood that multiple grants of low-priced options were awarded randomly. Seyhun says the chances Cyberonics' options grants to Coelho were random range from one in 2,000 to one in 492,000; for Appel, the chances are from one in 4,000 to one in 42,000; and for Cummins, from one in 600 to one in 2,796.

“None of this proves that they are backdating,” Seyhun says. “What it shows is that it is extremely unlikely to get these on a random basis.”

Bill Coleman, an executive compensation consultant at Salary.com, says, “It could be coincidence, it could not be coincidence. Many coincidences make one tend to believe it's not a coincidence at all.”

Even after Congress reduced insiders' ability to manipulate options dates under the Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002 — the new law required options grants to be reported within two business days, rather than up to a year previously — some Cyberonics executives and directors continued to get options at dips in the stock price.

In June 2, 2003, a week after Cyberonics provided Wall Street analysts with an earnings forecast at the low end of analysts' expectations, the board awarded Cummins options on 250,000 shares at $18.94 a share, the previous Friday's closing price. That was the lowest price the stock closed at for the rest of the year.

Then, in August 2003, the company issued new guidance to Wall Street, saying its earnings were exceeding expectations, driving up its stock price. On Aug. 21, Cummins cashed in 100,000 options he'd been awarded years earlier and reaped $2.5 million in a cash profit.

On June 15, 2004, the Holiday Inn at Gaithersburg, Md., filled with Cyberonics executives, lobbyists, medical researchers, depression patients and Wall Street securities analysts. It was a pivotal day in Cyberonics' history.

An FDA advisory panel would hear the company's arguments for approving the vagus nerve stimulation device to treat depression and vote whether to recommend it. The FDA almost always accepts its advisory panel decisions.

Six medical patients who had participated in Cyberonics-sponsored clinical trials spoke about their ordeals with depression and about the dramatic effect that the company's battery-powered electronic device appeared to have on their recoveries, according to an official transcript.

DOJ_NMG_0096866

Patients who participated in the trials were not told whether their implant device was turned on. Despite encouraging accounts from some patients, the trials provided scant statistical evidence that the implanted devices worked much better than placebos. “The study failed to demonstrate a statistically significant difference” between a group of implant patients whose devices were turned on and those whose devices were not, testified Carlos Pena, an FDA staff medical device reviewer.

Late in the day, the panel's chairwoman, Kyra Becker of the University of Washington School of Medicine, told Cyberonics that “it's unclear” whether the depression treatment should be approved. At 4:10 p.m., the panel took a break.

A few minutes later, Cyberonics' chief regulatory liaison, Vice President Alan Totah, delivered the company's closing argument in “an unusually confrontational tone,” according to Lazard Capital Markets securities analyst Alexander Arrow, who attended the proceeding.

Totah, speaking in “a slightly caustic, slightly indignant Southern drawl,” according to Arrow, said depression patients in Cyberonics' clinical trials appeared to do better after more extended treatment than originally envisioned. He interpreted that as a promising sign. Totah quoted from FDA statutes to remind the panel that clinical trial standards for medical devices are more flexible than for drugs, based on the agency's “least burdensome” approval guidelines. A few minutes later, the panel voted 5-2 to recommend Cyberonics' depression therapy.

Nasdaq had halted trading in Cyberonics shares that day, pending the advisory panel's decision. That night, the board rewarded Cummins with options on 150,000 shares of stock — and Totah with options on 10,000 shares — at the previous day's closing price of $19.58 a share. The next day, Cyberonics' share price soared 78% to $34.81, delivering a $2.3 million overnight paper gain for Cummins and $152,300 for Totah.

The Financial Accounting Standards Board, which sets U.S. accounting standards, was already concerned at the time of the after-hours grant that U.S. companies were not appropriately disclosing the costs and benefits of executives' options.

In December 2004, FASB revised its options-reporting rule. Under the guidelines, all public companies had to begin reporting the “fair market value” of new options grants on their financial statements, whether they were issued at, above or below the stock's market price. “Fair market” is a technical valuation that incorporates the options' likely value over time, not just at the date issued.

For Cyberonics, the new rule did not take effect until this fiscal year, beginning in April. That same month, the company said it was unable to file its financial statements until it had reviewed its options practices. As a result, Nasdaq is threatening to delist Cyberonics stock.

In June, SunTrust Robinson Humphrey securities analyst Amit Hazan, who recently left the firm, issued a critical note to investors about Cummins' after-hours grant in June 2004, writing: “We feel this management knowingly abused” the principle of aligning management's interests with that of shareholders.

In an interview, Hazan said Cummins and the board were “trading on information that nobody else had, and the stock clearly was worth more than he got it for.”

University of Michigan finance professor M.P. Narayanan calls the after-hours grant “clearly an end run around insider-trading laws.”

Even so, the options would not vest for years, and the men would have to wait for their money.

Unexpectedly, the FDA ruled on Aug. 11, 2004, that it would not accept its advisory panel's recommendation, amid an internal debate at the agency over Cyberonics' implant devices. In what is known as a “not approvable” letter, the agency's Center for Devices and Radiological Health, which evaluates new medical devices for use by the public, informed Cyberonics: “There are safety concerns associated with the use of your device. … In addition to known safety concerns, worsening depression was reported as a serious adverse event during” one of the clinical trials.

Cyberonics' stock, which had been trading at $23.95 a share, fell to $14.36 the next day.

On Aug. 26, 2004, Cummins wrote a passionate, 10-page reply to the same FDA office. He described himself “as an American citizen whose mother and grandfather suffered from treatment-resistant depression, and committed suicide because it was their only remaining option.”

He wrote that the FDA's decision against Cyberonics “insures that millions of Americans living today with chronic or recurrent treatment-resistant depression have only the same way out chosen by my mother and grandfather.”

“After finding my mother's body in her small apartment an estimated two weeks after her suicide,” Cummins wrote, “I can assure you that I know the sights, smells, tastes and despair that accompany the hopelessness of treatment-resistant depression and the only real way out.”

On Feb. 2, 2005, the FDA signaled in a letter to the company that it would approve Cyberonics' depression treatment after all. Over the next week, investors bid up the company's stock by 58% to a record $43.36 a share. And on Feb. 10, 2005 — his 51st birthday — Cummins' cashed out $14.7 million in stock options, netting $10.3 million after his trading costs.

DOJ_NMG_0096867

Sharing his good fortune were nine other insiders, including CFO Westbrook and board compensation committee members Coelho and Appel. Cyberonics officials cashed out $19.9 million in trading profits that February, in the largest sale of stock by insiders in any month in company history, according to Thomson Financial.

But the letter that Cummins wrote to the FDA was inaccurate on several accounts, he acknowledged during an interview in August.

In that interview, Cummins conceded he did not discover his late mother's body. Rather, Cummins said, the Mercer County, Pa., coroner's office informed him of her death.

He also said he does not know whether his mother was diagnosed with depression, or if her death certificate says she committed suicide. In fact, the death certificate and coroner's report state she died of natural causes.

As for where the term "treatment-resistant depression" he cited comes from, Cummins said, "We invented it."

Cummins burst into tears when discussing his mother. When he regained his composure, he said, "If you look at what Cyberonics has accomplished, it's not for the faint of heart.

"The leader of Cyberonics has to be willing to stand up and say, 'We're going to make it.'

"As the leader of Cyberonics, even if you're scared beyond words, you have to be able to convince people they can do the impossible."

Capital One Ex-CFO Resolves Charges (WP)

By David S. Hilzenrath, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, November 21, 2006

Insider Trading Probe Is Settled For $1.8 Million

A former chief financial officer of credit card issuer Capital One Financial Corp. agreed to pay more than $1.8 million to settle insider trading charges, the Securities and Exchange Commission said yesterday.

David M. Willey was accused of exercising Capital One stock options and cashing in shares after learning in 2002 that a regulatory examination of the company was likely to end unfavorably. After the results of the examination were made public, Capital One's stock price plunged by about 40 percent.

Without admitting or denying wrongdoing, Willey agreed to give up $801,434 in alleged ill-gotten gains, plus $218,180 in interest and a penalty of $801,434. The SEC dismissed a related claim against Willey's wife, Joy S. Willey, a former Capital One vice president. The agency had previously named her as a defendant alleging that some of the proceeds of the insider trading were in her possession.

An attorney for David Willey, William M. Mann, declined to comment.

Willey, who joined McLean-based Capital One in 1989, earned more than $1.2 million in salary and bonus in 2001, according to a company report.

The following year, Federal Reserve examiners found serious management problems in areas under his authority, the SEC alleged in a 2004 complaint. The lead examiner told Willey of the Fed's concerns in a private meeting and warned that they could lead to formal supervisory action, the complaint said.

Willey, of Great Falls, knew that if the Fed examination cost him his job, his stock options would expire within 90 days, the SEC alleged. In the spring of 2002, he exercised tens of thousands of options in his account and in his wife's, which he controlled, the SEC alleged. He also sold Capital One shares. The transactions yielded several millions of dollars in profits, the SEC alleged.

The SEC said Willey knew or should have known that Capital One's stock price would fall when the Fed's actions became public. Indeed, when Capital One's general counsel learned about the potential regulatory action, he immediately barred all senior executives from trading in Capital One securities. Willey, however, had completed his sales by then.

Willey was forced to resign from Capital One in 2003, the SEC alleged.

Under the settlement, he is banned from serving as an officer or director of a public company for five years.

South Korean Prosecutors Indict Lone Star, KEB (WSJ)

By Laura Santini And Lina Yoon

The Wall Street Journal, November 21, 2006

South Korean prosecutors indicted Dallas private-equity firm Lone Star Funds and Korea Exchange Bank on stock-manipulation charges related to the bank's credit-card unit, part of a nine-month investigation that the U.S. firm has blamed on antiforeign sentiment in Korea.

DOJ_NMG_0096868

The chief prosecutor in the case, Chae Dong Wook, vowed to continue a separate probe into whether Lone Star illegally purchased the bank in 2003. Prosecutors have been examining whether government and bank officials conspired to understate KEB's financial health when Lone Star acquired control of the bank. Lone Star's role in that transaction is also under scrutiny.

Korean lawmakers have threatened to nullify Lone Star's original purchase of KEB if wrongdoing is discovered, jeopardizing a $7 billion sale of the firm's controlling stake to Korea's Kookmin Bank that would secure a $4.5 billion profit for Lone Star.

In recent months, prosecutors have turned their focus to KEB's credit-card unit, leading some foreign investors watching the investigation to speculate that the prosecution had reached an impasse with the broader probe into the KEB purchase. Regarding KEB itself, prosecutors still haven't provided any evidence of wrongdoing by Lone Star in the transaction.

Last week, the Korean court issued arrest warrants for Lone Star's vice chairman, Ellis Short, and Michael Thomson, the firm's general counsel. Both men have refused to travel to Korea.

"They want to show the general public that they have a good case," said Hwang Ju Myung, a lawyer representing Lone Star in Korea, in characterizing the indictment yesterday. Mr. Hwang said the next step will be for the courts to set a trial date.

Foreign investors have complained that a backlash against them is hampering deal making in the country and scaring off newcomers.

For their part, Koreans are outraged at the use of tax shelters by foreign funds, which allowed the funds to buy assets cheaply after the Asian financial crisis of 1997-98 and then sell them at huge profits -- all without paying capital-gains taxes.

Yesterday's indictment names KEB and LSF-KEB Holdings SCA, a special-purpose vehicle owned by Lone Star that is KEB's largest shareholder, with a 51% stake. If KEB and the Lone Star vehicle are convicted of the stock-manipulation charges, the court may order a fine, Mr. Hwang said.

The indictment is the upshot of a probe into KEB's merger with the separately listed credit-card unit, KEB Credit Services. In 2003, KEBCS was under a mountain of bad debt amid a credit-card debacle in Korea. In November of that year, KEB's board said it would rescue the company by implementing a so-called capital reduction, in which the value of the shares outstanding is wiped out and the company works with creditors to restructure its debt.

The board's announcement precipitated a drop in the credit-card unit's share price, as panicky investors rushed to sell ahead of the plan. Days later, KEB announced that instead of the capital reduction, it would buy out existing shareholders, whose shares were now worth much less than before.

Prosecutors have estimated that minority shareholders lost about 22.6 billion won ($24 million) from the share decline.

A KEB spokeswoman declined to comment yesterday. The bank has previously denounced the allegations of stock manipulation as "groundless." In a statement in September, it argued that prosecutors are revisiting accusations made in January 2004 by KEBCS's labor union. At the time, KEB argued, investigators didn't see the merit of pursuing those accusations.

SEC Filings Show New Chairman Got Options 3 Years Before Joining Board (USAT)

By Elliot Blair Smith

USA Today, November 21, 2006

Former U.S. congressman Tony Coelho received below-market stock options from Cyberonics in early 1994, three years before he joined the board, at a much deeper discount to the market price than the company's stock-option plan provided for at the time, according to Securities and Exchange Commission filings.

On Monday, Coelho was named chairman of the medical device maker after its former chairman and CEO, Robert Cummins, resigned under pressure. Coelho did not respond to requests for comment through the company, his lawyer or the Epilepsy Foundation, which he chairs.

Coelho's first options at Cyberonics, dated April 14, 1994, entitled him to buy 20,000 shares of company stock at a 32% discount to the stock's market price on the grant date, according to a Form 3 stock ownership record he filed later with the SEC.

Cyberonics' maximum discount on options it issued at the time was 15%, according to the company's stock-option plan filed separately with the SEC that October.

In Cyberonics' 1994 shareholder proxy filing, which contained a copy of the plan, company officials stated that all options under the plan had been issued at the stock's fair market value.

Another member of the board's compensation committee, neurologist Stanley Appel, also received below-market stock options in 1994, two years and three months before he joined the board. Appel got 50,000 options on Sept. 21, 1994, priced at $3.06, a 35% discount to the stock's market price that day.

Since mid-1997, Coelho and Appel have served on the board's compensation committee, forming a two-member panel during many of those years. The two directors administered Cyberonics' stock-option plan and helped set CEO compensation.

DOJ_NMG_0096869

Coelho, the former Democratic party whip in the House, resigned from Congress in June 1989 after failing to disclose on his congressional financial statement a “junk” bond investment he had obtained on favorable terms. In recent years, Coelho and Appel cashed out their below-market options from Cyberonics at different times, reaping nearly $1.1 million in combined profits, SEC filings show.

Appel had no comment. At the time Coelho and Appel received their below-market options, the head of the compensation committee was Cummins, who took the helm of the company in October 1995. Cummins also declined to comment.

Cyberonics is now under investigation by the SEC and the U.S. Attorney's office in Manhattan, which are looking into the company's history of awarding lucrative stock options to company officers and directors. Until Monday, the company denied any wrongdoing. It now says it has identified some irregularities, principally from 1999 to 2003.

According to Financial Accounting Standards Board rule APB 25, issued in 1993, Cyberonics should have recorded the 1994 below-market options as an expense for tax and accounting purposes.

In addition, the two men would have been required to report as personal income that year the difference between the Cyberonics options' price and the stock's market price.

“It is taxable income in the year in which the option is received. And the income is the difference between the strike price” — that is, the price at which the option is issued — “and the fair market value,” says tax lawyer Kenneth Rubinstein.

For Coelho, the taxable benefit would have been $50,000 on the grant date. For Appel, the benefit would have been $84,375 on the grant date.

Former longtime Cyberonics director Thomas Duerden, 76, whom company documents show served on the compensation committee in 1994 when Coelho and Appel were awarded the below-market options, said in an interview, “I don't recall ever being a member of the compensation committee.” But he calls the below-market options to Appel and Coelho “very improbable.”

Duerden also is unable to say what Coelho and Appel did to earn their options. “I didn't know Stan Appel from a bar of soap until he joined the board” in 1996, Duerden says.

And, he says, “It's my memory that the first time I ever set eyes on Tony Coelho was when he joined the board” in 1997.

Appel first reported his below-market options to the SEC in December 1996, 27 months after the grant date. Appel cashed out half of this below-market grant on June 21, 2004, for a $639,249 profit. He also held onto 20,000 shares with a market value of $680,400 on that date.

Coelho first disclosed his April 1994 options grant in March 1997 upon joining the company's board. Unlike most stock options that mature over four to five years, Coelho's filing shows that these options could be cashed in immediately.

In June 2002, Coelho made another disclosure in a Form 5 stock ownership record filed with the SEC. In that filing, Coelho reported having received 20,000 options on March 8, 1994 — coinciding with the lowest price the stock traded at that month — rather than on April 14, 1994, but at the same price.

A key difference in the 2002 filing was that Coelho reported those options as vesting over five years rather than right away. He made a $444,420 profit when he cashed out the options in November 2003.

“Why did (Coelho) get an option grant three years before he joined the board? Why has the date moved? Why is the stock priced low? And (why), when they first reported them, (did) they (say) they were immediately vestable, and then later, they said, no, they vest over five years? Which one was it?” asks former SEC attorney Ronald Mueller, who specializes in executive compensation and disclosure issues.

Former SEC chairman Harvey Pitt says, “One of” Coelho's filings “has to be wrong.

“Both of them,” Pitt says, “could be wrong.”

Sumner Redstone's Nephew Sues Over Management Of Family Trusts (WSJ)

By Julia Angwin

The Wall Street Journal, November 21, 2006

Viacom Inc. Chairman Sumner Redstone, already facing a lawsuit from his son, now faces a suit from his nephew who claims he and other family heirs were bilked out of an approximately $4 billion stake in the Redstone family's business empire.

The suit, coming nine months after Mr. Redstone's son Brent filed suit against his father seeking to gain direct control of the son's personal stake in the empire, is likely to add to questions about the strength of Sumner Redstone's hold on Viacom and CBS Corp., both of which are controlled by the Redstone family.

In a lawsuit filed in a Massachusetts court this month, Michael Redstone alleges his father Edward Redstone and his uncle Sumner Redstone engaged in "self-dealing," "breaches of fiduciary duty" and "unjust enrichment as trustees of certain Redstone family trusts" when they bought his stake and that of other heirs in the family company, National Amusements Inc., in a series of transactions in 1972 and 1984.

DOJ_NMG_0096870

Michael Redstone's suit against his father, uncle and the family company is joined by the trustees for trusts representing his late sister Ruth Ann and a trust set up for the four children of Edward Redstone and Sumner Redstone -- Michael, Ruth Ann, Brent and Shari. Michael Redstone and the trustees are asking for the 1972 and 1984 transactions to be rescinded or for damages "in an amount equal to the present value of those shares."

The suit claims that National Amusements, which owns controlling stakes in CBS Corp. and Viacom Inc., is worth $8 billion. Absent the disputed transactions, the suit says the trust's combined stake would have been 50%, suggesting that the plaintiffs are seeking $4 billion. If the suit prevails, Sumner Redstone's control of National Amusements could be diluted.

In a statement, National Amusements called the allegations "baseless" and said it would defend itself vigorously. "This suit is particularly troubling considering the important role Sumner Redstone has played helping Michael overcome serious obstacles throughout his life," according to NAI spokeswoman Brandy Bergman. "Mr. Redstone essentially rescued Michael from a difficult family environment, removed him from a mental institution, paid for his education and gave him a job at NAI. It is unfortunate that this is how Michael has chosen to repay Sumner Redstone's care and generosity."

The younger Redstone's attorney, William Narwold of Motley Rice LLC in Hartford, Conn., declined to comment on his client's relationship with his uncle and his personal life. "I think it would be a mistake to make this lawsuit about Michael," he said. "This is, in our view, a lawsuit brought by the trustees who have obligations not only to the current beneficiaries but also to future beneficiaries."

The Redstone family dispute echoes those of other families who have passed on their businesses to the next generation. Last year, Liesel Pritzker, scion of the Chicago-based Pritzker family that owns the Hyatt Corp. hotel chain, and her brother each won about $450 million in a settlement, after she alleged that her father had secretly stripped her trust funds of more than $1 billion.

The Redstone family feud dates back to 1936, when Sumner Redstone's father Michael "Mickey" Redstone started his first drive-in movie theater. As the company expanded into a regional chain of theaters, the elder Redstone set up a series of trusts for his children and their children. Each trust contained a stake in the company.

In 1972, Edward and Sumner had a falling out, and as part of the resolution, National Amusements bought out Edward's shares and a portion of his children's shares for $5 million. Edward also agreed to let Sumner be the sole trustee of his children's trusts. Although Edward's children were minors, the lawsuit alleges that no guardian was appointed to protect their interest in this transaction.

In 1984, Sumner paid $21.4 million to buy back the shares of the trusts for Michael, Ruth Ann and the trust set up for all four children. The lawsuit alleges that the transaction set an artificially low valuation on the company and was "self-dealing" because Sumner was both buyer and seller of the shares.

Paulson Criticizes Regulation (USAT)

By Adam Shell

USA Today, November 21, 2006

NEW YORK — U.S. Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson said Monday that the tough, costly rules put in place to combat corporate frauds such as Enron need to be enforced in a more flexible manner if U.S. financial markets are to retain their competitive edge around the globe.

In his first major speech on market regulation, the former chairman of Goldman Sachs said regulators' decision to “impose rule upon rule upon rule” was making it more difficult for U.S. markets to attract business from abroad.

Many non-American businesses, he said, that are faced with spiraling accounting costs, mounting legal burdens and a confusing and threatening enforcement system here in the USA, were opting to take their business to markets with less onerous regulation, such as London and Hong Kong. He cited a drop in the number of foreign companies listing their initial public offerings on U.S. exchanges as evidence.

“When it comes to regulation, balance is key,” Paulson said. “The right regulatory balance should marry high standards of integrity and accountability with a strong foundation for innovation, growth and competitiveness.”

The speech comes amid increasing criticism from businesses that the Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002, designed to reduce accounting fraud and make corporate CEOs more accountable, is too costly and time consuming to implement.

Paulson stressed that he does not believe new legislation is needed. Rather, he said, the government needs to “implement the law in ways that better balance the benefits of the legislation with the very significant costs that it imposes, especially on small businesses.”

In an attempt to make existing laws more flexible, Paulson said, those enforcing the laws must “rise above a rules-based mind-set that asks, ‘Is this legal?' and adopt a more principles-based approach that asks, ‘Is this right?' ”

DOJ_NMG_0096871

Paulson's comments come just weeks after Democrats took control of Congress in the midterm elections. In a statement, Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., member of the Senate Banking and Finance Committees, said the committee looks forward to working with Paulson. "While most are pleased with the balance between entrepreneurialism and regulation that we've achieved, the new prominence of international competition requires us to re-examine that balance in a careful and thoughtful way so that we keep America No. 1," he said.

On the issue of finding solutions to the future funding shortfall of Social Security: "Now is a good time to deal with it when the economy is so strong," Paulson said in a Q&A session after his speech. "It's better to act from a position of strength."

On the economic front, Paulson said the key to keeping America strong is to reform entitlement programs such as Social Security and Medicaid, improve our energy independence and maintain free trade. "These challenges," he said, "won't be easy."

Paulson Urges Flexible Market Regulation (FT)

By Jeremy Grant And Krishna Guha

Financial Times, November 21, 2006

The US should move towards a more flexible, UK-style approach to regulating its capital markets to preserve its global competitiveness, Hank Paulson, US Treasury secretary, said on Monday.

Saying the US "should be open to learning from ... the experience of others", Mr Paulson said the country's regulators should put less emphasis on rules and more on principles.

The call marks a fundamental break with a regulatory approach rooted in the securities markets of the 1930s.

It comes as top US policymakers worry that the US "rules-based" system is not flexible enough to deal with the pace of innovation in capital markets, global exchange consolidation and emerging competition from abroad.

"It is necessary to take a global view. We don't operate in isolation, so it is very important to consider how changes we make affect the ability of our companies to compete globally and how these changes affect our interaction with markets and regulators around the world," Mr Paulson said in a speech to the Economic Club of New York.

"Our rules-based regulatory system is prescriptive, and leads to a greater focus on compliance with specific rules. We should move toward a structure that gives regulators more flexibility to work with entities on compliance within the spirit of regulatory principles," he said.

Without naming the UK, his comments are a clear reference to a less prescriptive approach to regulation championed by the Financial Services Authority and embodied in European accounting standards.

Taking issue with the US rules-based accounting system, he said: "Businesses and auditors are searching for something that doesn't exist in today's constantly changing world - a rules-based safe haven that still provides investors with an accurate portrayal of a company's financial performance."

Referring to the need for European companies to reconcile their International Financial Reporting Standards accounts with US GAAP, Mr Paulson said: "We should recognise that the time and cost that go into reconciling and restating IFRS statements may not be a worthwhile expense for a foreign company considering the US market."

"Added complexity and more rules are not the answer for a system that needs to provide accurate and timely information to investors in a world where best of class companies are continually readjusting their business models to remain competitive," he said.

He also warned that the existence of only four big auditing firms "may not be healthy".

"The current situation forces us to ask questions about the industry's sustainability and effectiveness. Is there enough competition?"

The "big four" accounting firms fear that huge liability litigation suits could bring down a firm and have argued for caps on the amounts of such suits.

Mr Paulson pointed out that the US has four separate banking regulators, with a "similar dynamic" in the securities and commodities markets, and their related self-regulatory structures.

Each of these organisations had different statutory responsibilities and a number had different regulatory philosophies. The US also had a dual federal-state regulatory system in the banking and securities markets – "and the degree of federal pre-emption over state law in these areas varies greatly".

"A consequence of [this] is an ever-expanding rulebook in which multiple regulators impose rule upon rule upon rule. Unless we carefully consider the cost/benefit trade-off implicit in these rules, there is a danger of creating a thicket of regulation that impedes competitiveness," Mr Paulson said.

He said the 2002 Sarbanes-Oxley auditing and compliance law had also "fundamentally" altered interactions between auditors and company management "in a number of ways, some of which are not constructive".

DOJ_NMG_0096872

Turning to enforcement, Mr Paulson said that a combination of enforcement and guidance was likely to be more effective and more efficient than relying on enforcement alone.

"When multiple jurisdictions and entities are involved, each with their own objectives and approaches, the enforcement environment can become inefficient and, to the regulated, can appear confusing and threatening," he said, referring to multiple US state and federal enforcement agencies.

Paulson Says Business Is Over-Regulated (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, November 21, 2006

Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. yesterday criticized the nation's "ever-expanding rulebook" and its burdensome legal system for constraining the economy but rejected wholesale revisions to a corporate accountability law under attack from business groups.

Paulson, a former chairman of the investment bank Goldman Sachs, called for striking a regulatory balance as he delivered his first major policy address on the subject since joining the government in July. "Excessive regulation slows innovation, imposes needless costs on investors, and stifles competitiveness and job creation," he said in a speech to the Economic Club of New York.

But under questioning, Paulson stood behind the controversial Sarbanes-Oxley law, passed in 2002 after financial scandals rocked the stock market and devastated investor confidence. Policymakers do not need to reopen the law, Paulson said. Instead, he expressed confidence in the work of securities regulators and accounting industry overseers, who are racing to make audit rules more flexible for small businesses that have complained about the regulations' cost. The eagerly awaited proposed revisions are to be unveiled within weeks, Christopher Cox, chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission, has said.

"I don't think there is a single principle in [Sarbanes-Oxley] that is ill-founded," Paulson said after the speech.

Paulson's remarks come as trade groups such as the U.S. Chamber of Commerce exhort lawmakers and regulators to retool corporate rules, which they contend are leading fewer companies to list on U.S. exchanges. A chamber-affiliated coalition led by William M. Daley, who was an official during Bill Clinton's presidency, and A.B. Culvahouse, counsel to former president Reagan, issued data yesterday that they said reflected a decade-long decline in market share of corporate listings in the United States.

Some consumer advocates warn that tighter rules make for a convenient scapegoat. Barbara Roper of the Consumer Federation of America pointed to other factors, including steep investment banking fees and changes in the global economy, for the dip in U.S. public offerings.

Business groups insist the changes would combat what they say is an overly onerous application of the law. "No one is talking about a wholesale rollback," said Robert S. Nichols, president of the Financial Services Forum, a coalition of large banks for which Paulson once served as chairman. "That would be a very serious mistake in our view. It's a matter of discussing the implementation and execution."

In his speech, Paulson sought to take the debate beyond recent corporate reforms and into broader terrain. He singled out class-action lawsuits as an Achilles' heel in the legal system, which he contended have "gone beyond protection" of investors and now hamper business competition.

Statistics compiled by NERA Economic Consulting suggest that the number of class-action lawsuits filed against corporations and executives has plummeted in the past two years, especially since the indictment of the law firm Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman, which had been a leader in filing plaintiff cases before being charged with improperly paying people to serve as clients.

"Investors already are getting pennies on the dollar for massive losses they suffered in recent scandals," said Roper, of the consumer group. "I don't think you can sell that message after the experience we've been through."

Separately, Paulson called for more "constructive" dialogue among prosecutors and corporate executives, citing possible changes to the Justice Department's guidelines on charging companies with crimes. The 2002 prosecution of accounting firm Arthur Andersen for charges of obstructing justice helped push it out of business, an issue that Paulson said has reduced choice and competition in the auditing industry.

An unusual coalition including the American Civil Liberties Union and the U.S. Chamber of Commerce testified before Congress this year in support of relaxing parts of the Justice guidelines, known as the Thompson memo, named after former deputy attorney general Larry D. Thompson.

Paulson said he would host a conference early next year to explore problematic rules, accounting and legal issues and to lay a foundation for possible new initiatives within the executive branch and Congress. Last week, Sen. Christopher J. Dodd (D-Conn.), who is set to lead the Senate Banking Committee when Congress returns in January, expressed skepticism that the Sarbanes-Oxley law had hampered U.S. competitiveness.

DOJ_NMG_0096873

But the wider topic appears to have drawn some bipartisan support. Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.), whose constituents include many Wall Street executives, yesterday referred to "a growing consensus . . . that we need to do a complete and comprehensive review of America's and New York's worldwide competitive position in financial services."

SEC To Undergo Further Scrutiny From Congress (WSJ)

By Kara Scannell

The Wall Street Journal, November 21, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Securities and Exchange Commission, already under fire for its handling of a suspected insider-trading case, will receive more congressional scrutiny next month when the Senate Judiciary Committee holds a hearing on the agency's effectiveness.

Sen. Arlen Specter, a Pennsylvania Republican who is chairman of the committee until the new Democrat-controlled Congress convenes in January, has scheduled an oversight hearing on the SEC for Dec. 5.

The hearing comes as the SEC has been on the defensive since Sen. Specter and Sen. Charles Grassley (R., Iowa) said they were investigating the agency's handling of an insider-trading investigation involving hedge fund Pequot Capital Management and John Mack, the chief executive of Morgan Stanley. The matter, which was brought to their attention by a former SEC attorney, was referred to the Government Accountability Office for a thorough review of the SEC's enforcement division.

Linda Chatman Thomsen, the SEC's enforcement chief, is expected to testify at the hearing. Pequot founder Arthur Samberg has been notified of the hearing, according to a person familiar with the matter. It is unclear if Sen. Specter will compel his testimony. A spokesman for Pequot declined to comment.

Sen. Specter is expected to discuss the ability of the Justice Department to work with the SEC on investigations, following two court rulings that criticized the agencies for working too closely. He is also likely to discuss hedge funds, which he has said require tough enforcement.

It follows two hearings Sen. Specter held earlier this year. The first focused on hedge funds and short-selling activities, and Gary Aguirre, a former SEC attorney, testified about the SEC's handling of the Pequot investigation. Mr. Aguirre says he was fired after he sought to compel the testimony of Mr. Mack, who he suspected of tipping inside information to Pequot about a pending takeover. Mr. Aguirre has charged that the SEC denied his interview request because of Mr. Mack's political connections, and he said the agency allowed insider-trading referrals to gather dust, allegations the SEC has denied. Mr. Mack testified before the SEC this summer, and the agency said last month it wouldn't file charges against Pequot or Mr. Mack.

Sen. Specter has criticized the SEC's diligence in following up on insider-trading referrals from exchanges. The SEC says 75% of referrals become informal probes.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Criminal Network To Catch Crooks In Cyberspace, FBI Goes Global (WSJ)

By Cassell Bryan-Low

The Wall Street Journal, November 21, 2006

ANKARA, Turkey -- On Aug. 16, 2005, a CNN television news bulletin alerted viewers that computers at the network's New York and Atlanta offices were infected with a new virus called Zotob. Soon, U.S. companies from coast to coast were hit.

Halfway around the world, two young computer hackers in Turkey and Morocco got spooked by the ensuing media coverage, but mocked the ability of authorities to track them down. "They can't find me," wrote Atilla Ekici, a 23-year-old Turk, in an email to his accomplice, a 19-year-old Moroccan called Farid Essebar. "Ha, ha, ha," replied Mr. Essebar.

The U.S. Federal Bureau of Investigation, however, was already hot on their trail. The 98-year-old FBI, which has traditionally focused on domestic crime, is extending its reach beyond U.S. borders and boosting cooperation with other law-enforcement agencies in pursuit of cybercriminals, much as the agency has done in tracking down terrorists overseas.

The shift reflects the global nature of computer crimes, which include unleashing viruses, worms and other rogue programs onto victims' computers to disrupt them or steal information. As electronic borders between countries blur, hackers in one nation can easily commit crimes against individuals, corporations and governments on the other side of the world.

DOJ_NMG_0096874

The FBI now ranks cybercrime as its third priority behind terrorism and espionage. Computer-based crimes caused $14.2 billion in damages to businesses around the globe in 2005, including the cost of repairing systems and lost business, estimates Irvine, Calif., research firm Computer Economics.

Building relationships with police in other countries is "the only way we are going to effectively get a handle on the problem," says Christopher Painter, deputy chief of the Justice Department's Computer Crime Section.

The FBI is running into limits fighting international computer crime. Cybercrooks remain difficult to pinpoint in part because hackers can hide their tracks by commandeering computers from afar and routing their activities through machines dotted around the world.

Even when the agency does find suspects overseas, local authorities sometimes lack the resources or laws to prosecute. In its pursuit of LoveBug, one of the first big international computer viruses, which spread around the world in 2000, the FBI located its creator in the Philippines. But he was never charged because local laws didn't specify the virus writer's activities as illegal at the time.

"The criminal community is winning," says Nicholas Ianelli, a security analyst at the CERT Coordination Center at Carnegie Mellon University, a federally funded group that coordinates responses to computer-security incidents.

But the agency is making some headway, thanks partly to a diplomatic offensive to enlist help from foreign agencies. It now has about 150 agents deployed in some 56 offices around the world, including in Iraq and China, which deal with computer intrusions, as well as terrorism and other crimes. That has grown from about a dozen offices in the early 1990s.

During the past two years or so, the FBI has also built up Cyber Action Teams, or CATs -- a group of about 25 people that includes agents, computer forensic experts and specialists in computer code, according to David Thomas, the deputy assistant director of the FBI's science and technology branch. Establishing the team has taken longer than expected, in part because of the challenges of hiring people with the right skills, Mr. Thomas says.

Earlier this month, the FBI announced the arrest of at least 16 individuals involved in a credit-card theft scam as part of an investigation spanning the U.S., Poland and Romania. As part of the probe, the FBI temporarily posted several agents with Polish and Romanian police to assist with surveillance and information sharing.

Some overseas police agencies have noticed the change. The FBI is "much more open to interaction" than it was even a few years ago, says Kevin Zuccato, director of the Australian federal police's high-tech crime center. One FBI agent is even embedded full-time with Australia's high-tech crime center. Usually, FBI agents are posted within U.S. embassies and consulates abroad.

Police in other countries can also get touchy about defending their turf from outsiders, just as a local beat cop in the U.S. might resent interference from the FBI on a murder case. In 2002, Russian police accused an FBI agent with computer hacking after the agent seized evidence against two Russian hackers by downloading data from their computers in Russia without approval from local authorities. Russia hasn't pursued the charges, however, and the agent is still at the FBI. The two countries since then have worked on several cybercrime cases.

The FBI's overseas push is still a long way from winning the borderless battle against cybercrime. But as the tale of the Zotob virus shows, the agency is scoring some victories.

By Sunday Aug. 14, 2005, the FBI and antivirus software companies noticed that a virus called Zotob had started to spread. The virus infected computers by taking advantage of a weakness in some versions of Microsoft Corp.'s popular Windows operating system, causing them to slow or reboot repeatedly.

But that wasn't all: Zotob opened a door for other malicious software to be installed, such as "key-logging" programs that record what a PC user types into a keyboard -- a way to snatch credit-card numbers and other information that is sold to criminal gangs. Zotob hit some 100,000 companies or more, some analysts estimate, including Time Warner Inc.'s CNN division and New York Times Co.

Even before the virus became famous by attacking CNN's computers, FBI Agent Erkan Chase and his colleagues were tracking the code. They discovered that the Zotob computer program had a signature line "by Diabl0". Mr. Chase, a 41-year-old former New York cop, recalled the nickname from another virus that he had started monitoring earlier in the year, called Mytob. That suggested the same person created both viruses.

Mr. Chase, who was overseeing the FBI's Cyber Action Teams at the time, checked in with the FBI's U.S. field offices and found that agents in Seattle had opened an investigation into Diabl0 after Mytob hit, linking him to an email account at Microsoft in nearby Redmond, Wash. With search warrants served on the software giant, Mr. Chase and his colleagues obtained emails between Diabl0 and another suspect using the nickname "Coder." They also received subscriber information and other evidence indicating the two were using computers in Morocco and Turkey, respectively.

DOJ_NMG_0096875

In their email traffic, the tone of the hackers became cautious after media coverage of the virus, especially a local report in Turkey that authorities believed one of the hackers might be living there. The two suspects discussed whether to take precautions by getting rid of the evidence, by wiping or ditching their computer hard drives.

That raised the pressure on Mr. Chase to act quickly and try to arrest the two young men before it was too late. "We had to respond pretty quickly because we didn't want to get out there and find there was no evidence," he said.

Late afternoon on Aug. 18, 2005, just days after the virus hit, the head of the Turkish national police's cybercrime unit, Omer Tekeli, received a call from the U.S. Embassy in Ankara asking for help. The FBI teams only travel overseas at the behest of local authorities and don't have special powers to make arrests, but can offer technical and investigative assistance.

Mr. Tekeli agreed, and later that same day, an FBI agent from the Seattle office called to brief Turkish police on the details, including information they had gathered on Coder, Mr. Tekeli says. Mr. Tekeli's team soon identified Coder as Mr. Ekici, a farmer's son who had taught himself about computers at Internet cafes. Turkish authorities already knew of Mr. Ekici from an earlier investigation into a gang of credit-card thieves. Among other details, the FBI provided an email address for Coder that included part of Mr. Ekici's name as well as the equivalent of digital fingerprints that linked Coder's computer with Mr. Ekici's home address.

On Aug. 21, a week after noticing the virus, Mr. Chase left with a team of about a dozen people for Morocco and Turkey, flying in an FBI Learjet. The fact that Mr. Chase, whose mother is Turkish, spoke some of the local language helped smooth the process. After dropping half the group in the Moroccan capital of Rabat, Mr. Chase landed in Ankara, Turkey.

At the sparsely furnished offices of Turkey's cybercrime police, the FBI team handed over evidence they had obtained about the suspects from Microsoft and about 25 pages of analysis of the malicious code. FBI engineers gave a roughly hour-long presentation on how the code worked, complete with slides. In Rabat, meanwhile, emails provided by the FBI enabled Moroccan authorities to locate Diabl0 -- Mr. Essebar -- as well as an accomplice. Emails typically carry a unique set of numbers, known as an Internet protocol address, which identifies each computer connected to the Internet. Moroccan police were able to obtain the name and contact details associated with the Internet protocol addresses received from the FBI from a local Internet service provider.

The FBI's documents also helped local authorities swiftly secure arrest and search warrants. Concerned that the arrest of one suspect would tip off the others, Mr. Chase helped the two countries coordinate the raids. In the early hours of Aug. 25, Turkish police officers surrounded Mr. Ekici's home and took him into custody. About 2,000 miles away in Rabat, police moved in on Mr. Essebar and his accomplice. The FBI wasn't invited to be present at either of the arrests. Turkish and Moroccan authorities say that is because only local police are allowed to charge suspects under the respective national laws.

Mr. Ekici in Turkey had disposed of his computer hard drive so Turkish investigators weren't able to gather much evidence from his machine. But Mr. Essebar in Morocco only reformatted his hard drive, which wipes out files but let the Moroccan police's computer specialists recover most of them because copies often still exist.

Among the finds were copies of the code itself and other information identifying Mr. Essebar as Zotob's author. Police also found emails between Diabl0 and Coder discussing Zotob as well as the numbers of about 1,600 stolen credit cards.

In parallel, FBI specialists worked off a copy of the hard drive, searching for relevant emails and writing a piece of computer code on the fly to help them analyze the program. "We were able to use that information from Morocco and give it to Turkish authorities to further [their] investigation," says Mr. Chase.

In September of this year, a Rabat court sentenced Mr. Essebar, a Russian-born Moroccan national, to two years in prison for virus-writing, illegal access to computers and conspiracy to commit credit-card fraud. The court also sentenced his 21-year-old accomplice to one year in prison for conspiracy to commit fraud. A lawyer for Mr. Essebar couldn't be reached. At the time of the sentencing, news service Agence France Presse cited a lawyer for the defendants saying they planned to appeal.

Authorities allege Mr. Ekici, whom they believe met Mr. Essebar at a Web site for credit-card fraudsters, was responsible for disseminating the Zotob worm and intended to use it to steal financial information. But they say it is unclear whether he had time to swipe any information or profit from it given the speed with which they were able to arrest him, less than two weeks after the worm first spread.

The trial of Mr. Ekici, whom Turkish authorities have charged with unauthorized access to computers and disseminating a virus, continues in Turkey. He couldn't be reached for comment.

The Zotob case marked the first time foreign law enforcement has come to Turkey to assist in a cybercrime investigation, says Mr. Tekeli, the cybercrime unit chief in Turkey. Without the FBI's help, the investigation "would have been more difficult and more time consuming," he says. Hakim Aarab, an engineer in the Moroccan police's computer division, says because of the borderless nature of cybercrime, "international collaboration is an obligation, it's not an option."

Gangsters Who Targeted Blacks Get Life (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0096876

AP, November 21, 2006

LOS ANGELES (AP) — Three members of a Hispanic gang were sentenced Monday to life in prison without the possibility of parole for using murder and other violent acts to intimidate blacks in their neighborhood.

Federal prosecutors had accused Gilbert Saldana, Alejandro Martinez and Fernando Cazares of targeting blacks in the largely Hispanic community of Highland Park, east of downtown Los Angeles. They were found guilty of conspiring to use violence, including the shooting deaths of two black men in 1999 and 2000.

Authorities said it was one of the first prominent cases in which the U.S. Justice Department targeted a street gang with laws normally used to prosecute white supremacist groups.

"These were horrific offenses that have had far-reaching consequences," U.S. District Judge Percy Anderson said during sentencing.

Each defendant received two consecutive life sentences. They were convicted in August.

A fourth man, Porfirio Avila, was also convicted. He was scheduled to be sentenced Dec. 18.

Government Backs Off Prison Restrictions (AP-Y)

By Gillian Flaccus, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 21, 2006

Prosecutors have dropped plans to ask a federal judge to prevent leaders of the Aryan Brotherhood prison gang from communicating with anyone but their attorneys, officials said Monday, but they may ask U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to do so instead.

Prosecutors will probably ask the Bureau of Prisons to impose the bans on Barry "The Baron" Mills, T.D. "The Hulk" Bingham, Edgar "The Snail" Hevle and Christopher Overton Gibson, said U.S. attorney's office spokesman Thom Mrozek.

The change means defense attorneys wouldn't be able to fight the restrictions until after they have been imposed, which would delay the appeals process, said Mark Fleming, an attorney representing Mills.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Stephen Wolfe filed papers Friday in federal court withdrawing a request for a federal judge to impose the restrictions.

An order would also keep writing implements, paper and previously viewed reading material out of the inmates' cells.

Mills, Bingham and Hevle are to be sentenced Tuesday for murder, conspiracy and racketeering. Gibson, who recently had back surgery, won't be sentenced Tuesday because he can't be present.

Similar bans have been imposed only 11 times in the history of the federal prison system. Inmates Zacarias Moussaoui, the suspected "20th hijacker" in the Sept. 11, 2001, World Trade Center attack, and convicted Unabomber Ted Kaczynski are among those with restrictions on their prison contacts.

All four men were convicted of racketeering and three were convicted of murder in a case aimed at dismantling the white supremacist organization, which is accused of dealing drugs and spreading terror inside some of the nation's most dangerous prisons.

Mills and Bingham face life in prison without the possibility of parole; Hevle and Gibson face 20 years to life.

G.O.P. Fund-Raiser Sentenced For Embezzlement In Ohio (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, November 21, 2006

TOLEDO, Ohio, Nov. 20 (AP) — A Republican fund-raiser who embezzled from a state investment in rare coins was sentenced Monday to 18 years in prison for his role in a scandal that helped bring down Ohio's ruling Republican Party.

The fund-raiser, Tom Noe, 52, was also fined $139,000.

Mr. Noe spent money as if he had "a bottomless cup of wealth and luxury" at his disposal, "when in fact it was at the state's expense," Judge Thomas Osowik of Common Pleas Court said Monday.

The sentence is on top of the more than two years Mr. Noe was ordered to serve after pleading guilty earlier this year to illegally funneling $45,000 to President Bush's re-election campaign.

Mr. Noe declined to make a statement before sentencing and stared blankly, his upper lip twitching, as his punishment was handed down.

Mr. Noe was the central figure in a scandal that dogged the Ohio Republican Party for more than a year. On Election Day, the Democrats won the governor's office, a Senate seat and other major offices after 12 years of Republican rule.

Until Monday, prosecutors did not say whether Mr. Noe had used any of the money to make campaign contributions, but after the sentencing, the prosecutor, Ron O'Brien, said, "You can make those inferences."

Also for the first time, prosecutors on Monday calculated that Mr. Noe had stolen a total of $13.7 million.

DOJ_NMG_0096877

Mr. Noe was hired by the state workers' compensation agency and given $50 million to invest in an unorthodox and risky effort by a state government to make money buying and selling rare coins. A furor erupted when the investment in rare coins became public and when it was learned that millions of dollars were missing.

Democrats asserted that Mr. Noe had gotten the job because of his Republican ties. He was a top fund-raiser who gave more than $105,000 to Republicans, including President Bush and Gov. Bob Taft in 2004.

The resulting investigations led to ethics charges against Mr. Taft, who pleaded no contest to failing to report golf outings and other gifts. Four former Taft aides pleaded no contest to similar charges.

Mr. Noe was convicted of theft, corrupt activity and other offenses last week, and faced a minimum of 10 years in prison on the corrupt-activity charge alone.

Prosecutors said he had used the money to pay off business loans, renovate his home in the Florida Keys and otherwise live in high style.

One of Mr. Noe's lawyers, John Mitchell, had asked for the minimum 10-year sentence, saying that other high-profile criminals had received less time for taking more money.

Married Aleppo Man Held In W. Va. Death (PPG)

By Milan Simonich, Pittsburgh Post-gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, November 21, 2006

Murder suspect waives hearings

WHEELING, W.Va. -- Eugene Talik Jr., a married man accused of killing his girlfriend to hide their illicit affair, yesterday abandoned any hope of getting out of jail before he stands trial.

He waived his right to a bail hearing and to a second proceeding that would have forced federal prosecutors to reveal some of their evidence.

Less than a minute after his court session began, Mr. Talik ended it by saying he did not want to go through either hearing.

U.S. marshals took him back to jail, where he will await his indictment in the death of 28-year-old Kelly Jo Elliott.

Prosecutors say the victim and Mr. Talik, 38, were having an affair that soured after she learned he was married.

The government alleges that Mr. Talik and an accomplice killed Ms. Elliott to stop her from telling his wife.

Grand jurors will consider a murder-for-hire charge against Mr. Talik when they hear the case against him, Assistant U.S. Attorney Robert McWilliams said in a motion opposing bail.

After the indictment, Mr. Talik could face the death penalty, Mr. McWilliams said.

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales has the final decision on whether the government will pursue a capital case or try to imprison Mr. Talik for the rest of his life.

As for Mr. Talik's accomplice, he still has not been identified by the government.

His name might have come out yesterday had Mr. Talik insisted on a preliminary hearing. Because he gave up his right to the hearing, prosecutors left court without having to disclose it.

Mr. Talik, a moving van driver from Aleppo, Pa., met Ms. Elliott during a swing through West Virginia.

Tall and powerfully built, he favored short-sleeve shirts that displayed his tattoos, including a spiderweb on his left elbow.

Soon, Ms. Elliott, a single mother of two, began seeing him on his days off or when his moving business brought him near the town of Valley Grove -- where she lived, just outside of Wheeling.

Prosecutors say she was the second West Virginia woman to have an affair with Mr. Talik.

The first told police that Mr. Talik threatened to kill her if she exposed him for cheating in his marriage. The government has not made the woman's name public.

Prosecutors say Mr. Talik and his accomplice killed Ms. Elliott the night of May 25 after extensive planning.

The accomplice owed Mr. Talik about $2,000 for cocaine, so he entered into the murder plot to wipe away his debt. Mr. Talik also promised the man additional cocaine at no charge, prosecutors said.

Ms. Elliott was supposed to be house-sitting for her sister, so the accomplice broke into the home with the idea of shooting her there.

But, prosecutors said, she changed her plans, so Mr. Talik called the gunman and told him to leave.

Soon after, prosecutors said, the two of them attacked Ms. Elliott near Dallas Pike, where a truck stop is located. The accomplice began the assault. He hit Ms. Elliott with a pipe, but the blow did not kill her.

Prosecutors gave this account of her final moments: Mr. Talik urged his cohort to strangle her, but the man could not bring himself to do it. So Mr. Talik grabbed Ms. Elliott and choked her until she stopped breathing.

Twelve hours later, Mr. Talik appeared at the house where Ms. Elliott had been living.

Her parents told him she had not come home the night before. Mr. Talik told them he was surprised.

DOJ_NMG_0096878

Then he left for the weekend, taking his wife, Karen, on a camping trip.

Later, prosecutors say, Mr. Talik disposed of Ms. Elliott's body in Elk County, Pa.

His accomplice led police to her remains last week, breaking the case open.

FBI Recovers Stolen Goya Painting (NSDY/AP)

By Wayne Parry, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, November 21, 2006

NEWARK, N.J. -- The FBI said Monday that it has recovered a 1778 painting by the Spanish artist Francisco de Goya that was stolen as it was being taken to an exhibition earlier this month.

"Children with a Cart," which disappeared en route from the Toledo Museum of Art in Ohio to the Solomon R. Guggenheim Museum in New York City and was valued at about $1.1 million, appeared to be unharmed, said Les Wiser, agent in charge of the Newark FBI office.

Steven Siegel, a spokesman for the FBI, said the bureau recovered the painting Saturday in New Jersey, but would not be more specific about where or how it was located. No arrests were made, but the case remains under investigation, he said.

The FBI said extensive news coverage of the theft led to tips that enabled the agency to recover the painting.

The painting was taken from an art transporter's truck that was parked overnight in a hotel parking lot in Stroudsburg, Pa., on Nov. 8, authorities said. It had been scheduled to be displayed in the exhibition "Spanish Painting from El Greco to Picasso: Time, Truth, and History," which opened at the Guggenheim on Nov. 17.

Siegel said the thieves apparently did not know what was inside the truck when they broke into it. "It was a target of opportunity. They probably thought it was a truck full of PlayStations," he said.

The image of four children at play was insured for about $1 million and was to be exhibited with about 135 paintings by Spanish masters.

The insurer had offered a reward of up to $50,000 for information leading to the recovery of the artwork.

A Phone Call Leads The F.B.I. To A Stolen Goya (NYT)

By Randy Kennedy

The New York Times, November 21, 2006

F.B.I. officials in Newark and Philadelphia said yesterday that they had recovered a Goya painting that was stolen from a truck this month while it was being transported from the collection of the Toledo Museum of Art in Ohio to a major exhibition now on view at the Solomon R. Guggenheim Museum in Manhattan.

Officials said the painting was recovered unharmed Saturday in central New Jersey after a lawyer called the F.B.I. and told investigators where they could find it while saying that he could not tell them anything else about the theft.

As of late yesterday, no arrests had been made. Because the investigation remains active, officials would not say exactly where or how the painting had been found.

Contrary to earlier law enforcement theories that the theft was carried out by insiders, they did say it appeared that the thieves probably had no idea what kind of art-historical loot they had stumbled upon when they broke into the truck overnight in a parking lot at a Howard Johnson Inn near Bartonsville, Pa.

“This time of year, close to Christmas, they probably thought they’d found a truck filled with PlayStations and broke in and started looking for the biggest-looking box,” said Steve Siegel, an F.B.I. agent who serves as the spokesman for the bureau’s Newark office. “Basically, it’s a target-of-opportunity typical New Jersey cargo theft. There are literally predators — for lack of a better word — who when they see a tractor-trailer or a cargo vehicle parked for any length of time start snooping around.”

Officials at the Toledo Museum of Art said the painting, which was insured for $1 million, would not be included as a late entry in the Guggenheim show, “Spanish Painting From El Greco to Picasso: Time, Truth and History,” a sprawling exhibition of some 135 paintings by Spanish masters that opened Friday. Instead, the work, painted in 1778 and titled “Children With a Cart,” will be returned to Toledo.

“We are ecstatic that the painting has been recovered, and we look forward to bringing the Goya home and sharing it again with our community,” Don Bacigalupi, the director of the Toledo Museum of Art, said in a written statement.

Lisa Dennison, the director of the Guggenheim, said the museum would have liked to put the painting into the show but added that it was “understandable that the Toledo Museum would want to bring the stolen painting back to its home after this nerve-racking experience.” She pointed out that the show includes 21 other works by Goya.

The crated painting was stolen either late on the night of Nov. 7 or early on Nov. 8 from a shipping container in the truck while it was parked in an unlighted lot near the Howard Johnson motel. The two drivers checked around 11 p.m. on Nov. 7, according to the motel manager, Faizal Bhimani. He said the white midsize truck was left in a lot adjacent to the hotel, out of sight of the motel's rooms and the main office.

DOJ_NMG_0096879

Law enforcement officials, speaking on the condition of anonymity, said that when the drivers returned to the truck about 6:30 a.m. on Nov. 8, the locks had been broken and the painting was gone. Neither the two museums nor the investigators have identified the shipping company responsible for transporting the painting.

Federal investigators had first said they believed that thieves armed with detailed shipping information were behind the theft.

While that theory appears to have been wrong, other law enforcement officials cautioned that it was not yet known definitively that the thief or thieves had no information about the shipment of the painting.

While Mr. Siegel would not say exactly where the painting was recovered or provide details about how the agents had found it, he did say that it was recovered without a search warrant. He added that several people had been interviewed about the theft, but he provided no details.

Officials declined to identity the lawyer who alerted the investigators and would not say how he learned of the painting's whereabouts. Nor would they say whether the lawyer was connected with anyone involved in the theft or whether he would be paid the $50,000 reward offered by an insurer.

It was not known whether the authorities had learned the identities of the thieves.

One law enforcement official, speaking on the condition of anonymity, said charges in the case could be filed as early as next week in United States District Court in Newark. Possible crimes could include interstate transportation of stolen property and theft of major artwork, each carrying a maximum penalty of 10 years in prison.

Goya Is Found After The FBI Is Tipped Off (NYS)

By Bradley Hope, Staff Reporter of the Sun

New York Sun, November 21, 2006

A $1 million Francisco de Goya y Lucientes painting has been recovered in central New Jersey less than two weeks after it was purloined from a parked truck, FBI officials said yesterday.

A spokesman for the Newark FBI office, Steven Siegel, said investigators now believe the theft was a "target of opportunity," not an inside job.

The work of art, "Children With a Cart," painted in 1778, was taken from an unmarked, locked truck in a hotel parking lot in Stroudsburg, Pa., on November 8. It was on its way from the Toledo Museum of Art in Ohio to the Solomon R. Guggenheim museum, where it was supposed to make its debut in a large Spanish art exhibit last Friday.

It didn't make it, and officials yesterday said it would now be whisked back to Toledo's permanent collection without making an appearance at the Guggenheim.

The two truck drivers were staying the night at the hotel, and when they saw the truck's locks had been broken and the painting was missing, they immediately called police, who contacted the FBI.

The FBI said the painting was found through tips that came about after extensive press coverage of the theft beginning early last week. Because the investigation is ongoing, FBI officials refused to provide specific information about where and how the painting was recovered.

A spokeswoman for the FBI's Philadelphia office, Jerri Williams, said no arrests had been made and no one is in custody for the theft.

"A tip came in that allowed us to recover the painting," she said.

The company that insured the painting for $1 million offered a reward of up to $50,000 when the theft was first announced. Ms. Williams said the decision to hand the money over to the tipster was up to the insurance company. A spokeswoman for the Toledo Museum of Art, Jordan Rundgren, refused to answer questions about the reward.

The FBI said the painting appeared to be in good condition, a fact that the executive director of the International Foundation for Art Research, Sharon Flescher, said was the biggest news.

"The most important thing today is that the painting was found, and found in good condition," she said. "Now we can start asking questions."

A spokeswoman for the Guggenheim, Betsy Ennis, said the directors of both museums decided the painting should be returned to the Toledo Museum of Art "for the benefit of the community."

"We are ecstatic that the painting has been recovered, and we look forward to bringing the Goya home and sharing it again with our community," the director of the Toledo Museum of Art, Don Bacigalupi, said in a statement.

The painting has been part of the museum's permanent collection since 1959, when it was purchased from Wildenstein & Co. gallery in New York.

"I'm so happy for the museum," a senior vice president at Wildenstein & Co., Joseph Baillio, said. "It's wonderful news. It's a lovely thing. It just shimmers. I think it was dramatically underinsured."

Goya created "Children with a Cart" early in his career when he was painting cartoons for tapestries at the Royal Tapestry Factory. The painting, one of about 60 cartoons, wouldn't have been displayed by itself when it first created, but as Goya's work began to attract more attention, it likely became an attraction on its own. Almost all of the other early Goya cartoons have remained in Madrid.

The painting depicts four children playing with a drum and a flute on a cart beneath a large tree, and a cloud rising from the horizon. The final tapestry was woven for the private quarters of the prince and princess of Asturias at the Pardo Palace, a professor of Spanish art at New York University's Institute of Fine Arts, Jonathan Brown, said.

The painting is 145.4 by 94 centimeters, according to the Guggenheim catalog.

The Guggenheim's exhibit, "Spanish Painting from El Greco to Picasso: Time, Truth, and History," opened Friday with work from a broad selection of Spanish artists including Diego Velázquez, Joan Miró, and Salvador Dalí.

Oil's Well That Ends Well For Stolen Goya (NYDN)

New York Daily News, November 21, 2006

A 1778 painting by iconic Spanish artist Francisco de Goya, stolen en route to an exhibition at the Guggenheim Museum in Manhattan, has been recovered by FBI agents in New Jersey.

Agency officials said yesterday that the painting, "Children With a Cart," is in good condition and appears unharmed.

The Goya, valued at $1.1 million, was stolen Nov. 8 from a transport truck parked overnight in a hotel parking lot in Stroudsburg, Pa. It was en route to the Guggenheim from a Toledo, Ohio, museum.

The FBI credited extensive media coverage for tips that led to the painting's recovery. But the agency would not reveal where or how the painting was recovered, citing a continuing investigation.

The image of four children at play was insured for about $1 million and was scheduled to be exhibited with about 135 paintings by Spanish masters.

The insurer had offered a reward of up to $50,000.

Owen Moritz

Million-Dollar Painting Recovered (ABC)

By Vic Walter And Krista Kjellman

ABC News' The Blotter, November 21, 2006

Federal authorities believe the thieves who stole a million-dollar masterpiece got rid of it because the painting was too hot to handle.

The 18th century painting, "Children with a Cart," by Francisco de Goya y Lucientes, "was recovered in good condition and appears to be unharmed," according to a FBI press release today.

Federal investigators believe the thieves stumbled onto the painting during a routine truck robbery somewhere in the Scranton, Pa., area last week.

"At this time, it appears that the painting was stolen as a random target of opportunity," FBI spokesperson Jerri Williams told ABC News.

The painting was en route to New York's Guggenheim Museum for an upcoming Spanish art exhibit that opened last Friday.

Read the FBI's Press Release on the Goya Painting Recovery in the Dossier Section of Our Homepage.

The FBI credits the "extensive publicity" of the theft and the "reward of up to $50,000" for the artwork's recovery.

No arrests have yet been made in the case, and Williams says at this juncture of the investigation, there is no indication that anyone from the transport company or the museums was involved.

Stolen Goya Painting Recovered (CNN)

By Deborah Brunswick, CNN

CNN.com, November 21, 2006

NEWARK, New Jersey (CNN) -- FBI agents have recovered a 1778 painting by famed Spanish artist Francisco de Goya that was stolen en route to an exhibition earlier this month, according to FBI Special Agent Jerri Williams.

The painting was recovered in Newark, New Jersey, Williams said.

The painting, "Children with a Cart," which is estimated to be worth about $1.1 million, was stolen November 8 from a transport truck as it was parked overnight outside a hotel in Stroudsburg, Pennsylvania.

DOJ_NMG_0096881

The truck was taking the painting from the Toledo Museum of Art in Toledo, Ohio, to the Solomon R. Guggenheim Museum in Manhattan.

According to Leslie Wiser, the special agent in charge of the Newark FBI office, the painting, recovered Monday morning, appears to be unharmed.

Wiser would not comment on when, where or how the painting was recovered, citing an ongoing investigation, but said "comprehensive media coverage of the theft assisted the investigative team and led to the recovery of the painting."

The painting had been scheduled to be displayed in the exhibition "Spanish Painting from El Greco to Picasso: Time, Truth, and History," which opened Friday at the Guggenheim.

The insurer had offered a reward of up to $50,000 for information leading to the recovery of the artwork.

Goya is best known for paintings, drawings and engravings of times of upheavals in Europe. Considered an early modernist, Goya was born in Spain in 1746 and died in France in 1828.

Alleged Agent's Confession Allowed At Trial (MH)

By Jay Weaver

The Miami Herald, November 21, 2006

A professor who acknowledged he was a Cuban government agent to the FBI has incurred a huge blow to his upcoming trial with a federal judge's ruling that his "confession" to agents was not obtained illegally.

U.S. Magistrate Judge Barry Garber rejected Florida International University professor Carlos Alvarez's bid to throw out his statements on grounds that he only spoke with the FBI because of alleged promises not to prosecute if he cooperated as a ``double agent."

Garber said two FBI agents made no such promises during three days of interviews in a hotel last year, nor did they have that authority. The judge also found that the agents did not place him in custody, nor did Alvarez make his statements involuntarily.

"Moreover, the defendant never exercised the most basic method at his disposal for avoiding discussions with the agents -- not talking to them," Garber wrote in a 22-page opinion, rejecting Alvarez's other motion to dismiss the government's indictment.

``Despite what he was told, he stayed at the hotel and spoke with the agents. . . . He even called the agents to request a third day of interviews."

Either side has 10 days to object to the judge's ruling, issued last Wednesday.

Alvarez, 61, who is being detained at the Miami Federal Detention Center, and his wife, Elsa, an FIU counselor who was granted a bond, face trial Jan. 22 on a single charge of being unregistered agents for the communist government of Fidel Castro. The couple, if convicted, face up to 10 years in prison.

Alvarez's self-incriminating statements to FBI agents, which were recorded on audio and videotape, will be the U.S. government's main weapon against the couple -- accused of gathering information on the Cuban exile community, but not espionage.

The FBI, which had a bug in the couple's bedroom from at least 2001 to 2005, picked up the professor at a local Publix before taking him to an unidentified hotel for interviews during June and July of last year. During those interviews, Alvarez and FBI agents Alberto Alonso and Rosa Schureck went back and forth on sensitive questions about his family and his history as an agent for Castro's government -- hinting at the possibility of a cooperation deal.

During a recent court hearing, Schureck testified that "the objective of the interviews was not to gain a criminal prosecution, but to create a double agent," according to the magistrate judge's ruling.

In a transcript of the June 22, 2005, interviews, the agent said: ``We're here on a professional, not personal, level. Now, since you helped the Cuban government, we want you to help the United States now. OK? Do you understand?"

Alvarez's response: ``I want something else. I want peace."

Alvarez did not succumb to the double-agent offer, which is why he was eventually indicted along with his wife five months later. They were arrested last January.

At the August court hearing, Alvarez testified that he felt threatened when agents told him that his decision on whether to cooperate would be "the most important day of his life" -- citing their references to his FIU career, his wife and his five children -- including a school-age daughter.

"According to defendant, he believed that if he did not speak with the agents, he would be arrested and something would happen to his family," according to the magistrate's opinion.

Alvarez testified that he believed if he provided truthful information to the agents, he would not be prosecuted, the judge wrote.

DOJ_NMG_0096882

"I was fearful, and I felt that the only way that I could get out of that situation, because I felt it had been promised to me, is by confessing to giving them everything -- all true statements," Alvarez testified.

His attorney, Steven Chaykin, argued that because his client truthfully answered the FBI's questions, prosecutors violated the agents' agreement to ``leave him alone."

But Garber, the magistrate judge, said the agents made no promises in the interviews.

Former Daley Aide Gets Almost 4 Years For Hiring Fraud (AP)

By Mike Robinson

AP, November 21, 2006

CHICAGO - A former high-ranking aide to Mayor Richard M. Daley was sentenced Monday to almost four years in prison for engineering a fraud scheme designed to cover up political patronage hiring at City Hall.

Robert Sorich, 43, showed no emotion as federal Judge David H. Coar also fined him $10,000 for mail fraud and delivered a sharp tongue-lashing before imposing the minimum 46-month sentence federal guidelines prescribe.

"The offense is corruption - corruption with a capital C," Coar said. He said that "for people to owe their jobs to political advancement rather than performance on the job stinks."

"I don't give a hoot whether this has been going on for 200 years - it still stinks," Coar said. "You sat near the top of this corrupt operation."

Sorich co-defendant Timothy McCarthy, 35, a former personnel director in the city Department of Aviation and a one-time Sorich aide, was sentenced to 18 months for mail fraud. Coar said he gave McCarthy a break because he had provided prosecutors with important information.

John Sullivan, 38, a former deputy commissioner of streets and sanitation, was sentenced to two months in prison and four months of house arrest for lying to FBI agents. He also was fined $5,000.

Patrick Slattery, 42, a former streets and sanitation official, was sentenced to 27 months for mail fraud.

Coar sentenced Sorich at the bottom of the guideline range of 46 to 57 months, saying "good people sometimes do bad things."

Even so, defense attorney Thomas Anthony Durkin told reporters that Sorich was "sentenced as if he were public enemy No. 1." He said the prosecutors were trying to pressure the defendants into providing evidence against City Hall higher ups.

"This is one of the most devastating days I've ever seen because it means if you don't cooperate you're going to the penitentiary," he said.

Lead prosecutor Patrick M. Collins, however, said that if the government were "guilty of anything it's that we're not treating people who are politically powerful differently."

The case was part of a larger investigation of city corruption that began with bribes paid to city officials by trucking company operators and expanded into City Hall hiring practices. So far, 44 people have been charged and 41 convicted. Two are awaiting trial and one has died.

Witnesses said Sorich presided over the faking of scores received by applicants for city jobs. He also made certain that campaign workers who were members of so-called "patronage armies" were hired, while other applicants were frozen out, witnesses testified.

More than 200 of Sorich's supporters flooded the courtroom. The crowd was so large that Coar moved the sentencing to a larger courtroom.

After the sentencing, some of those in the audience wept openly while others threw their arms around Sorich to show support.

Sorich took the sentencing calmly and apologized for nothing.

"I stand before the court and my friends and family to let them know that I am not a broken man," Sorich said. "As I stand before them I am a lucky man because I have their support. I have tried to do my best and I have tried to be fair."

Plainly many of those on hand, far from viewing Sorich as a criminal, consider him a martyr to the cause of Chicago's time-honored patronage system in which those who help the mayor get elected get the city jobs.

The system, which dates back more than a century, largely was banned under a 30-year-old court order known as the Shakman Decree. But federal officials say that decree has been repeatedly violated. Another judge recently named a federal monitor to force the city to follow the order.

Federal prosecutors had hoped Sorich would be sentenced to a term that exceeded the federal guidelines.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Philip A. Guentert told Coar that under Sorich city jobs were doled out through "a covert, corrupt underground hiring system." He said taxpayers and honest job applicants were victims.

DOJ_NMG_0096883

Witnesses at the trial testified that Sorich not only gave orders on who would be hired but also gave members of the "patronage armies" their marching orders, deploying them into parts of the city where the mayor and his allies wanted some extra push in getting out the vote on Election Day.

Former Patronage Chief Sentenced To 46 Months (CHIST)

By NATASHA KORECKI And MAUREEN O'DONNELL, Federal Courts Reporters

Chicago Sun-Times, November 21, 2006

Although the sentence was lighter than it could have been, U.S. District Judge David Coar was sharply critical of Robert Sorich, saying Sorich sat at the top of a corrupt operation.

"It's corruption with a capital C," Coar told Sorich. "There's nothing good about what you did. I don't give a hoot if this is going on for 200 years. It stinks. It stinks."

Sorich's eyes welled up as Coar announced his prison sentence. Sorich's wife put her hands to her face and cried.

Moments before, Sorich — who was once a top Daley aide, in the Mayor's Office of Intergovernmental Affairs — gave a brief statement but didn't apologize.

"I am not a broken man here today," the soft-spoken Sorich told the packed courtroom. "I am a lucky man because of this support."

Codefendant Timothy McCarthy, who also worked at the intergovernmental affairs office, was sentenced to 18 months in prison. He got a break after meeting with the government eight times five times before his trial and three times after his conviction. McCarthy's lawyer, Patrick Deady, said that if McCarthy pleaded guilty he would lose a pension he built up after 20 years.

"Judge, I will regret this for the rest of my life," McCarthy told Coar.

Sorich lawyer Tom Durkin argued for no prison time, saying his client didn't take bribes or otherwise gain anything personally. Durkin criticized a legal system in which another corrupt former city official, former water czar Donald Tomczak, got a prison sentence just one month longer than what Sorich got, though Tomczak admitted taking $400,000 in bribes. Durkin criticized the U.S. Attorney's Office for its role in a system he said punishes those who fight charges and take their case to trial and rewards those who cooperate, even if they're more corrupt.

"This is 'play ball by our terms, or else you go to jail,' end of story," Durkin said.

But prosecutors said they wouldn't apologize for a system that allows wrongdoers to make amends and help fix a criminal system.

Coar gave Sorich a prison sentence in the low end of the range possible under federal sentencing guidelines. Sorich had faced up to 57 months in prison. Prosecutors had sought a sentence of up to 71 months. Coar also gave McCarthy a significant break, citing his cooperation with the government and his show of remorse.

Hundreds of friends and family showed up at this morning's sentencing, causing Coar to move the hearing from his own courtroom to the federal courthouse's largest.

A jury convicted Sorich, McCarthy and two others — who are still to be sentenced later this afternoon — in a scheme to award jobs and promotions to city applicants who were politically connected.

Witnesses testified they were given "blessed lists" from Sorich and others at IGA, with names of people who were to get jobs. Managers then rigged interviews and changed test scores so that the connected candidates won advancement no matter their qualifications, testimony showed. Prosecutors maintained that those who won jobs had done free political campaign work and received city jobs and promotions as their payback.

Bus Union Official Faces New Charges (NYT)

By William K. Rashbaum

The New York Times, November 21, 2006

Federal prosecutors announced racketeering, extortion and bribery charges yesterday against the president of the 15,000-member city school bus drivers' union, who is already facing trial on charges that he tried to hide Mafia involvement in the union.

The new charges against the president, Salvatore Battaglia, 60, of Local 1181 of the Amalgamated Transit Union, were contained in an indictment unsealed in United States District Court in Manhattan that says he is a member of the Genovese crime family. The new charges came just weeks after the union's longtime secretary-treasurer, Julius Bernstein, pleaded guilty to federal racketeering charges and began cooperating with prosecutors and the F.B.I., law enforcement officials said.

The new charges said that over at least two years, Mr. Battaglia and others agreed with the owners of a number of school bus companies not to organize their workers, in exchange for tens of thousands of dollars in payoffs from the owners.

DOJ_NMG_0096884

Dissidents in the local have complained that it has been awash in corruption. Matthew Ianniello, 86, who prosecutors have said is the acting boss of the Genovese crime family, pleaded guilty in September, admitting that he had helped arrange for bus companies to make payoffs to Local 1181 officials.

Mr. Ianniello, Mr. Battaglia and Mr. Bernstein were among 20 people charged together in the original indictment in the case in July 2005. Last week, a federal jury in Manhattan acquitted one of the men, Ciro Perrone, on an obstruction of justice charge but failed to reach a verdict on racketeering charges. A prosecutor plans to retry him.

Mr. Battaglia's lawyer, Charles G. Fiore, and a spokesman for the union did not return telephone messages late last night.

Mr. Battaglia would face a maximum of 168 years in prison if convicted on all the charges.

FBI Busts Union's Boss On School Bus Shakedown Rap (NYDN)

By Greg B. Smith, Daily News Staff Writer

New York Daily News, November 21, 2006

A corrupt union backed by the Genovese crime family extorted cash from numerous school bus companies, prosecutors charged yesterday.

The charges emerged in a new indictment unsealed yesterday against Salvatore Battaglia, president of Amalgamated Transit Workers Union Local 1181.

Battaglia was arrested at dawn by the FBI at his Staten Island home, officials said. The arrest came a day after the Daily News revealed the FBI's probe of the city school bus shakedown.

Prosecutors in Manhattan U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia's office sought to keep the longtime union figure behind bars, but Battaglia was released yesterday on $1.5 million bond after agreeing to temporarily step down from his union post.

The new indictment alleges Battaglia "and others" - identified as the Genovese crime family - "improperly received payments from numerous bus companies" who employed Local 1181 members.

Among other allegations, prosecutors alleged that some bus companies paid off Battaglia to back off on efforts to organize the firms' nonunion members.

The new indictment alleged that Battaglia continued extorting the bus companies into 2006, even after he and other union officials were arrested in July 2005.

The arrest comes two months after Matthew (Matty the Horse) Ianiello, a Genovese captain, pleaded guilty to charges of shaking down Local 1181. During his plea, Ianiello contended he'd arranged payments to the union from several city school bus companies.

Jeffs' Preaching Will Be Dissected Word By Word (SLT)

Salt Lake Tribune, November 21, 2006

As prosecution begins its case today, judge will look at evidence from life in the sect

GEORGE - Word by word, every lesson, sermon and pronouncement polygamous sect leader Warren S. Jeffs ever made is likely to be dissected and offered as evidence - both against him and in his favor - as his prosecution begins today.

In one typical lesson, recorded and distributed to faithful followers, Jeffs can be heard counseling young women to be submissive and obedient, to "keep sweet" and to avoid squabbling with sister-wives.

He also tells them that fathers and husbands are to "persuade through love" and act with kindness, not force.

Jeffs, 50, is to appear for a preliminary hearing in 5th District Court as the state of Utah makes its case that he should stand trial on two first-degree felony counts of being an accomplice to rape.

The charges stem from Jeffs' role in conducting a 2001 spiritual ceremony between a 19-year-old man and a 14-year-old girl who alleges she was coerced into the union and, later, sexual relations.

The judge then will rule on whether the evidence is sufficient to bind Jeffs over for trial.

Identified only as Jane Doe IV, the woman alleges Jeffs told her to submit "mind, body and soul" to her husband and that her salvation depended on sticking with the marriage.

He also counseled the couple to "multiply and replenish the earth."

Washington County Prosecutor Brock Belnap highlighted those statements in filing charges against Jeffs.

But Wally Bugden, one of Jeffs' attorneys, said his client merely counseled the couple, both entering their first marriage, to love one another and build a family.

Each side is likely to cull comments made by Jeffs in recorded lessons and sermons he gave as a private school principal and then president and prophet of the Fundamentalist Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints.

Of particular interest will be the FLDS version of premarital advice Jeffs gave in home economics classes for junior-high age girls and in priesthood history classes for boys.

DOJ_NMG_0096885

The teachings draw on the Bible and standard works of the mainstream Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, which publicly disavowed plural marriage in 1890.

Jeffs quotes fundamentalist Mormon leaders as well as 19th-century LDS Church leaders such as Brigham Young.

In a collection of lessons reviewed by The Salt Lake Tribune, Jeffs, considered by his followers to be their prophet, traces the history of plural marriage, discusses how marriages are arranged through revelations received by the prophet and how girls are to "keep the bars up" for all males except "the one man you are given to."

In a March 13, 1998, lesson Jeffs gave to a home economics class at Alta Academy, girls learn that wives should never seek to rule over their husbands.

"So I remind you of what the prophet said," Jeffs says. " 'It takes a man and a woman to make a man. It takes a man and many women to make a man.' And the only real way to be a woman and fulfill your calling as a woman is to be in oneness with the priesthood bearer you will become part of."

He refers to advice from LDS Church President Brigham Young and "the great Jehovah" about the need for a woman to desire only her husband and to let him rule over her.

Jeffs also makes this observation: "I remind you that Priesthood government is persuasion through love. It is not force. The father, the husband, his duty is to persuade through love. Chastening is part of love, and even that is done in kindness."

Jeffs Preliminary Hearing Today (DESERET)

By Ben Winslow, Deseret Morning News

Deseret Morning News, November 21, 2006

ST. GEORGE — A judge is expected to decide today whether there is enough evidence to make polygamist leader Warren Jeffs stand trial on charges he forced a 14-year-old girl into a marriage with a 19-year-old man who is also her first cousin.

People who live on UEP Trust land look over newly subdivided property lines after a meeting in Hildale, Utah. The young woman is expected to be the prosecution's star witness when she testifies against the Fundamentalist LDS Church leader today in 5th District Court.

In court papers obtained by the Deseret Morning News on Monday, prosecutors revealed the identity of the young woman and her purported husband. Until now, she has been identified only as "Jane Doe IV."

The Deseret Morning News does not name sexual assault victims, nor is the newspaper naming the alleged rapist because he has not been charged with a crime.

Washington County Attorney Brock Belnap said he intends to prove that Jeffs "enticed (the victim) into submitting to sexual intercourse" with the man she had just married.

"In this case, the defendant did not have sex with (the victim). However, (the victim) submitted to sex with her purported husband because of the undue influence and religious authority of the defendant," Belnap wrote in a memorandum.

Belnap said no marriage license was ever obtained for the wedding presided over by Jeffs. The quickie ceremony was conducted in secret at a Caliente, Nev., motel in 2001.

Even if she wasn't legally married, prosecutors said the victim believed she was married and had sex with her purported husband because "she believed it was her responsibility as a wife."

Jeffs, 50, is charged with two counts of rape as an accomplice, a first-degree felony. He faces up to life in prison if convicted.

Defense lawyers have fired back, asking a judge to dismiss the case against the Fundamentalist LDS Church leader. Defense attorney Walter Bugden Jr. says the state is confusing the culpability of the alleged rapist and Jeffs.

"The state alleges that the victim did not consent to sexual intercourse with the principal and bases its allegations on the actions of the defendant (Jeffs) i.e., that he used psychological manipulation and his position as a religious leader to gain her consent," Bugden wrote in a motion to dismiss obtained by the Deseret Morning News.

Citing a series of case histories, he attacked the prosecution's claims by saying Jeffs did not "command, encourage or intentionally aid" the alleged rapist in having sex with his purported wife.

"Moreover, merely by acting as the community's religious leader, the Defendant (Jeffs) did not affirmatively act to request, command, encourage or intentionally aid the principal in enticing or coercing the alleged victim," Bugden wrote, concluding Jeffs was not an accomplice to a rape.

Washington County sheriff's deputies said security at the 5th District Courthouse today will be intense for both Jeffs and "Jane Doe IV." Outside the courthouse, the St. George Police Department plans to deploy its SWAT team.

"It's not for him," said St. George Police Sgt. Craig Harding. "It's his detractors, it's his supporters. It's who's going to try and spring him or kill him."

DOJ_NMG_0096886

Police said they have received no threats on the victim or Jeffs, who continues to exercise his authority as FLDS leader from the Purgatory Jail. A law enforcement source told the Deseret Morning News that Jeffs makes phone calls from the jail to groups of followers, who sing to him, and he goes into his "prophetic utterances."

At least one edict that Jeffs has made could have a substantial impact on the people in the polygamous border towns of Hildale, Utah, and Colorado City, Ariz.

"Do not sign your name to any document for property that has already been consecrated to God," Jeffs reportedly told his followers concerning reforms to the FLDS Church's financial arm.

At a meeting in Hildale, dozens packed the tiny town hall to ask questions about the recent court-ordered reforms of the United Effort Plan Trust. The UEP controls homes, businesses and land in the towns.

Bruce Wisan, the court-appointed special fiduciary of the UEP, tried to explain how things would work under the new reforms, including the potential for private property ownership. Applications to petition the new UEP advisory board for property were handed out.

"I sincerely hope that the time will come, either through a change in leadership or a change in thinking of leadership, that the FLDS will participate in this process," he said.

So far they have not, even refusing to pay property taxes unless demand notices are posted on their doors.

Many of those attending the town hall meeting are ex-FLDS members with family still inside the polygamous sect. They also put their blood, sweat and tears into building up the community and objected to the idea of paying fees for the land.

"The property's already paid for," said one man. "Why do we have to pay if we already own it? We paid for it for 67 years."

In 2005, a judge in Salt Lake City's 3rd District Court took control of the UEP, after allegations were brought forward that Jeffs and other top FLDS leaders had been "fleecing" the trust.

Wisan said he plans to be in the courtroom today to hear the victim, "Jane Doe IV," testify against Jeffs. She has also filed a multimillion-dollar lawsuit against the UEP.

Polygamists Fight To Be Seen As Part Of Mainstream Society (WP)

By John Pomfret, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, November 21, 2006

SALT LAKE CITY -- In her battle to legalize polygamy, the only thing Valerie hasn't revealed is her last name. The mother of eight has been on national TV; her photo along with that of her two "sister-wives" has graced the front cover of a glossy magazine dedicated to "today's plural marriages."

She has been prodded about her sex life: "He rotates. It's easy -- just one, two, three." Quizzed about her decision to share a husband with two other women: "You really have a good frame of reference when you marry a man who already has two wives." Interrogated about what it's like to live in a house with 21 children: "Remodeling a kitchen, that's no small feat with three wives and a husband involved."

All the while, the petite brunette with a smile as bright as Utah's sky has insisted that she's just like you and me: "I'm a soccer mom. My kids are in music lessons. They go to public school. I'm not under anyone's control."

Valerie and others among the estimated 40,000 men, women and children in polygamous communities are part of a new movement to decriminalize bigamy. Consciously taking tactics from the gay-rights movement, polygamists have reframed their struggle, choosing in interviews to de-emphasize their religious beliefs and focus on their desire to live "in freedom," according to Anne Wilde, director of community relations for Principle Voices, a pro-polygamy group based in Salt Lake.

In recent months, polygamy activists have held rallies, appeared on nationally televised news shows and lobbied legislators. Before the Nov. 7 elections, one pro-polygamy group issued a six-page analysis of all Utah's state and local candidates and their views on polygamy. "We can make a difference," the group told supporters.

The efforts of Valerie and scores of others like her are paying off. Utah's attorney general, Mark L. Shurtleff, no longer prosecutes bigamy between consenting adults, though it is a felony. Shurtleff and his staff have established an organization, Safety Net, to bring together at monthly meetings representatives from at least five polygamous communities and law enforcement officers. He has arranged to have representatives of polygamous groups address Utah police. And three years ago, he wrote legislation to reduce bigamy between adults from a felony to a misdemeanor, although pressure from Utah's county attorneys derailed that.

In an interview, Shurtleff, a tall man who favors roomy suits and dark green shirts, said his office now treats bigamy between consenting adults much like fornication or adultery, laws about which are still on Utah's books.

"The thinking is this: This is a big group of people. They are not going away. You can't incarcerate them all. You can't drive them out of the state. So they are here," Shurtleff said. "What do we do about it?"

DOJ_NMG_0096887

In their quest to decriminalize bigamy, practitioners have had help from unlikely quarters. HBO's series "Big Love," about a Viagra-popping man with three wives, three sets of bills, three sets of chores and three sets of kids, marked a watershed because of its sympathetic portrayal of polygamists. The U.S. Supreme Court's 2003 decision in Lawrence v. Texas, which voided laws criminalizing sodomy, also aided polygamy's cause because it implied that the court disapproved of laws that reach into the bedroom.

Since then, liberal legal scholars, generally no friend of the polygamists' conservative-leaning politics, have championed decriminalization. One of them is Jonathan Turley, a law professor at George Washington University who has written two op-eds for USA Today calling for the legalization of bigamy -- and same-sex marriage.

"I find polygamy an offensive practice," said Turley, who has become something of a celebrity among polygamists in Utah. "But there is no way its practice among consenting adults should be a felony."

What Shurtleff has vowed to do in Utah, rather than enforcing the bigamy code, is go after members of polygamist groups who break other laws, especially involving children. In April, Washington County prosecutors in Utah charged Warren Jeffs, the 50-year-old head of the Fundamentalist Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, with two first-degree felony counts of rape as an accomplice on suspicion that he forced a 14-year-old girl to marry her first cousin, who was over 18. Jeffs, who was apprehended during a traffic stop in Las Vegas in August, is facing similar charges in Arizona. His next court appearance is Tuesday.

Shurtleff's office has also moved to dismantle a communal property trust owned by Jeffs's sect in Hildale, Utah, and Colorado City, Ariz. His office also is investigating the Kingston family, including seven brothers accused of incest who are thought to have fathered more than 600 children, informed sources said.

Shurtleff has secured commitments from four polygamist groups that they would abandon the practice of forcing underage girls into marriage, end the widespread practice of welfare fraud and create a more favorable environment for women in plural marriages to report domestic violence and child abuse.

"The things I am going after are crimes against children, rape and other types of abuse where there is a clear victim," he said. Shurtleff persuaded Utah's legislature to pass a specific law in 2003 on child bigamy, making it a second-degree felony punishable by one to 15 years in prison for a married adult to take as a second spouse anyone under 18.

Polygamy has deep roots in Utah's history and in the history of the Church of the Latter-day Saints. Many mainstream Mormons once believed, and many fundamentalists still believe, that only men in plural marriages will get to heaven. But, to ensure Utah would get statehood, the Mormon Church swore off polygamy in the 1890s.

Even so, polygamous communities continued to exist through the American West and in Canada and Mexico. And in recent years, authorities in the state adopted a "don't ask, don't tell" stance, Shurtleff said.

One reason was that the politically powerful Mormon Church, while officially opposing polygamy, did not want the bad press strict enforcement might bring. Another reason was that law enforcement was worried that isolated polygamist communities would erupt in violence if raided. An internal memo at the Arizona attorney general's office in 2002 spoke of a "Waco-level problem" among the polygamous communities along the Utah state line.

Shurtleff said he decided to confront polygamy's darker side and leave the more mainstream communities alone. In 2001, one of Utah's best-known polygamists, Tom Green, was prosecuted for and convicted of child rape for having sex with his first wife when she was 13.

"That's what really started my focus on this," Shurtleff said. "We can't really allow crimes to be committed against children in the name of religion."

Some polygamists said they welcome Shurtleff's prosecutions.

"Jeffs needed to be stopped," said Bonnie, a 20-something in a polygamist marriage who, like Valerie, declined to give her last name. (She said she has lost three jobs because of her polygamous background.) "I am glad they are prosecuting him."

Bonnie, along with her husband, Nat, and his first wife and their three children, are members of the Apostolic United Brethren, which says it has 7,500 members across the West and in Mexico. Bonnie's family lives in a suburban subdivision containing about 50 houses -- all inhabited by members of the sect. Bonnie's family has been polygamous since the 1860s. Nat was raised in a monogamous household but converted to Mormonism and decided to become a fundamentalist and a polygamist.

Bonnie said that what attracted her to polygamy was the chance it gave her to bond with women as well as with her husband.

"I always had an inner feeling that I'd be a plural wife," she said. "I was very excited to join his family. I had a really good feeling with his first wife."

DOJ_NMG_0096888

Nat said he needed to be convinced. Far from the stereotype of the patriarch, he appears bookish and perhaps a tad meek. "Usually the women tend to be the biggest advocates of this way of life and men enter it more timidly," he said. "If you are going to do it right, it's a huge responsibility."

Motel Room Was Often Site Of Polygamist Rites (AP)

By Jennifer Dobner, The Associated Press

AP, November 21, 2006

CALIENTE, Nev. — Room 15 at the Caliente Hot Springs Motel seems like an unlikely place for a wedding. There are no flower-covered arbors, pews or candles. It is an apartment-style room with a kitchenette, a bed, a dresser, a table and a couch.

But it was in Room 15 that dozens of weddings took place between underage girls and men from a polygamist sect, church insiders say.

The sect's charismatic leader, Warren Jeffs, has been charged with rape as an accomplice for his alleged role in arranging one of those marriages — that of a 14-year-old girl who says she was forced to wed her older first cousin in 2001.

Jeffs, the 50-year-old leader of the Fundamentalist Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, will be in a Utah court today for a hearing on whether prosecutors have enough evidence to try him. If he is tried and convicted, the man whom about 10,000 followers revere as a prophet could spend the rest of his life in prison.

Jeffs was captured in a traffic stop outside Las Vegas in August after nearly two years on the run. He was one of the nation's 10 most wanted fugitives.

According to authorities, the bride, identified in court papers as Jane Doe No. 4, stood dressed in white in Room 15 and said, "I do," sealing the marriage with a secret handshake. Prosecutors say the marriage was then consummated in Hildale, Utah, where members of the sect live.

The girl told Jeffs she didn't want to marry and later begged to be released from the union, saying she did not like marital relations, authorities said. But Jeffs said the marriage was her religious duty and threatened her with the loss of salvation, according to authorities.

The FLDS claims to be a fundamentalist offshoot of the Mormon church. But the Mormons disavow any connection and renounced polygamy more than a century ago.

Jeffs' attorneys have not responded to requests for interviews. But at a hearing in September, attorney Walter Bugden said Jeffs believes he is being persecuted for his religious beliefs.

Carolyn Jessop, a former sect member who used to run the motel, said that once or twice a month, beginning in the spring of 1999, she would get a telephone call telling her to plan for a weekend of weddings. Some insiders say as many as 10 such weddings were held in a single day.

The drive to Caliente from Hildale is 160 miles, most of it on a two-lane road through the mountains and across the desert.

But sect leaders believed Caliente was a safe place — "a way to go under the radar screen" — because Utah and Arizona were passing legislation to address underage marriage and threatening prosecution, Jessop said.

Many sect members live in Hildale or in neighboring Colorado City, Ariz.

Many DNA Matches Aren't Acted On (USAT)

By Richard Willing

USA Today, November 21, 2006

In a March 2003 speech arguing for $1 billion in new spending on DNA-based crime fighting, then-attorney general John Ashcroft singled out the FBI's DNA database for its many successes.

In Virginia, for example, he said authorities “have been able to solve 90 homicides and 196 non-homicide sexual assaults” by matching the DNA left at crime scenes to the DNA of prior offenders.

What Ashcroft didn't explain was that a DNA match — a crime “solved” by the FBI's database — does not mean that an arrest was made, that a criminal was prosecuted or even that detectives considered a case closed. Just how many DNA matches lead to an arrest isn't known; no government agency keeps track.

But a USA TODAY investigation found almost three dozen cases during the past five years — including a rape in Virginia — in which investigators failed to pursue potential suspects whose DNA matched evidence found at crime scenes.

DNA matches that could have closed cases weren't pursued because of basic police foul-ups, such as overlooking a telephone message reporting the match. Backlogs of unsolved “cold cases” that threaten to overwhelm some big-city police departments caused matches to be ignored, the newspaper found. In some jurisdictions — Richmond, Va., Cincinnati, and DeKalb County, Ga. — police offered no explanations for why matches were not pursued.

DOJ_NMG_0096889

The suspects in two such cases, one a rape and the other the attempted sexual assault of a child, were later charged with committing subsequent sex crimes that might have been prevented had the first DNA match been pursued.

In one of those cases, William Orlando Smith followed a 13-year-old girl home from a convenience store, dragged her into a wooded area beside a middle school and raped her — months after Virginia authorities matched Smith's DNA to a previously unsolved rape, and Richmond police failed to take action. Had the first match been pursued in 2002, Smith might have been in jail in October 2003 and unable to commit the second rape.

Smith was caught and convicted for raping the 13-year-old — by a DNA database match that police in Chesterfield County, Va., immediately pursued.

The FBI calls the DNA database CODIS, for Combined DNA Index System. It has cost the government hundreds of millions of dollars to build and has proved adept at making matches in "cold cases" in which police had no leads and little hope of finding a suspect. Its dozens of successes include clearing innocent suspects, bringing rapists to justice 30 years after their offenses, and linking burglars to murders, rapes and other violent crimes in which they never were suspects.

USA TODAY reviewed hundreds of pages of court documents and local media reports and interviewed police, prosecutors, defense attorneys and lab officials to look for cases in which matches were made but police departments were slow to react.

Among the cases the newspaper found:

·In Oakland, Calif., in June 2004, the DNA of convicted child molester Kalonji Lee matched DNA from an attempted sexual assault of a 10-year-old Oakland girl the previous January. Police did not contact Lee until after he had molested another Oakland 10-year-old in December 2004, deputy chief Howard Jordan confirms. Lee was caught for the second assault after the victim's parents spotted his picture on California's "Megan's Law" website and alerted detectives.

·In September 2004, the DNA of career felon Gary Box matched DNA left at a December 2001 rape and abduction that Cincinnati police had been unable to solve. At the time of the match, Box was serving a prison sentence for assault. But police did not contact him until May 2005, after he had been released from prison and had returned to Cincinnati. Court files show that police acted after being alerted by Box's victim, who encountered him by chance while walking in a local park.

·In Georgia in March 2003, the DNA of convicted burglar and sex offender Floyd "Tony" Arnold matched DNA left at separate rapes in Fulton and DeKalb Counties. The rapes had taken place in 1993 and 1995. But neither Fulton nor DeKalb authorities contacted Arnold, according to both police departments, even though at the time of the matches he was in Georgia's prison system serving a five-year sentence for cruelty to children. The unpursued matches came to light last December, when Arnold was matched through a third DNA hit to a 1981 Cobb County rape for which another man had been wrongly convicted. That man, Robert Clark, Jr., had served almost 24 years in prison.

·In 2002, the Oregon state police crime lab used DNA to match 26 men to unsolved Portland burglaries. The names were reported to Portland police, department spokesman Detective Paul Dolbey acknowledges. None was followed until one of the 26 suspects was matched again to an additional burglary, and lab technicians pointed out the earlier matches.

The unpursued matches had this in common: All were recorded as "hits" by the CODIS system and added to the list of CODIS-aided investigations that the FBI makes public. Through September, the FBI counted 39,291 such matches since 1990.

No one is certain how many of those matches resulted in arrests or convictions, however.

In part that's because no law or regulation requires crime labs, the FBI or local law enforcement to follow through and determine what becomes of DNA matches after the CODIS system reports them to police.

Crime lab officials believe hundreds more matches have not been pursued by authorities. They say those matches might become evident only after a perpetrator is caught for a second crime.

"How many (CODIS matches) don't get pursued and we never find out about it? That's the part of the iceberg that's under water," says Roger Kahn, forensic biologist for the Harris County, Texas, medical examiner's office, and a former president of the American Society of Crime Laboratory Directors. "I've got to believe it's a pretty big iceberg."

Early on, the developers of CODIS realized that requiring labs to monitor what police do with the matches would be burdensome. The International Association of Chiefs of Police estimates that there are about 18,000 different local, state and federal law enforcement agencies in the U.S.

"That would have meant tracking information through hundreds of different local authorities and judicial systems, some of which might take years to resolve a case (based on a DNA match)," says John Hicks, director of the FBI's laboratory division when CODIS was developed in the early 1990s. "It didn't seem feasible."

Instead, the bureau decided to measure success by "investigations aided." These include cases in which DNA from a crime scene matches a potential suspect, as well as cases in which DNA matches one unsolved crime to another. Lab technicians, not detectives, determine whether a match has "aided" an investigation.

The FBI says it is unfair to hold CODIS accountable for what happens to the "investigative leads" after they are furnished to investigators.

DOJ_NMG_0096890

Labs that make CODIS matches send written reports and sometimes follow up with telephone calls and e-mails.

CODIS "was not designed … to answer" whether matches actually solve crimes through arrests and prosecutions, says Thomas Callaghan, the leader of the FBI's CODIS unit. "What we can do is provide information to investigators that can lead to an arrest or a prosecution."

Today, 16 years after CODIS began as a pilot project in the FBI laboratory, the lack of data on how many matches are pursued makes assessing the system impossible.

CODIS "is a black box," says Frederick Bieber, a geneticist at Brigham and Women's Hospital in Boston who wrote about unpursued DNA matches in The Journal of Law, Medicine and Ethics this year. "You can talk about DNA matches all you want, but the reality is no one really knows what's out there."

That uncertainty, however, hasn't stopped public officials from boasting of its successes or securing millions of taxpayer dollars to grow the system.

The original mission statement for CODIS, still carried on the FBI's website, describes it as "an effective tool for solving violent crime." CODIS' "underlying concept," then-FBI lab director Dwight Adams told a U.S. Senate hearing in May 2002, was to "solve crimes for which there are no suspects."

CODIS prospered. Both the Clinton administration in the 1990s and the Bush administration in this decade backed federal grants that expanded lab capacity, DNA research and testing designed to expand the number of offenders, and unsolved cases whose DNA profiles are included in CODIS.

Since fiscal year 2000, the Justice Department has made about $286 million in grants that have directly or indirectly benefited the system. Bieber, the Boston geneticist who has studied unpursued matches, estimates that state and federal governments have spent at least $1 billion building the system.

And CODIS has grown. In October 1998, when the FBI ended its pilot project and made CODIS a permanent program, the system held DNA profiles of about 1 million convicted offenders, according to bureau records. The database now includes more than 3.6 million samples, most added in the past five years. The number of "investigations aided" is growing with the database. In March 2001, CODIS had made about 2,200 such matches. The number doubled in the next year, quadrupled by April 2004, and has more than doubled again since then, to 39,291 such matches.

When pursued, such matches are "overwhelming, flabbergasting," says David Scoville, a Canandaigua, N.Y., man whose 28-year-old daughter Patty was raped and murdered on a Stowe, Vt., bike path in October 1991. More than 13 years later, a DNA profile from the crime scene matched Howard Godfrey, a 58-year-old Vermont man who had been forced to give a DNA sample after being convicted of assault. Godfrey is awaiting trial for the Scoville murder.

"Finding the man the authorities believe was Patty's killer was a huge relief," Scoville says. "Whether that makes it worth all the millions of dollars (spent building CODIS), I don't know. But it was to us."

Why do investigators fail to pursue a DNA match? In some cases, ineptitude is to blame.

In Fulton County, Ga., officers failed to retrieve a telephone message from the CODIS lab reporting the match that might have led to the arrest of sex offender Arnold, says Lyn Vaughn, spokeswoman for prosecutor Paul Howard, who investigated the foul-up. Ted Staples, DNA section chief at the Georgia Bureau of Investigation crime lab, says a written report also was sent but that no action was taken.

In Oakland, an overworked cold case investigator received the information that child molester Lee had been matched to an attempted sex assault but failed to give it priority, says Jordan, the deputy chief.

"He had over 100 cases (to work on), but that's not an excuse," Jordan says. "We dropped the ball."

In other instances, police were not prepared to handle the wealth of leads that CODIS sometimes supplies.

In Portland, Ore., police had no system for accounting for or tracking unsolved property crimes cases that were suddenly revived by DNA matches. Reports describing DNA matches in two dozen burglary cases simply "sat on a sergeant's desk," Dolbey says.

There also is evidence, however, that CODIS is making some matches that investigators can't use.

In Richmond this year, a police department review of its first 500 CODIS cases found more than a dozen instances in which crime scene evidence was matched to a person who was clearly not a suspect, such as the owner of a home that was robbed.

Last year, an internal study by the Virginia state crime lab found that 424 of the state's first 3,000 DNA matches were not prosecuted because victims could not be found or were reluctant to testify or the evidence submitted for testing did not solve the crime. An example: a cigarette butt from a stolen car that matched the car's owner.

Other DNA matches were not pursued because the time limit for filing prosecutions had expired.

In Oakland, in at least 20% of the rape cases in which CODIS has identified a potential suspect, the victim had previously told police that she would not press charges, says Rockne Harmon, an assistant prosecutor who specializes in DNA cases.

DOJ_NMG_0096891

The evidence was analyzed anyway, Harmon says, because crime labs received state and federal funding that paid for the analysis. Police and prosecutors were not consulted, Harmon says.

"All the money (to build CODIS) has gone to the lab side," Harmon says. "Nobody ever asked the cops what they wanted or how (CODIS matches) would affect what they do."

Unpursued matches, he says, are a "shame" but not a "surprise."

What can be done to improve accountability? Callaghan, the FBI's CODIS leader, says that tracking the results of DNA matches would present a "significant task" that the FBI is not geared to undertake. He says that accounting for CODIS matches should be the responsibility of local police and prosecutors who are given match information.

Some are taking action. In Portland, Fulton County, Ga., and Oakland, Calif., all jurisdictions in which authorities overlooked DNA matches, police have begun tracking CODIS leads that were reported to detectives.

In Georgia last December, state crime lab officials sent reminders to every police chief and prosecutor whose jurisdiction had received a match report since Georgia's first CODIS hit, in 1995. Previously, CODIS matches had been reported only to detectives.

But absent a law or other requirement, it is uncertain that many other departments will follow their example.

In 2005, Virginia CODIS officials found more than a dozen instances in which local detectives and prosecutors had lost track of DNA matches that had been reported to their departments.

This year, the California District Attorneys Association asked its members to account for all of the state's 1,509 DNA matches by searching police records and court files. Through August, fewer than half had been located.

In other nations with DNA databases, accountability isn't optional.

In the United Kingdom, which has had a national database since 1995, police are required to tell the Home Office whether matches actually prove useful to resolving cases.

From 1999 through 2005, about 43% of the U.K.'s matches were relevant to criminal investigations.

Beginning in November 2006, police in Canada will be required to report DNA match outcomes. The Canadian database runs on CODIS software donated by the FBI.

Some state CODIS officials think the laboratories themselves should take the lead in following up DNA matches.

Without better data on whether the matches really solve crimes, CODIS funding is vulnerable to cost cutting, says Michael Bourke, CODIS administrator in Connecticut's state police crime lab.

"At some point, the federal government is going to want some measure other than raw hits of what the real societal impact is," Bourke says.

Because of prodding by Bourke and other officials, the Connecticut chief state's attorney's office is attempting to account for 335 CODIS matches the state has made, dating back to 1995.

A report is expected before the end of the year.

In New Orleans, Rust In The Wheels Of Justice (NYT)

By Christopher Drew

The New York Times, November 21, 2006

NEW ORLEANS — Seventeen months ago, when Edward Augustine was arrested with what the police said were marijuana and crack cocaine in his pocket and a handgun in his waistband, he seemed like just another run-of-the-mill drug suspect: easy to prosecute, easy to lock up.

But two months later, the floodwaters rushed through the labyrinth of evidence rooms in the courthouse basement here, scattering tens of thousands of items and leaving a fetid mess. When Mr. Augustine finally came to trial in October, the authorities could no longer find the three things they needed most: the small bag of marijuana, the rocks of crack and the gun. The judge threw out the case, and Mr. Augustine walked free.

As the judge, Lynda Van Davis, put it, Mr. Augustine, 18, had lucked out. But he is not the only lucky defendant in New Orleans. As the city's criminal justice system slowly gears back up after Hurricane Katrina, as many as 500 defendants, mostly in drug, theft and assault cases, have been freed because of problems with evidence, including difficulty in finding the witnesses who have moved away.

Law-enforcement officials say a few of those who were freed could potentially be violent, a cause for concern in a city battling a surge in drug-related killings. And some judges say that missing witnesses and damaged evidence, like spoiled DNA samples and rusted guns, will almost certainly lead to more acquittals, even in cases of murder, rape and armed robbery.

"It's amazing that for every case I've walked into lately, there's evidence missing," said Rick Tessier, a defense lawyer.

Several judges have jettisoned cases like Mr. Augustine's over the last few weeks. And in acquitting him, Judge Van Davis chastised prosecutors for going ahead without the drugs or the gun.

DOJ_NMG_0096892

"This is ridiculous, absolutely ridiculous," she said from the bench.

But the district attorney, Eddie Jordan, responded in an interview, "We can't just tuck our tails between our legs and run just because it's difficult."

Mr. Jordan said that under state law, testimony from the arresting officer, and a laboratory report that confirmed Mr. Augustine had possessed illegal drugs, should have been enough to convict him. He added that although the evidence problems might seem to be "an Achilles' heel," he did not think "that the overwhelming problems that some of the critics have speculated about have materialized."

While 800 suspects have pleaded guilty to various crimes since the New Orleans courts reopened in June, only about 90 trials have been held, about a third the normal number. More than 2,000 people arrested before Hurricane Katrina are still waiting for their cases to be heard, and at least 400 of them remain in jail. And 1,500 cases have been temporarily set aside because the defendants, who were out on bond, apparently evacuated and never returned.

Court officials say other delays have come from a shortage of jurors and from limits on how many inmates can be brought to court each day. And the public defender's office is so overwhelmed that it is recruiting law students from across the country to conduct interviews with long-neglected clients who cannot afford a lawyer.

But a growing source of delays and acquittals has been the lack of witnesses and evidence.

After Hurricane Katrina hit in August 2005, the evidence rooms at the Orleans Parish Criminal District Court sat in chest-high water for two and a half weeks. Only recently have court officials begun to realize the extent of the evidence problems within the old Beaux-Arts courthouse, which was closed for nine months and is still not quite back to full operations.

Warren E. Spears, the clerk in charge of the evidence rooms, said in an interview that before the storm only about 10 percent of the hundreds of thousands of items had been sealed in plastic bags. The rest were in paper bags and scrap boxes holding clothes, guns and drugs, some of which disintegrated in the swirling waters, Mr. Spears said, dumping their contents into heaps on the floor.

Clothing from murder and assault cases took "a brutal beating," Mr. Spears said. Photo lineup cards used to identify suspects stuck together and could not be separated. Stacks of assault weapons turned to rust, he said, and holes had to be punched in duffel bags filled with rotting marijuana to let the water out.

The court hired a cleanup contractor to gather the evidence, clean off the mold and place it in plastic bags and fresh boxes. Court officials have estimated that 8 percent to 10 percent of the evidence was a total loss.

Mr. Spears added that a number of the workers spoke little English, and that he could only gesture to them as they guessed which items should be packaged together.

Water also seeped into safes, he said, rotting a great deal of paper money that had to be freeze-dried to remove the moisture.

At separate police evidence rooms nearby, some DNA samples for rape and murder cases were held for months without refrigeration, possibly ruining their usefulness, other officials said.

Given shortages in staffing, the condition of the evidence comes to light only as each case approaches trial.

The problems are starting to make life easier for the city's defense lawyers.

Pamela R. Metzger, a member of a state board that oversees the public defender's office, said she had learned about the evidence problems after asking Mr. Spears about a suspected crack pipe that was missing in one of her cases. Ms. Metzger, who is also a law professor at Tulane University, said she was urging the public defense lawyers, who handle the vast majority of the court's cases, to raise more challenges about the condition of the evidence and how it had been handled.

"I think you'll see more and more and more of that," she said.

Mr. Jordan, the district attorney, said his office had taken the lead in dismissing 400 to 500 cases recently, mainly because crucial witnesses, like the victims or the arresting officers, had moved away.

"Many of my prosecutors had held on to those cases until the last minute in hopes that we'd be able to go to trial," he said. "But I thought that if we had not been able to contact the victim since before the storm, then it was unlikely we'd be able to reach them now."

Mr. Jordan also said his office had won about 60 percent of the roughly 90 trials since the courts reopened. While several judges have been tough, others recently convicted suspects on cocaine and burglary charges even though the physical evidence had been lost, he said.

Of one recent jury case, he said: "We weren't certain we had the same gun from the crime scene. But we were able to find a gun that fit the description. And we found a photo of the original gun, and the jury found the defendant guilty as charged."

Still, Mr. Jordan said he had recently hired a former federal prosecutor to assess the strength of the 2,000 pre-hurricane cases to see how many more should be dropped.

DOJ_NMG_0096893

Mr. Tessier, the private defense lawyer, said he had recently taken on a widely publicized murder case in which his client and another man were charged with stabbing a Tulane student in 2002.

The lawyer said the files had indicated that an important piece of evidence was a shirt stained with a drop of his client's blood. But Mr. Tessier said that neither Mr. Spears nor the New Orleans Police Department, which is temporarily storing evidence in rental trucks, had been able to find the shirt.

Katherine Mattes, another Tulane law professor, said the lost or damaged evidence could also make it harder for innocent people to shake off charges filed against them. She said, for instance, that a rusted gun might no longer fire, making it impossible to conduct new ballistic tests that might show it could not have been used in a murder.

"What people say when you describe all the evidence problems is how terrible it will be if we have people who committed crimes and can't be prosecuted," she said. "But it also can work the other way."

A Good Chief Goes (WP)

The Washington Post, November 21, 2006

NEWS THAT Mayor-elect Adrian M. Fenty has decided to turn to someone else to head the D.C. police department comes as no surprise. For some time, Mr. Fenty and D.C. Police Chief Charles H. Ramsey have not seen eye to eye on the department's performance, a fact that Mr. Fenty never kept secret. Under the circumstances, and given the incoming mayor's determination to be hands-on with the police force and other city agencies, it probably is best that he have a person of his choice leading the department when the Fenty administration gets started on Jan. 2.

The departure of Chief Ramsey is, however, a development that many District residents and this page receive with regret. The D.C. police force that the chief bequeaths to his successor is in far better shape than the one Mr. Ramsey inherited upon his arrival in Washington eight years ago. The credit goes to him. As the longest-serving police chief since the start of home rule three decades ago, Chief Ramsey, the record will show, made the best use of his time. In every major category of offense -- homicides, rapes, robberies, aggravated assaults, burglaries, larcenies and vehicle thefts -- rates are down. He took a department that was loosely run and staffed with poorly trained, quick-triggered officers and converted it into a better managed and more disciplined force. From scout cars to technology, police officers now do their jobs with 21st-century resources.

There have been bumps along the way, serious missteps that cost the city dearly. The September 2002 Pershing Park incident, in which large numbers of protesters were improperly arrested and detained, stained the reputation of a department renowned for its handling of mass demonstrations in the nation's capital. It also cost the city thousands of dollars to settle lawsuits. Chief Ramsey accepted responsibility for the misbehavior, as he should have, and apologized to the city.

Mr. Fenty, in deciding to appoint police Cmdr. Cathy L. Lanier as the next chief, has drawn from within the ranks of the department. It is reassuring that Chief Ramsey spoke well of Ms. Lanier's appointment and that she also has the background and qualifications that Mr. Fenty seeks in a chief. They apparently agree on community policing, and she appears to be in sync with his leadership style. It will soon fall to the new leadership in the John A. Wilson Building and in police headquarters to maintain and expand on the advances achieved by Chief Ramsey. As for the departing chief, any police jurisdiction in the country would be fortunate to have him.

CIVIL LAW:

Lawyers Argue Validity Of '98 Online Law (AP-Y)

By Maryclaire Dale, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 21, 2006

Justice Department attorneys, defending a law aimed at keeping online pornography from minors, argued that software filters often block valid sites — on gay rights or sexual health, for example — that teens might seek out.

"Filters are hindering minors from learning about the world around them. That's a huge problem," government lawyer Joel McElvain said Monday. "There may be reasons the teenagers have problems speaking to their parents about these (issues)."

Under the 1998 Child Online Protection Act, commercial Web publishers who fail to keep material "harmful to minors" away from children could face fines and even prison time. The law has never taken effect, because of a long-running legal challenge filed by Salon.com, the Philadelphia Gay News and other groups represented by the American Civil Liberties Union.

Closing arguments concluded Monday before Senior U.S. District Judge Lowell Reed Jr., ending four weeks of testimony.

Justice attorneys evoked problems with the software filters even as they had defended their use in a 2000 law requiring schools and libraries to block porn if they receive certain federal funds. The high court upheld that law in 2003.

DOJ_NMG_0096894

Opponents say the 1998 law is overly vague and would have a chilling effect on their work. They also say it would not apply to foreign Web operators or streaming video and audio. The ACLU argues that filters are more effective than legislation, because they let parents set limits based on their own values and their children's ages.

"If you're a parent who doesn't want sexually explicit material slipping through, then set it (the filter) strictly," ACLU lawyer Chris Hansen told the judge Monday.

The U.S. Supreme Court, indicating the government was unlikely to prevail, granted the ACLU a temporary injunction in 2004.

Technology experts not involved in the case have noted that many parents now have more pressing concerns about their children's use of the Internet, such as online predators and the popularity of social-networking sites.

The Justice Department raised eyebrows as it prepared for trial when it demanded reams of privately held information from Google Inc., Yahoo Inc. (Nasdaq:YHOO - news) and other Internet companies for a study on the prevalence of online pornography.

Google fought a subpoena to turn over 1 million sample queries and 1 million Web addresses in its database, citing trade secrets. A judge sharply limited the scope of the subpoena.

The resulting study, conducted by a University of California, Berkeley statistics professor, concluded that about 1 percent of Web sites indexed by Google and Microsoft Corp. are sexually explicit and that about 6 percent of searches yield at least one explicit Web site.

Hansen said filters can be as much as 98 percent effective in blocking explicit material, even if the most stringent filters also "overblock" a large number of acceptable sites.

Congress first tried to regulate online pornography in 1996 with a law that was largely struck down by the Supreme Court the following year.

The 1998 law narrows the restrictions to commercial Web sites and defines objectionable material as obscene or that which offends "contemporary community standards."

The law, signed by then-President Clinton, requires Web site operators to prevent youngsters from seeing material harmful to children by demanding proof of age — such as a credit card number — from computer users. It would impose a $50,000 fine and six-month prison term on commercial Web site operators that allow minors to view such content.

Closing Arguments In Internet-porn Trial (PHI)

By Joseph A. Gambardello

The Philadelphia Inquirer, November 21, 2006

A never enforced federal law aimed at protecting children from Internet porn is vague, threatens free speech, and will not achieve its intended goal, opponents of the measure argued today.

But the federal government countered that the Children's Online Protection Act, known as COPA, is needed because Internet filters are not foolproof and parents cannot be expected to supervise their children's Web surfing at all times.

U.S. District Judge Lowell A. Reed Jr. heard those opposing positions as both sides made closing arguments at the end of a four-week trial in Philadelphia that had been ordered by the U.S. Supreme Court to determine whether technology developed since Congress passed COPA in 1998, such as commercially available filtering, offered effective ways to protect children.

The law would authorize jail time and heavy fines for online porn merchants who do not require adult-access codes, personal identification, or credit cards to access their Web sites.

Plaintiffs, including the American Civil Liberties Union and a group of Internet artists, merchants and magazines, maintain that having parents use Internet filters and personal control and educate children on Internet usage is the least restrictive way to protect youngsters from porn and ensure the free flow of speech online.

The government pointed to credit cards and emerging online identification services as ways to ensure that only adults - those 17 or older - are accessing Internet porn.

In his arguments today, the ACLU's Christopher Hansen said the law was confusing on what would be considered harmful to a child and that it limits enforcement to sites using the hypertext transfer protocol, or http, just one of the applications through which information is transmitted on the Internet.

Half the Internet's porn sites also are based outside the United States and therefore out of the law's reach, Hansen said.

He asked why the federal government was not enforcing existing obscenity laws, noting that the Justice Department had prosecuted "fewer than 30 cases in the last six years."

Joel McElvain, a government lawyer, countered that sexually explicit material for adults that does not violate obscenity laws would be considered harmful to children under COPA.

DOJ_NMG_0096895

Another government lawyer, Tamara Ulrich, said it was "disingenuous" for Hansen to argue that the law singled out "http" sites because the ACLU had succeeded in overturning an earlier law that also targeted pornography in e-mails and chat rooms.

Both sides disagreed on who would be affected by COPA. Hansen said the plaintiffs would suffer if they had to set up age-verification systems, but the government lawyers said the law was aimed at "commercial pornography" - not sites such as those operated by the plaintiffs, which offer a range of content, including commentary, art, news and sexual advice.

And although Hansen said the case was not a question of COPA vs. filters, arguments from both sides focused on their effectiveness in blocking porn.

The government also argued that although filters can let some porn in, they can block so-called clean sites.

Reed gave both sides until Dec. 7 for final submissions.

Smokers Sue Tobacco Company For Lung Scans (LAW)

By Peter Geier, The National Law Journal

National Law Journal, November 21, 2006

A group of long-term Marlboro smokers has filed an action in federal court in New York to force Marlboro maker Philip Morris USA Inc. to give them regular low-dose CT scans to catch possible early signs of lung cancer.

The action is unusual because it seeks only medical screenings for people whose smoking habit has put them at increased risk of lung cancer, said plaintiffs attorney Jerome H. Block of Levy Phillips & Konigsberg in New York.

"The sole relief we are seeking is that Philip Morris pay for a program of CT scans," Block said. The scans should be annual, or "more frequent if something looks suspicious." He noted that a recent article in the New England Journal of Medicine suggests that such a program would increase dramatically one's chances of surviving lung cancer.

Block represents Marcia L. Caronia and four other named plaintiffs on behalf of a class of New York residents 50 years of age or older who have smoked Marlboro-brand cigarettes for at least 20 "pack years" -- an average of a pack a day for 20 years. Caronia v. Philip Morris USA Inc., No. 06-224 (E.D.N.Y.).

Generally speaking, early diagnoses of lung cancer now occur by happenstance, when doctors administering CT scans to patients with pneumonia or a broken rib, for instance, discover lesions and nodules that could be lung cancer, he said.

"CT scans for people who might have cancer typically are not covered by medical insurance," Block said. "This is for all those people out there who don't have this covered and are at increased risk of lung cancer. It's a huge issue from a public health point of view."

VIABLE LEGAL THEORY?

Block said that this action stands a good chance of survival because the class is confined to long-term smokers of a brand of Philip Morris products. But lawsuits in the past seeking medical monitoring for smokers have not succeeded.

William S. Ohlemeyer, vice president and associate general counsel of Altria Group Inc., Philip Morris' parent company, said, "Nobody is opposed to medical monitoring as a public health tool. The question is whether this is a viable legal theory that can be pursued in a lawsuit."

Although plaintiffs counsel have coined "creative and innovative theories" in this instance, "most states don't recognize medical monitoring as a remedy or cause of action. ... We expect the case to be dismissed," Ohlemeyer said.

Smokers' medical-monitoring class actions have been rejected by the majority of trial and appellate courts since the first one was filed in New Orleans federal court in 1994, according to Altria spokesman John Sorrells.

The 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals decertified a class seeking medical monitoring over variations in state law and the particulars of how a case would be tried against numerous tobacco defendants. Castano v. American Tobacco Co., 84 F.3d 734 (5th Cir. 1996).

Juries returned defense verdicts on medical-monitoring claims in the only two cases that made it to trial. Blankenship v. Brown & Williamson (In re Tobacco Litigation), No. 02-31157 (W.Va. 2004), and Scott v. The American Tobacco Co. Inc., No. 96-8461 (Orleans Parish, La., Dist. Ct.). An appeal argued last April is pending before the Louisiana 4th Circuit Court of Appeal.

Billion-Dollar BofA Ruling Struck Down (LAW)

By Justin Scheck, The Recorder

California Recorder, November 21, 2006

Earlier this year, talk about the big class action against Bank of America was all about money -- the billion dollars or so in statutory damages, the $284 million in compensatory damages, and of course the correspondingly large contingency fee due the plaintiffs lawyers.

That all changed Monday when California's 1st District Court of Appeal struck down a trial court's ruling that the bank may not withdraw Social Security funds from customer accounts to pay for overdrafts and overdraft penalties.

DOJ_NMG_0096896

In a trial presided over by San Francisco Superior Court Judge Anne Bouliane, plaintiffs lawyers James Sturdevant and Thomas Brandi had successfully argued that Bank of America's practice of debiting government benefit fees was illegal.

Central to their arguments -- and to Bouliane's jury instructions -- was a 1974 case that said a bank couldn't take public benefit money out of an account to cover a credit card debt. They said the case, Kruger v. Wells Fargo Bank, 11 Cal 3d 352, presented an analogous situation to that of lead plaintiff Paul Miller.

In 1998, after Miller had spent money that Bank of America mistakenly credited to his account, the bank withdrew money from Social Security benefits to cover the overdraft.

While the bank eventually returned the money, it repeated the pattern on two other occasions. Miller eventually sued, arguing that government-directed deposits shouldn't be subject to such seizures.

In a unanimous, 14-page opinion Monday, Justice Peter Siggins disagreed with verve.

Siggins -- joined by Justices Joanne Parrilli and William McGuiness -- said the verdict in the case was based entirely on Kruger, an opinion that prohibits using government benefits to pay debts from a separate account. In Miller, he wrote, the issue was different because overdraft fees had to do with balancing a single account.

"This is a complex and heavily regulated area more suited to legislative than judicial action, so we conclude the trial court erred by finding Kruger governs this significantly different situation," Siggins wrote.

"I think the court absolutely got it wrong," Sturdevant said. He said Kruger clearly applies to overdraft fees, since they are treated as debts, and dismissed the notion that handling the fees was a legislative issue, since the Kruger court had no qualms about ruling on the matter.

Sturdevant also chafed at Siggins' reference to a defense expert's trial testimony on the consequences a plaintiff verdict would have for the banking industry.

"It's improper fact-finding," he said. "That's the province of the trial judge, not the province of the Court of Appeal."

Walter Dellinger, the O'Melveny & Myers partner who argued the appeal for Bank of America, couldn't be reached before press time. But judging by Sturdevant's plans, it seems likely that he'll have a chance to speak about the case in the future.

"The Supreme Court is the place where this case ultimately has to be decided, because Kruger is the basis of decision for both the trial court and the Court of Appeal," Sturdevant said.

Court Rules On Internet Defamation Liability (LAT)

By Maura Dolan

The Los Angeles Times, November 21, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO -- Internet users and providers cannot be held liable for posting defamatory material written by someone else, the California Supreme Court ruled unanimously Monday.

"The prospect of blanket immunity for those who intentionally redistribute defamatory statements on the Internet has disturbing implications," Justice Carol Corrigan wrote for the court. Immunity "serves to protect online freedom of expression and to encourage self-regulation."

Monday's decision was consistent with holdings by many federal appeals courts and one other state supreme court.

"The courts are now uniform," said Ann Brick, who represented the American Civil Liberties Union of Northern California in the case.

But attorneys on both sides of the case said the California Supreme Court went further than other courts by giving immunity to all Internet users except the original author.

"What you couldn't put in your print newspaper, you can put in your Internet newspaper, " said Christopher E. Grell, who represented two doctors who said they were defamed. "The notion of fact checking and verifying things doesn't apply to the Internet."

Mark Goldowitz, the lawyer for the defendant, cited a line in the ruling that the decision brought "the law of libel from the Gutenberg era to the cyberspace era."

Unlike hard-copy publications, the Internet allows users to "immediately respond and correct any harm," Goldowitz said. "Not everyone has a printing press, but everyone can start a blog or post on a news group."

Although the court did not specifically address media Web sites, lawyers on both sides said it would protect newspapers and other media that report defamatory remarks by third parties on their Web sites but not on their pages or on air.

The decision overturned a 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ruling and threw out a lawsuit that claimed Ilena Rosenthal, a San Diego activist for breast implant victims, defamed Dr. Stephen J. Barrett and Dr. Terry Polevoy on the Web sites of two news groups.

Barrett and Polevoy operated Web sites aimed at exposing health fraud in various kinds of alternative medicine. They said Rosenthal, a supporter of alternative medicine, made the postings even after she was told they were libelous.

DOJ_NMG_0096897

Rosenthal wrote in one posting that Barrett, a retired psychiatrist in Philadelphia, was "arrogant, bizarre, closed minded; emotionally disturbed, professionally incompetent, intellectually dishonest ... a quack, a thug, a bully, a Nazi."

She similarly described Polevoy, who works in Canada, and accused him of making anti-Semitic remarks.

An Alameda County Superior Court judge threw out the doctors' lawsuit against Rosenthal, ruling that her postings involved the public interest and for the most part contained no assertions that could be proven false.

But the court determined that one statement in an article Rosenthal received from Tim Bolen subtitled "Opinion by Tim Bolen" was problematic. The article accused Polevoy of stalking a Canadian radio producer.

The trial court decided nonetheless that Rosenthal could not be held liable because she had not written the original posting. A libel case against Bolen for first making the stalking allegation is pending. Bolen describes himself as a crisis-management consultant and health advocate.

In ruling for Rosenthal, the California Supreme Court interpreted a provision of the Communications Decency Act of 1996. Although many courts have ruled on the provision, the Rosenthal case was the first in which an Internet user with no responsibility for the site carrying the posting claimed federal immunity.

The court explained that Internet defamation law differs from that of other media.

"Book, newspaper or magazine publishers are liable for defamation on the same basis as authors," Corrigan wrote. "Book sellers, news vendors or other 'distributors' ... may only be held liable if they knew or had reason to know of a publication's defamatory content."

Congress "chose to protect even the most active Internet publishers, those who take an aggressive role in republishing third party content," she wrote.

She also cited practical reasons for ruling in favor of Internet freedom. If California permitted defamation suits against those who post others' work, the state could be inundated with lawsuits.

"Adopting a rule of liability ... would be an open invitation to forum shopping by defamation plaintiffs," Corrigan wrote.

She said the threat of liability also would reduce the flow of ideas on the Internet.

"The volume and range of Internet communications make the 'heckler's veto' a real threat," Corrigan said.

Grell, who represents the doctors, said he has not yet decided whether to appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court. Noting the court twice referred to "blanket immunity" as troubling, the lawyer said Congress should now amend the law to increase Internet accountability.

Times staff writer Chris Gaither contributed to this report.

California Court Reverses Internet Liability Case (WSJ)

By Kevin J. Delaney

The Wall Street Journal, November 21, 2006

The California Supreme Court today reversed an appeals court decision in a much-watched Internet case, ruling that individuals are generally immune from liability for transmitting over the Internet content that was authored by someone else.

Legal experts say the decision1 is in line with prior court rulings on immunity for transmitting content online originating from someone else, who themselves may still be held liable for defamation or other claims.

The California court ruling came in the case of Stephen J. Barrett et al. v. Ilena Rosenthal. The case concerned an article Ms. Rosenthal received via email and posted on two Web newsgroups that the plaintiffs argued was defamatory.

"This opinion reinforces the broad reach of federal statutory immunization for content published by third-parties online," said Eric Goldman, Assistant Professor at Santa Clara University School of Law and Director of the school's High Technology Law Institute. "This case is significant because it shuts down all of the workarounds people have been trying to find."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Dems To Target Political 'Robo Calls' (USAT)

USA Today, November 21, 2006

WASHINGTON — Senate Democratic leaders say they'll push legislation next year to make it a federal crime, punishable by fines and jail time, to use automated "robo calls" and other tactics to mislead and discourage voters.

"We're going to find some way to stop this," says Sen. Harry Reid, D-Nev., the incoming majority leader.

Civil rights and watchdog groups say some voters complained this year of being barraged by automated recorded campaign calls. Though many were only annoying, some gave misleading information, directing voters to the wrong polling site or raising questions about whether a voter was registered.

DOJ_NMG_0096898

"We definitely think it's a good idea for Congress to investigate and hold hearings on these issues and to consider carefully targeted legislation focused on outright deception," said Elliot Mincberg of the liberal People for the American Way, which helped operate a national hotline for voter complaints.

Tova Wang of the Century Foundation says misinformation in flyers and calls, practices employed by Democrats and Republicans, aim to suppress voter turnout.

New York Sen. Charles Schumer, who is helping to draft Democratic legislation, plans to call for a separate division within the Justice Department to deal with such problems. Penalties could include up to 10 years in jail.

In a letter to Justice officials Thursday, Schumer said he was disappointed with the department's response to voter complaints.

Justice officials defended their record in a letter responding to Schumer, noting that investigations recently have been launched into alleged voter deception and intimidation in Arizona, Maryland, Virginia and elsewhere.

Rep. John Conyers, D-Mich., in line to be chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, also has called for federal officials to investigate complaints about "robo calls."

Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., has proposed a separate measure that would make it a crime to give voters misleading election information. Violators would be subject to fines of up to $100,000 or one-year's imprisonment or both. It would require the attorney general and federal election agencies to distribute accurate information in areas where deceptive practices were found.

Election experts say Schumer's proposal, which focuses on "robo calls," may raise concerns about freedom of speech, particularly if the calls are more annoying than misleading. "That's where you could potentially get into the First Amendment area," Mincberg said. "As irritating as 'robo calls' may be ... it raises a lot more difficult questions about the ability to regulate them."

Obama's bill focuses on cases in which there is a "clear intent for out-and-out deception."

Suburban Atlanta Police Ask DA's Office To Review Officer Shootings (AP)

By Harry R. Weber

AP, November 21, 2006

ATLANTA - Prosecutors in a suburban county will extensively review at the police chief's request 14 shootings by police, including eight that were fatal, this year following concern about the high number of killings compared to the nation's two largest cities.

Prosecutors also have received a request to investigate the death of another person who died in police custody but was not shot, and they expect to be asked later to look into four other fatal shootings by police in September and since then, Adora Andy, a spokeswoman for the DeKalb County District Attorney's Office, said Monday.

The review request comes as police released details of an internal probe into the shootings in which a police review board has found that an officer in one fatal shooting was unjustified in using deadly force. Officers involved in three nonfatal shootings were found to be unjustified. The officers in the remaining shootings through September were either found to be justified or no determination was made.

"We review all officer-involved shootings for criminal activity. He's asked us to do a more extensive review," Andy said of Police Chief Nick Marinelli.

The shootings and in-custody death review involves 15 incidents from Jan. 1 through Sept. 12, Andy said, adding that her office expects to get another request from the police department to review the police shootings since then. Police review board findings were not released about the shootings since September. A fatal police shooting that occurred Sept. 2 also was not included in the materials released Monday by police, though Andy assumed the material will be forwarded later.

Andy declined to say why the request was made. She also would not disclose what reports the chief has turned over, except to say, "We've been given everything the police review board has had."

A police spokesman did not return several calls seeking comment beyond a Police Department statement that said the DA's office investigation had been requested.

Marinelli has defended the department's actions since an Associated Press investigation published Sept. 28 showed that the nine fatal shootings this year by DeKalb County police at that time was more than even New York City had recorded and was equal to what Los Angeles police had recorded. It also was three times the number of fatal shootings DeKalb police had recorded last year.

Records obtained by AP through open records request showed that some of the department's required in-service training in the use of deadly force had been reduced, along with instruction in the use of batons.

DOJ_NMG_0096899

The toll led to an independent review of police training and use-of-force procedures by a consulting firm that found some deficiencies, including a lack of emphasis on de-escalation of tense situations. County CEO Vernon Jones said at the time that there were no widespread problems at the department.

But there have been three more fatal shootings by DeKalb police since September, and now the police chief has asked for a review by the prosecutor's office to remove any doubt that might exist in the public's mind.

"We will review the documents and we will determine the appropriate course of action," Andy said.

Action could range from doing nothing to bringing criminal charges. Andy declined to say what action will be taken.

Nationwide, justifiable killings by officers while on duty declined from 378 in 2001 to 341 last year, according to the FBI, which does not catalog fatal police shootings that are accidents or not justified.

Among the DeKalb killings this year: On Aug. 24, an officer with three years on the force shot a man who she says charged her in an apartment and tried to take her gun. The police review board has ruled that the use of deadly force in that incident was justified. On May 17, an officer with 11 years of experience shot a man inside a vehicle; the man's girlfriend said he had a gun and was suicidal. That shooting also was ruled justified by the police review board.

A young man also was killed Sept. 12 after officers went into an apartment building in search of a man wanted for questioning in an earlier shooting. There is no indication in the police report that the man, Lorenzo Matthews, was armed. One of the officers involved was determined unjustified in using deadly force, according to the police review board's findings released Monday.

One of the two officers who confronted Matthews was a 17-year department veteran who also had a role in a fatal shooting June 5. That shooting remained under review, but department policy did not prohibit the officer from returning to duty. The police statement Monday did not say if that officer was the same one who was found to be unjustified in the Sept. 12 shooting.

Officer In Taser Case Identified (LAT)

By Charles Proctor And Richard Winton, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, November 21, 2006

Terrence Duren, a 2001 UCLA officer of the year, has been the subject of two other use-of-force complaints.

The UCLA police officer videotaped last week using a Taser gun on a student also shot a homeless man at a campus study hall room three years ago and was earlier recommended for dismissal in connection with an alleged assault on fraternity row, authorities said.

UCLA police confirmed late Monday that the officer who fired the Taser gun was Terrence Duren, who has served in the university's Police Department for 18 years.

Duren, who was named officer of the year in 2001, also has been involved in several controversial incidents on campus.

In an interview with The Times on Monday night, Duren, 43, defended his record as a campus police officer and urged people to withhold judgment until the review of his Taser use is completed.

"I patrol this area the same way I would want someone to patrol the neighborhoods where I live," he said. "People make allegations against cops all the time. Saying one thing and proving it are two different things."

While he would not directly talk about why he used the Taser on the student, he said a videotape of any arrest doesn't necessarily tell the whole story.

"If someone is resisting, sometimes it's not going to look pretty taking someone into custody," he said. "If you have to use some force, it's not going to look pretty. That's the nature of this job."

A student's cellphone video of the incident has been broadcast around the world and focused much criticism on the officer.

But Duren — who was back on duty at the UCLA campus Monday night — said he can roll with these punches and wants to explain himself to students critical of his actions.

"In this line of business, you have to have a thick skin," he added. "I am proud of my service as a cop."

The incident occurred about 11 p.m. Nov. 14 in a library filled with students studying for midterm examinations.

Senior Mostafa Tabatabainejad, 23, was asked by Duren and other university police officers for his ID as part of a routine nightly procedure to make sure that everyone using the library after 11 p.m. is a student or otherwise authorized to be there.

Authorities said Tabatabainejad refused repeated requests to provide identification or to leave. The officers decided to use the Taser to incapacitate Tabatabainejad after he went limp while they were escorting him out and after he urged other library patrons to join his resistance, according to the university's account.

The video shows portions of the incident, in which Tabatabainejad can be heard screaming in pain when the Taser shocks are administered.

The tape, which has been broadcast on the YouTube website and TV newscasts, prompted widespread criticism both on campus and from outsiders. On Friday, more than 200 students held a march to the police station, while acting Chancellor

DOJ_NMG_0096900

Norman Abrams tried to quell the critics by announcing an independent investigation of the Taser use. Abrams said UCLA had received numerous e-mails and calls from concerned alumni and parents.

Tabatabainejad's attorney, Stephen Yagman, said his client was shocked five times with the Taser after he refused to show his ID because he thought he was being singled out for his Middle Eastern appearance. Tabatabainejad is of Iranian descent but is a U.S. citizen by birth and a resident of Los Angeles.

Duren said Monday that he joined the UCLA police force after being fired from the Long Beach Police Department in the late 1980s. He said he was a probationary officer at the time and was let go because of poor report-writing skills and geographical knowledge.

In May 1990, he was accused of using his nightstick to choke someone who was hanging out on a Saturday in front of a UCLA fraternity. Kente S. Scott alleged that Duren confronted him while he was walking on the street outside the Theta Xi fraternity house.

Scott sued the university, and according to court records, UCLA officials moved to have Duren dismissed from the police force. But after an independent administrative hearing, officials overturned the dismissal, suspending him for 90 days.

Duren on Monday disputed the allegations made by Scott.

In October 2003, Duren shot and wounded a homeless man he encountered in Kerckhoff Hall. Duren chased the man into a bathroom, where they struggled and he fired two shots.

The homeless man, Willie Davis Frazier, was later convicted of assaulting an officer. Duren said Frasier had tried to grab his gun during the struggle. But Frazier's attorney, John Raphling, said his client was mentally ill and didn't do anything to provoke the shooting.

It remains unclear when the independent investigation of the Taser incident will be completed. It will be headed by Merrick Bobb, a veteran watchdog of both the Los Angeles Police and Los Angeles County Sheriff's departments.

UCLA police officials said in a short statement that Duren arrived at Powell Library with Officer Alexis Bicomong. Duren "discharged the Taser," the statement said. Officers Kevin Kilgore, Andrew Ikeda and Ricardo Bolanos, and Sgt. Philip Baguliao, a supervisor, were also at the scene.

"Let the independent watchdog run its course," Duren said.

The officer said that when the probe is complete, he'd like to sit down with students, particularly Muslim student groups, to explain his actions at the library.

"I have nothing to hide."

charles.proctor@latimes.com

richard.winton@latimes.com

Federal Judge Rejects Las Vegas Ban On Feeding Homeless In Parks (AP)

By Ken Ritter, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 21, 2006

LAS VEGAS (AP) - A federal judge ruled Monday that the city cannot make it illegal to feed poor people in city parks.

U.S. District Court Judge Robert Jones issued an injunction prohibiting enforcement of a City Council ordinance passed in July that prohibits "providing food or meals to the indigent for free or for a nominal fee" in a city park and defines indigent as a person whom a reasonable ordinary person would believe to be entitled to public assistance.

Las Vegas Mayor Oscar Goodman said handouts discourage homeless people from seeking help from social service providers set up to handle mental health and substance abuse problems. Neighbors had complained of large numbers of homeless people congregating at downtown parks, drawn by groups providing meals.

Jones told lawyers for the city and the American Civil Liberties Union of Nevada that he intends to issue an order killing the measure. No date was set for final action.

"The judge said you can't just ban providing food to people who look poor," said Lee Rowland, the ACLU lawyer who argued the case. She said the key fault in the city ordinance was that it made distinctions among people based on their appearance.

Las Vegas officials vowed to rewrite the law to pass constitutional muster.

"The main thing is to make sure these people get professional care," Goodman said of homeless and indigent people he said "deserve to be in service centers and with faith-based groups."

"I know I'm right on this one," Goodman added. "We just have to get the law in shape."

City lawyer Brad Jerbic said "tweaking" the existing ordinance might be enough to help it pass judicial review.

"We didn't outlaw vagrancy, indigency or homelessness," Jerbic said, adding that the possible fine of up to $1,000 was designed to discourage behavior, not punish people.

DOJ_NMG_0096901

"What we did is make it an offense to set up a mobile soup kitchen in a park, attracting large numbers of indigents and stranding them without any social services," Jerbic said.

Gary Peck, ACLU executive director in Las Vegas, said he was disturbed by city arguments that he said suggested homeless and indigent people constitute an unsightly problem that should be kept from public view.

"The city says, 'Poor people are different from the rest of us, we need to control them or we will be overrun by them and they will ruin things for the rest of us,'" Peck said. "That shows a profound misunderstanding of basic constitutional principles."

Since the ordinance took effect several summonses have been handed out by city marshals at parks in the downtown area, several miles from the Las Vegas Strip.

One municipal court judge tossed out a misdemeanor case against a California activist last month and called the ordinance unconstitutionally vague. That judge said the measure denied equal protection of the law to all citizens.

A final ruling by Jones in the case, Sacco vs. City of Las Vegas, is expected to affect several similar cases currently pending in municipal court.

An Opening On Abortion? (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, November 21, 2006

If both parties combine wisdom with shrewdness, the election of a new congressional majority should open the way for a better approach to the abortion question.

The bitter political brawling of the past three decades has created an unproductive stalemate that leaves abortion opponents frustrated, abortion rights supporters in a constant state of worry and the many Americans who hold middle-ground positions feeling that there is no one who speaks for them.

But the politics of abortion began to change even before this month's elections. In September, a group of 23 pro-choice and pro-life Democratic House members introduced what they called the Reducing the Need for Abortion and Supporting Parents Act.

Okay, it's not the catchiest title, but you get the point. The bill -- its sponsor is Rep. Tim Ryan (D-Ohio), an abortion opponent, with Rep. Rosa DeLauro (D-Conn.), an abortion rights supporter, a leading co-sponsor -- took a lot of negotiation. Supporters of abortion rights tend to favor programs that encourage effective contraception, which some in the right-to-life movement oppose. Opponents of abortion emphasize helping women who want to carry their children to term.

The Ryan bill, one of several congressional initiatives to reduce the abortion rate, does both. It includes a remarkably broad set of programs aimed at reducing teen pregnancy, promoting contraception and encouraging parental responsibility. But it also includes strong measures to offer new mothers full access to health coverage, child care and nutrition assistance.

The public debate usually ignores the fact that abortion rates are closely tied to income. As the Guttmacher Institute has reported, "the abortion rate among women living below the federal poverty level . . . is more than four times that of women above 300 percent of the poverty level." The numbers are stark: 44 abortions per 1,000 women in the lower income group, 10 abortions per 1,000 women in the higher income group.

In other words: If you truly care about reducing the number of abortions, you have to care about the well-being of poor women.

There are moral and practical reasons for members of both parties, and combatants on both sides of the abortion question, to embrace this approach.

Liberal supporters of abortion rights should be eager to promote a measure that does not make abortion illegal but does embrace goals, including help for the poor, that liberals have long advocated.

In the meantime, the victories that opponents of abortion rights have won do little to reduce the number of abortions. As Rachel Laser, director of the Third Way Culture Project, points out, even those who would ban late-term or "partial-birth" abortions need to acknowledge that very few are performed, meaning that these laws do little to reduce the overall abortion rate. According to one study cited by Laser, only 0.08 percent of abortions are performed in the third trimester.

Parental consent laws affect fewer than a fifth of all abortions, those obtained by teenagers 17 or younger, and it is not clear how many abortions these measures stop, since studies suggest that many parents favor rather than oppose abortion in such circumstances.

Why shouldn't both sides embrace broader steps that, without coercion, could cut the abortion rate by much larger numbers? We know this is possible because it has already happened: Between 1994 and 2000, the abortion rate fell by 11 percent. An ambitious national effort could do more.

DOJ_NMG_0096902

There is also the politics of the issue. In her study, Laser points to a group she calls the "abortion grays," i.e., the six voters in 10 who do not see the issue in black-and-white terms. This group tilts pro-choice but does not believe abortion should always be either legal or illegal.

For Democrats, this means taking into account that while most of the new members they elected this month favor abortion rights, the party's freshmen include strong opponents of abortion -- among them Sen.-elect Bob Casey (D-Pa.) and about a half-dozen new House members. Democrats are a party with a pro-choice majority, a significant pro-life minority and a lot of grays.

Republicans are the more antiabortion party but include many pro-choice voters and grays in their ranks. They face a broadly pro-choice country and now have to battle a right-wing image that drove so many independents and moderates to the Democrats.

Taking substantial steps to reduce the abortion rate will not settle the larger ethical argument over the practice. But it could show that politicians are capable of living up to their highest calling, which is to seek practical forms of moral seriousness.

ANTITRUST:

Muni Cloud Hovers Over Investors (WSJ)

By John Connor

The Wall Street Journal, November 21, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The latest outcropping of suspected U.S. municipal-bond-related abuses, including bid-rigging on guaranteed investment contracts used in some muni transactions, has cast a cloud of potential taxability on billions of dollars of bonds sold to investors as tax-exempt securities.

One federal official familiar with the situation said the amount of bonds in question remains to be determined but that a conservative estimate could be between $10 billion to $15 billion. He added that the final tally likely will be far larger than that.

Wide-ranging criminal and civil probes of suspected muni-related illegality are now under way, with the U.S. Justice Department's Antitrust Division and the Securities and Exchange Commission investigating suspected violations unearthed initially by the Internal Revenue Service. A number of firms, including leading providers of guaranteed investment contracts, or GICs, have received federal subpoenas recently.

The IRS's probe of bid-rigging on GICs -- which are insurance contracts that pay a fixed interest rate over a set period of time, and are often used in retirement plans and in connection with certain muni deals -- has been under way for some time. In early 2005, Mark Scott, then head of the IRS's muni enforcement program, said that "we have a lot of evidence pointing to bid-rigging for GICs in municipal-bond transactions."

While the spotlight of the federal investigations has been on suspected antitrust violations, including price-fixing on bond insurance, the bond transactions under scrutiny also present tax issues by virtue of the suspected diversion of arbitrage profits away from the federal government to participants in the bond deals.

Arbitrage profits, which are earned in the muni market by investing tax-exempt bond proceeds in high-yielding obligations, are supposed to be rebated to the Treasury. Arbitrage abuses have erupted periodically. One of the most virulent outbreaks, which resulted in federal enforcement action against dozens of securities firms over six years ago, was known as "yield burning."

The IRS typically avoids taxing bondholders -- the tax code's penalty for muni noncompliance. But taxing bondholders isn't as rare as it used to be. About a dozen mutual funds with noncompliant munis in their portfolios have paid taxes over the last year on bonds purchased as tax-exempts, according to a federal official familiar with the matter.

Bondholder taxation usually is averted by settlements under which the IRS recoups some of the money lost on noncompliant bond deals and agrees to let the bonds in question remain tax-exempt.

Private Cash Fuels Boom In Takeovers (LAT)

By Tom Petruno And Josh Friedman, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, November 21, 2006

Elite private investors are buying up major companies at a record pace, in a wave of deals that is raining riches on Wall Street but also may be raising the risk of a financial bust.

Investors led by Blackstone Group announced late Sunday the biggest takeover ever by a so-called private equity fund, a $36-billion deal to buy Equity Office Properties Trust, the largest U.S. owner of office buildings.

The proposed purchase follows announcements in recent months of buyouts that would put firms including radio giant Clear Channel Communications Inc., casino titan Harrah's Entertainment Inc. and food-service company Aramark Corp. in private hands, taking their shares off the stock market.

DOJ_NMG_0096903

Takeovers are nothing new in American business, but historically the largest deals have involved companies whose shares are publicly traded buying other companies.

This year, the buyers behind the biggest deals are private equity funds — run by generally secretive investment firms that raise money from pension funds, wealthy individuals and other investors who are hungry for double-digit returns on their capital.

"It's obviously a boom," said C. Kevin Landry, a managing director at TA Associates, a Boston-based private equity firm. "You can raise as much money as you want" to do deals.

A private equity fund typically buys a company using mostly borrowed money, then seeks to improve the firm's bottom line through measures that may include refocusing the business or forcing cost cuts. The goal is to eventually sell the firm to another company, or take it public again, at a fat profit.

The buyout wave is enriching company shareholders because private equity investors usually pay more than a stock's current price to clinch a deal. That is helping to drive share prices higher overall, analysts say; the Dow Jones industrial average has been hitting record highs.

Yet the surge in buyouts this year is making some on Wall Street wonder whether they're witnessing a replay of other episodes when too many investors threw too much money in the same direction — the dot-com boom of the late 1990s, for example, or a late-1980s company buyout wave led by corporate raiders. Both of those booms gave way to painful busts.

"It's sort of feeding on itself now," said Edward Yardeni, investment strategist at money management firm Oak Associates in Akron, Ohio. "You could make a pretty good case that a bubble is building in private equity, and that it will burst."

Private equity buyers have announced about 1,000 U.S. takeovers this year worth a record $356 billion, according to data tracker Thomson Financial. That dwarfs the $138 billion in such deals announced last year.

Private-fund deals still account for a minority of U.S. takeover activity. In all, the value of announced corporate takeovers this year exceeds $1.2 trillion; most of those are company-to-company deals. But the rising clout of private equity buyers shows in the sizes of the deals they're behind, experts say.

"Five of the six top deals this year are private equity. That's never happened before," said Richard Peterson, an analyst at Thomson Financial in New York.

Most private equity firms aren't household names, but more may be on their way to that status as their corporate assets balloon. Big players include Blackstone, Bain Capital, Carlyle Group, Silver Lake Partners and Texas Pacific Group. One — Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co. — became famous for its massive deals in the 1980s.

More than any other factor, the ascendance of private equity buyers over the last few years reflects the willingness of well-heeled investors to pony up mountains of cash in search of better returns than they can earn in stocks or bonds.

"There is tremendous liquidity in the market," said Brad Freeman, a 23-year buyout fund veteran whose Los Angeles-based firm, Freeman Spogli & Co., has a $1-billion private equity fund it's putting to work. "Deals are being done because they can be."

Private equity firms have raised an unprecedented $178 billion in new capital from investors this year, about 10 times what they raised in 1995, according to data firm Dealogic.

The cash comes from investors such as the California Public Employees' Retirement System, or CalPERS, the nation's largest public pension fund.

CalPERS has about $6.3 billion invested in buyout funds, said Joncarlo Mark, a senior portfolio manager. The pension plan expects to earn an annual percentage return in the upper teens on that money, he said. By contrast, U.S. blue-chip stocks have generated a return of 11.4% a year over the last three years.

"There are a lot of investors out there looking for yield," said Josh Lerner, a finance professor at Harvard University.

But the success of buyout deals depends in large part on the purchased companies' ability to handle the debt loads they take on with their new owners.

With many private equity funds wielding huge war chests, competition to acquire companies has become fierce, said Stephen Presser, a partner at private equity firm Monomoy Capital Partners in New York.

"At the moment, private equity firms are paying almost historically high prices for businesses, and are depending on those businesses to continue to grow in order to pay down their debt," Presser said. "If the economy softens — and someday it will — those companies are going to have a tough time" managing their debt loads.

Some analysts also question whether companies that are targets of private equity buyers today can be substantially improved by their new owners.

"Companies already are under so much pressure to be lean and mean," Yardeni said. "It's not clear what they're [private equity owners] going to bring to the table to make these companies more profitable."

Still, corporate managers often are happy to attract private equity buyers. One reason is that top managers often participate as investors in buyouts, with the potential to reap hefty financial rewards if the company is eventually sold at a profit.

DOJ_NMG_0096904

The costs and regulatory hassles of being a public company also are spurring corporate boards down the go-private road, said Scott Honour, a managing director at Gores Group, a private equity firm in Los Angeles.

"Companies are bogged down by Sarbanes-Oxley requirements," he said, referring to the law Congress passed in 2002 tightening regulation of public companies after the financial scandals at Enron Corp. and other firms.

"Boards are saying, 'Geez, we're better off being private,' " Honour said.

That worries the Bush administration. In a speech Monday, Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. questioned whether the going-private trend might signal that U.S. regulation of shareholder-owned companies had become too severe, and was driving them out of the public market.

The deal wave also has attracted the attention of another branch of the government: The Justice Department reportedly is looking into the power wielded by private equity funds and whether the biggest players may be illegally colluding to increase their clout.

*

tom.petruno@latimes.com
josh.friedman@latimes.com

Times staff writer Walter Hamilton contributed to this report.

*

(INFOBOX BELOW)

The year's top 10 private buyouts

Here are the U.S. companies that have brought the highest purchase prices from private equity funds this year:

(In billions)

Equity Office Properties: $36
HCA: $32.2
Kinder Morgan: $27.4
Clear Channel Communications: $26.7
Harrah's Entertainment: $25.4
Freescale Semiconductor: $16.2
Univision Communications: $12.6
Merrill Lynch Investment Mngmt.: $8.5
Aramark: $8.0
GMAC: $7.4

*

Sources: Bloomberg News, Thomson Financial, companies listed
Note: Deal values include assumption of debt.

Ready To Deal: $60 Billion In Two Days (WSJ)

By Serena Ng, Gregory Zuckerman And Michael Hudson
The Wall Street Journal, November 21, 2006

Wall Street's cash spigots are turned wide open.

That means the recent deluge of merger and buyout deals could keep rising even though signs are emerging that some target companies are being loaded with increasingly risky levels of debt in the process.

More than $60 billion in deals were consummated in the past 48 hours of frantic merger and buyout activity, not including the debt assumed from target companies in these transactions, according to Dealogic, a research firm. The deals included a $20 billion private-equity bid for real-estate giant Equity Office Properties Trust and stretched from Europe to Canada to the U.S. More than 35 deals were announced globally, leaving bankers looking broadly to other sectors -- including health care, technology, gambling and home building -- for the next megatransactions.

BUYOUT BOOM

1

Read about what is behind the buyout boom2 and see a breakdown of the busiest sectors for M&A3. WHO ARE THE LAWYERS?

View a list of the law firms and lawyers representing the principals on the 10 largest deals in 2006 with U.S.-based acquirers.

DOJ_NMG_0096905

One important factor behind the year's takeover boom is a well-oiled financial machine: buyout firms searching out prey and raising cash with bonds and loans that are then sold off to investors around the world. Leveraged buyouts account for some 17% of the $3.4 trillion in transactions announced globally so far this year.

"It seems that each large deal is a stepping stone to the next bigger deal," says Edward Marrinan, a credit strategist at J.P. Morgan Chase, one of the big underwriters and lenders in the borrowing boom. Companies and their private equity buyers "are pushing the envelope in risk-taking and testing the outer boundaries of the market's tolerances," he adds.

The overall pace of deal making already surpasses the $3.3 trillion record set in 2000. Almost $1.3 trillion of mergers have been announced in the U.S. alone, though that is still off from the 2000 pace, which was driven by the tech boom and included many transactions in which companies were acquired in stock swaps.

The common denominator now is debt. In the U.S., corporations have sold $109 billion in "high yield," or junk, bonds and raised an additional $593 billion in junk-rated bank loans so far this year, according to Dealogic. Last year they raised $707 billion in bonds and loans in the U.S.

Earlier in the year some investors predicted the borrowing cycle could take a turn for the worse. Yet in recent weeks hospital operator HCA Inc. and Freescale Semiconductor Inc. easily found investors for more than $11 billion in bonds behind buyouts. Freescale raised money with few of the operating constraints -- known as covenants -- that often come with risky loans.

The surge in corporate profitability that followed the 2001 recession has left many companies well-positioned to pay off debt. So far this year, companies had defaulted on just 1.27% on outstanding U.S. speculative-grade bonds, a 24-year low. The long-term average default rate is 4.7%, according to Standard & Poor's. The default rate for junk-rated bank loans is 0.99%.

Because so few companies are defaulting, investors are willing to take chances on new debt. Investors also have a growing appetite for high-yielding assets, which has them turning to junk bonds and risky loans behind takeover deals. So far this year, junk bonds have returned a robust 10%.

While debt loads have been rising, interest rates remain relatively low, meaning some companies and buyout shops taking them over are betting they will be able to service their fast-rising debt loads. "The interest burden for companies is still manageable," says Gregory Stoeckle, managing director at Invesco Senior Secured Management.

"We've not seen any let-up in investor demand [for debt] and we don't see that changing anytime soon," says James Merli, managing director and head of debt syndication at Lehman Brothers.

Yet there are signs emerging that large debt loads could begin to weigh on companies involved in the deals. Some of the bonds issued by both HCA and Freescale were "toggle" bonds, which allow the companies to choose between paying interest in cash or in the form of additional bonds. That's a strategy companies adopt when they worry that they might be short of the cash flow needed to pay off interest in the short term.

"There's so much demand for yield in the marketplace that investors are willing to give companies that option. It seems pretty crazy to me, but it's a sign of the times," says Mark Kiesel, a portfolio manager at Allianz AG's Pacific Investment Management Co., or Pimco.

If economic conditions change or interest rates creep higher, some companies may have much less room to maneuver and could run into trouble, analysts say.

As it stands, HCA, which completed its takeover last week to take itself private, will incur over $2 billion a year in interest expenses, close to half its annual operating cash flow, according to research firm CreditSights. Freescale operates in a highly cyclical industry and its interest costs also are likely to represent roughly half its annual operating cash flow, says KDP Investment Advisors, Inc. HCA officials couldn't be reached to comment. Officials at Freescale declined to comment.

Also unlike the stock-driven tech-merger boom of the 1990s, this one is wide-ranging. A proposed acquisition of Harrah's Entertainment Inc. by Texas Pacific Group and Apollo Management is fueling speculation other casino companies will be bought. Blue chip names like Sprint Nextel Corp. -- with a stock market value of more than $50 billion -- and iconic brands like Hilton Hotels Corp. -- which has attracted interest from investor Carl Icahn -- are held out as reasonable targets. Home builders, in the midst of a worrisome housing bust, and commodities producers, facing a bust of their own, are turning up on buyout watch lists.

A spokesman for Sprint would not comment. An official for Hilton wasn't immediately available.

The leveraged-buyout boom of the late 1980s didn't turn until bankers felt losses. One turning point was a failed attempt by bankers to sell bonds to finance the buyout of Sealy, then known as Ohio Mattress Co.

First Boston, now part of Credit Suisse, had arranged a temporary loan to fund the $965 million buyout of the mattress maker by a firm called Gibbons Green van Amerongen.

The bank was unable to issue enough bonds to refinance the loan, and ended up holding most of the loan on its own books and took equity in the company.

The event sent a chill around the marketplace and became known on Wall Street as the "burning bed." The only things on fire on Wall Street right now are the phone lines of buyout shops.

DOJ_NMG_0096906

Smaller Rival In Agreement To Acquire Copper Giant (NYT)

By Andrew Ross Sorkin And Ian Austen

The New York Times, November 20, 2006

Phelps Dodge, the world's second-largest copper producer, will be acquired by Freeport-McMoRan Copper and Gold, a smaller rival that has been embroiled in environmental and human rights controversies, in a cash and stock deal worth $25.9 billion, the companies said yesterday.

The transaction, if approved by shareholders, would create the world's largest copper producer and the largest mining company based in North America. It is the latest move in a series of mining and metals mergers. Like companies involved in other mining mergers, Freeport-McMoRan promoted the idea that increased size has become an important competitive factor.

"We have been watching the industry consolidation, fewer companies, larger companies, but we had not been playing a role in it," Freeport-McMoRan's president and chief executive, Richard C. Adkerson, said. "Now Freeport is a larger company that has a larger platform."

The chairman and chief executive of Phelps Dodge, J. Steven Whisler, said yesterday that the two companies have talked about a possible merger for about a decade. The premium of about 33 percent being offered by Freeport-McMoRan, Mr. Whisler said, was a decisive factor in Phelps Dodge's decision to end its 172-year history as an independent company.

The boards of both companies have approved the transaction. Under its terms, stockholders in Phelps Dodge will receive $88 a share in cash plus 0.67 of a Freeport-McMoRan share. Based on Friday's closing, the deal is offering Phelps Dodge shareholders a 33 percent premium.

Freeport-McMoRan, which has a market capitalization of $11.3 billion compared with Phelps Dodge's value of $19.4 billion, will finance the transactions by borrowing about $17.5 billion. Freeport said it expected the deal would be accretive to the combined company's earnings per share and cash flow immediately.

To a considerable extent, Phelps-Dodge now finds itself being acquired because of its failure earlier this year to bulk up with an acquisition of Inco, the large Toronto-based nickel miner.

Inco had approached Phelps Dodge in an attempt to help it with its bid for another Canadian nickel miner, Falconbridge. In exchange for financing for that transaction, Inco's board agreed to be acquired by Phelps Dodge in a deal cash and stock worth about $17 billion.

Ultimately, however, the three-way transaction fell apart. Phelps Dodge walked away from its Inco offer after Xstrata of Switzerland emerged as the winning bidder for Falconbridge. Companhia Vale do Rio Doce of Brazil acquired Inco after offering about $17 billion in cash.

Not only did the Phelps Dodge bid fail to impress Inco's shareholders, it was also criticized by some of the Phoenix-based company's own shareholders largely because it would have increased the company's debt levels from almost nothing to about $24 billion. Some critics said at the time that they would prefer Phelps Dodge to sell itself rather than become larger through acquisitions, a request that has now apparently been granted.

Mr. Whisler will retire when the Freeport-McMoRan takeover is completed. The resulting company, which will retain Freeport-McMoRan name but move its head office from New Orleans to Phoenix, will be led by Mr. Adkerson and retain James R. Moffett, of Freeport-McMoRan, as chairman.

While Phelps Dodge has large mines in United States, Central and South America as well as Africa, Freeport-McMoRan's only significant asset is a mine in Indonesia.

Earlier this year, riots in the Indonesian province of Papua were directed at Freeport-McMoRan. In December 2005, The New York Times reported that Freeport had given more financial support to the Indonesian Army and police in Papua than the company had publicly reported, in some cases individual commanders received tens of thousands of dollars from the company.

Mr. Adkerson said the company was still responding to requests from regulators about the timing and level of disclosure to shareholders about those payments.

The Indonesian mine's operations have also come under criticism for their environmental practices. Mr. Adkerson said that Freeport-McMoRan now had its environmental measures assessed and tracked by independent auditors.

"We operate in an unusual place," he said. "Our mine is in a remarkable physical setting."

Freeport-McMoRan was advised in the deal by J. P. Morgan Securities and Merrill Lynch while legal advisers were Davis Polk & Wardwell and Jones, Walker, Waechter, Poitevent, Carrère & Denègre. Citigroup Corporate and Investment Banking and Morgan Stanley & Company worked with Phelps Dodge, and its legal counsel was Debevoise & Plimpton.

Mattel Says It Really Owns The Bratz That've Given Barbie Such A Bad Time (WSJ)

By Christina Binkley

DOJ_NMG_0096907

The Wall Street Journal, November 21, 2006

Barbie has a new tactic in her battle against the rival Bratz doll clan: If you can't beat 'em, own 'em.

Mattel Inc., maker of Barbie, is attempting to lay legal claim to the Bratz fashion-doll empire created by its rival MGA Entertainment Inc. The El Segundo, Calif., toy maker yesterday filed documents with U.S. District Court in California arguing that the Bratz dolls rightfully belong to Mattel, whose Barbie franchise has been dented by competition from the saucy, big-headed dolls that appeared on the market in 2001.

The argument is based in part on Mattel's claim that the designer of Bratz was employed by Mattel when he did initial drawings for the dolls several years ago. Recently, Mattel's lawyers quietly applied for copyright protection on a number of early Bratz drawings, according to the documents.

Moreover, the documents claim that closely held MGA Entertainment hired away a number of key Mattel employees in Mexico, the U.S. and Canada. Mattel says those employees "stole" confidential sales information, documents, plans, and other Mattel secrets -- copying the information onto hard drives or using other means to transfer the intelligence to MGA over the past six years or so.

Among other sources of information, including depositions of witnesses, the documents cite emails that appear to have been recovered from the personal computers of several former employees.

"MGA intentionally stole not just specific Mattel property, such as Bratz designs, prototypes and related materials, but also a vast array of trade secrets and other confidential information that comprise Mattel's intellectual infrastructure. MGA's rapid growth was not organic, but rather was based upon its theft of Bratz," the lawsuit says.

Isaac Larian, MGA's chief executive, said he hadn't seen the legal documents, but that his lawyers had briefed him on the contents. "This is another fantasy on the part of a desperate company that doesn't have any leadership," Mr. Larian said in an interview. "It's just basically a desperate organization that has lost its way."

Mr. Larian said that Mattel's claims regarding employees in Mexico have been dismissed as invalid by the Mexican courts.

Mattel responded to requests for comment with a written statement confirming the legal documents and declining to comment further.

Specifically, Mattel sought permission from a federal judge to amend an existing lawsuit it filed against Carter Bryant, the designer who is credited with creating the Bratz. The proposed amendment, a 58-page document, accuses MGA, Mr. Larian, Mr. Bryant and other MGA divisions and former employees of abuses that include copyright infringement, violation of the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act (or RICO), misappropriation of trade secrets, aiding and abetting breach of duty of loyalty, and unfair competition. Mattel is demanding a jury trial.

Mattel's new claims arise from legal discovery and separate investigations that the company conducted as part of several broader Barbie-Bratz related lawsuits.

In the documents, Mattel says that Van Nuys, Calif.-based MGA sells more than $500 million a year worth of Bratz items. Mr. Larian confirms that the sales are "more than $500 million" but declined to say how much more. The Bratz line has been a juggernaut since its inception five years ago. The Bratz dolls have a more hip-hop style and are more heavily made up than Barbie, who has been accused of being overly sexy herself, but appears positively demure in comparison with Bratz. In the late 1990s, Barbie had some of her best sales years ever. But the Bratz have eaten away at her kingdom, and world-wide Barbie sales fell 11% last year. Mattel has attempted to boost its fashion doll revenues with a series of hipper-looking dolls such as the Flavas, which came out in 2003 and have been discontinued.

Mattel doesn't disclose the value of its Barbie franchise. According to market researcher NPD Group, overall fashion-doll sales were $1.4 billion in 2005 -- roughly flat with the year before.

Mattel sued the Bratz designer Mr. Bryant in 2004. Mattel is now arguing that it has proof that Mr. Bryant was employed by Mattel when he drew the original drawings for the Bratz fashion dolls and sold them to MGA Entertainment. Mr. Bryant had signed an employment contract giving rights to his work to Mattel.

Mr. Bryant joined Mattel in 1995 and briefly left its employ in April 1998, according to Mattel. Mr. Larian says that Mr. Bryant conceived of Bratz during that time, when he was living with his parents in Missouri and working as a free-lancer. He says Mr. Bryant showed plans for a series of postcards -- not a doll -- to a mutual acquaintance who brought them to Mr. Larian's attention. "I said, OK, let's try it in 3-D," Mr. Larian says.

Mr. Bryant returned to Mattel's employ in January 1999, designing Barbie fashions.

Mattel claims in its filing that two third-party vendors have testified in depositions that they painted Bratz doll faces and worked on Bratz packaging between June and September 2000 -- before Mr. Bryant left Mattel in October 2000.

MGA began showing prototypes for the dolls around the toy industry within several weeks of Mr. Bryant's departure from Mattel. Mr. Bryant couldn't be reached for comment.

DOJ_NMG_0096908

Mr. Bryant now earns royalties for Bratz and has become wealthy, according to Mr. Larian. The royalties are something he wouldn't have gotten at Mattel, where his contract required him to sign over all his ideas.

Cephalon Used Improper Tactics To Sell Drug, Probe Finds (WSJ)

By John Carreyrou

The Wall Street Journal, November 21, 2006

From setting unrealistically high sales quotas to pushing larger prescriptions at higher doses, drug maker Cephalon Inc. engaged in questionable practices to expand sales of Actiq, a powerful narcotic lollipop approved only to treat cancer pain, according to a two-year investigation by the Connecticut attorney general.

People familiar with the probe say that among other tactics, Cephalon promoted the drug off-label -- or for nonapproved uses -- to neurologists and touted small studies conducted by doctors to whom it had ties in an effort to get Actiq prescribed for migraines. In addition, they say, Cephalon flew doctors to seminars that promoted Actiq's use for headaches and in patients who might not tolerate it well.

Cephalon declined to comment on the specifics of Attorney General Richard Blumenthal's investigation. Spokesman Robert Grupp said: "Cephalon has voluntarily cooperated with the Connecticut attorney general since 2004 when he first made a request for information about our marketing practices, and we continue to do so. Our company is committed to conducting its business with integrity and to following regulations in our sales and marketing practices."

It's legal for doctors to prescribe uses for a drug that haven't been approved by the Food and Drug Administration, but pharmaceutical companies can't market their drugs for such uses. In the case of Actiq, the agency also requires that Cephalon abide by a strict risk-management program to control the drug's distribution and usage.

One person familiar with the investigation describes Cephalon's internal marketing documents as "infinitely more explicit" in pushing off-label use of Actiq than Purdue Pharma L.P. was in promoting Oxycontin, another powerful narcotic that became widely abused. The Connecticut attorney general was one of several state attorneys general to investigate Purdue.

Mr. Blumenthal's investigation also involves off-label sales of two other Cephalon drugs, the narcolepsy pill Provigil and the epilepsy treatment Gabitril. Cephalon is also being investigated by the U.S. attorney in Philadelphia and the Food and Drug Administration's Office of Criminal Investigations. Like Mr. Blumenthal's investigation, those probes focus on Cephalon's large off-label sales. The U.S. attorney and the FDA declined to comment.

Mr. Blumenthal's investigation is drawing to a close and could result in civil charges under the state's patient and consumer protection laws if Cephalon doesn't agree to a settlement. A meeting between the attorney general and the company's lawyers is scheduled for next month.

If Cephalon opts to settle the case out of court, Mr. Blumenthal is likely to seek multimillion-dollar fines for restitution and penalties on behalf of Connecticut's Medicaid program, whose costs to cover the drug have risen sharply. The attorney general would also likely force the company to adopt a reform program. "We want them to change the way they do business," Mr. Blumenthal says.

Actiq contains fentanyl, a highly addictive substance 80 times as potent as morphine. Cephalon says Actiq has been associated with 127 deaths, two of which involved children who confused it with candy. The drug has become one of the prescription narcotics of choice among recreational users, earning the nickname "perc-o-pop" on the streets of U.S. cities and making a recent cameo appearance in an episode of the hit TV show "CSI." In the first nine months of this year, Actiq sales reached $471 million.

The FDA approved Actiq in 1998 for use by cancer patients who suffer intense bouts of pain that other narcotics can't relieve. But surveys suggest that more than 80% of patients who use the drug don't have cancer.

The trigger for Mr. Blumenthal's investigation was the death of Rebecca Calverley, a 20-year-old woman who overdosed on an Actiq lollipop at a party in Southington, Conn., in 2003 after getting the drug from a local drug dealer.

Mr. Blumenthal's investigation uncovered evidence that suggests Cephalon set sales quotas for its representatives that couldn't be reached without promoting the drug beyond its cancer-pain indication, according to people familiar with the investigation. Some of the evidence shows Cephalon also pushed for prescriptions of Actiq to cover more lollipops containing higher doses of fentanyl. Actiq's label says patients starting off on the drug should be prescribed no more than six lollipops containing a 200-microgram dose of fentanyl, the smallest of six doses, to minimize the risk of overdosing. Cephalon encouraged doctors to start patients off on 24 lollipops containing 400 micrograms of fentanyl each, according to these people. The higher dose costs more and brings in more revenue.

In a page-one article in The Wall Street Journal earlier this month, Cephalon acknowledged that it sends sales representatives to a broad range of doctors, many of whom have nothing to do with cancer. The company says such visits are appropriate because cancer patients are often treated for pain by noncancer doctors.

DOJ_NMG_0096909

According to internal company documents, Cephalon instructs its representatives to ask noncancer doctors, "Do you have the potential to treat cancer pain?" Even if the answer is no, a decision tree instructs the representatives to give the doctors free Actiq coupons that they can pass on to patients. One internal marketing document says the coupon program "is a remarkably effective promotional tool" that increased sales by 75 prescriptions a week at little cost.

Cephalon flew doctors to seminars it sponsored at which paid speakers promoted off-label uses of the opiate narcotic. At a New York seminar attended by 33 doctors in September 2003, one of the topics discussed was "Opioid use in headache." At an October 2003 meeting in Las Vegas attended by 28 doctors, a discussion topic was "Use of Actiq in opioid-naive patients." Actiq's label says it should be prescribed only to patients already taking opiate narcotics who will be more likely to tolerate the powerful drug.

Mr. Grupp declined to comment on the seminars. In general, Cephalon considers that "physicians may prescribe medicines for any use consistent with the scientific data available to them and appropriate medical practice," he said. "The decision to prescribe 'off label' is theirs and theirs alone."

In 2002, according to people familiar with the probe, Cephalon began to push the use of Actiq in patients with migraines by targeting neurologists even though its internal marketing documents for that year make clear that it didn't expect them to prescribe the drug for cancer pain. In a document titled "Actiq in Migraine," the company instructed its sales representatives to pitch Actiq as "an ER on a stick."

Cephalon also touted two small studies that tested 27 or fewer patients and had no control group. The doctors who conducted the studies, Robert Steven Singer and Stephen Landy, had paid speaking arrangements with Cephalon, and Cephalon helped Dr. Landy with the study he conducted, according to the people close to Mr. Blumenthal's probe.

Dr. Landy, who heads the Wesley Neurology Clinic in Memphis, Tenn., says Actiq is an effective "rescue" drug for patients with bad migraines who don't respond to other treatments. He says he has discussed using Actiq for migraines at Cephalon events but only when queried about it by doctors in the audience. Dr. Landy won't say how much Cephalon paid him for speaking. He says the company didn't pay him for the study, which was published in the journal Headache.

Dr. Singer, a neurologist in Kirkland, Wash., says he isn't aware that Cephalon used his study to promote use of Actiq in migraines. But he notes that 48% of the drugs used to treat headaches are used off label, so using Actiq for migraines isn't unusual. He declines to say how much Cephalon paid him to speak.

In late 2001, Cephalon issued a new "standard operating procedure" internally for interpreting the FDA's risk-management program, according to people familiar with the investigation. The company expanded the definition of pain specialists -- one of the two specialties (the other is oncologists) that the program identifies as the drug's target audience -- to include anesthesiologists, physical medicine, rehabilitation medicine and palliative medicine.

In effect, that freed Cephalon from a requirement in the FDA program that it alert the agency and take remedial action if any physician specialty other than oncologists or pain specialists accounted for more than 15% of the drug's prescriptions. Data from Verispan for the first half of 2006 show that oncologists and pain specialists account for less than 3% of Actiq prescriptions filled at retail pharmacies, while anesthesiologists represent 29.5% of prescriptions.

LSE Shuns 'final' £2.7bn Nasdaq Bid (FT)

By Norma Cohen In London

Financial Times, November 21, 2006

London Stock Exchange on Monday batted away a £2.7bn ($5.1bn, €4bn) "final" offer to be acquired by US-based Nasdaq, saying the bid so undervalued the company its board was not even willing to meet for further discussions.

The announcement sparked tumultuous trading in LSE shares, which closed 6 per cent higher at 1,291p, well above the 1,243p per share offer price. Nearly 50m shares switched hands. The price is the minimum Nasdaq has to pay until next May under UK takeover code rules because that is the average price at which it bought its initial 25.3 per cent stake.

On Monday, Nasdaq increased that to 28.75 per cent, buying the stake of Scottish Widows Investment Partnership, one of the LSE's few remaining long-term investors.

Posturing by both parties is likely to be played out in coming weeks. Under the code, Nasdaq cannot raise its offer unless either its board recommends a bid or a competing bidder emerges. If it fails to acquire the company, it cannot bid for another 12 months.

LSE's response suggests it wants to set a value for its shares well above what Nasdaq would be willing to pay, thus keeping its independence.

The offer is the second that Nasdaq has made for LSE and the fifth approach LSE has received in the past two years.

Clara Furse, LSE chief executive, said: "We believe Nasdaq's final offer fails to recognise the outstanding growth record and prospects of our group on a stand-alone basis, let alone the exchange's unique global position."

DOJ_NMG_0096910

In timing its approach, Bob Greifeld, Nasdaq chief executive, said he was very much influenced by a sell-off in LSE shares last week. That had been sparked by an announcement from some of its largest customers that they intended to build a low-cost share trading platform that could compete with the LSE. The US has become fiercely competitive and technology and new European Commission rules are likely to make Europe follow suit.

"The broad context is that this proposed transaction is recognition that the world we knew will be very different in three or four years' time," Mr Greifeld said.

However, the recovery of LSE shares is believed to have emboldened Nasdaq to make its move, taking the view that the shares would have fallen further without the prospect of an offer.

The offer gives little to customers who have been pressing for tariff reductions. It simply promises that fees will not be raised for at least the next three years.

It offers some protections to the London market in the form of an oversight committee which will be mandated in its articles of association. The committee cannot agree to rule changes for the London market without the consent of the Financial Services Authority – a move aimed at easing concerns about the import of US regulations.

It also will have veto rights over any effort to move more than 20 per cent of the cost base or revenue base out of the UK.

LSE Rebuffs Offer By Nasdaq Valuing Firm At $5.1 Billion (WSJ)

By Aaron Lucchetti In New York And Alistair Macdonald In London

The Wall Street Journal, November 21, 2006

Nasdaq Stock Market Inc. will likely have to increase its offer price if it wants a chance of taking over London Stock Exchange PLC after the London exchange rejected Nasdaq's latest advance.

That presents Nasdaq Chief Executive Robert Greifeld with a dilemma: Use even more of his shareholders' money to continue his lengthy pursuit of a reluctant partner or be saddled with a huge passive stake in LSE at a time when LSE faces challenges. Although it operates Europe's largest stock exchange by the value of shares traded, LSE is dogged by a series of competitive threats and isn't a player in the fast-growing market for trading derivatives.

Early Monday, Nasdaq took another run at the London Stock Exchange, proposing to buy the approximately 71% of the company it doesn't own for £12.43 a share, or $23.55, valuing the LSE at £2.7 billion, or $5.1 billion. The 300-year-old London exchange rejected the offer and declined to meet with Nasdaq officials. The response was similar to LSE's rejection of a March approach by Nasdaq at £9.50 a share. Nasdaq has a 60-day period under British takeover rules in which to convince LSE shareholders and its board to negotiate. Nasdaq billed its latest approach as its "final offer."

Investors quickly drove LSE's share price above Nasdaq's bid price, signaling that it will take a higher offer from Nasdaq to convince them to sell or that they expect a rival suitor to emerge. LSE's shares rose Monday in London to £12.91, up 6%. Nasdaq shares rose 3.1%, or $1.14, to $37.71 in Nasdaq trading, but debt-ratings firms threatened to lower their marks on Nasdaq's already junk-rated debt because of the risks and expense of a deal.

Prospects of another bidder appear dim, at least for now. Nasdaq's interest in the LSE is just one element of a major round of consolidation under way among the world's biggest exchange companies, which means there are few, if any, major potential suitors for LSE that aren't already tied up in deals.

NYSE Group Inc., operator of the New York Stock Exchange, has agreed to purchase Euronext NV, an operator of four stock exchanges and one derivatives exchange in Europe, in a deal Euronext shareholders are expected to vote on next month. Deutsche Börse AG, operator of the Frankfurt Stock Exchange, last week pulled out of a rival bid for Euronext but is unlikely to immediately look at London and has been rejected by LSE in the past. And Chicago Mercantile Exchange Holdings Inc. and CBOT Holdings Inc., operator of the Chicago Board of Trade, are pursuing an agreed-upon merger and aren't that interested in operating a stock exchange anyway.

WALL STREET JOURNAL VIDEO

1

Watch a video report on The London Stock Exchange's rejection2 of a buyout bid from the Nasdaq. (Nov. 20)

The tie-ups are happening now because many exchange companies are seeking cost efficiencies through mergers as the fees they can charge users have come down. Big investors such as hedge funds, pension funds and investment banks also want to trade more easily in a wider range of markets.

LSE's flat-out rejection of even entering talks means Nasdaq's chances are slim at its current offer price, even though Nasdaq said formally that its offer was final and wouldn't be revised unless it received approval from LSE's board or a competitor jumped into the fray.

"We are disappointed by the quick rejection of our proposal and the LSE board's refusal to meet with Nasdaq," Mr. Greifeld said.

DOJ_NMG_0096911

Now he is relying on LSE's shareholders to complain vociferously that LSE should start talking to Nasdaq. One LSE shareholder whose firm owns about 1% of the company's shares said LSE should at least talk to Mr. Greifeld because he has made it clear he could increase his offer if LSE's board would start to negotiate.

Nasdaq is "transferring the burden to LSE's shareholders," says Rick Wetmore, an analyst at Turner Investment Partners, which owns shares of Nasdaq. He says that LSE finding a white knight is "unlikely in the near term."

One manager at a hedge fund that owns more than 3% of LSE said Nasdaq would have to dig deeper. "They are not going to win the company this way," he said.

Nasdaq said a deal would create the world's largest stock market by the number of listings, though it would be far smaller than a combined NYSE and Euronext if measured by the market value of listed companies. Nasdaq and LSE would comprise more than 6,400 quoted companies with a total market capitalization of about £6.3 trillion.

Nasdaq plans to leave the LSE some autonomy to regulate and operate its market. Such steps are likely necessary to gain approval from U.K. regulators. Mr. Greifeld doesn't view the step as the final move by Nasdaq to become a more global company. In an interview he called Asian expansion "a natural outgrowth of a market that wants to be the world's leading equity exchange."

A combined company would be home to Britain's giants such as Vodafone Group PLC and BP PLC, and Nasdaq's technology-oriented giants such as Cisco Systems Inc. and Intel Corp. but also thousands of smaller companies that have chosen Nasdaq in the U.S. and LSE's AIM exchange to list.

Nasdaq, which before Monday's announcement owned 25.3% of the LSE, backed up its offer by buying 7.1 million LSE shares, taking its stake to 28.75%, a move that cost it about £87.8 million.

If Nasdaq proceeds with its offer and wins at least a significant chunk of LSE shareholders, it could give it an inside track to shuffle the LSE board and management to a new group more supportive of a deal. Nasdaq could be in trouble if it doesn't ultimately snap up a majority of LSE shares with its offer. In that case, it would be prevented under U.K. takeover rules from bidding again for as long as one year, said Richard Repetto, an analyst with Sandler O'Neill & Partners.

Even among less-obvious potential bidders for LSE there appear to be few candidates. Magnus Böcker, CEO of Nordic exchange operator OMX AB, said in an interview that his exchange has no plans to bid for LSE and doubted whether this would change. The LSE held talks over the summer with U.K. broker ICAP, but the collapsed mainly because ICAP thought the exchange's shares were too high. ICAP also isn't expected to return to the table.

LSE may still look to other deals to give shareholders an alternative to Nasdaq's vision. One exchange investor said Monday that LSE could link with other independent stock markets in Italy or Spain, and the LSE has recently held talks about partnerships with the Tokyo Stock Exchange and the Bombay Stock Exchange.

Under CEO Clara Furse, LSE has repelled four approaches, including Nasdaq's March attempt. "We believe Nasdaq's final offer fails to recognize the outstanding growth record and prospects of our group on a standalone basis let alone the Exchange's unique global position," Ms. Furse said.

LSE in the past argued that it is more than capable of continuing to be independent given that it is located in one of the world's financial centers and because of what it sees as a long-term trend of increasing trading volume with the arrival of fast-moving hedge funds and computer programs that move money in and out of stocks quickly.

Ms. Furse's independent stance bucks the general trend among exchanges that have recently gone public and started looking for ways to expand and cut costs. Exchange executives like NYSE CEO John Thain have talked about the emergence of a handful of global exchange giants, and it is unclear where LSE would fit into that. LSE declined to say whether it was talking to potential rival bidders. A spokesman said: "We are continually exploring options over and above the standalone growth story."

Mr. Greifeld said Nasdaq was ideally suited to help LSE compete going forward. "We've never had a historical monopoly. We had to scratch and claw for our progress in the market," he said. He said that combining the two companies would give international companies "the ability to dual-list simultaneously in London and New York."

London Exchange Rejects Nasdaq's $5.1 Billion Offer (WP)

By Aaron Lucchetti And Alistair Macdonald

The Washington Post, November 21, 2006

NEW YORK, Nov. 20 -- The Nasdaq Stock Market will likely have to increase its offer price if it wants a chance of taking over the London Stock Exchange after the exchange rejected Nasdaq's latest advance.

The rejection presents Robert Greifeld, Nasdaq's president and chief executive, with a dilemma: use even more of his shareholders' money to continue his pursuit of a reluctant partner, or be saddled with a huge passive stake in the London exchange at a time when it faces challenges. Although it is Europe's largest stock market in terms of the value of shares traded, the London exchange is dogged by a series of competitive threats and is not a factor in the fast-growing market for trading derivatives, which are investments used to hedge against interest-rate changes.

DOJ_NMG_0096912

Nasdaq's offer of $23.55 per share Monday was valued at $5.1 billion, which the 300-year-old London exchange said substantially undervalued the company. London exchange representatives also declined to meet with Nasdaq officials, similar to their response when approached by Nasdaq in March. Nasdaq has a 60-day period under British takeover rules in which to persuade the shareholders and board of the London exchange to negotiate.

Investors quickly drove the London exchange's share price above Nasdaq's bid price, signaling that it will take a higher offer from Nasdaq or that they expect a rival suitor to emerge. But prospects of another bidder appear dim, at least for now.

Nasdaq's interest in the London exchange is just one element of a major round of consolidation going on among the world's biggest exchange companies, which means there are few, if any, major potential suitors for London exchange that are not already tied up in deals.

NYSE Group., operator of the New York Stock Exchange, agreed to buy Euronext, an operator of four stock exchanges and one derivatives exchange in Europe, in a deal that Euronext shareholders are expected to vote on next month. Deutsche Borse, operator of the Frankfurt Stock Exchange, last week pulled out of a rival bid for Euronext, but is unlikely to soon look at London and has been rejected by London exchange in the past. And Chicago Mercantile Exchange Holdings and CBOT Holdings, operator of the Chicago Board of Trade, are pursuing an agreed merger and aren't that interested in operating a stock exchange anyway.

The tie-ups are occurring now because many exchange companies are seeking cost efficiencies through mergers as the fees they can charge users have come down. Big investors, such as hedge funds, pension funds and investment banks, also want to trade more easily in a wider range of markets.

But Nasdaq and the London exchange may be dealing only with each other or with no one at all. And London's rejection of talks with Nasdaq's means chances are slim at its current offer price, even though Nasdaq said its offer was final and would not be revised unless it received approval from the London board or a competitor jumped into the fray.

"We are disappointed by the quick rejection of our proposal and the London exchange board's refusal to meet with Nasdaq," Greifeld said.

Now he is relying on shareholders to complain that the London exchange should start talking to Nasdaq. One shareholder, whose firm owns about 1 percent of the company's shares, said that the London exchange should at least talk to Greifeld because he has made it clear that he could increase his offer if the London board would negotiate.

Nasdaq is "transferring the burden to London exchange's shareholders," said Rick Wetmore, an analyst at Turner Investment Partners, which owns shares of Nasdaq. He said the London exchange was unlikely to find a white knight soon.

A manager at a hedge fund that owns more than 3 percent of the London exchange said that Nasdaq would have to dig deeper. "They are not going to win the company this way," the mananger said, on condition that he not be named.

Nasdaq said a deal would create the world's largest stock market by the number of listings, though it would be smaller than a combined NYSE and Euronext if measured by the market value of listed firms.

British Shun A New Offer By Nasdaq (NYT)

By Heather Timmons And James Kanter

The New York Times, November 21, 2006

LONDON, Nov. 20 — The Nasdaq Stock Market has intensified a trans-Atlantic battle for the London Stock Exchange in an effort to overtake the rival New York Stock Exchange as the world's leading equity marketplace.

The London exchange, the largest in Europe, quickly rejected Nasdaq's $5.1 billion cash offer on Monday and said it would not meet with Nasdaq executives. Nasdaq officials said that while they still hoped to reach a friendly deal, they planned to go ahead with their offer.

The London market is attractive to Nasdaq because it has benefited from a flood of new money from Asia and the Middle East. It has lured new listings because its regulatory regimen is seen as less onerous than the oversight of stock exchanges in the United States.

A combination of the London market and Nasdaq would create a company with 6,400 listings and a total market capitalization of $11.3 trillion — making it the world's biggest stock market, Nasdaq said.

The world's share markets are moving energetically to consolidate, under pressure from customers to reduce fees and offer global services. By merging, exchanges can pool their liquidity and offer better prices to buyers and sellers. Last week, a group of big investment banks added to the pressure by announcing plans to create a pan-European stock trading platform next year.

DOJ_NMG_0096913

Reaching a deal with London could help Nasdaq overtake the New York Stock Exchange's parent NYSE Group in Europe. The New York exchange and Euronext, a network of four European stock markets and a London derivatives market, are expected to ask shareholders for final approval of their planned merger in December.

This is the second time this year that Nasdaq has offered to acquire the London exchange. In March, London rejected an informal offer of £9.50 a share. On Monday, Nasdaq made an offer of £12.43 a share ($23.57), up more than 30 percent from March, but only 2 percent above the London exchange's closing stock price of £12.18 on Friday.

Much has changed since March, though. London's shareholders have rapidly turned over, and as many as a third of its investors now are thought to be hedge funds, chiefly concerned not with a company's long-term business strategy but with the highest short-term return.

"It is difficult to see how this is not going to go through," said Lynton Jones, a former head of Nasdaq's international operations and a founder of Bourse Consult in London, which advises stock exchanges. "The London exchange is boxed into a corner."

But Nasdaq may still need to sweeten its offer. Apparently anticipating a higher bid, investors bid up the shares of the London Stock Exchange 6 percent on Monday, to £12.91.

Andrew Mitchell, an analyst with Fox-Pitt, Kelton in London, said, "It's not obvious where the L.S.E. can move next, but by not entering into negotiations with Nasdaq, they have put them in an awkward position." Nasdaq, he said, might be forced to offer more.

Yet officials at ratings agencies said that paying more could be dangerous for Nasdaq. One agency, Moody's Investors Service, put Nasdaq on review for a possible downgrading because of any additional debt that the company might take on.

Nasdaq has now accumulated nearly 29 percent of the London exchange's shares, enough to scare away rival suitors. It needs just over 50 percent to win control.

Doug Atkin, chief executive of Majestic Research in New York, said "the really powerful thing about this is there is no alternative" for Nasdaq rivals who hope to match the deal.

He added that Clara Furse, the chief executive of the London exchange, had "the equivalent of the only beachfront property in town."

And London has been reluctant to sell. The 246-year-old exchange has turned down offers in recent years from the Macquarie Bank of Australia, Deutsche Börse of Germany and OM, owner of Nordic region markets.

In a statement Monday, Ms. Furse said, "Nasdaq's final offer fails to recognize the outstanding growth record and prospects of our group on a stand-alone basis, let alone the exchange's unique global position."

Nasdaq replied that it was "disappointed" by the London exchange's decision.

Its chief executive, Robert Greifeld, said during a call with investors that he would like to reach a deal with the approval of the London exchange's board. He ran off a long list of concessions he would make in a takeover, including leaving the London Stock Exchange's board independent, its management intact and holding Nasdaq board meetings in London. Nasdaq would also list its shares on the London exchange.

He said Nasdaq "respects the strength of the London market" and will ensure that it continues its same practices. Mr. Greifeld also pledged not to raise broker-dealer fees for users of either market for three years. Nasdaq plans to use a combination of cash, preferred stock and bank debt arranged with Bank of America and Dresdner Kleinwort to finance the deal.

Nasdaq expects to post an official offer this week, at which time London Stock Exchange holders have 28 days to tender their shares. That period can be extended to 60 days. In addition, 30 days after posting a formal offer, Nasdaq can buy more shares of the London exchange on the market.

If Nasdaq succeeds, both it and the New York Stock Exchange would face competition on other fronts. The global investment banks — Citigroup, Credit Suisse, Deutsche Bank, Goldman Sachs, Merrill Lynch, Morgan Stanley and UBS — have formally disclosed their plan to start a electronic European exchange. Predictions that such a market could take business away from the London Stock Exchange have recently weakened its share price.

Underlining the increasingly global market for stocks and futures, and a growing demand for cheap trading across time zones, both the New York and the London exchanges are in talks with the Tokyo stock market over possible alliances.

On Monday, the British government said it was open to foreign ownership in London but stressed that any takeover must not threaten the current regulatory framework.

"We are neutral with respect to the nationality of the ownership of the L.S.E.," said Ed Balls, economic secretary to the chancellor of the exchequer, Gordon Brown. "Our interest in the ownership of the L.S.E. is that it should not affect the existing risk-based regulatory regime under which the exchange and its members and issuers operate."

Curtain Rises On Final Act In LSE Drama (FT)

DOJ_NMG_0096914

Financial Times, November 21, 2006

The takeover battle for the London Stock Exchange has been like a romantic comedy in which the leading lady is determined not to get married. The LSE has seen off Deutsche Börse, the German exchange, Macquarie, the Australian bank, and other less determined suitors. Now Nasdaq, the US exchange, is wooing the LSE with a cash offer. The LSE's users will hope that it meets with no more success.

Nasdaq should not be turned down because it is American. The LSE is a profitable, private business and there is no public interest in protecting it from foreign ownership. It is important to ask, however, if the US authorities would allow a deal if the LSE were trying to buy Nasdaq.

Nasdaq has been careful to say that it would protect London's regulation, its brands and its individual identity. But it would be insane to do otherwise: those strengths, and the business that they bring, help to justify the high price Nasdaq is offering.

That price would stretch Nasdaq. It is already highly leveraged and its debt is not rated at investment grade. Yet it plans to pay for the LSE by borrowing more. Such a large debt burden would make it hard for the new company to cut prices for its users.

That would upset users, given that there would be cost savings from a merger. The economics of a stock exchange are like those of the software business. Once a computer program is written it costs almost nothing to sell more copies; once a stock exchange is set up it costs almost nothing to process more trades. Nasdaq and the LSE could share a technology platform and strip out costs.

Any merger between two stock exchanges has that advantage. The particular logic of Nasdaq buying the LSE, however, is less clear. There is no obvious demand for joint listings on the two stock exchanges and the bid seems to have more to do with Nasdaq management's desire to lead consolidation. Their shareholders should be asking tough questions about the price to be paid for that privilege.

For users the danger is that a Nasdaq deal makes consolidation among the European exchanges more difficult. With the NYSE likely to buy Paris-based Euronext, Europe may be stuck with three large exchanges: two owned by American rivals, and an independent Deutsche Börse. But what users want is a pan-European exchange, with independent, pan-European clearing and settlement.

The real prizes would be mergers among Europe's national exchanges and the merger of Deutsche Börse's clearing and settlement arm with LCH.Clearnet, which performs that function for the LSE and Euronext. A Nasdaq deal with the LSE brings such outcomes no closer. Shareholders in the LSE are likely to accept an offer at the right price. But stock exchange users will still sigh about the handsome Europeans the LSE turned away.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Snowmobile Plan Proposed For Yellowstone (AP-Y)

By Mary Clare Jalonick

AP, November 21, 2006

The National Park Service wants to maintain snowmobile regulations allowing 720 snowmobiles per day to enter Yellowstone National Park.

A draft statement issued Monday by the agency mirrors a temporary plan that has been in use for the past two winters. It would also allow 140 snowmobiles a day to enter Grand Teton National Park and the John D. Rockefeller Jr. Parkway, which connects the two parks.

The snowmobiles must use what the Park Service calls "best available technology" to reduce noise and pollution levels.

The plan was issued to other government agencies. The public will be able to comment on a separate draft expected in March.

Park officials stressed that the report is only a draft and that the plan is the agency's preferred alternative out of several proposals. A final plan is expected to be issued in time for the 2007-2008 winter season.

The agency has been looking at a wide range of options, from a ban on snowmobiles in Yellowstone in favor of snowcoaches — which run on tracks and can carry several people — to allowing more snowmobiles, which generally carry one to two.

"We are far away from the final decision," Grand Teton National Park spokeswoman Joan Anzelmo said.

The plan would limit snowcoaches in Yellowstone to 78 per day and require those vehicles to meet sound and emissions requirements.

DOJ_NMG_0096915

For years, snowmobile access to the park was largely unrestricted. But that ended before the 2003-04 winter, when the Park Service moved from a Clinton administration-era plan that called for phasing out snowmobiles in favor of snowcoaches and decided instead to limit the numbers and types of snowmobiles. Court challenges have also delayed a final decision.

Jon Catton, a Bozeman, Mont.-based conservationist, called the proposal "an unfortunate U-turn by the administration only months after it pledged to emphasize conservation in our national parks." Catton said noise pollution has continued to be a problem, even though far fewer than 720 snowmobiles have entered the park each year.

Yellowstone Plans To Retain Current Snowmobile Limit (NYT)

By Jim Robbins

The New York Times, November 21, 2006

HELENA, Mont., Nov. 20 — Yellowstone National Park officials say they will keep the number of snowmobiles allowed into the park at the level it has been under a temporary plan for three years, about 720 a day.

The park released a long-awaited draft environmental impact statement on Monday, proposing a long-term winter use plan for Yellowstone and Grand Teton National Parks.

Officials are seeking comments from the states and counties that border the park and will release another draft document for public comment early next year. The new plan will go into effect for the winter of 2009.

Allowing snowmobiles into Yellowstone, the nation's most famous wilderness park, has been hugely controversial and political. The current statement is the fourth environmental study of snow machines in the park. The Clinton administration proposed banning snowmobiles; the Bush administration proposed a limit of 1,000 a day.

The latest plan would allow 720 a day, split among the three main entrances. All snowmobiles that enter the park have to meet noise and pollution standards.

Although 720 is the current limit, the park has averaged only 250 snowmobile visits a day in the last three years. Environmentalists had hoped that the new plan would reflect the lower number.

"Yellowstone has a noise problem with 250 snowmobiles a day," Jon Catton, an environmentalist in Bozeman, said. "The park service says it already interferes with visitors' ability to hear erupting geysers and wildlife. This proposal will make it worse by allowing a threefold increase."

A spokesman for the park, Al Nash, said, "All of our measures would meet federal and state air quality guidelines," because of new technology.

Noise problems, Mr. Nash said, are largely caused by older snow coaches, an over-snow bus on rubber treads or skis.

The new plan requires such coaches to meet stricter sound and emission levels and limits them to 78 a day. On average, 32 now enter the park daily.

Businesses that depend on snowmobiles favor keeping the higher number.

The new limit, said Glen Loomis, owner of a snowmobiling and snow coach business in West Yellowstone, "still protects the wildlife and other values."

The new plan would also keep a requirement that snowmobilers ride with guides. Business owners have said that requirement limits the number of snowmobilers who visit the park.

Mr. Nash said the guide requirement had proven successful.

"We've seen the number of arrests and moving violations dramatically decrease," he said. "Guided travel is a way to provide safe and effective travel."

Environmentalists Seek Marine Protection For Parts Of Northwest Atlantic (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, November 21, 2006

(AP) - BOSTON-Parts of the northwest Atlantic Ocean stretching from Cape Cod in Massachusetts to the northeastern tip of Nova Scotia in Canada should be declared off-limits to fishing and other human activities in order to protect threatened marine species, two environmental groups said Monday.

The Boston-based Conservation Law Foundation and the World Wildlife Fund-Canada recommended creating 30 marine reserves extending 10 miles (16 kilometers) to 200 miles (322 kilometers) from shore.

The proposed zones include productive fishing areas, however, and creating the reserves in U.S. waters would require federal authorization.

A fishing industry official worried that closing large areas permanently could make it harder for fishermen to earn a living.

"They have to be very careful not to close an area that is producing a lot of net benefit to the nation," Vito Giacalone of the Northeast Seafood Coalition told The Boston Globe newspaper.

DOJ_NMG_0096916

The groups said they used computer technology to identify offshore areas where a large number of species could be protected while imposing the fewest restrictions.

Letters (WSJ)

Wall Street Journal, November 21, 2006

LETTERS

'Freedom' Is America's Truth, Sen. Webb -- 'Fairness' Is Subjective

In response to Jim Webb's Nov. 15 editorial-page essay "American Workers Have a Chance To Be Heard":

It is unfortunate, albeit not unexpected, that senator-elect Jim Webb makes the common mistake of using income inequality as a gauge of social injustice in this country. In a free market, income inequality is the inevitable result of individual productivity inequality, and of course productivity inequality exists due to variations in natural ability, industriousness, education, risk-aversion and dumb luck. The reason income equality has grown rapidly (although hardly "infinitely," as Mr. Webb hyperbolically asserts) is that productivity inequality has grown. And the reason productivity inequality has grown is that with the advance of technology and globalization, the impact of a good idea or exceptional performance can be leveraged dozens of times more than it could be even one generation ago. J. K. Rowling, the author of the Harry Potter series, has made more than $200 million for each book she has written. Is that too much? Absolutely not, when one considers the benefits that each book brings to tens of millions of children (and adults) around the globe. But the impact of J.K. Rowling's creativity and hard work, and the income she has earned from it, would have been perhaps orders of magnitude smaller 30 years ago.

Mr. Webb misses the point that one of the pillars of a free-market economy is that people should be allowed to earn in proportion to their productivity. To use government to do otherwise would be to impede productivity everywhere. In fact, my guess is that in most of the regrettable cases in which income vastly outstrips productivity, government intervention is probably to blame. The news that the three richest counties in the United States are clustered around Washington, D.C., certainly came as no surprise to me this morning.

In any case, a much better gauge of social injustice is consumption inequality. Of what relevance is it that there is large income inequality? Or wealth inequality for that matter? It only matters to the extent that it translates into unequal consumption of the country's resources, consumption being the true gauge of one's standard of living. I have not seen studies in this area, but my guess is that we are many times less unequal in our rates of consumption than in our levels of income or wealth.

Eric Meyer

Newton, Mass.

Blah, blah, blah. When are we going to actually hear something of substance from the Democrats? You would think they would've begun outlining how to deal with the "inequalities." People will start to think that they might not know what to do next.

Michael S. Woodard

Charlotte, N.C.

Mr. Webb forgets to mention in his diatribe against top wage earners that the top 5% band of earners pay 57% of the country's total income taxes. I guess that kind of data flew out of his mind when he switched sides.

Margaret McGirr

Greenwich, Conn.

Underneath the smooth rhetoric is a frightening message: "Fairness" is emphasized, but "freedom" not at all. Beware of any politician who places fairness over freedom. What is at jeopardy, in his hands, are your life, liberty and property.

Jim Brankin

Southlake, Texas

Mr. Webb asserts that the top 1% of wage earners "takes in" (not earns, mind you) "an astounding 16% of national income." IRS statistics for 2003 show the same top 1% pays a truly "astounding" 34.3% of all income taxes. If Mr. Webb could replace DNC talking points with some thinking and historical perspective, he might contribute rational problem solving rather then tired class envy and nostalgia for Great Society nostrums that led to Jimmy Carteresque stagflation.

Jay S. Haberman

New York

Nowhere does Mr. Webb actually outline what he'll do to benefit the American worker. All he provides is a list of Democrat buzzwords and phrases -- job outsourcing, CEO compensation, Rove, wage gap, Wal-Mart, etc. I have no problem with Democrats addressing issues they perceive to be hurting the American worker, but, please -- offer solutions.

Timothy O. Corkery

South Boston

DOJ_NMG_0096917

Mr. Webb is long on class envy and short on facts. Nowhere does he state what he would do to change the status quo. Senator, it is not the politics of the Karl Rove era that are distracting and dividing people -- it's you.

Joe Schroeder

Big Canoe, Ga.

Mr. Webb's rant is right in tune with the heart and soul of his new party. He sounds like Willy Stark.

Douglass M. Holmes

Louisville, Ky.

I'm so glad Mr. Webb opened my eyes to the fact that we mindless rubes, who are concerned only with the issues of "God, guns, gays, abortion and the flag," have merely been victims of seduction by the all powerful "Oz" -- Karl Rove.

Mark Rauschenberger

Washington

The country has changed in the 40 years since Mr. Webb "graduated from college in the 1960s," but apparently he has not. Today, the percentage of home owners has increased from under 20% to about 70%; the stock-owning investor class has increased from less than 10% to about 60%. The "top tier" that "has grown richer" has itself increased (as a definition of upper middle class and above) exponentially. All of this is under a program of steady decrease in taxation and regulation.

Lenny Toboroff

New York

If so many jobs are disappearing, as Mr. Webb would have us believe, why is unemployment at a historical low?

Patrick Duffy

Haddon Township, N.J.

Mr. Webb says "manufacturing jobs are disappearing." True. Contrary to his suggestion, though, this fact is unrelated to recent trends in globalization, corporate governance or tax policy. Manufacturing jobs as a percentage of the U.S. work force peaked in 1945 and have declined steadily ever since, even though manufacturing output continues to rise. Today this output is at an all-time high.

Donald J. Boudreaux

Chairman

Department of Economics

George Mason University

Fairfax, Va.

Mr. Webb's discussion of class structure implies that we are locked into a class and cannot escape, something that is simply not true in America. We can all move through various economic situations quite fluidly without any restrictions due to birth. Mr. Webb himself is a fine example: From his days working part time in college to becoming a best selling author to a senator, he has moved dramatically between various "classes" of earnings. Opportunity in America is distinctly classless.

Richard Noble

Eagle, Ind.

Jim Webb expresses a profoundly shocking un-American idea: From each according to his ability, to each according to his need. Our founding principle of individual rights recognizes the sovereignty of the individual in his thoughts and actions and the government as the protector of the individual's life, liberty, property and pursuit of his own individual happiness. The values he creates by his own efforts are his to dispose of as he chooses, not the property of the family, the tribe, or the state. There is no national income.

Ralph C. Whaley, M.D.

Barron, Wis.

Great Plains Drought Is a National Disaster

Your Nov. 15 editorial "Fargonomics" misrepresents the facts on agriculture disaster assistance. My bipartisan legislation would bring badly needed federal aid to the thousands of farm and ranch families whose livelihoods were destroyed by natural disasters including drought, flood, frost and disease.

This country has always responded to disasters, whether hurricanes, wildfires or drought. To represent the deepening drought of the Great Plains as anything but a national disaster is an affront to every farm family in the Midwest. This is the third worst drought in U.S. history, searing millions of acres of crops and livestock forage, and driving producers and the small town businesses that rely on them to the brink of foreclosure. If we do not respond, the drought will be followed by economic disaster across the plains.

You misrepresent the role of crop insurance. Yes, crop insurance is an important risk management tool for farmers and ranchers. But when those losses stack up year to year, as has happened as the drought conditions have worsened year after year, crop insurance loses its effectiveness -- the amount of crop loss covered goes down, while premiums go up. Crop insurance was never designed to cover repeated losses. Crop insurance isn't covering basic farm expenses, and the natural disasters depleting our farms and ranches are breaking the backbone of the Midwest economy.

DOJ_NMG_0096918

Sen. Kent Conrad (D., N.D.)

Washington

Suffering in Africa Makes Us See (RED)

Your Nov. 10 editorial "Shopping for the Poor" (Taste page, Weekend Journal) made an astute observation: "Good charity" theory includes (in its DNA) the concept of sacrifice. You suggest that (Product) RED, our venture, is playing a part in questioning the hair shirt thinking. That was great. But alas, you then committed several interpretive misdeeds.

First, you say "too bad" that many (Product) RED items are not made in Africa. Give us a chance! We've been in business in the U.S. only five weeks. But within these weeks, we now have what we never had during our two years developing this project: objective proof that (RED) branded products produce a measured commercial advantage. Because we did not have that proof during development, could you really have expected us to persuade giant multinationals to source 100% of the (RED) products in Africa? That said, it is great that Gap has been producing there for years and that Motorola was able to purchase packaging materials in Lesotho.

Now that Gap has proved our theory, you will see many more products manufactured on the continent, not because we proselytized but because companies have seen the commercial advantage in doing so.

Second, you assert that because the Geneva-based Global Fund supports "a range of heath-related projects," our manifesto's assertion that (RED) money will not purchase AIDS medicines is incorrect. I am thrilled to confirm that the fund has accepted that money made by (RED) and will be used only for purchase and delivery of medicines to those suffering from HIV in Africa, with particular emphasis on women and children.

Third, you suggest that our energy might be better spent on promoting trade with poor nations. Because we have a lot of energy, we have made this exact idea part of our work at DATA, a public education/lobbying organization Bono and I co-founded in 2000. In fact, DATA is an acronym for "Debt Aids Trade for Africa" in return for "Democracy, Accountability and Transparency for Africa." Along with many others, we have supported new trade initiatives, including the Millennium Challenge Corp., change to customs regulations and AGOA, the African Growth and Opportunity Act, which allows tremendous new investment and trade between the U.S. and Africa. Our sister entity, one.org, works on trade issues in a grassroots manner.

We created (RED) to bring the marketing brilliance and the budgets of the private sector to bear on the greatest human health-care crisis in history. To make this happen, we needed a device, a brand that would enable the bravest and smartest companies to invest and to make money on that investment. (RED) is that brand.

Gap's campaign has proved our idea not only by its genius advertising and products, but by that fact that all Gap employees have been trained to explain this crisis to customers. In malls across America, young Americans are explaining AIDS to their customers and selling them T-shirts made in Lesotho and denim made in America from African cotton. As success builds on itself, more products will be sourced in Africa.

In addition, Motorola has launched its (Product) RED phones with Sprint and US Cellular -- wait until sales people in Sprint stores are telling stories about the positive effects of America's medicines and the opportunities for investment in Africa. Wow.

The Wall Street Journal

200 Liberty Street

New York, N.Y. 10281

Fax: (212) 416-2255

E-mail: wsj.ltrs@wsj.com

Because of the large volume of mail, all letters are subject to abridgment and those unpublished can be neither acknowledged nor returned.

Navajos' Desert Cleanup No More Than A Mirage (LAT)

By Judy Pasternak, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, November 21, 2006

Through a federal program, decontamination seemed possible. But delays and disputes thwarted the effort.

Church Rock Mine, N.M. — Most of the mining companies that drilled, dug and blasted for uranium on the Navajo reservation during the Cold War did nothing to repair the environmental damage they left behind. For a time, tribal leaders staked their hopes for a cleanup on Superfund, the landmark legislation that forces polluters to pay for remediation of toxic sites.

More than 1,000 abandoned mines are scattered across the Navajo homeland, which covers 27,000 square miles in Arizona, Utah and New Mexico.

DOJ_NMG_0096919

Such a comprehensive cleanup is "exactly what Superfund was designed for," said Paul Connor, a lawyer who once directed Superfund enforcement policy for the Environmental Protection Agency.

It hasn't happened. Bureaucratic delays and misunderstandings between the tribe and the EPA have prevented the Navajos from tapping Superfund's deep pockets and broad legal authority.

Instead, the tribe reluctantly settled for a partial cleanup under a separate program. That effort left many hazards untouched.

One of them is in Church Rock Mine, a Navajo community named for an abandoned uranium site. A 30-foot-high heap of grit and dynamited stone from the mine looms over a cluster of 15 homes. The wind roars for hours at a time, scattering radioactive dust throughout the settlement.

For years, residents appealed to tribal leaders and the U.S. government for help. In 2003, tired of waiting, they joined forces with Navajo activists who were using a foundation grant to conduct radiation testing.

In a dry wash where generations of children had played catch and tag, they discovered elevated radiation levels.

As word spread of the citizen effort, authorities stirred at last. Under pressure from the tribe, the EPA opened negotiations with the mine's operator, United Nuclear Corp., and its parent, General Electric Co., to clean up the mess.

If the companies eventually foot the bill, it would mark the first time a polluter has been held to account under Superfund for contaminating the reservation.

But like the Church Rock families, members of other Navajo communities are done waiting for the government to act. They have reached out to environmental groups or university scientists, hoping to fashion their own solutions.

"The Navajos need a champion," said Glynn R. Alsup, a retired Army Corps of Engineers official who served as a liaison to the Navajos. "The EPA and the tribe should be knocking on doors in Congress every year if they need money. I don't see that happening."

*

Thwarted efforts

The Navajos allowed intensive uranium mining by private companies starting in the 1940s. The lone buyer of the uranium was the federal government. The nuclear arms race with the Soviet Union was just beginning, and U.S. officials were desperate for material to make atomic bombs.

In contracts typed on onion-skin paper, the companies promised to leave the land "in as good condition as received." The federal Bureau of Indian Affairs approved all leases and was supposed to enforce their terms.

When demand for uranium eased in the late 1950s, mines and processing mills began to close. The operators often left behind open tunnels and shafts and piles of radioactive tailings. Rarely did they fence off the sites or post warning signs. Federal inspectors knew of the hazards but seldom intervened.

Decades passed. As former miners were dying of lung cancer and respiratory disease in the 1970s, their widows started to wonder whether they and their children were endangered by the detritus of the uranium boom.

In 1982, the tribal government demanded $6.7 million from a federal claims court to seal and clean about 300 mines. The tribe argued that federal inspectors had failed to enforce safety standards in order to keep down the price of bomb material.

A judge rejected the claim in 1985, calling the allegations "entirely speculative."

Next, tribal officials considered suing the mining companies. But a legal consultant advised that victory was unlikely because the firms had operated and departed with government approval.

The only other parties possibly liable were tribal members who had staked mineral claims and leased them to outside companies. But few of those Navajos made much money.

Running short of options, the tribe pinned its hopes on Superfund.

*

Superfund criteria

The 1980 law gave the EPA power to identify the worst toxic-waste sites and force polluters to pay for cleanup, health studies, clinics, maintenance and monitoring. If no polluters could be found, EPA could pay for the cleanup from its $1.6-billion trust.

To get a site on Superfund's priority list, the tribe had to document the pollution. So staff members of the Navajo environmental commission, established in 1972, went from mine to mine, assessing contamination levels.

As they drove near New Mexico's Haystack Butte in 1990, their radiation detector began beeping. They determined that the radiation was coming from two mining complexes just outside the reservation. More than 50 Navajos lived within half a mile. Inspectors from the federal Centers for Disease Control and Prevention declared a health emergency.

DOJ_NMG_0096920

Determining who was responsible for the contamination proved arduous. Most of the mine operators had vanished. The Department of Energy paid to clean a part of the site once leased by the Atomic Energy Commission. Another portion was owned by the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway. A subsidiary had mined there, and the railroad agreed to pay for cleanup.

The EPA did not pursue any other companies and ultimately paid for the balance of the cleanup — $500,000. The work was finished in 1992.

Sadie Hoskie, then the Navajo environmental administrator, figured there had to be another way. Restoring the reservation one mine at a time would take too long.

"We were concerned about the health impacts on the people," recalled Hoskie, who was working for the Navajos while on leave from a position at the EPA. "Their daily lives were not as safe as they believed."

In 1993, Hoskie went to Washington to complain. She told members of two House subcommittees that the Navajos wanted "speedy, thorough and permanent remediation of all sites."

Of 42 abandoned mines investigated by her staff, 28 were hazardous under Superfund criteria. But none had made it onto the national priority list — a sought-after status that all but assured the EPA would put its money and muscle behind a cleanup.

The reservation's low population density worked against the Navajos in the Superfund ranking system. The process "has proven a failure and must be changed," Hoskie said.

Rep. George Miller (D-Martinez) criticized the "piecemeal and uncoordinated approach" that "fails to eliminate the radiation health hazard."

Bill Richardson, then a Democratic congressman from New Mexico and now the state's governor, said the work at Haystack Butte was "all well and good, but "there must be a final and complete way to address the problems of cleanup."

*

Disagreements

To Hoskie, King Tutt Mesa illustrated the need for a comprehensive approach.

The rock tabletop in the reservation's northeast section was once the domain of a Navajo couple named King and Despah Tutt.

From 1953 to 1958, the Tutts leased a parcel known as King Tutt No. 1 to a succession of operators, the largest of which was Vanadium Corp. of America.

In 1989, Navajo inspectors visited the abandoned site and found huge mounds of dust and ore rich in uranium and other heavy metals — vanadium, selenium and arsenic. They also found products of uranium's decay — radium, radon gas, thorium and lead.

About 200 mines had been bored into the mesa. Hoskie suggested lumping them into one Superfund application. She believed that "the sheer number of sites" would make the application hard to reject.

After hearing her House testimony, EPA officials said they would consider the proposal.

In January 1994, tribal and federal officials gathered in Albuquerque to devise a plan for the mesa. But they quickly got bogged down. They couldn't even agree on the minutes of the meeting.

The Navajos thought the government had committed to pursuing "responsible parties" early in the process and listed this as an "action item" in their summary of the discussion.

After getting a copy, the EPA wrote back: "Please delete as an action item…. USEPA did not agree."

In 1996, federal officials finally concluded that King Tutt Mesa did meet criteria for a Superfund cleanup.

But because there were only 19 homes within three miles, its chances of making the national priority list were uncertain, said Andrew Bain, a regional EPA manager.

There was one sure way to make the cut. The Navajo president, like any state governor, could designate a single site for the national list. If the president wrote a letter, King Tutt Mesa could be the one.

But by then, the EPA was urging the tribe to consider a different path.

*

Another approach

Long before the uranium boom, miners had been digging for coal in Navajo country. Hundreds of spent coal mines dotted the reservation, and by the 1990s the tribe was filling and sealing them.

The work was paid for with fees collected from coal mining companies across the country and distributed by the Interior Department. The EPA began pushing the Navajos to use this coal money to seal the uranium mines, too.

Hoskie much preferred Superfund. The coal program wasn't designed to deal with the complicated issues surrounding the uranium sites.

Superfund gave the EPA the power to clean polluted groundwater that had spread beyond a mining site. The coal program couldn't pay for that.

DOJ_NMG_0096921

Superfund could remove and replace homes built with radioactive waste, a pervasive problem on the reservation. The coal program couldn't pay for that, either.

Superfund could go after mining companies to pay for cleanups. The coal program couldn't.

But the coal-fee money had one big advantage: It was readily available.

As for Superfund, even if the tribe put King Tutt Mesa on the national priority list, EPA's pursuit of the polluters could get tied up in court for years. The hundreds of other Superfund candidates on the reservation faced even longer delays, if they made the list at all.

In May 1994, the Navajos finished sealing entrances to the reservation's coal mines. The Interior Department certified that the tribe could start using coal money to fill uranium mines.

In the Navajo capital of Window Rock, Ariz., the time had come to make a choice.

Navajo Abandoned Mine Lands, the tribal unit that sealed old mines, was ready to start work on King Tutt "right then and there," recalled Stanley Edison, a chemist for the Navajo environmental agency.

"We'd been waiting, and the residents had been waiting," he said.

A partial cleanup trumped none at all, Navajo officials decided.

*

Starting over

Over the next decade, the tribe's workers sealed about 900 uranium mines, at a cost of more than $25 million. The achievement was substantial: Most of the old pits and shafts no longer presented a temptation to people and animals seeking shelter and water.

But Madeline Roanhorse, head of the Abandoned Mine Lands department, noted at a 2004 meeting in Washington that her staff was charged with fixing "physical hazards, not subsurface contamination."

Another problem is that erosion keeps undoing the tribe's work. In the desert, drought and wind continually strip the earthen covers off the mines and waste piles, exposing radioactive material. The tribe's maintenance workers have trouble keeping up with this wearing-away. The task will become harder if Congress approves a proposal to shift more coal-fee money to eastern states.

King Tutt Mesa reflects the limitations of the coal-fee program. Tribal workers have sealed the many shafts and tunnels, but polluted groundwater remains, and condemned homes, built with radioactive waste, still stand nearby.

So the effort to get the site listed for Superfund action is starting over.

On hearing this, Hoskie, now back in the Denver office of the EPA, sighed loudly. "Oh, my goodness," she said. "I don't think that the [coal-fee] reclamation is enough…. It's so bureaucratic. Why can't we rise above it?"

In 1999, Phelps Dodge Corp. swallowed the vestiges of Vanadium Corp. of America. Phelps Dodge is currently spending millions of dollars to clean up 10 former Vanadium Corp. uranium sites in remote canyons in Colorado and Utah. The company acted at the urging of the U. S. Bureau of Land Management and the Forest Service, which were concerned about the safety of hikers and campers.

Whenever Phelps Dodge is informed of such health hazards, "we will of course take responsible action," company spokesman Kenneth Vaughn said.

Asked why the firm was not cleaning King Tutt Mesa or other Vanadium Corp. sites on the Navajo reservation, Vaughn said there was a simple explanation:

"No one asked."

*

Turning elsewhere

In 1998, the EPA finally began to test for radiation and water contamination throughout the reservation. Navajo leaders saw reason to hope for the thorough cleanup that had eluded them for so long. But the sampling effort ended prematurely after an argument between tribal and U.S. officials over control of information.

The Navajos demanded that the federal crew pack up and leave. The sampling never resumed.

Ordinary Navajos resolved to turn elsewhere for help.

Milton Yazzie had been trying for seven years to get the tribe or EPA to test springs and reservoirs in Black Falls, Ariz. He suspected that cancers, kidney disease and eye problems among his family and neighbors were connected to the uranium mines. Yazzie drove an hour or more to Flagstaff, Ariz., several times a week to fill barrels with drinking water for his family.

In 2002, he persuaded EPA officials to hold a meeting at his parents' home to talk about uranium hazards. A year later, the agency honored him as an "environmental hero." He drove to San Francisco to receive a plaque.

"Despite approaching numerous agencies, the area remains without clean, regulated water," an EPA news release said.

DOJ_NMG_0096922

Yet six months later, the EPA denied an application from the U.S. Indian Health Service for a grant to bring clean water to Black Falls. The project was "ineligible," EPA officials said, because there was no evidence that the locals were drinking polluted water.

At wit's end, Yazzie asked researchers at Northern Arizona University to help. He guided chemistry professor Jani Ingram to six springs, wells and reservoirs. Tests of the water found dangerous concentrations of uranium and arsenic.

The Indian Health Service went back to the EPA. Eventually, the agency provided $830,000 for a pipeline to Black Falls Bible Church, where water will be sold to residents. The pipeline is expected to be finished in 2008.

But Yazzie, 49, said he would always wonder whether tainted water caused the kidney cancer that took his sister's life last year. She was 59.

When a tribal official e-mailed condolences, Yazzie typed a choppy reply: "There isn't a day that goes by thinking, what if I had done things differently, something would have been accomplished."

In the hamlet of Red Valley, Ariz., residents fear that pollution from uranium mines will spoil their plans for a new ball field, senior center, high school and other development. The planning committee contacted Franz Geiger, a chemist at Northwestern University, who sampled six wells in June 2004 and found uranium and arsenic. The concentrations were particularly high in a well serving 200 students at Red Rock Day School.

Back on campus, Geiger and a student researcher experimented with filters they hoped would remove the contaminants. The filters took out uranium, but not arsenic.

"It's at best a temporary solution," Geiger said, "but it's something."

*

A big gray heap

Before United Nuclear Corp. began mining there in 1968, the valley where the big waste pile now stands was called Red Water, for the color of the local pond after a heavy rain. But residents soon adopted the name of their noisy new neighbor, Church Rock Mine.

Before long, they got used to the rumble of pickup trucks dropping low-grade ore off a ridge. In time, the waste pile reached the top of the cliff and stretched along its breadth.

Teddy Nez, his wife and their children lived about 500 feet from the heap. When United Nuclear closed the mine in 1982, Nez assumed the company would haul away the waste. He was wrong. He watched with concern as sheep, goats and cattle climbed up the pile and onto the ridge and as people searched the property for sacred herbs for healing ceremonies.

Through the 1980s, Nez, his wife Bertha and her cousin lobbied Navajo leaders to complain to the EPA.

Diane Malone, the tribe's liaison to the Superfund program, said she didn't learn about the waste pile until the mid-'90s, and then by chance. She was invited on a tour of United Nuclear's nearby processing mill, just off the reservation, which was being cleaned under Superfund.

Malone glimpsed the gray heap on the Navajo side of the border. On future visits to the mill site, she'd ask company and EPA officials: "Why is that pile still sitting there?"

"Nobody really took it seriously," she said.

Through fellow Navajos, Church Rock residents made contact with Chris Shuey, who studies uranium issues for the Southwest Research and Information Center in Albuquerque. With Shuey's help, Navajo activists had obtained a $90,000 grant to conduct radiation testing. Church Rock Mine was added to the project.

On learning of the grass-roots effort, the EPA provided technicians and a van with radiation-scanning equipment. The tribe donated detectors and training.

Malone joined the Navajos who walked through the residential community near the waste pile in October 2003, halting every few steps to take readings at waist and ground level. The morning was cold and blustery and the readings confirmed that the sand stinging their faces was radioactive.

"We just wanted to get out of there," she said.

The EPA concluded that chronic exposure to the radiation levels in the valley could lead to bone, liver and breast cancers.

In September, after negotiations with the agency, United Nuclear agreed to investigate the extent of the contamination. Then the two sides will discuss what further steps to take.

The network of families in the valley includes 96 grandchildren. The grown-ups want them to be able to stay and raise families of their own.

"We would like for them to build houses here that are safe," said Teddy Nez. "That's our goal."

judy.pasternak@latimes.com

Times researcher Mark Madden contributed to this report.*

DOJ_NMG_0096923

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Senators To FBI: Get A VCF Refund (GCN)

By Wilson P. Dizard III

Government Computer News, November 21, 2006

Proposal would pit bureau against SAIC over failure

The Senate's draft of the appropriations bill for the Justice Department and the FBI would order the bureau to use "all means necessary" to try to recover funds from the vendor of its failed Virtual Case File project.

In an unusual action, according to several sources, the draft legislation—known as HR 5672, the Departments of Commerce and Justice, Science and Related Agencies appropriations bill—directs the bureau to retrieve as much as $104 million from the defaulted VCF contract.

The FBI hired Science Applications International Corp. of San Diego in 2001 to build VCF, which was intended to create an investigative case management system. The FBI pulled the plug in 2005 after realizing the system would not work.

A key sentence in the Senate report language for HR 5672 reads: "In addition, the Committee expects the FBI to use all means necessary, including legal action, to recover all erroneous charges from the VCF contractor ... ."

The Senate's reference to "the VCF contractor" especially singles out SAIC.

The FBI and SAIC both declined to comment on the legislation and related VCF matters.

If the FBI could recover funds, the bill would direct the bureau to use the money it would potentially recover from the VCF contractors on its current case management project, known as Sentinel.

The House version of the bill does not include a similar provision—meaning if the full Senate passes the bill with the language intact, it still could be stripped out during the conference committee session between the two bodies.

If the FBI were to try to take legal action to recover the VCF funds, it would be stepping into a legal and political minefield, sources close to the project said.

For one thing, even after the FBI had decided to scuttle the investigative case management system, SAIC recommended that the bureau should deploy VCF and made detailed technical proposals on how it could be salvaged.

Another critical problem is that the bureau has accepted some responsibility for the demise of the VCF project [GCN.com, Quickfind 714]. Sources close to the project said that some of the senior officials in place during the VCF fiasco—including director Robert Mueller—still hold powerful jobs in the bureau, and their reputations could suffer if a public lawsuit or civil trial unveiled the details of their roles.

The Senate Appropriations Committee itself acknowledged the bureau's role in bungling VCF, in report language attached to HR 5672: "The Committee understands that the FBI shares much of the burden for past IT failures."

One federal official involved in the VCF incident noted that federal contract law requires an agency that has cancelled a project because of contractor default to attempt to recover the funds from the contractor. "The FBI did not carry out that obligation because it never punishes its own," the official said.

"The real issue is why didn't they [seek to get the money back from SAIC]," the official said. "The world's greatest investigative body slowed this down. The answer is culpability of the FBI officials who are still there. Mueller says he takes the responsibility. I still think there is accountability and culpability."

A prominent federal procurement law attorney noted, "In general, when it terminates for default, the government has the same rights as a private party would in the event of a breach of contract [to recover misused funds].

"However, what the government usually does is to assess 'excess reprocurement costs,' " the attorney said. "In other words, it buys the same thing from someone else, and if it costs more, it charges the difference to the defaulted contractor."

The procurement attorney cautioned that he had not studied the specific details of the FBI's pact with SAIC, so he could not comment on how the general principles of federal contract law would apply to that specific matter.

The FBI and SAIC both declined to comment on the legislation and related VCF matters.

Legislative analysts said the VCF fund recovery language was inserted at the behest of Sen. Judd Gregg (R-N.H.), who is the second most senior Republican member of the Appropriations Subcommittee on Commerce, Justice and Science. Gregg's office did not respond to a detailed inquiry on the matter.

The full name of HR 5672 is the Departments of Commerce and Justice, Science and Related Agencies Appropriations Bill, [fiscal] 2007.

In addition to requiring the FBI to get back the money it paid to SAIC, the bill imposed other restrictions on the bureau that reflected the committee's skepticism that the agency is capable of managing large software projects.

DrugNet, Chapter 3: The PowerPoint (PHI)

By John Shiffman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, November 21, 2006

THE STORY SO FAR: Pills discovered at Philly's airport launch DEA's first global Internet pharmacy case, leading agents to a rendezvous with a mysterious shipper and a clue from overseas. Today's installment begins as Akhil Bansal, smuggling a half-million pills a month here from India, prepares for the biggest business meeting of his young life. It is July 2004.

ROXBOROUGH

"A red tie?"

Akhil Bansal scoffed. So far, he had accepted most of his roommate Atul Patil's advice for the big meeting: Put together a compelling PowerPoint presentation. Lean forward when you speak. Exaggerate your expenses, and expect the buyer to do the same. Above all, don't budge on price.

But the color of a tie? What difference could it make?

"It is a business tie - red means power," explained Patil, also an MBA student at Temple University. "You want them to take you seriously."

Akhil knotted the tie. The Manhattan meeting his father, Brij Bansal, had set up from India was too important to ignore any detail. A Costa Rican client sought an exclusive deal to buy 500,000 generic pills a month. Millions of dollars were at stake.

Akhil stepped from his apartment near Fairmount Park in Philadelphia and into the humid day. The laptop he carried contained a PowerPoint presentation of which he was very proud - one that months later would come back to haunt him.

He revved his Chevy TrailBlazer and sped toward Manhattan.

CHINATOWN

Like most law enforcement agencies in Philadelphia, DEA liked to keep cases in the family.

When other agencies got involved, DEA worried about losing control. Or sharing the credit - what feds called "the stat" - or sharing cash, cars and property seized in the arrests.

Carlos Aquino understood this.

He also understood that this case was different. DEA had never conducted an Internet pharmacy case on such a scale. It needed help.

What Carlos initially viewed as a quick-hit investigation had morphed into something much bigger, perhaps the case of his career.

Four months earlier, Carlos traced 119 packages of generic Valium and Viagra to a Chester shipper and two Indian graduate students. The shipper was an ex-con. The Indians looked like small-timers, couriers maybe.

The identity of the real targets - the Internet pharmacy kingpins - wasn't clear yet. But already a clue found at the shipper's storefront had led to something called Rx-mart.com, and from there to an Australian pharmacy with global tentacles.

So far, DEA had identified suspect Web pharmacies in Australia, India, Germany, New York, Virginia and Philadelphia. The pharmacies bought generic drugs for pennies a pill, then sold them online, without requiring a prescription, for a dollar apiece.

In a report Carlos shared with Homeland Security, he wrote: "Early investigative findings indicate... sales of $108 million annually... . This organization generates enough revenue per year to purchase a virtually unlimited supply of drugs."

In short, a public-health nightmare - people, even teens, buying highly addictive pills online, generics made cheap overseas, from who knows where.

Carlos approached DEA supervisor Jeff Breeden to begin putting together a team with other agencies. At a minimum, they would need people to trace Web sites, track bank accounts, run surveillance, supervise wiretaps, and trace passport and customs data.

Carlos sat in his DEA cubicle on Eighth Street, looked at the ferns, the Puerto Rican flag, and his Emiliano Zapata poster, and tried to think of a sexy title for the investigation, something to remind everyone who was top dog.

Carlos called it "Carlito's Way."

N.J. TURNPIKE

Akhil drove as fast as he dared, rolling through toll plazas with E-ZPass, toward Jersey's congested north and Manhattan.

He loved driving, just as he loved computers and business.

He missed India's hectic traffic with its Darwinian rules. For a young man who hated video games - they wasted valuable computer memory - driving was the ultimate reality game.

At home, he'd snake through Agra's clogged, 16th-century roads, then break onto the highways that split farmland between Agra and Delhi, or roar east to the Himalayas and Nepal. He'd push his Korean sedan to 80 m.p.h., crank up the air, and blast his 12-CD stereo, the woofer thumping Phil Collins or a Hindi cover of "Pretty Woman."

DOJ_NMG_0096925

Using the horn more than the brake, like any good Indian driver, Akhil would lean low, bouncing from lane to lane, zooming past cows, chickens, scrawny dogs, motorized rickshaws, camels carting rice, semis hauling flammable fuels, pickups stacked with wind-whipped riders. He'd fly by grimy green buses jammed with lesser castes, by women ferrying jugs on their heads, by motorbikes balancing families of four.

The sight of the Manhattan skyline with its steel canyons jolted Akhil back to the task at hand.

He did his best to act cool, but he was glad his roommate had come along. Patil was 30, five years older than Akhil, though his receding hairline made him appear older than that. Patil read books on the art of negotiation. Patil knew what he was doing.

They were on their way to meet Corrina Meherer, an executive for Interphar, a Costa Rican-based Internet pharmacy that also operated strip clubs. Interphar, looking to expand its business with the Bansals, had sent Meherer to New York to eyeball Akhil and his operation.

Akhil viewed the meeting as a different kind of test. He had built his father's U.S. business into an efficient, assembly-line operation, largely by phone and e-mail. But now he was headed for his first face-to-face business negotiation.

Could he close the deal? Or was he some young poseur playing businessman in a fantasy league?

WASHINGTON

DEA Administrator Karen Tandy had just settled into her seat at a U.S. Senate hearing, her prepared text next to the microphone, when the chairman began to rant.

"We are drowning in a flood of imported drugs of unknown composition and origin as well as potentially lethal controlled substances," Sen. Norm Coleman said. Unknown quantities of untested imported drugs too easily slip through customs, he said, mostly through regular cargo to JFK Airport.

"The federal government has been on notice about this issue for at least five years," the Minnesota Republican complained. "Many of the initiatives that we will hear about today sound eerily familiar. I am concerned by the apparent lack of progress in getting our arms around this glaring problem."

Tandy didn't disagree. "The attorney general and I have made it a priority," she said.

CHINATOWN

By midsummer, Carlos and Breeden had finished assembling a team for Operation Carlito's Way:

DEA agent Eric Russ - age 36, a no-nonsense former Marine who had worked hard-core pot, cocaine and heroin jobs, but never a pill case. No Internet jock, he still used AOL dial-up at home. His assignment: With Carlos, supervise the case.

IRS agent Aaron Carp - age 25, eager, hungry for something significant. His assignment: Trace bank records.

FBI agent Jason Huff - age 30, a buttoned-down software engineer recently transferred from the antiterror squad. His assignment: Trace the Web addresses of pharmacies and make undercover online purchases.

Immigration Customs Enforcement agent Andrew McCrossan - age 55, paternal, a customs inspector for 23 years. His assignment: Search passport, travel and global financial databases and determine how pills are smuggled past Customs.

Lower Merion Police Officer Christine Konieczny - age 35, quick-witted, a natural leader, one of a dozen suburban Philadelphia officers on loan to DEA since 2001. Her assignment: Supervise surveillance of the Indian suspects.

At Carlos' request, Konieczny took Carp and Huff on an early undercover job. When the young crewcut agents showed up, veteran cops on the detail cringed.

The baby-faced FBI man wore a suit, making him look a lot like... an FBI agent. And the IRS kid? He sported a Hawaiian shirt and shades, like something off the set of Magnum, P.I.

Konieczny laughed.

FORT LAUDERDALE, FLA.

Vic Devore, who ran bigcitymeds.com, studied the spam e-mail:

The medicine are the best quality available in India. We have made arrangements to ship within five to six days, in any part of USA, without any Customs problem. If you are interested...

Devore, 25, had chiseled cheekbones, white teeth, dark hair, and all-American aspirations to become a celebrity and a millionaire. He appeared well on his way, too. Devore gave traffic reports on South Florida radio and operated Web sites; some of them sold Zippo lighters, some sold generic Valium, Viagra, Darvon and Xanax.

Devore excelled at Web design, but had no medical training, not even a college degree. He didn't read the medical histories customers sometimes sent him. He didn't understand the legal disclaimers he posted. It was just marketing, words to make it all look legit.

Devore thought about the Indian's e-mail. This guy, Dr. Brij Bansal, was saying he could ship from inside the United States, which meant fewer packages seized by Customs, which meant more money.

From a Google search, Devore knew this was all illegal. Whatever. He e-mailed Bansal back.

MANHATTAN

DOJ_NMG_0096926

At a hotel near Times Square, Akhil met Meherer - 34, slender, in jeans and a T-shirt.

Akhil shook hands, feeling silly in his suit. He shot Patil a screw-you stare: Red tie, eh?

Akhil opened his laptop. Time to wow her.

Akhil titled his PowerPoint presentation Evolution because it outlined the development of his pill distribution network.

Evolution had four chapters. The first three - "Stone Age," "Bronze Age" and "Iron Age" - recounted Akhil's struggle to ship pills by himself and later to use a private shipper. Results had been mixed.

Meherer listened.

Gaining confidence, Akhil moved to the final chapter, "Revolution." His was a professional operation! Pills were now shipped in bulk from India to a home in Queens. Each morning, women working there downloaded customer orders and fulfilled them via UPS. With the new system, consumers got their drugs in 48 hours.

From the last slide, Akhil read aloud questions for discussion: "Can we process more orders? Can it be done with the same efficiency? How long can we keep this going? What if anything bad happens?"

He showed her clip art of Donald Duck and dollar bills. It seemed to say: Can you believe how much we're going to make?

Meherer laughed. Akhil did, too.

PLYMOUTH MEETING, PA.

Carlos wanted to meet a customer. What kind of person ordered pills online?

Of the 119 packages seized at the airport in February, a dozen had been destined for local addresses. That gave Carlos a list of leads.

As he headed out for his first visit, background data in hand, Carlos grabbed Huff, his new FBI colleague. They headed west on the Schuylkill Expressway, past Boathouse Row, past Roxborough.

Laura, an attractive woman in her mid-20s, answered the door of a luxury townhouse. Agents knew that she and her husband had no children, and that she held a six-figure sales job with, ironically, a pharmaceutical company. She looked nervous.

Carlos tried to put her at ease. "You're not in any type of trouble. We just want to talk to you about the Ambien."

Carlos saw her hands quiver as she invited them in. They sat on overstuffed couches, near a giant flat-screen TV. Everything looked new, clean. Too perfect, Carlos thought.

The woman spoke freely, almost eager to confess her secret: It all started with insomnia two years ago, for which her doctor prescribed the proper dosage - one pill a night. When the refills ended, and her doctor refused to renew the prescription, she decided she couldn't sleep without the drug. So she got online, Googled "Ambien," found a site, and bought 100 tabs with her credit card. Days later, the pills arrived.

Carlos: "How many pills a night do you take now?"

"Ten."

Ten? The agents tried not to flinch. Two years hooked on Ambien, at possibly lethal doses.

Carlos stepped gingerly. "Have you ordered any lately?"

The woman walked to a closet, where she hid her stash from her husband. She handed Carlos an envelope.

He spilled the pills across a coffee table and began to count.

QUEENS, N.Y.

Akhil felt pumped.

The meeting with Meherer had gone so well that the next day he took her to the Queens depot to show her how sophisticated his operation really was.

There was his fulfillment center, a clean, brick rowhouse secured by bars on the windows. He'd called ahead to send the workers home. Coffee and snacks were waiting.

Inside, Akhil gave Meherer and her Asian assistant the full tour:

Here, on the ground floor, was the office where supervisors David and Elizabeth Armstrong received e-mail orders from online pharmacies.

Here, on the second floor, the Indian women grabbed blister packs of pills from cubbyholes, each labeled with the names of the appropriate medicine.

And here, in the basement, the women packed the pills into boxes and labeled them.

Then, Akhil explained, the Armstrongs drove the packages to their nearby home, where UPS made a pickup daily.

As they moved through the tour, Patil could sense Meherer's assistant grow uneasy.

The volume. The audacity. The risk.

Patil overheard the assistant whisper to Meherer: "My God, this guy is crazy! I want to get out."

What if the police found out? What if they seized the pills? What was the plan?

DOJ_NMG_0096927

Stealing a line from Akhil's PowerPoint presentation, the assistant said, "What if something bad happens?"

QUEENS

A crisp October evening three months later. Rush hour.

A silver Olds Alero parked half a block from the Armstrong home. In the front seat, two blond women in their mid-30s chatted. Stuffed animals lined the rear window, above two child-booster seats. A couple of neighborhood moms.

Out of sight, the driver cradled a police radio, the passenger a tiny video camera.

Weeks of grueling surveillance had brought the driver, Konieczny, and her DEA team here. The 10-person detail had spent days camped near the Indian students' spartan Roxborough apartment. The agents hadn't seen much, just trips to the grocery store and the bank.

And when this Akhil ventured out? The way he drove! So fast, so crazy. And tough to tail.

Besides, how important were these Indians, anyway? Were they stars of a global conspiracy? Or bit players?

Either way, they were now essential to the case. Even if they didn't lead the DEA to a big boss behind the Internet pharmacies, they gave the feds in Philadelphia jurisdiction. Without a local defendant in the case, the office couldn't prosecute.

In August, the DEA team had followed the Indians to another Queens home. In September, agents there photographed the Armstrongs stuffing packages into a 1999 Lincoln Continental with MOTOR vanity plates.

Now, as dusk fell, the MOTOR car arrived at the Armstrongs' driveway. The cops watched them unload large, see-through plastic bags, each with about 20 packages inside.

Paydirt.

At 7:03 p.m., a UPS truck pulled up.

"You getting this?" Konieczny asked her partner holding the camera, Christine Kelliher.

"Yeah," Kelliher shot back. "I remembered to push record."

With the videotape rolling, Konieczny narrated, "The front door opened, and the driver is starting to load the bags. One, two... I'll count them. Three, four, five. God. Six, seven, eight, nine, 10, 11..."

The bags were so light that the Armstrongs carried a big one in each hand.

"Unbelievable! She's got 12. That's 13. 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22. Oh, my!"

The packages kept coming.

"... 23, 24, 25, 26..."

The agents started laughing.

"... 27, 28. Oh, my gosh, 29, 30! I think they're done. 30 bags!"

They did the math: 30 bags, each with 20 smaller packages inside. That meant UPS had loaded about 600 packages. The average online pharmacy order was 100 tabs.

The Indians had just shipped roughly 60,000 pills illegally.

"Unbelievable," Kelliher said.

Another UPS truck appeared.

"I wonder," Konieczny suggested, "if they didn't have enough room in the first one."

Texas Man Pleads Guilty To Pot Charges (AP)

AP, November 20, 2006

LOUISVILLE, Ky. - A Texas man pleaded guilty Monday to conspiracy to distribute marijuana after he was caught driving a semi-trailer truck loaded with about 1,700 pounds of pot hidden among broccoli, authorities said.

Erasmo Castillo, 27, of Starr County, Texas, pleaded guilty to one count of conspiracy to distribute marijuana and one count of possession of marijuana with intent to distribute, said U.S. Attorney David L. Huber said in a statement.

Because of the quantity of marijuana involved, Huber said, Castillo faces a penalty of from five to 40 years in prison, a fine of not more than $4 million and a term of supervised release of at least four years.

Huber said that on June 26, 2005, a commercial vehicle inspection in Hope, Ark., revealed a semi was carrying a large quantity of marijuana. The Drug Enforcement Agency was notified and began surveillance of the semi and another vehicle. The vehicles ended up at warehouse in Louisville, where they were joined by two other vehicles. Castillo was arrested by DEA agents on June 27, 2005.

The street value of the marijuana is estimated to be approximately $7 million. None of the men arrested, including Castillo, were armed or resisted arrest.

The plea was entered before U.S. District Judge Jennifer B. Coffman for the Western District of Kentucky. Coffman has ordered a presentence investigation.

DOJ_NMG_0096928

115 Charged In Prescription-drug Sweep (LCJ)

By Tom Loftus

Louisville Courier-Journal, November 20, 2006

LEXINGTON, Ky. — More than 100 people have been charged in connection with a joint federal and state investigation into illegal prescription-drug trafficking in Eastern Kentucky.

State arrest warrants were issued Monday for 103 people in Eastern and Southeastern Kentucky, people that authorities described as street-level dealers.

In addition, 12 more people were federally indicted over the past month, including two pharmacists and 10 people authorities described as “suppliers,” authorities said in a news conference Monday.

Those indictments were unsealed Monday as arrests were made.

The drugs involved in most of the cases involved prescription painkillers such as Oxycontin, authorities said.

70 Seized In E. Kentucky Drug Sweep (LEXHL)

Lexington Herald-Leader (KY), November 21, 2006

Two licensed Kentucky pharmacists were among nearly 70 people arrested yesterday afternoon in a huge crackdown on prescription drug abuse in Eastern Kentucky.

David Gregory Jones, who owns RX Express in Ashland, and Dan Daffron, owner of Quick Script in Monticello, face federal indictments charging them with unlawful distribution of controlled narcotics. Daffron was arrested early Monday on a 16-count indictment and Jones was arrested later on a 559-count indictment.

During a news conference Monday, Kentucky State Police Capt. Joe Williams classified prescription drug abuse as "a substantial problem in Kentucky." Williams declined to go into details about the case involving the two pharmacists, but said controlled substances accounted for 98 percent of business for one of the men.

"I'm told the normal percentage at your corner drug store is about 15 percent controlled substances," he said. "This guy is out there distributing these drugs and making a lot of money off of it, getting it out to people who are going to divert it. Some of them are drug addicts themselves; a lot of them will turn around and sell them and they'll make money off it too."

Jones, according to court documents, distributed large quantities of several prescription drugs including OxyContin, hydrocodone and alprazolam. Daffron is accused of distributing several drugs, including hydrocodone, Darvocet and dextroamphetamine.

During the course of the investigation, officials say, Jones made $1.5 million and used the money to -- among other things -- pay premiums on a life insurance policy, purchase a Yamaha Grand Piano, a custom-made 10 carat diamond bracelet, property and several vehicles, including a 2005 Mercedes SCK350.

U.S. Attorney Amul Thapar said law enforcement officials were still searching for more than 30 others suspected of trafficking prescription drugs. Most, he said, appeared to be mid- to street-level dealers.

Arrested and charged with conspiring to possess and distribute quantities of controlled substances were Javed Ashiq, Roger Dean Combs, Kelly Marie Green, Tonya Lynn Groover, Kurt Francisco Kilgore. Adam Justice Palm and Kimberly Monette Palm were part of a five count indictment, charging them with two counts of conspiracy to distribute controlled substances, two counts of possession with intent to distribute controlled substances and one count of forfeiture.

The maximum penalty for all charged would be up to 20 years imprisonment.

The arrests, part of 101 arrest warrants issued for alleged dealers, some with out-of-state ties, came after an 18-month investigation involving local, state and federal law enforcement. The criminal conduct spanned more than 11 counties in the Eastern District of Kentucky and distributors were from Georgia, Indiana, Ohio and Tennessee, authorities said.

Law enforcement agencies teamed up with the anti-drug organization UNITE and Kentucky All Schedule Prescription Electronic Reporting or KASPER, a state database that helps health officials and law enforcement detect prescription fraud and drug diversion by tracking suspicious prescription patterns, Thapar said.

"Through teamwork, we're moving beyond our borders," Thapar said. "We're reaching out grabbing these people. We're reaching beyond our borders and saying 'enough. Don't bring it to Kentucky.'"

Eastern Kentucky, nicknamed the "prescription-painkiller capital of the United States," has long been known for heavy abuse of OxyContin and Vicodin.

Yesterday, Karen Engle, executive director of UNITE, said it was time to put an end to the pipeline into Eastern Kentucky. Several counties in Eastern Kentucky, she said, have more prescribed narcotics than anywhere else in the nation.

"This pipeline from Ohio and Tennessee and Virginia must stop, and it must stop now," she said.

Drug Sweep Nets More Than 50, Including 2 Pharmacists (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0096929

AP, November 21, 2006

LEXINGTON, Ky. State and federal authorities have arrested more than 50 people in a major drug sweep in eastern Kentucky today.Two pharmacists from Ashland and Monticello were among those caught in the drug busts.U-S Attorney Amul Thapar says authorities also confiscated numerous prescription drugs, including the powerful painkiller OxyContin, that were being sold on the black market.Police are still looking for about 50 more alleged street-level drug dealers named in indictments. They also are looking for black market distributors from Georgia, Indiana, Ohio and Tennessee.Investigators from the anti-drug organization UNITE coordinated the roundup.

Bonds' Personal Trainer Back In Prison (AP)

AP, November 21, 2006

DUBLIN, Calif. -- Barry Bonds' personal trainer returned to prison Monday afternoon for refusing to testify before a federal grand jury investigating Bonds' steroid use.

Greg Anderson has twice been freed on technicalities. He was ordered to report after an appeals court last week upheld the entirety of his contempt-of-court citation _ meaning Anderson could serve a year or more unless he testifies against Bonds, his boyhood friend.

In 2003, Bonds testified before a federal grand jury probing steroid use that Anderson had provided him flaxseed oil and arthritis balm, not steroids. Authorities suspect Bonds is lying, and have subpoenaed Anderson to testify.

Anderson also has served three months stemming from that steroids investigation, pleading guilty to distribution and money laundering charges.

The Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative scandal has netted five convictions, including Anderson's, and one pending indictment.

27 Face Charges In Mississippi Drug-trade Ring (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, November 21, 2006

Drug Enforcement Administration agents in Mississippi, assisted by local law-enforcement authorities, have arrested 27 persons, confiscated more than $15 million in cocaine and marijuana and seized cash and property worth $3 million as part of a lengthy undercover investigation.

"Operation Central Hub targeted and successfully dismantled one of the largest drug-trafficking operations ever known to operate in the state of Mississippi," said DEA Assistant Special Agent Stephen Luzinski in the agency's Jackson, Miss., field office.

"It was especially significant in that agents were able to successfully trace the movement of both drugs and money from the hands of high-level Mississippi traffickers into the hands of some of Mexico's most powerful drug traffickers," Mr. Luzinski said.

The Mississippi Bureau of Narcotics initiated the investigation in April 2005 and later joined forces with DEA to jointly start a federal investigation targeting multiple high-priority cocaine and marijuana trafficking distribution cells operating in Hattiesburg and the Jackson-metro area.

DEA spokesman Rusty Payne at the agency's Washington headquarters, said yesterday that the investigation also yielded criminal links to drug organizations in Dallas; Atlanta; Little Rock, Ark.; Detroit; and Laredo, Texas.

Mr. Payne said Operation Central Hub also produced important connections to Mexico, revealing direct criminal links and associations between select Mississippi organization heads and Mexican drug sources of supply. Texas-based organization members, he said, were found to be functioning as logistics coordinators in arranging the delivery of drug loads from Mexico to Mississippi.

This same group arranged for the collection of money as payment for the drugs, he said.

Through a coordinated multiagency investigative attack, agents uncovered the existence of a highly sophisticated drug-trafficking organization with tentacles across the United States, which routed large shipments of cocaine and marijuana across the border from Mexico into South Texas.

Once inside U.S. borders, Mr. Payne said drug shipments were shuttled from Texas to various cities throughout the nation in 18-wheel commercial tractor trailers operated by truck drivers employed by the Mexican drug bosses.

Investigators also discovered that the organization used large gooseneck trailers outfitted with sophisticated hidden compartments accessible only through a hydraulic remote-control system. The trailers were pulled by dual-wheel pickup trucks and were capable of holding several thousand pounds of marijuana.

Mr. Payne said Dallas, Laredo and San Antonio-based drivers and couriers routinely were dispatched to Mississippi to meet with cell leaders and deliver the drug loads.

DOJ_NMG_0096930

As part of a parallel financial investigation, he said, agents discovered that local distributors were normally provided with drug shipments on a consignment basis -- meaning that shortly after receipt, the Mexico-based suppliers and Texas logistics coordinators requested cash payment.

Agents Credited For Drug Busts (BSH)

By Robin Fitzgerald

Biloxi Sun Herald, November 21, 2006

GULFPORT - Federal authorities credit Gulfport-area narcotics agents with starting an investigation that has dismantled one of the largest drug-trafficking operations in Mississippi.

The investigation has resulted in 27 arrests and the seizure of $15 million in drugs and $2.9 million in cash and other assets, said Stephen Luzinski, assistant special agent in charge of the DEA in Jackson.

"It was especially significant," said Luzinski, "in that agents were able to successfully trace the movement of both drugs and money from the hands of high-level Mississippi traffickers into the hands of some of Mexico's most powerful drug traffickers."

As the cocaine and marijuana investigation expanded, it became known as Operation Central Hub and linked courier travels with cash payments at hotels mostly in the Hattiesburg and Jackson areas.

The investigation was launched in April 2005 by the Mississippi Bureau of Narcotics and agents assigned to DEA's Gulfport district office, which includes Hattiesburg.

Operation Central Hub produced "important connections" to Mexico with criminal links in Mississippi and in Texas, where drug delivery arrangements were coordinated, Luzinski said.

Once the drug shipments crossed the U.S. borders, they were shuttled to various cities, primarily in 18-wheelers driven by employees of Mexican drug bosses. The drugs often were hidden compartments or commingled with legitimate cargo loads.

In some cases, the deliveries used "large, gooseneck trailers that were outfitted with sophisticated hidden compartments accessible only through a hydraulic remote control system," Luzinski said.

Drivers and couriers based in Dallas, Laredo and San Antonio were sent routinely to Mississippi to deliver the drugs. The large loads of cash were then hidden in 18-wheelers for delivery to Mexico.

Luzinski said the investigation also turned up illegal drug links in Atlanta, Detroit and Laredo, Texas.

Police Find One Completed IED, Components For More Explosive Devices (DLYSENT)

By Emily Taravella

The Nacogdoches (TX) Daily Sentinel, November 21, 2006

The components of an explosive device and a psilocybin mushroom/marijuana-growing operation were discovered early Monday in a unit at Lakewood Village Apartments, by Nacogdoches police officers investigating an assault.

One resident of the apartment unit was undergoing psychiatric evaluation Monday. At press time, no arrests had been made.

Nacogdoches police and fire, along with University police officials and ATF agents cordon off a section of apartments where they say they found 'components' that could be used to craft an explosive devise.

A joint investigation is being conducted by the Nacogdoches Police Department and the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, according to Sgt. Greg Sowell, NPD community relations officer.

Although Sowell did not release the nature of the components seized by the ATF, he said the ATF is describing them as "components that could be assembled as an improvised explosive device."

"As it stands, the investigation is in preliminary stages," he said. "Everything has been seized, and the apartment has been released. Arrests could be forthcoming."

Sowell said the report of assault came in around 1 a.m.

After discovering the components of an explosive device, some of the surrounding Lakewood units were evacuated. Lakewood Street was closed from North Street to North Pecan Street until the ATF arrived.

IMMIGRATION:

Arizona Growers Race Against The Clock To Find Winter Harvest Workers (USAT)

By Daniel González

USA Today, November 21, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0096931

YUMA, Ariz. — C.R. Waters practically lives in his pickup now that harvest season has begun for the winter vegetable capital of the USA.

As the farm manager for a major vegetable distributor, he makes sure everything from iceberg lettuce to broccoli is ready to pick at precise times.

Good weather has created ideal growing conditions, but Waters is worried that when the vegetables are ready, there won't be enough laborers to get crops out of the fields to market.

Waters, president of the Yuma Fresh Vegetable Association, said it will take 30,000 seasonal workers to harvest the sea of winter vegetables grown in Yuma County, where the fruit and vegetable crop was valued at $745 million in 2004. The area produces 90% of the winter vegetables consumed in the USA and Canada, and 98% of the iceberg lettuce, according to the Arizona office of the National Agricultural Statistics Service, a part of the U.S. Department of Agriculture.

If growers can't find enough workers, some crops may go unpicked. That could increase prices at the supermarket, and create substantial financial losses for farmers.

Last year some growers overproduced, so prices stayed low even though some labor contractors reported a 30% shortage of workers. Yuma growers won't know how severe the labor shortage will be until the harvest kicks into high gear this month. To hedge their bets, they planted 15% fewer acres this year.

“You can have the best crop in the world, but if you don't have the labor to harvest it, it's going to rot in the field,” Waters said.

Growers and farm advocates say the shortages, even with thousands of legal Mexican laborers, have become more severe as stricter immigration enforcement, tighter border security and increased competition from construction and other industries have shrunk the pool of seasonal workers.

The shortages are not limited to the Yuma region. Vegetable growers in Colorado, pear growers in northern California, and apple growers in Washington, all have lacked workers. During the harvest, lettuce pickers earn a base pay of $8 an hour, plus bonuses the faster they pick. The best lettuce pickers can earn as much as $12 to $14 an hour.

For years, these workers have served as the backbone of the labor force in Yuma. Many farmworkers, however, have been drawn by steady jobs at housing developments and construction sites sprouting up around Yuma that pay better.

The increased presence of Border Patrol agents also has scared some illegal workers already in the USA away from Arizona.

In the past year, the Border Patrol also doubled the number of agents assigned to the Yuma sector to 551. Another 200 are on the way. The buildup is having an effect, the Border Patrol reports. Arrests for the 2006 fiscal year that ended Sept. 30 declined 14%, to 118,549 from 138,438 the year before.

“As we gain more operational control, they (smugglers) are seeking other routes,” Border Patrol agent Maranda Weber said. “In the past, there were a lot of undocumented doing this work but now there is so much border enforcement,” said Glafira Sanchez, a lettuce crew foreman for Valley Pride, a vegetable harvester in Yuma.

Growers such as Doug Mellon, 61, scoff at that notion that growers would have less trouble finding workers if they paid more. Because unemployment is low, there simply aren't enough workers, he said. On top of that, most Americans shun farm work.

“I don't care if you paid $40 (an hour), they'd do it about three hours and say, ‘That's not for me,' ” Mellon said.

Many growers say the long-term solution is an expanded “guest worker” program for agriculture.

Earlier this year, the Senate passed comprehensive immigration changes, legislation that included a provision known as AgJobs, which would have created a new temporary-resident status for seasonal farmworkers and given long-term farmworkers a chance to apply for permanent residence.

During negotiations in Congress this year, Yuma farmers offered to test a scaled-down version that would have allowed Mexican workers to commute daily across the border with temporary work visas. Conservative Republicans in the House, however, refused to consider the comprehensive immigration changes, angering growers who tend to vote Republican.

“I hate to say this, but the Republicans in Congress just played politics with this and never came up with a solution. It has really frustrated me,” said Mellon, a Republican.

Now growers hope the new democratically controlled Congress will revive guest-worker legislation next year.

As for this year's harvest?

“It's too late,” Mellon said.

DOJ_NMG_0096932

TAX:

IRS Links Increased Revenue To More Audits (WP/AP)

By Jim Abrams, Associated Press

The Washington Post, November 21, 2006

A taxpayer who made more than $1 million had a one-in-16 chance of being audited by the IRS in the fiscal year just ended, up slightly from the year before.

Commissioner Mark W. Everson said in a telephone news conference Monday that the Internal Revenue Service also paid more attention to the filings of small businesses that tend to underreport incomes and to the records of tax-exempt organizations.

Overall, enforcement revenues for fiscal 2006 were $48.7 billion, up from $47.3 billion. Revenues in fiscal 2005 had jumped 10 percent because of collections from a crackdown on improper tax shelters.

"We have restored the credibility of our enforcement programs which were badly diminished and to some degree gutted" in the 1990s, Everson said.

The "tax gap," the difference between what taxpayers owe and what is collected, has been estimated as $345 billion annually, and congressional Democrats coming to power see closing this gap as an important way to raise revenue without raising taxes.

Everson said that audits of individuals making $1 million or more increased to 17,015 from 12,835. That was an increase only from 6.1 percent to 6.3 percent because of the growing number of millionaires. About 1 percent of all taxpayers face audits.

Audits of people with incomes surpassing $100,000 were up 18 percent, to 257,000. Total audits increased 6 percent, to almost 1.3 million.

Everson said there was also a one-third increase in audits of S corporations, to almost 14,000. An S corporation is generally a small business in which profits pass through to the owners, who report them on their personal tax returns.

He said the IRS had added resources to its tracking of charitable and tax-exempt organizations, with audits up 43 percent to 7,079.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

GOP Leaving Spending Bills To Democrats (AP-Y)

By Andrew Taylor

AP, November 21, 2006

Republicans vacating the Capitol are dumping a big spring cleaning job on Democrats moving in. GOP leaders have opted to leave behind almost a half-trillion-dollar clutter of unfinished spending bills,

There's also no guarantee that Republicans will pass a multibillion-dollar measure to prevent a cut in fees to doctors treating Medicare patients.

The bulging workload that a Republican-led Congress was supposed to complete this year but is instead punting to 2007 promises to consume time and energy that Democrats had hoped to devote to their own agenda upon taking control of Congress in January for the first time in a dozen years.

The decision to drop so much unfinished work in Democrats' laps demonstrates both division within Republicans ranks and the difficulty in resolving so many knotty questions in so short a time. GOP leaders promised their House and Senate members the December lame duck session would last no more than two weeks, or until Dec. 16 at the latest.

Now, with the agenda shrinking, a session that will be the last for 45 retiring or defeated House members and senators should be wrapped up by Dec. 8.

That could work against efforts to forestall a cut in physicians' Medicare payments. Under a formula dating back to 1997, Medicare payments to doctors for office visits will drop an average 5 percent on Jan. 1 — unless Congress steps in. Keeping them the same for another year would be expensive, about $10.8 billion, and chances are mixed at best for the doctors' lobby.

Driving the decision to quit and go home rather than finish the remaining budget work is a determined effort by a group of conservative Republicans to prevent putting a GOP stamp on spending bills covering 13 Cabinet Departments — and loaded with thousands of homestate projects derided as "pork" by critics.

Some Republicans on Capitol Hill would rather complete this year's budget work and have the GOP's imprint rather than a Democratic one on how federal agencies will be spending their money through next September. However, conservatives such as Sen. Jim DeMint, R-S.C., fear doing that would leave as the GOP's legacy a foot-tall bill containing thousands of parochial projects. Last week they seized the upper hand by employing delaying tactics to drag the budget process to a halt in the Senate.

DOJ_NMG_0096933

"The last thing Republicans need is an end-of-Congress spending spree as our last parting shot as we walk out the door," said DeMint spokesman Wesley Denton.

Some Republicans also look forward to using unfinished budget work to gum up an early Democratic agenda that includes raising the minimum wage, negotiating lower drug prices for Medicare beneficiaries, cutting interest rates on college loans and repealing some tax breaks for oil companies.

"Other stuff may get pushed off the table," said GOP lobbyist Hazen Marshall, a former longtime Capitol Hill aide. "It kills (Democrats') message."

For its part, the White House sided with GOP traditionalists such as Appropriations Committee Chairman Thad Cochran, R-Miss., who has been pushing to finish the budget while Republicans still hold power.

"We think it's the best thing for fiscal discipline," White House Budget Director Rob Portman told reporters last week.

Instead, lawmakers are expected to pass a temporary bill to keep the domestic agencies such as the Education, Transportation and Housing and Urban Development departments on autopilot at this past year's spending levels until Democrats can come up with new bills.

It will be no small test of the incoming Democratic majority, which has yet to develop a plan to cope with the more than $460 billion in unfinished budget business. The Democrats' problem is made even more complicated because President Bush in early 2007 will send Congress a bill that could exceed $130 billion for continuing the war in Iraq, according to Capitol Hill aides.

Bush is likely to be torn between the necessity of working with Democrats to finance his priorities — including the war — and a desire to take a stand against spending increases. Bush has never vetoed a spending bill in his six years in office, but that may change now that it will be Democrats writing them.

Democrats pledge not to overreach in their dealings with the president.

"We're not going to send him veto bait," said Rep. David Obey, D-Wis., who will be taking over as the chairman of the House Appropriations Committee. "We're not that stupid."

Fiscal Battle Lines Drawn (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, November 21, 2006

As partisan wrangling over spending priorities dominates the Senate's lame-duck session, the battle lines are forming for next year's Democratic effort to reinstate pay-as-you-go budget rules that Republicans decry as a back-door tax increase.

Democratic leaders vowed even before their decisive Election Day victories to demonstrate their commitment to fiscal responsibility by restoring the pay-as-you-go statute, also known as pay-go, should they win back the majority. Pay-go under law, which expired in 2002, required any new mandatory spending or tax breaks to be offset or risk automatic across-the-board spending cuts.

While budget analysts often point out that the hefty Democratic agenda for the 110th Congress would present an immediate challenge to pay-go, Republicans blast pay-go as a tax hike in budget-cutting clothing. Extending President Bush's tax cuts, including investment tax breaks that the GOP pursued through a marathon reconciliation process last year, under pay-go would require finding offsets that few Republicans believe a Democratic majority would want to seek out.

Though they have little hope of defeating a Democratic pay-go plan next year — the vice president cast a tiebreaking vote to stave one off in March — Republicans are poised to put up a fight for a pay-go rule that treats taxes and entitlements equally.

"The big question is, are they going to have integrity in the presentation?" said Sen. Judd Gregg (R-N.H.), outgoing Budget Committee chairman.

The Congressional Budget Office treats reauthorized entitlements as pre-existing programs, relieving lawmakers of the need to find offsets under pay-go, but Democrats could tweak their new pay-go rule to apply to more entitlement spending. Gregg said he would support a pay-go process with those changes made, but he also wondered whether Democrats would pass alternative minimum tax (AMT) relief before restoring pay-go as a means to avoid offsetting it.

"So far I've heard, 'We're going to do an AMT fix, and then [tax] extenders, and then do pay-go,' " said Gregg, who often refers to pay-go as "tax-go." "Let them put pay-go in place first."

New Senate Budget Chairman Kent Conrad (D-N.D.), a strong supporter of pay-go, blocked floor action last week in a push to secure a vote on his $4.5 billion emergency farm aid package. Six farm-state Republicans, including Mike Enzi (Wyo.) and Pat Roberts (Kan.), signed on as cosponsors of Conrad's amendment, but some conservatives were taking notes on the move with an eye to the coming pay-go debate.

DOJ_NMG_0096934

"This tension is not taking too long to play out," said Brian Riedl, budget analyst at the conservative Heritage Foundation. "Congress would routinely waive pay-go [in the 1990s]. It ends up being a paper tiger."

Yet Conrad's floor fireworks came after compromises on his part, such as the removal of direct payments to farmers that had raised White House objections and a cut in the package's overall cost. Conrad won a promise from leadership to take up his amendment as soon as the Senate returns next month, which he views as a chance to lay down his marker even as the overall appropriations bill appears unlikely to come to a vote.

"Pay-go is not designed as the cure-all for our budget ills," Conrad said in an interview. "I've never wanted to oversell pay-go. It's sort of a straw-man argument on [Republicans'] part, that 'it doesn't solve this, it doesn't solve that.' It's not intended to solve all those things."

Conrad also expressed support for a pay-go that would cover entitlement reauthorization, citing next year's children's health insurance program rewrite as an example. As for cutting down on future emergency farm-aid packages, he proposed a permanent disaster relief title in next year's new farm bill, which a spokesman for new Agriculture Committee Chairman Tom Harkin (D-Iowa) said was under consideration.

Meanwhile, both parties are amplifying their pay-go messages. The Senate GOP Policy Committee, which Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison (Texas) will take over next year, released a pre-election report dismissing Democratic pay-go as "support[ing] an anti-tax-cut agenda unrelated to fiscal restraint."

Former Senate Budget Chairman Don Nickles (R-Okla.), now head of K Street powerhouse The Nickles Group, noted that senators would still be free to offer pricey spending increases during the appropriations process even under pay-go.

"Democrats have acted like, 'This is so important, it's going to lead us to fiscal responsibility,' but they always try to bust the limits on the appropriations side," Nickles said. "I almost say, hey, let them have pay-go. They have been touting it. Now they're going to get to live with it."

Incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) affirmed to reporters last week that "we believe in the pay-go system" and offered a road map to where Democrats would look for offsets. The $15 billion in subsidies to oil companies passed along with last year's energy bill would be on the block, Reid said, and as much as $200 billion per year could be won by closing the "tax gap," the shortfall between federal taxes owed and received.

Budget watchdogs, however, are skeptical that the tax gap can provide much of a fiscal cushion for Democrats.

"I don't view them as realistic offsets," said Robert Bixby, executive director of the nonpartisan Concord Coalition. "Every effort ought to be made to close the gap, but nobody should think you can press a button and get $300 billion."

Conrad asserted that the CBO would be able to treat the efforts to close the tax-gap as a budget item if a bill were written specifically enough: "[They] would have to be convinced that it's real."

The Bush administration has included pay-go for spending in its annual budgets, Christin Baker, spokeswoman for Office of Management and Budget (OMB) director Rob Portman, said in an e-mail.

"We support budget reforms and look forward to working with Congress on ways to increase accountability and transparency," she wrote. "But we are concerned about pay-go that would block the extension of tax relief."

The Economic Front (WSJ)

By Roger C. Altman And Alan S. Blinder

The Wall Street Journal, November 21, 2006

Election returns drive policy changes. On Nov. 7 the voters clamored for change. And with the departure of Donald Rumsfeld, politicians have already started to deliver it. The leadership at the Pentagon is unlikely to be the only change in the administration's failed foreign policy. But what about the economic front? For the answer, though not for all the details, look to the economic anxieties which voters expressed through exit polls.

Sixteen years ago, one of us wrote a book titled "Growing Together." The double meaning was deliberate. But in recent decades the fruits of economic growth have not been widely shared, and we Americans have been growing apart. Notably, the middle class has fallen much further behind the rich; and recently, real wages have lagged behind productivity while profits have soared. One way to read the election returns is as a cri de coeur from the middle class for a fairer shake. They want to reap some of the dividends of economic growth -- as they should.

What to do? The problem is both deep-seated and longstanding, and there is no magic bullet to set things right. But a few obvious steps would help. For starters, the Democrats have pledged to raise the federal minimum wage, which is now at its lowest (relative to other wages or prices) in a half-century. Making the Earned Income Tax Credit more generous would also help.

Beyond that, our government needs to repair and thicken the badly tattered safety net for the middle class. Tens of millions of Americans live in fear that a major health problem could reduce them to penury. While citizens of other rich countries also worry about their health, only Americans fear financial ruin due to lack of health insurance. That should not be. Health insurance poses complex problems that will not be solved easily or cheaply. But it is well past time that we started moving judiciously toward universal health insurance. Covering all children is a sensible first step.

DOJ_NMG_0096935

Retirement security is another worry of the non-rich majority. Both of us opposed President Bush's failed attempt to privatize Social Security, but the president was right to call attention to the system's long-run financing gap. Fixing Social Security is not that difficult with a little bipartisanship and a dose of goodwill -- two more things the voters want. That said, all realistic solutions involve moderating benefit growth and/or raising more revenue -- which is precisely why they require bipartisanship.

The exit polls also reminded us that many Americans no longer believe that the next generation will be better off than they are. The federal budget deficit, the negative personal saving rate, and our massive borrowing from abroad are all evidence that America is focused too much on the present and not enough on the future. We need a multidimensional investment strategy to change that orientation.

Two of the top priorities should be equipping our work force to cope better with the rapidly globalizing economy, and reducing our dependence on oil and gas. The first requires more and better education and training. The second requires a greater commitment to research on alternative energy technologies, plus serious conservation measures by consumers and industry. Setting sensible priorities will be critical -- and perhaps a bit painful. We probably cannot afford all the good things mentioned above, not to mention other expensive items that do not appear on our wish list (such as public infrastructure). But making hard choices is what grown-ups do, and the voters were telling the politicians to grow up.

The federal budget deficit is a concrete example. Regardless of whether you supported or opposed the Bush tax cuts, it is clear that the long-run budget is in shambles. With the baby boom generation about to retire, the budget should be in surplus. But instead, we face cumulative 10-year deficits of $3.5 trillion -- and worse after that. You can blame this sorry state of affairs on either excessive tax-cutting or on profligate spending -- take your pick. It's more accurate to blame both, because fiscal discipline has utterly broken down. Restoring that discipline will doubtless mean both spending restraint and new revenues -- more hard decisions that the voters want politicians to make.

As an important procedural step, Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi has promised to restore pay-as-you-go financing -- a bipartisan set of budget rules that were originally adopted under the first President Bush, but then brushed aside under his son. Unfortunately, when paygo went, so did any pretense of fiscal discipline. A coincidence? We think not. The new Congress should bring back paygo immediately.

We fully realize that only a few of these policies can be promulgated right now. But a year hence, the policy window will have closed tight and the (presidential) political window will be wide open. So time is short. After watching the recent election results, we'd hate to be an empty-handed politician facing the voters in 2008.

Mr. Altman, chairman and co-CEO of Evercore Partners, was deputy secretary of the Treasury in the first Clinton administration. Mr. Blinder is a professor of economics at Princeton and former vice chairman of the Federal Reserve Board.

Pelosi: Relieving Middle Class Tops List (AP-Y)

By Jim Abrams

AP, November 21, 2006

House Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi said Monday her new Democratic majority will extend a hand to Republicans in moving the agenda of relieving the "middle-class squeeze." She said restoring the military draft will not be part of that agenda when Democrats take over the House in January.

Pelosi, following a strategy meeting with the next House majority leader, Steny Hoyer, D-Md., said she will meet with incoming House Minority Leader John Boehner and "we'll find our common ground for the American people."

"The principle of civility and respect for minority participation in this House is something we promised the American people. It's the right thing to do," she said.

Pelosi and Hoyer repeated that in the first 100 legislative hours of the new Congress that convenes in January, they will try to pass bills that directly affect the pocketbooks of working-class and middle-class people, including raising the minimum wage, cutting interest rates for student loans and allowing the Medicare program to negotiate lower drug prices.

Other top priorities for January are lobbying reform, implementing the recommendations of the 9/11 Commission and rolling back subsidies to the oil industry.

Pelosi said restoring the draft will not be on that list and was not something she supported.

"The speaker and I discussed scheduling and it did not include that," Hoyer added.

Incoming Ways and Means Committee Chairman Charlie Rangel, D-N.Y., caused a stir by repeating a long-held position that a draft is the best way to ensure that all levels of society are represented in the military. Besides Rangel, there is almost no support in Congress for restoring the draft.

DOJ_NMG_0096936

"It's not about a draft, it's about shared sacrifice in this country," Pelosi said. She said Rangel is "a strong voice for social justice in our country" and his support for the draft was "a way to make a point."

Democratic Leadership Spotlights Middle Class (WT)

By Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, November 21, 2006

House Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi and Majority Leader-elect Steny H. Hoyer -- days after engaging in an intraparty power struggle -- said yesterday that they will push bills to help the middle class and that they don't need Republican support to pass them.

Mrs. Pelosi and Mr. Hoyer said they expected bipartisan backing for their efforts to lessen the "squeeze" on the middle class, specifically increasing the minimum wage, lowering Medicare prices and cutting interest rates on student loans.

But Mrs. Pelosi said Democrats can pass those measures on the strength of their new majority alone, if need be.

"I think that's what winning the majority was all about," Mrs. Pelosi said when asked about the role of Republicans.

She quickly added that she hopes to see a large number of Republicans support her legislative agenda, and that she plans to meet with incoming House Minority Leader John A. Boehner of Ohio when he returns to town after the holiday.

Mrs. Pelosi, who last week had backed Mr. Hoyer's challenger to become her second-in-command when the Democratic Congress is seated in January, said she looks forward to working with Mr. Hoyer after their strategy session yesterday.

The California Democrat again congratulated Mr. Hoyer, Maryland Democrat, on his "stunning" win over outspoken war critic Rep. John P. Murtha of Pennsylvania.

Mr. Hoyer, who defeated Mr. Murtha 149-86, said he and Mrs. Pelosi had worked together as the top two House leaders of the minority to create the "most unified and focused [Democratic] caucus" in many decades and would continue to do so as the majority leaders. Mr. Hoyer is the outgoing minority whip.

Mrs. Pelosi and Mr. Hoyer did not raise any new agenda items yesterday as they said they would pursue allowing Medicare to negotiate with drug companies for lower prices, expanding federal support for embryonic-stem-cell research and lobbying reform.

Besides trying to generate some Republican support, Mrs. Pelosi may have to work on keeping her caucus from straying from the agenda.

Rep. Charles B. Rangel, New York Democrat and likely new chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, recently reiterated his long-held belief that there should be a military draft.

When asked whether she would support reinstituting the draft, Mrs. Pelosi said Mr. Rangel has "long held this position" and uses it as "a way to make a point" about the Iraq war.

"It's not about a draft; it's about a shared commitment," she said.

When pressed, she said she doesn't support the idea. Mr. Hoyer chuckled and said the schedule they're compiling doesn't include a bill to reinstitute the draft.

One thing both Mr. Hoyer and Mrs. Pelosi found amusing as they spoke to the packed room yesterday was the spike in the number of reporters attending their briefings.

Mr. Hoyer joked that he had "two and a half times the people" this week than he usually does at his normal briefing.

"It's nice to be in the majority," Mrs. Pelosi quipped. "We have many more visitors."

Rebalancing Act Democrats Target Wealth Gap And Hope Not To Hit Economy Divide Between Rich And Poor Continues To Widen; Spurs 'Robin Hood' Plans Can Growth Benefit Workers? (WSJ)

By David Wessel

The Wall Street Journal, November 21, 2006

By almost every measure, the gap between winners and losers in the American economy has widened over the past 20 years. In this month's election, anxiety about that gap was not far behind voter anger over Iraq and congressional corruption in driving Democrats to victory. "We will make our economy fairer" vowed House Democrats, in a campaign manifesto.

Now they're in a position to try, raising a big question: What can Democrats do to resist inequality in a way that doesn't choke off economic growth? Can government slice the economic apple more evenly without shrinking it?

See a chartbook3 examining income disparities and a guide to Democrats' relevant writings4 about the economy. · Plus, share your thoughts at the new online Capital Exchange forum5.

DOJ_NMG_0096937

Today's inequality reflects a confluence of forces. Technology is increasing employers' appetite for some skilled workers, while diminishing it for assembly-line workers in auto and textile factories. Imports and outsourcing are doing the same. Schools aren't graduating enough of the workers in short supply, such as engineers. Immigration is contributing to a glut of others, visible wherever day laborers gather hoping for work. Unions are atrophying. Corporate boards, hedge funds and sports teams are increasingly willing to write super-sized paychecks to a chosen few.

At the extremes, some politicians (not all of them Democrats) believe the benefits of a globalizing, high-tech economy are outweighed by the costs to U.S. workers. They would build a fence around the U.S. to reduce immigration or erect tariff barriers to imports. Even at the Democratic middle -- where the virtues of technology and globalization are prized -- proposals to reduce inequality range widely. They include interceding in the market to raise pay at the bottom or limit it at the top, pushing "Robin Hood" take-from-the-rich tax policies, improving shock absorbers that protect workers when their employers crash, extending health and retirement plans to workers without them and spending more to promote education from pre-K through college.

Meddling With the Market

High on Democrats' to-do list is lifting the federal minimum wage. It's been steady at $5.15 an hour since 1997, while consumer prices have risen 25%. Although many economists warn a higher minimum wage means fewer jobs, the 1990s suggest that boosting the minimum wage can boost incomes of those at the bottom. But its potential to shrink the gap between the wealthiest and poorest wage-earners is limited, especially when wages at the top are soaring far away from the middle and bottom.

Limiting pay at the top has proven tough. A 1993 law that discouraged tax deductions for executive salaries above $1 million is widely regarded as a bust. "Executives responded by rewarding themselves with millions of dollars worth of stock options" instead of big salaries, lament former Clinton aide Bruce Reed and Chicago Rep. Rahm Emanuel, a key strategist in the Democrats' win, in their pre-election book calling for "a new social contract for the 21st century." They go on, "This time we should approach the problem from the other direction and require companies that provide stock options to their executives to provide stock options to every worker."

That's unlikely to become law. But Barney Frank, the Massachusetts Democrat in line to chair the House Financial Services Committee, vows to push legislation that would force companies to provide more and clearer details of CEO pay, devise policies to recapture incentive pay if earnings are later restated, and require shareholder approval of "golden parachute" payments to dismissed executives. Mr. Frank says he plans hearings into a "fundamental" economic question: "How do you do a better job of sharing overall economic growth with the average worker?"

Few Democrats would block employers from laying off workers or closing factories, as is often done in Europe. But several newly elected Democrats, particularly from the beleaguered Midwest, vow to slow the flood of imports and rethink the pacts that President Bush has been negotiating to lower trade barriers.

There also is strong support among Democrats for strengthening American labor unions to try to tilt the balance in the labor market more toward workers. A bill co-sponsored by 215 House members and 43 senators, would, among other things, require employers to recognize a union after a majority of workers sign cards asking for representation instead of secret-ballot votes.

Robin Hood

A popular alternative among Democrats is to champion the market -- that is, allow it to direct people and money to best use -- and then tax the rich to give more to the poor. Enlarging the earned-income tax credit, viewed by many economists as a smart alternative to a higher minimum wage, is an option likely to figure in Democratic tax deliberations. The credit offers up to $4,536 to a family with two or more children to offset payroll taxes that the working poor pay. And it offers a cash bonus if the credit exceeds taxes paid, rewarding low-wage workers without raising employers' costs.

But most of the focus is on taking more from the top. Many Democrats would let at least some of Mr. Bush's income-tax cuts expire in 2010 or roll them back. Many favor preserving the estate tax, which Republicans target for abolition. New House Speaker Nancy Pelosi has vowed to restore a 1990s rule requiring new spending to be offset by spending cuts or tax increases; upper-income taxpayers are the sure target.

The Senate Finance Committee, with the blessing of both parties' leaders, is circulating a list of ways to shrink the "tax gap" between taxes owed and taxes actually paid. Most are aimed at upper-income taxpayers, such as requiring stock brokers to report not only the price a client got for shares, but also the original purchase price paid.

Boosting taxes on upper-income Americans would reduce disparities and provide revenues for other attacks on inequality. Raising the top two tax rates, now 33% and 35%, by a single percentage point would yield $90 billion over five years, the Congressional Budget Office estimates.

Another favorite Democratic target is the lower tax rate -- a maximum of 15% -- on capital gains and dividends. The administration says the lower rates have strengthened the stock market and the economy. Some Democrats say they're unfair. "We must end the Republicans' war on work, which taxes a millionaire at a lower rate for his stock trades than it taxes the wages his secretary earns for placing the call to his broker," wrote Rep. Emanuel and Mr. Reed. Also under discussion, often in conversations about ways to shore up Social Security, is increasing the ceiling -- now set at $94,200 -- on wages subject to the Social Security payroll tax.

DOJ_NMG_0096938

Republicans as prominent as Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson and Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke recently have warned in speeches of risks posed by widening inequality. But many conservatives fear taxing the rich in response would reduce incentives for innovation, entrepreneurship and education -- and thus reduce economic growth to the detriment of all. Their counsel: Try to lift incomes of the poor and middle class, and don't worry if the rich do even better.

Democrats argue that the 1990s proved that raising taxes on upper-income Americans can produce lots of revenue and coincide with a very strong economy. Republicans counter that the 2000s show tax cuts propel the economy and can coincide with surging tax revenues. Both arguments exaggerate the ability to isolate tax rates from other economic crosswinds. But the fundamental disagreement is over the extent to which higher taxes discourage work, savings and investment. "The market is not so good at spreading the gains. We need an activist government that pursues broad-based growth," says Mr. Reed.

Shock Absorbers

One direct response to workers' anxiety is expanded government programs to cushion the fall of those who lose jobs in today's rapidly changing economy. "Better preparation before adverse events happen and more...assistance after bad events occur" would both help workers and "diminish political demands for growth-reducing policies, such as protectionism," says Peter Orszag, who heads the Hamilton Project, a think tank spawned by former Treasury Secretary Robert Rubin to find way to promote "broad-based economic growth" and "economic security."

Targeted federal programs, created to lure congressional votes for free-trade pacts, now reach few people. There's a tax credit to help those who lose jobs due to imports buy health insurance. And there's wage-loss insurance, which offers cash to eligible workers dislocated by imports to compensate for taking lower-paying jobs. Inequality foes would greatly expand such programs.

Lori Kletzer of the University of California at Santa Cruz and Howard Rosen of the Peterson Institute for International Economics in Washington, for instance, would offer eligible dislocated workers up to half the difference between weekly earnings at their old and new jobs, up to $10,000 a year. This isn't cheap: They put the price tag at between $2.6 billion and $4.3 billion a year, financed through general tax revenues or an expanded payroll tax.

Universal Coverage

An alternative, albeit expensive, is to close the gap between those with health insurance and a retirement-savings plan (on top of Social Security) and those without. About 25% of people in households with incomes below $25,000 lack any health insurance, even government provided. Among the over-$75,000 crowd, only 8.5% are without insurance. About 45% of full-time workers on private payrolls aren't offered private retirement savings plans of any sort at work.

Gene Sperling, a former Clinton aide who published a 300-page "economic strategy for shared prosperity" last year, preaches to Democrats: "Simply voting yes [on trade pacts] and getting 5,000 more people on Trade Adjustment Assistance is a losing strategy. With control, Democrats can envision a more expansive social compact might make people less fearful about the pace of change and globalization."

Finding a politically palatable and affordable way to make health insurance universally available has been impossible, so far. Mr. Bush has pushed tax credits to help more people buy insurance on their own, and dangled rule changes and low-premium, high-deductible policies to encourage small firms to offer coverage. Although some Democrats still drool over proposals for government health insurance for all, others prefer piecemeal approaches. Among them: Allowing businesses with up to 100 employees tax credits to buy insurance through a government-sponsored pool modeled on the Federal Employee Health Benefit Plan, which gives federal workers a choice of private health insurance plans.

On retirement savings, outside the contentious Social Security debate, Democratic and Republican centrists are inching toward similar proposals, described differently. Mr. Sperling is pushing a "universal 401(k)" to which employees, employers and, in some cases, the government would contribute, a cousin to the private accounts Mr. Bush wanted to carve out of Social Security. Increasingly prominent Democratic Sen. Barack Obama cites it favorably in his new book, "The Audacity of Hope" and Ms. Pelosi backs a similar proposal. It would, in essence, narrow tomorrow's inequality by encouraging Americans to save more in their working years.

Education

Improving education is the feel-good solution, seen across the political spectrum as a way to promote growth and equality simultaneously. "The economy increasingly rewards education and skills," says Edward Lazear, chairman of Mr. Bush's Council of Economic Advisers. "We would not want it any other way. However, inequality in skills and education levels means inequality in income." His fix: Improve public schools for the disadvantaged through the No Child Left Behind Act and foster competition among schools.

DOJ_NMG_0096939

Democrats are focused on doing more to help Americans pay for college, especially important since the typical college grad earns 45% more than the typical high-school grad. Ms. Pelosi's platform calls for making up to $12,000 a year in college tuition tax-deductible -- or the equivalent in a $3,000 tax credit -- as well as cutting interest rates on student loans and increasing the maximum Pell Grant for low-income students to $5,100 from $4,050.

A coalition that spans the political spectrum is pushing more government support of Pre-K education. The case: Low-income children are behind when they arrive at kindergarten and never catch up; spending more on them sooner would have a big payoff.

One political problem: Education has a long fuse. It can take a generation to see results.

In the end, government can do only so much, especially given Americans' traditional ambivalence toward big government and European-style social welfare programs. "It's not hard to think of government policies with redistributive aspects," says Mr. Sperling, the former Clinton adviser. "What gets hard is to say: Here's my vision for how the private sector is going to create jobs that lead to a strengthening, not a hollowing out, of the middle class."

Americans want government to protect their current jobs and tell them where their next job -- and their children's jobs -- will come from. "But government is not good at that," Mr. Sperling says.

Write to David Wessel at david.wessel@wsj.com6

Washington Wire (WSJ)

Wall Street Journal, November 21, 2006

November 20, 2006, 2:02 pm Bumper to Bumper

What do private economists expect from the new Congress? Gridlock, mostly.

Sure, Congress is likely to deliver on Democrats' promise to raise the federal miniumum wage. But beyond that, they expect little to be accomplished on the economy.

Forty-six of 48 economists in the latest WSJ.com economic forecasting survey said they believe an increase in the federal minimum wage is very or somewhat likely to be passed in Congress and signed by the President.

As for the raft of other economic issues at hand — tackling the finances of entitlement programs, dealing with foreign trade, addressing the tax code — the economists expect gridlock.

Entitlement programs, such as Social Security and Medicare, should be the top priority for Congress when Democrats take control next year, the economists said. But 44 of the 48 economists believe it is somewhat or very unlikely any reform will be signed into law.

The story is little different on other fronts: On ensuring that trade negotiations move forward, 31 say unlikley. On revising the Medicare drug benefit, 30 say unlikely. On extending tax breaks for the wealthiest: 37 say unlikely. Rescinding the breaks? Thirty-six.

Economists expect the federal budget deficit to narrow. By the end of fiscal 2008, they predicted the gap will be equal to 2.2% of gross domestic product, the total output of all goods and services produced in the economy, compared with 2.6% for fiscal 2005.

But that has little to do with the change in control in the House and Senate. Their prediction for the budget deficit had the Republicans remained in power: 2.2%.

Video: The Journal's David Wessel discusses WSJ.com's forecasting survey

Comments (4) | Permalink | Trackbacks

Save & Share: Share on Facebook | Del.icio.us | Digg this

Read more: Global, Budget, Spending and Taxes, Economy

November 20, 2006, 12:43 pm Treasury's To-Do List

Paulson

Henry Paulson, who left Wall Street to become President Bush's third Treasury secretary, returned to New York today to sound his trumpet call for making the U.S. more friendly to capital markets in the face intensifying global competition.

His to-do list: "First, it is necessary to take a global view. We don't operate in isolation, so it is very important to consider how changes we make affect the ability of our companies to compete globally and how these changes affect our interaction with markets and regulators around the world. Second, our regulatory structure should be more agile and responsive to changes in today's marketplace. Third, to stand the test of time, rules should be embedded in sound principles. Fourth, regulators should take a risk-based approach to regulation, weighing the cost to shareholders against the benefits. Fifth, our enforcement regime should punish and deter wrongdoing and encourage good behavior without hindering responsible risk-taking and innovation. And, lastly, the best way our business leaders can protect the integrity and competitiveness of our markets is to exert moral leadership, where the threshold question is, 'Is this right?' not 'Do the rules allow us to do this?' "

DOJ_NMG_0096940

Video: Paulson Q&A
Comments | Permalink | Trackbacks
Save & Share: Share on Facebook | Del.icio.us | Digg this
Read more: Global, Economy
November 20, 2006, 8:04 am How Official Promotes Marriage to Help Poor Kids

The notion that government can help children escape poverty by promoting marriage for their parents was once considered a fringe idea from right field. It is now federal policy.

In very large part, that's due to Wade Horn, a child psychologist turned bureaucrat who has put marriage atop the Bush administration's limited antipoverty agenda.

As head of the federal Administration for Children and Families, Dr. Horn has employed the zeal of an ideologue and the discipline of an academic to inject marriage promotion into a host of government programs under his purview, even before Congress authorized an official marriage program. Today, more than 200 programs are at work across the country, seeking to change public attitudes surrounding marriage, persuade teenagers to aspire to matrimony and teach relationship skills to young couples.

Along the way, Dr. Horn has co-opted critics, fine-tuned his rhetoric, and persuaded Congress to insert his marriage agenda into this year's welfare legislation, winning $500 million over five years.

"Wade Horn has shown the influence a bureaucrat can have," says Ronald Haskins, a welfare expert who has worked for Congress and the current President Bush's White House. Read the full article. – Laura Meckler

Comments (5) | Permalink | Trackbacks
Save & Share: Share on Facebook | Del.icio.us | Digg this
Read more: Global

Pelosi-Harman Friction Strains Democrats' Unity (LAT)

By Johanna Neuman And Michael Finnegan
The Los Angeles Times, November 21, 2006

WASHINGTON — When Jane Harman left Congress in 1998 to run for governor of California, her colleague Nancy Pelosi threw her a party — a chocolate-fudge sundae "social" in the House members' dining room.

Two years later, Harman hosted a fundraiser in Los Angeles for Pelosi when she was running for minority whip, raising $400,000.

These days the two rarely talk, much less throw parties for each other.

Their relationship has been deteriorating since Harman returned to the House in 2001, according to those who know them, and the tension now threatens to complicate Pelosi's role as House speaker when the 110th Congress convenes in January.

Pelosi indicated as early as last year that she intended to oust Harman from the Intelligence Committee — where Harman expected to become chairwoman if Democrats won control of the House — in favor of someone more to Pelosi's liking.

The move has created dissension within the party. Some Democrats and foreign policy experts argued that Harman, a centrist on national security, is the most credible person for the job. The Congressional Black and Hispanic caucuses countered that it was time for one of their members on the committee to take the helm.

Fresh from Pelosi's fierce and unsuccessful lobbying effort to install antiwar ally John P. Murtha of Pennsylvania as her No. 2, the coming battle over the Intelligence Committee leadership is turning into a showdown where the political has turned personal. And it could undermine the unity that the Democratic Party has hoped to show as it prepares to take the reins of power.

The falling-out between Pelosi and Harman offers a window into how business gets done on Capitol Hill, where personal friendships are often as important as policies and politics. Pelosi in particular is noted for remembering who has been on her side and who hasn't, as evidenced by her support of Murtha for House majority leader over her one-time rival Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland, even though Hoyer was widely preferred by the party caucus.

The prospect of conflict between two such powerful Democratic women is tantalizing to gossipy Washington. But the split is so toxic that Democrats in California and Washington won't go near it.

"I don't want to talk about it," said Roz Wyman, the doyenne of California Democratic fundraising and a friend of both.

Most people contacted for this article spoke only on condition of anonymity, not wanting to get on the wrong side of two formidable politicians.

Pelosi declined through her spokeswoman to comment. The only statement issued from her office, by Press Secretary Jennifer Crider, was that the committee decision "will be made before early January."

Harman said in an interview that she did not wish to vent the matter in public. "I read about this in the paper last year and I visited with her then," said Harman, who would not disclose the nature of their conversation.

DOJ_NMG_0096941

"It's so unfortunate because they're both capable people," said William Coblentz, a San Francisco lawyer who has contributed to both their careers and coffers. "I know them both well, and I love them both, but I believe Nancy felt that Jane was abrasive and aggressive, which she can be."

Pelosi's supporters say the dust-up over Harman is not personal, noting that the Democratic leader spent an extra day in California lobbying the state party to endorse Harman in her reelection bid.

Although they may seem similar on the surface — two wealthy and powerful Democrats from California — Pelosi and Harman are cut from different cloth. Pelosi is a people person — she recently entered a raucous room of reporters offering to shush them in her "mother-of-five voice." Harman has a more cerebral personality and revels in the minutiae of policy.

Pelosi grew up in Baltimore, where her father, Thomas D'Alesandro Jr., was mayor, and got an early education in the art of machine politics. She met Paul Pelosi while at Trinity College in Washington, and the couple moved to his hometown of San Francisco. As Paul Pelosi grew the family's fortune through real estate and stock investments, Nancy Pelosi raised their children, then worked her way up in California Democratic Party politics from volunteer to chairwoman for Northern California. She was elected to the U.S. House in 1987.

Harman grew up in Los Angeles, the daughter of a Westside physician. She graduated from Smith College and Harvard Law School at a time when few women went into law. Harman began her career in Washington as a Capitol Hill staffer and later worked in the Carter White House before going into private law practice. She is married to Sidney Harman, founder and chairman of Harman Industries. She ran for the House in 1992 and joined Pelosi in the California delegation, representing Venice.

People who know both women say there was no single incident that soured their relationship; rather it was a series of small irritations that eventually led to estrangement.

Some California Democrats say tensions began during the 2001 redistricting of the state's congressional seats.

As lawmakers from both parties cooperated in Sacramento to make Democratic seats safer for Democrats and GOP seats safer for Republicans, Harman reportedly complained that her district did not include Los Angeles International Airport.

"She wanted to get the LAX asset in her district," said one Californian who was familiar with the process. "Jane thinks the airport is power."

Party leaders were annoyed, given that the redistricting gave Harman — who until then represented a swing district — a safe seat.

A Capitol Hill staffer suggested that Pelosi also was miffed that Harman had higher visibility in the media.

Harman, using her platform as ranking Democrat on the Intelligence Committee, landed on Sunday talk shows so regularly that she all but eclipsed Pelosi's rising star as House minority leader. An informal survey of the major talk shows over the last two years found that Harman made 18 appearances to Pelosi's six.

Associates of Pelosi say she was not troubled that Harman was on television frequently, only that Democrats' message on Iraq wasn't being aired.

Some Democrats say Pelosi's choice for intelligence chair is less about personal conflict than fixing a political problem, which ironically began with Harman's return to the House in 2001.

After Harman lost her gubernatorial bid, Pelosi urged her to run for Congress again. Harman's choice was made easier by the fact that then-Minority Leader Dick Gephardt (D-Mo.) had promised her in writing that she could reclaim her seniority on the Intelligence Committee. That bumped a member of the Congressional Black Caucus, Rep. Sanford D. Bishop Jr. (D-Ga.), off the committee and jumped her over another African American, Rep. Alcee L. Hastings (D-Fla.), in seniority.

Black members of Congress were upset by what they saw as a slap by House Democratic leaders. Last year the black caucus asked for a meeting, and according to one witness, Pelosi promised not to slight either blacks or Latinos when plum slots came up on the Intelligence and Homeland Security committees.

When news got out that Pelosi was not planning to name Harman chairwoman, heavy hitters from the foreign policy establishment besieged Pelosi to change her mind.

Those close to Harman say the lobbying campaign came to life on its own. The Pelosi side doesn't buy it.

"The biggest mistake Jane made was lining up people to lobby," said a Hill staffer. "People went over the line lobbying for her. Now Nancy is very angry."

Asked whether Pelosi held a grudge against Harman, Rep. Anna G. Eshoo (D-Atherton) said: "People are going to do what they're going to do. But anyone who underestimates Nancy Pelosi does so at her own risk."

*

johanna.neuman@latimes.com
michael.finnegan@latimes.com

Neuman reported from Washington and Finnegan from Los Angeles.

DOJ_NMG_0096942

*

(INFOBOX BELOW)

Jane Harman

1945: Born in New York City; raised in Los Angeles where father is a Westside physician

1966: Graduates from Smith College, Northampton, Mass.

1969: Graduates from Harvard Law School; later serves in Carter White House and as Defense Department special counsel

1992-98: Elected by California's 36th Congressional district

1998: Runs for governor, spending more than $20 million, including $15 million of her own money, but finishes third among Democrats

2000-present: Reclaims her former House seat; joins Energy and Commerce Committee; joins Intelligence Committee, becoming ranking Democrat of new Terrorism and Homeland Security subcommittee

2003: After November 2002 election, chosen by Nancy Pelosi as her successor on Intelligence

2004: Works closely with new Intelligence chairman Peter Hoekstra and Senate Governmental Affairs Chairman Susan Collins to get Congress to pass intelligence reorganization bill

2005: Calls for a ban on torture by U.S. interrogators and a prohibition on transferring detainees to countries that torture

Sources: Almanac of American Politics 2006; office of Jane Harman; Los Angeles Times

**

Nancy Pelosi

1940: Born Nancy D'Alesandro in Baltimore; her father served five terms in Congress ending in 1947, then 12 years as Baltimore mayor

1962: Graduates from Trinity College (now called Trinity University), Washington, D.C.

1977-1981: Northern chair, California Democratic Party

1981-1983: State chair, California Democratic Party

1985-1987: Finance chair, Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee

1987-present: Elected by California's 8th Congressional District, which includes most of San Francisco; serves for 10 years (until early 2003) on the Intelligence Committee

2001: Elected minority whip by House Democrats

Oct. 2002: Leads Democratic faction opposed to authorizing military force in Iraq, bucking the House Democratic leader

Nov. 2002: Elected minority leader by House Democrats

Nov. 2006: Slated to become next House speaker after midterm election gains

Sources: Almanac of American Politics 2006; office of Nancy Pelosi; Los Angeles Times

Democrats Plan Series Of Votes On Ethics Reforms (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, November 21, 2006

Despite divisions among Democrats over how far to go in revising ethics rules, House leaders plan a major rollout of an ethics reform bill early next year to demonstrate concern about an issue that helped defeat the Republicans in the midterm elections.

But they will do it with a twist: Instead of forwarding one big bill, Democrats will put together an ethics package on the House floor piece by piece, allowing incoming freshmen to take charge of high-profile issues and lengthening the time spent on the debate. The approach will ensure that each proposal -- including banning gifts, meals and travel from lobbyists as well as imposing new controls on the budget deficit -- is debated on its own and receives its own vote. That should garner far more media attention for the bill's components before a final vote on the entire package.

"This will be the most significant ethics and lobbying reform that Congress has ever voted on," promised Rep. Martin T. Meehan (D-Mass.), one of the point men on the effort.

The approach may be the first indication of how the Democrats plan to use their ability to control the House agenda as the majority power, setting the terms of debate while lifting the strict rules that Republicans used to curtail dissent.

And Democrats hope to show that they are attentive to issues of corruption that, according to exit polling, proved to be of major concern to voters on Nov. 7. House and Senate GOP leaders pledged early this year to pass major lobbying reforms in the aftermath of the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal but never delivered on their promise.

DOJ_NMG_0096943

Democratic leaders are still putting the finishing touches on the floor schedule and some of the components of the ethics package, said Jennifer Crider, spokeswoman for incoming House speaker Nancy Pelosi (Calif.). But other Democratic leadership aides said the proposal to break up the package and reassemble it is virtually a done deal.

Under that plan, freshmen would offer, over as many as five days in January, separate amendments to ban gifts, meals and travel financed by lobbyists, said Rep. Rahm Emanuel (Ill.), incoming chairman of the House Democratic Caucus. New rules mandating the disclosure of all contacts with lobbyists would be another vote, as would a rule requiring that the sponsors of funding for home-state pet projects be identified. The House would also vote on whether to reinstate budget rules, known as pay-as-you-go, or "paygo," requiring that any new spending or tax cuts be offset by equal spending cuts or tax increases.

While there is broad support for reform, Democrats face divisions on how far to go on some issues, such as whether to establish an independent board to enforce ethics rules. But leaders are eager to show that they are serious about tackling the corrosive influence of lobbyists and money, so much so that they are willing to spend days working on the issue. They may even let the divisions play out in public, with amendments allowed that may or may not pass, on issues from campaign finance to independent oversight.

"We heard continually out here that people were tired of the way business is conducted in Washington," said Rep.-elect Harry Mitchell (D-Ariz.). "They didn't like the way lobbyists had so much influence. They didn't like the way rules were not enforced. They just didn't think things were being done right."

The idea is to give each provision what Emanuel called its "Warhol time" -- 15 minutes of fame -- while forcing Republicans to take a stand on the components before a final vote on the ethics package. Because House rules changes are, by tradition, party-line votes, breaking the package into its components would also allow Republicans to support individual amendments, even though they probably would vote against the package in the end.

The unorthodox approach, more reminiscent of the drawn-out legislating done in the Senate than the slam-dunks of the House, would also give Democratic leaders a chance to show that they plan to change the way the House does business, Democrats said.

"Why have the gift ban, if that's one of [the components], be buried inside when it can stand on its own and the public wants it and gets it?" Emanuel asked. "Why have paygo have to share space with the meal ban or gift ban?"

The procedure would be as much about solidifying Democratic power as it would be about changing the rules of the House. Freshmen Democrats, many of them representing Republican-leaning districts, would take ownership of components that would resonate most with their voters, Democratic leaders said. For example, a conservative "Blue Dog" would get to present the budget-balancing rule.

Amendments aimed at reducing the influence of lobbyists would go to swing-district Democrats who campaigned on ethics themes. One is Mitchell, who unseated Rep. J.D. Hayworth (R-Ariz.) in large part by stressing Hayworth's links to Abramoff, the disgraced lobbyist. The others are Zack Space (Ohio), who took the Republican-leaning district of convicted former representative Robert W. Ney, and Michael A. Arcuri (N.Y.), who ran on corruption themes to take the district vacated by retiring Rep. Sherwood L. Boehlert (R).

Such a freewheeling approach could expose disagreements within the Democratic Caucus. For example, some members think that an independent board should be created to conduct ethics investigations and mete out punishment to members who violate House rules. Others say the House Committee on Standards of Official Conduct, informally known as the ethics committee, can handle the assignment as long as leaders allow it to do its job.

Democratic leadership aides say Pelosi is weighing a middle ground -- the establishment of an independent body similar to a grand jury that would weigh the validity of ethics complaints, then pass meritorious allegations to the ethics committee.

The rules change on earmarks, or lawmakers' pet projects, is expected to differ from the proposal Democrats outlined earlier this year, the aides said. That rule would mandate that home-district projects be identified by the names of their congressional sponsors. Pelosi wants to make sure that change applies to projects in spending bills as well as in policy bills, such as the broad highway and transit law that passed in 2005. Tax breaks known as rifle shots, narrowly targeted to benefit only a few companies or individuals, are also expected to face more scrutiny.

Has Gates Learned His Lesson? (LAT)

By Jennifer Glaudemans

The Los Angeles Times, November 21, 2006

FIFTEEN YEARS AGO, the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence asked me to testify at the confirmation hearings for Robert M. Gates, who had been nominated to be director of Central Intelligence.

I was asked because I had worked in the CIA's office of Soviet analysis back when Gates was the agency's deputy director for intelligence and chairman of the National Intelligence Council.

DOJ_NMG_0096944

More specifically, I was asked to testify because of my knowledge about the creation of a May 1985 special National Intelligence Estimate on Iran that had been used to justify the ill-fated deals known as Iran-Contra.

It seems like a long time ago now. Iran-Contra is just one of many scandals that have come and gone in the intervening years. But today, in the aftermath of the U.S. decision to go to war in Iraq based on faulty intelligence — and with Gates poised to reemerge, this time as secretary of Defense — it is worth remembering some lessons from the 1980s about how intelligence was politicized to support ideologically-based positions.

In 1985, during Ronald Reagan's second term as president, the U.S. faced enormous diplomatic and military challenges in the Middle East and in Central America. Reagan and then-CIA Director William J. Casey were known for their aggressive anti-Soviet rhetoric and policies. Gates, as Casey's deputy, shared their ideology.

Iran-Contra was in the planning stages then, a secret scheme in which the Reagan administration was going to sell arms to an enemy country, Iran, and use the proceeds to fund the anti-communist Contras in Nicaragua.

In order to justify these actions, administration officials felt they needed some analytical backing from the intelligence community. Those in my office knew nothing of their plans, of course, but it was the context in which we were asked, in 1985, to contribute to the National Intelligence Estimate on the subject of Iran.

Later, when we received the draft NIE, we were shocked to find that our contribution on Soviet relations with Iran had been completely reversed. Rather than stating that the prospects for improved Soviet-Iranian relations were negligible, the document indicated that Moscow assessed those prospects as quite good. What's more, the national intelligence officer responsible for coordinating the estimate had already sent a personal memo to the White House stating that the race between the U.S. and USSR "for Tehran is on, and whoever gets there first wins all."

No one in my office believed this Cold War hyperbole. There was simply no evidence to support the notion that Moscow was optimistic about its prospects for improved relations with Iran. All of our published analysis had consistently been pessimistic about Soviet-Iranian relations as long as Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini was alive.

We protested the conclusions of the NIE, citing evidence such as the Iranian government's repression of the communist Tudeh Party, the expulsion of all Soviet economic advisors and a number of Soviet diplomats who were KGB officers, and a continuing public rhetoric that chastised the "godless" communist regime as the "Second Satan" after the United States.

Despite overwhelming evidence, our analysis was suppressed. At a coordinating meeting, we were told that Gates wanted the language to stay in as it was, presumably to help justify "improving" our strained relations with Tehran through the Iran-Contra weapons sales.

It's possible that the Reagan administration would have gone ahead and made its overtures to Iran regardless of what was said in the NIE, but having the coordinated assessment of the intelligence community support its views certainly added legitimacy to its rationale. What's more, if the policymakers had received better and more accurate intelligence, perhaps someone would at least have questioned the false sense of urgency. Instead, our intelligence was used as expensive intra-government propaganda.

Unfortunately, the Iran NIE was not the only case of politicization under Gates. It began in 1982, when Casey asked for an NIE on Soviet support for international terrorism. It continued when we were asked how far we thought the Soviet Union would go in its support for leftists in Central America. There was also an investigation by the CIA's inspector general into the atmosphere of politicization at the agency, the results of which were published even before 1991.

It was well known among analysts at the time that we would have a hard time getting Gates to sign off on analyses that did not fit his ideological preconceptions. All one had to do was look at his margin comments on controversial papers to know what was going on. Fortunately for him, classification and layers of bureaucracy kept those comments from public view. Today, however, many cases of politicized intelligence are a matter of public record. The National Security Archive, a not-for-profit organization, has posted many documents on its website that tell the story.

During those years, the government was clearly dominated by people who had a strong ideological view of the Soviet Union. But their conflict was not with people who were "soft" on communism, it was with people who looked at all the available evidence, without much bias one way or another, and who had been to the USSR and witnessed its hollow political and social structure, seeing not an omnipotent superpower but a clumsy, oafish regime often stumbling over its own feet.

The real untold story is just how wrong the American hard-liners, such as Gates, got the Soviet Union. Although they were the last to recognize that Mikhail S. Gorbachev was indeed reforming the USSR, they were the first to state that Gorbachev would be ousted and replaced by neo-Stalinists, as had been done to Nikita Khrushchev. (See Gates' Op-Ed article in the Washington Times in March 1989.) They also completely missed the Boris Yeltsin reform option.

Is all this ancient history relevant today? It is if you believe that policymakers are poorly served when analysis is concocted to support their preexisting positions. It is relevant if you believe that the failure to learn the lessons from the 1991 Gates hearings harmed U.S. foreign policy when, a decade later, we went to war on false intelligence about weapons of mass destruction in Iraq. It is relevant if you believe that Congress should take its oversight responsibilities seriously.

DOJ_NMG_0096945

The nomination of Robert Gates to become secretary of Defense is an opportunity for him to demonstrate that he has learned from his mistakes and for Congress to reassert its constitutional authority.

Democratic Leaders Reject Idea Of Draft (WP)

By Charles Babington And Josh White

The Washington Post, November 21, 2006

The new Democratic-controlled Congress will not seriously consider reinstating the draft, even if concerns about the military's strength and resiliency grow, party leaders said yesterday.

Key Democrats, including the incoming House speaker, House majority leader and chairmen of the House and Senate armed services committees, said they do not support a resumption of the draft. They predicted that the idea will gather little momentum in the 110th Congress, which convenes in January. Pentagon officials also restated their opposition to a draft.

Their comments came a day after Rep. Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.), who will chair the Ways and Means Committee, said he would again introduce a bill calling for a return to the draft, which has been suspended since 1973.

Rangel's previous bids to reinstate the draft stirred little interest in Congress but considerable agitation among some bloggers and talk radio hosts, who suggested the public was about to be blindsided. Yesterday, congressional leaders tried to allay such fears, saying the 2007-08 legislative agenda will not include a resumption of the draft.

"Mr. Rangel will be very busy with his work on the Ways and Means Committee, whose jurisdiction is quite a different jurisdiction," Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) told reporters. Ways and Means handles tax matters, not military legislation.

Dismissal of the draft idea does not mean key lawmakers and analysts are not worried that the military is being stretched to its limits in Iraq, Afghanistan and elsewhere, with possible threats looming in Iran and North Korea. If higher troop levels are needed, several said, the answer is in recruiting more volunteers, not drafting people.

"The all-volunteer force has been successful," said Rep. Ike Skelton (D-Mo.), who will chair the House Armed Services Committee. "But the Army is stretched thinner than paper."

Skelton said Americans soured on the draft during the Vietnam War era because many felt that the system of exemptions -- claimed mainly by wealthier and better-educated people -- "was downright unfair in many instances. . . . I think it would not be acceptable to the American people today."

To address the manpower concerns, Skelton said, "we must slowly disengage ourselves from Iraq" and focus on fully equipping all units before they go into combat. "The recruiting is coming along better," he said. "The retention, with the exception of captains and junior majors, is going well. . . . The bigger problem is readiness," which he said is mainly a matter of equipment.

Pentagon officials have long said they do not support reinstatement of the draft, which would send people unwillingly into the armed forces alongside the hundreds of thousands of professional troops who volunteer. Top officials have shown great pride that the military has been an all-volunteer force for more than three decades, even as the armed services face growing strain as a result of the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan.

In 2004, when the same topic was raised in House hearings, top Pentagon officials said the Bush administration did not support the draft and had no plans to pursue it. Officials said yesterday they still do not believe that conscription is a viable option for today's military.

Army officials point to the turnaround in recruiting efforts over the past year -- during which the Army met an elevated goal of 80,000 new soldiers and continued to surpass reenlistment targets -- as evidence that the military can support itself as a volunteer force. Training draftees, who likely would leave the service as soon as possible, would cost millions of dollars with little return on the investment, they said.

Rangel, a Korean War veteran, said a draft would bring more upper-middle-class Americans into the military and would force policymakers to evaluate warmaking more carefully. But a recent Heritage Foundation study found that the all-volunteer military has a fairly good distribution of people from all family income and education levels.

"No evidence supports arguments for reinstating the draft or altering recruiting policies to achieve more equitable representation," wrote Tim Kane, director of the foundation's Center for International Trade and Economics.

Rangel has suggested incorporating military conscription into a larger program of mandatory national civilian service, in which Americans would perform nonmilitary functions.

But such a proposal probably "would go nowhere even faster than a military draft," said Robert Goldich, a retired expert on military manpower for the Congressional Research Service.

American traditions and courts frown on "involuntary servitude," he said. Moreover, he said, "what Vietnam did was sort of confirm a basic American attitude that the draft was something that was going to be used only for major conflict."

DOJ_NMG_0096946

The U.S. military included about 2.2 million people in the mid-1980s, Goldich said, compared with about 1.4 million now. If the nation's policymakers decide the military must grow, they can probably achieve their goals by improving benefits and targeting people ages 22 to 25, rather than the customary 18- and 19-year-olds, he said.

"Clearly we've recruited a much larger all-volunteer force in the past" and can probably do so again, Goldich said.

Rangel's Call For New Military Draft Rebuffed (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough And Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, November 21, 2006

Democratic Rep. Charles B. Rangel's latest call to quickly restart the military draft was shot down yesterday by incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi and other party members, who said it will not be part of the Democrats' legislative agenda.

New York's Mr. Rangel periodically has urged a draft revival as a mechanism to criticize President Bush's handling of military deployments in the war on terrorism. He renewed his call again on Sunday, saying on CBS' "Face the Nation" that "if we're going to challenge Iran and challenge North Korea and then, as some people have asked, send more troops to Iraq, we can't do that without the draft. ... I will be introducing that bill as soon as we start the new session."

But Mrs. Pelosi, California Democrat, told reporters she does not favor the draft and has no plans to schedule a floor debate. And in the Senate, incoming Armed Services Chairman Carl Levin, Michigan Democrat, also dismissed the idea.

"I don't think we need it," he told reporters.

House Armed Services Committee Chairman Duncan Hunter, California Republican, disagreed with Mr. Rangel's long-held position that the burden of fighting wars fall disproportionately on low-income people. A study by the conservative Heritage Foundation concluded that the children of higher-income parents increased their enlistment numbers after the September 11 attack.

Mr. Hunter said his son left a civilian job to serve in Iraq and that several committee members have sons fighting in the war.

Mr. Rangel, an Iraq war critic who will become chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, urged a new draft during the 2004 presidential election. Other Democrats floated a rumor that the Bush administration plotted behind the scenes to institute compulsory service because of missed recruiting goals.

The Republican leadership quickly moved for a floor vote that October. Then-House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, Texas Republican, said of Democrats, "We've had enough of that. We're going to call them on it. The Democrats are the only people that have a bill instituting the draft. We're going to bring it out there, and we're going to put a nail in it."

Mr. Rangel's proposal, which would draft women as well as men, was defeated 402-2. He even voted against it, saying Republicans brought up the bill up as a political stunt. Rep. John P. Murtha, Pennsylvania Democrat, who subsequently called for an immediate troop withdrawal from Iraq, and Rep. Pete Stark, California Democrat, voted in favor of the bill.

The all-volunteer force began when President Nixon ended the draft in 1973, more than 30 years after President Franklin D. Roosevelt ordered it to prepare for World War II. The draft was suspended after the war, but restarted in 1948. Women were exempt.

Mr. Rangel argued Sunday that "there's no question in my mind that this president and this administration would never have invaded Iraq, especially on the flimsy evidence that was presented to the Congress, if indeed we had a draft and members of Congress and the administration thought that their kids from their communities would be placed in harm's way."

He added, "I think at a time where national security is so important, having our young people commit themselves to a couple of years in service of this great republic, whether it's our seaports, our airports, in schools, in hospitals and at the end of that to provide some educational benefits is the best thing for our young people and the best thing for our country."

Rejecting The Draft (NYT)

The New York Times, November 21, 2006

There are many reasons why we are distressed to hear that Representative Charles Rangel of New York plans to reintroduce his annual measure aimed at resurrecting the draft when the Democrats take control of the House in January. We don't favor military conscription in general. And in this particular case, compelling military service won't achieve the things Mr. Rangel says he wants, either.

Mr. Rangel wants to replenish an Army that is in critical condition, make the armed services more equitably representative of American society as a whole, and find a way to prevent future presidents from embarking on military misadventures. Those are laudable goals, but not ones the nation can achieve by bringing back the draft.

Even if the draft was a good idea, it would be politically impossible to achieve. Members of Congress are well aware that their constituents oppose it. This White House has never been willing to ask the American public to do anything but accept more tax cuts; it's hardly going to embrace something as difficult and unpopular as military conscription.

DOJ_NMG_0096947

But the idea is flawed as well. Because of the dire situation in Iraq, the Army is indeed having trouble meeting its yearly quota of 80,000 recruits. Yet military leaders nevertheless oppose a draft. They believe you don't get a highly skilled Army by forcing people to serve against their will, and they are right.

The draft would not demonstrate to young people that everyone must do his or her fair share. It is more likely to convince them that the demand for sacrifice is made mainly on those too poor to avoid it. The volunteer force in Iraq has been a truer cross section of America than the force created under the last draft, which ended in 1973, before the end of the Vietnam War. The wealthy and well-connected could get deferments then or assignments to safe alternatives, and many did. While there are plenty of underprivileged in the current force, at least they are there by their own choosing.

The problem with the draft does not lie in the fact that it requires young people to spend some time contributing to the nation's well-being before they embark on their life careers. We wish the president had called for such sacrifices after Sept. 11, 2001, when so many Americans were aching to contribute.

For those young people who do not feel moved by patriotism or propelled by economics to enlist in the military, there should be other options for national service — like AmeriCorps. These programs need money and attention. Some of the potential candidates for president in 2008 have said the United States should require all young people to devote a year or two to service after high school or college, and that idea should be debated during the upcoming campaign.

But the urgency of the Army's current needs requires a different solution. There are many ways for the armed services to meet their recruitment goals outside of general conscription. After all, the Army's annual quota of 80,000 recruits is barely a drop in the ocean of some 60 million Americans between 18 and 35. Forcing the issue, with a draft, is no solution.

Democrats' Rx? Generics (WSJ)

By Anna Wilde Mathews

The Wall Street Journal, November 21, 2006

NEWLY EMPOWERED Democrats' vow to cut health-care costs might spell bad news for the brand-name pharmaceutical industry, but their efforts could provide new momentum for the generic-drug rivals' agenda.

Boosting the generics industry may prove to be a politically palatable way to follow up on the party's campaign promises. That's because making more room for generics is meant to cut prices through increased competition -- a solution that is easier to sell as pro-market than other proposals Republicans will portray as precursors to federal price controls. In addition, some legislation that must be renewed in 2007, including laws providing vital funding to the Food and Drug Administration and encouraging studies of drugs' use in children, could provide gridlock-proof vehicles for generics provisions.

"Overall, because of the shift in Congress, next year could be the most important year to the generics industry since 1984," when Congress passed the law that opened the door to the modern generics business, says Jake Hansen, a vice president at generics maker Barr Pharmaceuticals Inc., of Woodcliff Lake, N.J.

The most important question will likely be how and whether to create a legal pathway for the FDA to approve generic versions of biotechnology drugs. The 1984 law that created a framework enabling the FDA to approve generic drugs focuses on traditional, chemically derived drugs such as Prozac, but didn't give the agency a way to approve generic versions of most biotech products. Now, the issue will get a push from several key Democrats, though it will be difficult to pass such a complicated and contentious change in 2007.

An array of other measures aimed at smoothing the way for traditional generic drugs will also get attention, and could well be tucked into broader bills next year. Among them are proposals to limit branded-drug company tactics that thwart generic competitors, such as licensing additional companies to sell their drugs and thus diluting the profits to be made from copying them.

The FDA generics office is likely to get more funding to speed its reviews now that the Democrats are in charge, and there may be limits put on FDA petitions filed by brand-name makers that can delay generic-drug approvals. Another likely goal for Democrats: shortening a six-month period of exclusive marketing that branded-drug makers get in exchange for their pediatric research, a benefit that can be worth millions of dollars because it delays generic competition.

Makers of traditional chemical generics sell versions that can be substituted for the originals, typically at a substantially lower price. The generics companies have far smaller development costs, since they don't have to duplicate years of research and regulatory review borne by branded-drug makers.

A number of Democrats who have been allies of the generics makers are slated for positions that could help in pushing forward such changes. In the Senate are Vermont's Patrick Leahy, the expected Judiciary Committee chairman, as well as high-profile lawmakers such as New York's Hillary Clinton and Charles Schumer. Sen. Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts, who will head the health committee, is among the Democrats who have signaled that health-care costs will be a major focus for next year.

DOJ_NMG_0096948

Sen. Herb Kohl, a Wisconsin Democrat who is expected to head the Senate Appropriations subcommittee that handles the FDA's funding, says, "We really want to promote the use of generics because of the savings."

In the House, California Rep. Henry Waxman, a sponsor of the 1984 generics law, will be chairman of the Government Reform Committee, while FDA appropriations will go through a subcommittee headed by Connecticut Rep. Rosa DeLauro. The generics makers count some Republican supporters as well: Mississippi's Trent Lott, who will be the new Republican whip in the Senate, co-sponsored a bill supported by the industry last year with Michigan Democrat Debbie Stabenow.

"I'm obviously supportive of whatever we can do to make generics more available," says Democratic Rep. Frank Pallone of New Jersey, who may become chairman of the House Energy and Commerce health subcommittee. Drug prices are the kind of "affordability issue" that drew votes to Democrats, he says, adding that he supports the idea of generic biotech drugs. Mr. Waxman, with Sens. Schumer and Clinton, has introduced a bill to create a generic biotech pathway, which he says is "very, very much needed."

Generics makers are leaning on a coalition that has worked in the past, drawing on big employers and others scared by rising health-care costs. European regulators, meanwhile, have already begun crafting guidelines for what they call "biosimilars."

The generics makers' pitch is simple, and likely to resonate with many lawmakers: Helping them means lower drug costs, and doesn't involve government-imposed price controls or the controversies surrounding imported medicines.

The generics industry complains about remaining "loopholes" in law and regulation exploited by branded-pharmaceutical makers to delay generic competition. On the issue of generic biotech drugs, they argue that they can safely create copies without duplicating all the expensive studies done by the original manufacturers. "Right now, there's a regulatory monopoly" for biotech drugs, says Kathleen Jaeger, chief executive of the Generic Pharmaceutical Association.

Branded-drug companies defend their tactics. In a statement, the Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America says licensing additional competitors increases competition and brings down prices beyond the introduction of a generic version. The group also says the FDA needs to consider safety issues raised by petitions before it approves a drug, and such petitions allow consumers and others to "present their views on important FDA issues."

The biotech industry, for its part, is pushing its own case on Capitol Hill. One argument: Science isn't advanced enough for generics makers to produce truly identical duplicates of their medications. It is likely to get a good hearing from Democrats, partly because of biotech companies' base in Democratic strongholds of California and Massachusetts.

Some biotech officials argue that generics makers will need to redo all the studies performed by the original manufacturer, in order to guarantee their copycat products are effective and safe for patients. That would likely eliminate much, or all, of the price advantage offered by the generics rivals. "There is no way to characterize a biological," says James Greenwood, a former congressman who heads the Biotechnology Industry Organization, a trade group.

Biotech companies also argue that their products take longer to develop, and are often tested for use in fighting more illnesses than traditional drugs. For small start-ups, they say, generic competition could be devastating. So if legislation moves forward, they will press for trade-offs such as extra years of exclusive marketing. Such a compromise was the basis for the 1984 passage of the generics bill.

"I would like to see Congress be fair to the innovators," says Jim Green, a senior vice president of Biogen Idec Inc., of Cambridge, Mass. "The level of research-and-development investment in the next product is not going down."

Write to Anna Wilde Mathews at anna.mathews@wsj.com1

Intelligence Panel Staffer Reinstated (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, November 21, 2006

A Democratic staff member of the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence has had his security clearances reinstated and yesterday resumed work for the panel, ending a pre-election drama during which senior House Republicans alleged he may have leaked an intelligence report that was politically embarrassing to the Bush administration.

The mid-level staffer, Larry Hanauer, had signed an affidavit that he did not "discuss, disclose or cause to be discussed or disclosed" a National Intelligence Estimate (NIE) on Iraq to any person "affiliated with the press."

Committee Chairman Peter Hoekstra (R-Mich.) wrote on Friday to ranking Democrat Jane Harman (Calif.) that the affidavit and the results of the committee staff director's interview of Hanauer were enough for him to rescind the punishment.

An earlier plan to carry on an investigation of all staff members to include possible review of their past e-mails was dropped. A spokesman for Hoekstra, Jamal Ware, said that the staff member's access to classified information had been "restored," but that otherwise the chairman would have no comment on the matter.

At the time of the suspension, Hoekstra told Harman that another committee member, Rep. Ray LaHood (R-Ill.), had questioned the timing between Hanauer obtaining the NIE for a Democratic lawmaker who requested it and the New York Times publishing a story about it days later. Although the leak allegation was not based on any evidence, Hoekstra suspended Hanauer, telling Harman he had "come to the conclusion that I cannot assume that this was a mere coincidence."

DOJ_NMG_0096949

Soon after the suspension last month, House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) and House Majority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.) released statements condemning leaks and praising Hoekstra.

Jonathan Turley, Hanauer's Washington attorney, yesterday released a statement welcoming the news that "this long nightmare for Larry and his family is now over." He added that it is "regrettable that it took this long given the total absence of any evidence linking Larry to the New York Times articles." In the interim, Hanauer worked in Harman's office handling non-classified duties, and he said he received threatening phone calls as a result of the publicity.

The situation highlighted long-standing animosity between Hoekstra and Harman. Harman objected to the chairman's release of several intelligence reports -- drafted primarily by the Republican staff -- that gave support to the Bush administration's policies dealing with terrorism, Iran and North Korea. In turn, Harman had released an internal report raising questions about how former committee member Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Calif.) had used his status to get Pentagon contracts for political supporters. Cunningham is serving an eight-year prison sentence after being convicted on bribery and other charges.

The antagonism between the two senior committee members seems not to have ended. Hoekstra, in his Friday letter, reminded Harman that his policy prohibits staff members from talking to the media "unless authorized by me," adding: "Even when such contacts do not deal with classified information."

He pointedly noted that he had been told "it has been the routine practice of the minority staff to have contacts with the press at your direction." Hoekstra added, referring to Hanauer: "I expect the staff member to comply scrupulously with my announced policy for the remainder of the 109th Congress."

Under normal circumstances, Harman would be in line to replace Hoekstra as chairman in January. But Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), who under the rules appoints all members of the intelligence panel, has indicated that she plans to choose someone else, possibly the next ranking Democrat, Rep. Alcee L. Hastings (Fla.).

One alternative, according to a senior Democratic staff member who asked not to be identified because he was not authorized to speak for his boss, would be for Pelosi to give Harman the chairmanship of an intelligence panel subcommittee, rather than just dropping her from the committee.

As for Hoekstra, a Republican congressional staffer said whether the current chairman remains on the committee is up to Boehner, who under the rules chooses the panel's membership. "I believe Mr. Hoekstra would serve if Boehner selects him," the staff member said.

Same Old Party (NYT)

By Thomas B. Edsall

The New York Times, November 21, 2006

Washington

Last Friday, the Republicans gave the Democrats a gift that will keep on giving: Roy Blunt of Missouri.

After an election repudiating the politics of Jack Abramoff and Tom DeLay, Republicans elevated Blunt from the number three spot in the leadership to number two.

Roy Blunt embodies the insidious, half-legal corruption that has permeated the G.O.P. majority since 1995. Blunt's election as minority whip, by a 137-to-57 margin, was a defiant Republican rejection of calls to clean up their act. Warnings by Blunt's challenger, John Shadegg of Arizona — "We ceded our reform-minded principles in exchange for a ...tighter grip on power" — went unheeded.

In 1998, DeLay put Blunt on the leadership ladder, making him chief deputy whip. Blunt modeled himself on DeLay, creating an identical network of state and federal political committees that raised money from the same lobbyists, corporations and trade associations that financed what became known as DeLay Inc.

If one political operation captured the essence of DeLay's leadership, it was the Republican takeover of Washington's influence-peddling industry. This industry, grossing $2.36 billion last year alone, eagerly accommodated DeLay's demands to replace Democratic lobbyists and association executives with Republicans. In a mutually rewarding relationship, lobbyists who financed DeLay Inc. wrote amendments and bills, while DeLay received a flood of cash to build a multimillion-dollar network of PACs. These committees lavished contributions, corporate jets and year-round entertainment on Republican House members, ensuring their loyalty, and channeled cash into local political parties, helping to win control of state legislatures that, in turn, gerrymandered districts to implement a long-term strategy of larger G.O.P. Congressional majorities.

In 2003, after DeLay moved up to majority leader and turned the so-called K Street Project over to him, Blunt promptly converted a legion of Republican lobbyists into an arm of the House whip operation. Lobbyists have always been close to Congress, under rule by either party. What DeLay and Blunt did was to sacralize this relationship. In doing so, they transferred a chunk of power from Capitol Hill to business interests.

DOJ_NMG_0096950

This unholy alliance was a crucial factor in transforming the G.O.P. into an army of spenders whose earmarks, appropriations and tax cuts rivaled the government largess of Lyndon Johnson's Great Society.

In 2004, Blunt turned his lobbyist team loose to win passage of a bill eliminating a $50 billion corporate tax break that the World Trade Organization had ruled in violation of international agreements. These lobbyists inserted $143 billion worth of new corporate tax breaks, turning the bill into a Fortune 500 Christmas tree.

Blunt is not the easy target DeLay was. DeLay, a born-again Southern Baptist, by his own account had battled demon rum and the playboy life. Once he started down the path of righteousness, moralizing and sermonizing, he made enemies, painting a bull's-eye on his back.

Blunt, by contrast, is bland, unctuous and adept at keeping a low profile. But there is plenty to see. After divorcing his wife of 35 years to marry a tobacco lobbyist, Abigail Perlman, he cleared his second marriage with the House Ethics Committee to get "a waiver of the limitations of the gift rule to allow me to accept gifts in connection with my wedding."

Blunt unblushingly told the Heritage Foundation this month that Republicans "have allowed our efforts to defend traditional values to be defined as little more than a politically driven effort to appease 'family groups.' "

For Blunt, the blurring of boundaries is a family tradition. His son Matt is the governor of Missouri. Another son, Andrew, is one of the state's top lobbyists. Almost all Altria subsidiaries — Kraft, Miller Brewing, Philip Morris (remember Abigail Perlman) — hired Andy Blunt, along with other financial backers of Roy Blunt.

In Blunt, House Republicans have kept on display a top official reminding voters why they cast ballots for Democrats on Nov. 7. After winning the post of minority whip last week, Blunt declared that the Republicans had "come together ... frankly, to get rid of the bad habits that we may have developed in 12 years in the majority." This is precisely the opposite of what they actually did, which was to affirm their bad habits. The burden on the Democrats will be to make the elusive Blunt a nationally recognized figure.

A Familiar Number (NYT)

By Robin Toner

The New York Times, November 21, 2006

With only a few races undecided, the new House of Representatives looks increasingly like a mirror image of the old: the Democrats are likely to have a majority close to 232, which was the Republicans' majority in the departing Congress. That may seem small compared with the Democrats' glory days; in 1994, before they lost power, they had 258 seats out of 435, and in the 1970s, after Watergate, they approached 300.

Still, the new Democratic majority is comparatively comfortable; 232 was the high-water mark for the Republicans in the 12 years they held power.

The strength of the Democratic showing in the elections this month was underscored by one statistic: they did not lose a single seat. They have gained 29 and, in New England, left the Republicans with just one House seat — that of Representative Christopher Shays of Connecticut — out of 22 in the region.

Whether the Democrats can hold this majority together on legislation, of course, is another question. And even if they maintain unity in the House, the prospects in the new Democratic Senate are even more fraught, given the particularly independent class just elected. Moreover, Senate Democrats have a majority of only 51, far short of the 60 votes required to break a filibuster.

Behind Democrats' Climb In Mountain West (USAT)

By Martin Kasindorf And Tom Kenworthy

USA Today, November 21, 2006

Some say party's success on Election Day was just a fluke; others see a major political realignment; it could just be a normal part of a cycle between parties

DENVER — A wave of Democratic blue is splashing the fast-growing Rocky Mountain West, which until recently was so Republican that all eight states in the region went red for President Bush in 2004.

Democrats are celebrating their Election Day seizure of a U.S. Senate seat, a governorship, three U.S. House seats and other major offices in Rocky Mountain states. That extends a trend started in 2002 with winning three governor seats. Now, Democrats are hoping to break the Republican lock on the inland West in the 2008 presidential race.

The region's results Nov. 7 tracked with Democratic successes in the Northeast and Midwest. The question is whether the Western shifts indicate a fluke, the normal turn of a cycle or a permanent realignment.

DOJ_NMG_0096951

Some Republicans say their party should gird for long-term trouble. “The West is not going to be as definitively conservative and Republican as it has been,” says Eddie Mahe, a veteran GOP campaign strategist. “The Rocky Mountain West is probably trending to look more like a lot of the remainder of the country, not quite as unique as it once was.”

Utah Gov. Jon Huntsman, a Republican, says, “Many of the Democratic leaders in the region have co-opted Republican issues. It signals the success of certain traditional Western conservative values. Republicans in this region should stick to their knitting. We should focus on that which we do best — economic vitality, immigration, the environment, energy efficiency and tax reform.”

Randy Pullen, a Republican National Committee member from Arizona, says the election was a one-shot loss. “This election was a referendum on the president,” he says. “We'll fare better in two years.”

The political changes mean both national parties will pay more attention to the West, says Michael Stratton, a Democratic campaign strategist in Denver. “It sets the grounds for the candidacy of a president who can speak Western issues,” he says.

University of Maryland-Baltimore County political scientist Thomas Schaller says Democrats should develop a strategy for 2008 that would cede the South to the GOP. Schaller says in his book, Whistling Past Dixie, Democrats could reach the needed 270 electoral votes by winning Colorado, Arizona, Nevada, New Mexico and other targets in the Mountain West. Midwestern states also would get more attention. “The West is not cowpokes and tumbleweeds, if it ever was,” he says. “It's changing rapidly.”

Signs that the Democratic Party is getting the message:

·The Democratic National Committee this year added Nevada to the early presidential nominating contests. Nevada's caucuses will be in January 2008, between the Iowa caucuses and New Hampshire primary. The DNC wanted to move up a racially diverse state and to please Las Vegas' powerhouse, 60,000-member Culinary Union, says Michael Gehrke of the Senate Majority Project, a Democratic group separate from the party.

·Denver is a finalist to host the 2008 national convention. The DNC will decide between it and New York City next year.

·DNC Chairman Howard Dean's “50-state strategy” put field operatives on the payroll and dispatched them a year ago for groundwork in Mountain West states that Democrats used to write off.

Democrats made notable gains.

Former Denver prosecutor Bill Ritter won the governorship in Colorado. Now, Democrats control that office, the Legislature and a majority of the state's U.S. House delegation for the first time since 1958.

In 2000, Democrats had no governors in the eight Mountain West states. Ritter's win increases the party's count from four to five of the governors.

In Montana, Jon Tester, an organic farmer with a flattop haircut, narrowly upset Republican U.S. Sen. Conrad Burns. Montana, which gave Bush a 59% majority in 2004, now has two Democratic senators. Democrats also held both houses of the Legislature.

Democrats captured three GOP-held House seats in the region. In Arizona, former Tempe mayor Harry Mitchell unseated Rep. J. D. Hayworth, and Democrat Gabrielle Giffords defeated Republican Randy Graf for retiring Rep. Jim Kolbe's seat. Colorado Democrat Ed Perlmutter picked up the seat Republican Bob Beauprez left open in his losing run for governor.

Launching the Democratic trend in 2002 were governors Janet Napolitano in Arizona, Bill Richardson in New Mexico and Dave Freudenthal in Wyoming. All were just re-elected in landslides.

Factors making the difference for Democrats:

·No liberals. Luring Western voters these days are “Blue Dog” Democrats, moderate-to-conservative candidates who are comfortable in Stetsons and boots. They support gun rights, Democratic pollster Celinda Lake says.

“First off, it's recruiting candidates that look like your state and use words you use,” says Montana Gov. Brian Schweitzer, elected in 2004 as the state's first Democrat in the post in 20 years. “We don't scare 'em. We are the kind of people who go to church on Sunday, drive a pickup and lower taxes when we can.”

Lake recalls a moment in Schweitzer's 2004 campaign when he was asked his views on an amendment banning gay marriage. “He said, basically, ‘I believe marriage is between a man and a woman, but aren't you a lot more worried about the price of grain?' ”

·Population changes. Cities and suburbs are booming from Albuquerque to Las Vegas to Boise to Grand Junction, Colo. There's been an influx of Hispanics and others. Many people are fleeing California's high housing costs and flocking to thriving Mountain West economies.

“We've become less isolated, more cosmopolitan, less the Last Frontier typified by Barry Goldwater conservatism,” says F. Chris Garcia, a retired pollster and University of New Mexico political scientist. “As states grow rapidly, there's a blending going on. We're going toward the center, not being just of one party.”

DOJ_NMG_0096952

Hispanic population growth also is changing the face of the West, particularly in the Southwest and Colorado, Richardson says.

According to the Pew Hispanic Center, Hispanics eligible to vote in 2006 were 38% of the New Mexico electorate, 17% in Arizona, 13% in Nevada and 12% in Colorado (Hispanic citizens were 9% of the overall U.S. electorate.) "You have a new melting pot in the West," Schaller says. "It's good for Democrats if they can capitalize on it."

·Social attitudes. Many newcomers are from coastal states where religious fundamentalists have made few inroads, Schaller says. And though the religious right dominates the GOP machinery in some mountain states, it is less pervasive in the Mountain West than in the South, he says.

·Rapid growth. Nevada, Arizona and Idaho are the USA's fastest-growing states, with Utah fifth. In Denver, Albuquerque and other Western cities, growth has brought congestion and sprawl. That points Westerners toward Democrats who say government can manage the problems, says Daniel Kemmis, senior fellow at the University of Montana's Center for the Rocky Mountain West. "There is a growing awareness among Westerners that these growth pressures … require thoughtful responses, not ideological responses," says Kemmis, a Democrat and former speaker of Montana's House.

·Environmental views. Typical new Montana residents, Schweitzer says, are moderate Republicans drawn to the state's open landscapes, blue-ribbon trout streams, hunting and hiking.

"Why we choose to stay or move here is because of the quality of life," he says.

Old-line Western farmers and ranchers are allying with environmental groups in a "coalition for Teddy Roosevelt-style conservation" of land and wildlife that's helping Democrats against pro-industry Republicans, Stratton says.

Put it all together, and the good year for Democrats "is not a fluke," says Larry Sabato, a University of Virginia political scientist. "There may be some one-term wonders … but on the whole, the Democrats in the West were part of a national and regional trend. Colorado has been running toward the Democrats, and I don't see that it's going to move back any time soon."

Freudenthal, Wyoming's Democratic governor, says pundits are reading too much into Democratic gains. "It's hardly as ebullient as the Democrats say, or as dark as the Republicans do," he says. "On the state-level stuff, I think it's all local politics and not some groundswell one way or the other. Wyoming has not become a Democratic state."

Freudenthal says Western voters were concerned this year about health care, education and balanced growth — issues that favored Democrats.

"The issues created the Democrats more than the Democrats created the tide," he says.

Election Day wasn't a Democratic sweep.

Nevada Republicans retained the governorship and fended off a challenge for a House seat. Republicans kept House seats in Montana and Wyoming. Idaho Republicans won all seven statewide races, including governor. Utah, too, stayed in the red column.

The natural cycles of politics provide another explanation for Democratic gains, says Pam Inmann, executive director of the Western Governors' Association.

"We had a big change in '74 (toward the Democrats), another in '94 (toward the Republicans)," she says. "After a party's been in power for a while and things are not going well, things tend to shift."

Can Democrats hold their gains? "It depends on how the Republicans choose to respond," Freudenthal says. "If they move toward more moderate candidates, then it becomes competitive."

Ritter, Colorado's new Democratic governor, says the trend will last "if we govern well. If we squander this because we don't appreciate the Western electorate, then it'll be short-lived."

He says the success will continue if Democrats focus on "how government intersects with where people struggle. It's about running a smart government, not a big government."

Traditionally Republican States Show They're Open To Democrats (MCT)

By Steven Thomma

McClatchy Newspapers, November 21, 2006

WASHINGTON - The next time you look at a political map of the United States, you'll have to adjust the color. After this month's elections, the old red-blue map that's defined the country for years is dead.

All the solid Democratic states are still Democratic blue - basically the West Coast, the Northeast and scattered Great Lakes states such as Illinois, Wisconsin and Michigan.

Some are even bluer. Democrats took back the governor's office in New York, for example.

But a lot of states that were dependably Republican Red are now some other hue. Call them purple, striped or polka-dotted - the fact is they're now open to Democrats.

DOJ_NMG_0096953

They haven't gone completely over. But they did elect some Democrats, signaling that they're in play. And that means a new center of gravity for the Democrats as they struggle to define themselves by governing in Congress the next two years and setting the table for 2008, hoping to consolidate this year's gains and win back the White House.

Democrats gained in states such as Colorado, where they picked up the governor's office.

That gives them a statehouse foothold across the Mountain West, as they now hold governors' offices in a solid line from Montana to New Mexico.

Democrats also picked up Senate seats in once-solid red states, such as Ohio and Virginia.

And they gained U.S. House of Representatives seats in such red states as Arizona, Colorado, Georgia, Indiana, Kansas, Kentucky, North Carolina, Ohio, Tennessee and Texas.

In part that reflects changes within those states. Migration of Democrats from the North to the Sun Belt continues to dilute the Republican red zone. Immigration brings new voters from Mexico and farther south, the majority of them Democrats once they vote.

It also reflects changes in the Democrats, who this year recruited centrists and moderates to compete in culturally conservative areas.

These new voices in the party - people such as incoming Sens. Bob Casey of Pennsylvania, Jon Tester of Montana and James Webb of Virginia - are certain to influence how the party handles issues such as abortion, taxes and gun control. Many are anti-abortion, anti-tax and pro-gun.

Democrats will want to keep those hard-won gains. And having tasted victory in red states, Democrats likely will want to go back and win the 14 House seats they lost by less than 1 percent, many of them in red states.

"Who you represent, who you're fighting over, changes thinking within the party. The party will be impacted by this election," said Democratic pollster Stan Greenberg. "When people look up at whose seats they are defending and the seats they can pick up ... that will impact what Democrats take up, what symbolic issues get put out on the table."

Issues that appealed to the party's liberal base might anger its new supporters and provide fresh ammunition to Republicans to re-energize their base.

Thus, a committed liberal such as Rep. Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., the next House speaker, stifles talk about gay rights, a living wage, tax increases or cutting off funds for the Iraq war. The liberal base will push for those and more - but it can't rule the new map the way it did the old.

Another example: The last time the Democrats controlled the Congress, in 1994, they made gun control a centerpiece of their domestic agenda. This time around, it hasn't been mentioned, and many Democrats boast of their support for gun rights.

"If somebody brings up guns," said Democratic strategist James Carville, "I'm going to shoot `em."

These states also may be purple for the 2008 presidential election.

Democrats now hold governors' offices in states with 295 electoral votes - enough to win the White House.

"I consider all those states part of the presidential strategy," said Greenberg, who helped Bill Clinton win the presidency in 1992.

Still, one of the challenges facing Democrats is to find a presidential nominee who can satisfy both the liberals of Los Angeles and New York and the moderates of Golden, Colo., or Missoula, Mont.

Is The South Truly A Dead Zone For Democrats? (NYT)

By Adam Nossiter

The New York Times, November 21, 2006

NEW ORLEANS, Nov. 20 — The South largely sat out the drama of the recent election, apparently confirming its reputation as the Democrats' graveyard. An influential book published in October predicted as much, saying the party could safely avert its gaze from a region that could not be of help.

"They don't need the South to win," said Thomas F. Schaller, who wrote the book, "Whistling Past Dixie: How the Democrats Can Win Without the South," and who teaches political science at the University of Maryland, Baltimore County. "Why would Democrats go after the most rural, least unionized, most racially polarized, most evangelized region in the country?" As proof, Mr. Schaller has cited Representative Harold E. Ford Jr.'s losing Senate race in Tennessee.

But not so fast. The thundering silence from the South may prove nothing more than what should be obvious: when Democrats do not compete, or compete unequally, they lose. Party officials in Tennessee, reflecting on the race in recent days, acknowledged that Mr. Ford was not an ideal candidate for the state, and not just because he was a black politician trying to climb the steep mountain of a white electorate. His own political baggage added significantly to his burden.

Throughout the South, Democrats ceded vast swaths of Congressional territory to Republicans, hardly bothering to show that the party was alive, even in places where such a demonstration might have been welcome. In Louisiana, Democrats barely fought in two Congressional districts where Republican incumbents could have been vulnerable: the Fifth District in the north, represented by a party-switching Republican whose last-minute change infuriated the state's Democrats two years ago, and the Seventh District in Cajun country to the south, peopled by socially tolerant French Catholics and long represented by Democrats.

DOJ_NMG_0096954

Democratic officials in the state say they tried to persuade strong candidates to take up these challenges but found no buyers and evidently no deep bench from which to draw, testimony to the years of national Republican ascendancy.

True, President Bush piled up big majorities in 2004 in both districts, but he also did so in a southern Louisiana district where the Democratic incumbent was handily re-elected on Nov. 7. Had Democrats fought in Louisiana this year, "they would have made a good run for it," said Wayne Parent, a political scientist at Louisiana State University.

In Mississippi and Alabama, Republican incumbents cruised to re-election with hardly a peep out of the Democrats. Yet Mississippi, depicted by Mr. Schaller in some ways as the most impregnable Republican bastion in the South, has elected progressive Democrats as governor three times in the last three decades, a fact unmentioned by Mr. Schaller in his book. In Georgia, two Democratic incumbents considered by Republicans to be among the most vulnerable in the nation held their seats, albeit narrowly.

In many ways, however, it was the closely watched Senate race in Tennessee that was most indicative of the problems and the promise of the Democrats' future in the region.

At one level, Mr. Ford's loss to the Republican, Bob Corker, was simply a reiteration of an ancient reality for Democrats in the South: black candidates in statewide races are unlikely to win because they face a majority-white electorate, and most whites do not vote for blacks. In other words, there is a challenge with the voters, not the candidate, which is one of Mr. Schaller's arguments.

For example, at an election-eve rally in rural Centerville, about 65 miles west of Nashville, John C. Tidwell, the local Democratic state representative, looked out over the small, mostly white crowd and said, "There are people spread out here that wouldn't vote for" Mr. Ford "even if he were Moses." Mr. Tidwell used a slur for a black man, not Mr. Ford's name.

Another attendee, Wes Morgan, backed up Mr. Tidwell's observation: Mr. Ford's race was a tough sell in Hickman County, which includes Centerville. "You're still in the country," said Mr. Morgan, an emergency medical technician. "A lot of people say, 'Ain't no way my grandfather would have voted for a black man.' "

Yet even given that reality, Mr. Ford came remarkably close, winning 48 percent of the vote. Why he did not do better was suggested by Mr. Tidwell's next comment, which also hinted at why Mr. Ford's racial background was not the only factor in his loss.

"These people are struggling with their vote," Mr. Tidwell said. "They don't like the Republicans, but they don't like a Ford black boy either." Here the racially charged language was accompanied by the Ford name, and for many in Tennessee, that carried a specific meaning.

Voters knew that several members of the politically active Ford family had been caught up in legal and ethical problems, including Mr. Ford's father and predecessor in Congress, Harold Ford Sr., who was acquitted on federal corruption charges.

"The Ford name has a lot of baggage in West Tennessee," said Will T. Cheek, a member of the Democratic National Committee in Nashville.

That voters might have considered the Fords less than trustworthy could have been reinforced in the Senate race, in the view of some Tennessee Democrats, by the candidate's own late-breaking genuflections toward his faith, by his denunciations of same-sex marriage and by other signals of a swing to the right.

As it happened, white Democrats did turn out for Mr. Ford in Tennessee, just not in sufficient numbers, suggesting that a different candidate, and not necessarily a white one, could have been elected.

"We really lost this thing in rural Middle Tennessee, which is historically Democratic, and it did not perform well at all," said Mr. Cheek, who is also a former chairman of the Tennessee Democratic Party. (Most of the state's black voters are concentrated in the western third of the state.) Looking over the statistics postelection, "Ford is winning," Mr. Cheek said, "but he's not winning as big as he should be winning."

In several counties, Mr. Ford won even fewer votes than Senator John Kerry, who lost big in the state when he ran for president in 2004. And Mr. Ford lost while Gov. Phil Bredesen, a Democrat, was sweeping every county in the state.

"I think another candidate might have won — I think one of the congressmen could have won it," Mr. Cheek said, referring to Tennessee's Democratic representatives.

In an interview last week, Mr. Schaller, the political scientist, was jubilant, seeing the national election as a vindication of his book. "For the first time in 52 years," he said, "Congress will be run by the party that has a minority of Southern seats in the House and Senate."

But others warn that to abandon the South carries risks as well, paralleling those faced by Republicans who let themselves become dominated by Southern voices and ideology.

DOJ_NMG_0096955

"The Republican mistake was to center the party too much in the South," said Mr. Parent, of Louisiana State University. But "once the Democratic Party starts extricating itself from Dixie too much, it might move itself too far away from its center in Ohio and Pennsylvania."

Dems' Senate Grip Will Rely On 3 New Hybrids (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely
USA Today, November 21, 2006
WASHINGTON

When Democrats take over the Senate in January, the party's bare two-vote majority will include three senators whose history shows they heed their own views more than those of any political leader.

Just how precarious is the Democrats' grip on power? The 51 senators who will make up the party's Senate caucus beginning in January include two who aren't officially Democrats — independents Joe Lieberman of Connecticut and Bernie Sanders of Vermont — and Jim Webb of Virginia, who used to be a Republican.

The 110th Congress will be the first since 1976 to have two people who don't belong to the two major parties serving in the Senate at the same time. Republicans will occupy 49 of the chamber's 100 seats.

Even when one party has a more comfortable margin of control, Senate rules make it "easy to play to a draw on everything," says deputy Democratic leader Dick Durbin of Illinois.

In the new Senate, where every roll call could be a squeaker, political hybrids Lieberman, Sanders and Webb stand to be key players.

No wonder incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid lavished plum committee assignments on the trio last week.

Lieberman will head the high-profile committee that oversees homeland security and governmental affairs. Webb, though a freshman, snagged coveted posts on the Armed Services and homeland security committees. In addition to the three assignments he requested — on the energy; environment; and health, education and labor committees — Sanders said he was surprised to learn he's also been given a seat on the Senate Budget Committee.

On paper, the three appear likely to push the party in opposite directions: Sanders describes himself as a "democratic socialist;" Webb worked in the administration of President Reagan, a conservative icon. He and Lieberman share a belief that the Democratic Party must develop more muscular stands on defense and foreign policy.

In separate interviews, however, all three members of what could become the Senate's maverick caucus identified one area of common ground: All named the middle class squeeze as one of their top concerns and said they want to reverse Bush administration policies that, in their view, favor the wealthy.

Dems Return To Power With A Long Wish List (USAT)

By Richard Wolf
USA Today, November 21, 2006

WASHINGTON — Democrats will return to power in Congress with a lengthy list of expensive priorities and a pledge to pay for them. Some budget experts say the dual goals don't add up.

Democratic leaders have endorsed an ambitious agenda that includes fortifying the military, improving homeland security, helping veterans, making college more affordable, establishing energy independence and boosting private savings rates. Annual tab: at least $79 billion, according to the National Taxpayers Union, a group opposed to higher taxes.

They also want to protect 20 million upper middle-income taxpayers from the alternative minimum tax. It was originally designed to ensure the rich didn't avoid paying taxes, but it threatens to raise taxes on the less affluent unless it's indexed for inflation. Cost: $50 billion a year, according to the Joint Committee on Taxation.

And they want to eliminate the coverage gap in Medicare's prescription-drug program, which forces those with big drug bills to pay at least $3,600 out of pocket. Price tag: about $30 billion a year and rising, according to the Congressional Budget Office.

At the same time, Democratic leaders say, they will reinstate budget rules that expired in 2002. They want statutory caps on most domestic and defense spending. They also want new tax cuts or benefit increases offset by other tax increases or spending cuts to keep the deficit from growing.

"They can't basically have all of those priorities … without deciding who's going to pay the bill, and that means either cuts in spending or increases in revenue," says Leon Panetta, White House chief of staff and budget director under President Clinton. "There's going to be a huge temptation here to borrow the Republicans' example of borrow and spend."

"It's going to be difficult," says Rep. Charles Rangel, D-N.Y., who is in line to lead the tax-writing House Ways and Means Committee next year. "We're going to have to see how much fat is out there."

DOJ_NMG_0096956

The growing list of pent-up Democratic demands reflects 12 years largely spent out of power in Congress. In the days after the election, Democrats who will chair key committees spoke openly of goals as ambitious as expanding health insurance to all children and providing free college educations to math and science majors.

The immediate list is less expensive. In crafting their "Six for '06" campaign agenda, incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid left off fixing the alternative minimum tax and closing the Medicare drug coverage gap because of their costs.

Still, items such as implementing the homeland security recommendations of the 9/11 Commission and cutting interest rates for student loans could cost billions more once specific proposals are made. Democrats have pledged to pass those in the first 100 hours of the new Congress.

Some of the party's leading proponents of reducing the $248 billion federal deficit say the initial package is realistic. Sen. Kent Conrad, D-N.D., in line to be the Senate Budget Committee chairman, calls it "pretty modest." Rep. Jim Cooper, D-Tenn., says it's "reasonable."

Paying for those priorities may prove untenable, they say, forcing Democrats to choose between forgoing new initiatives or waiving the budget rules. "You impose a discipline that may restrict your ability to enact one or more of them," Conrad says.

The Democrats have a much smaller list of ways to pay for their initiatives. They would have the government negotiate lower prices with drug companies for the Medicare prescription program, which the Congressional Budget Office has said will not save money. They would repeal subsidies for big oil companies worth about $7 billion a year. And they would try to close the elusive "tax gap" — an estimated $400 billion in taxes owed but uncollected each year. The IRS says $50 billion to $100 billion eventually could be recouped.

Republicans scoff at the disparity between the Democrats' wish list and wallet. "It's going to be difficult to do some of the things Democrats have suggested," says Rep. Jim McCrery, R-La., who's in line to be the top Republican on the Ways and Means Committee.

"It is extraordinarily expensive. You're talking tens if not hundreds of billions of dollars," says Sen. Judd Gregg, R-N.H., current chairman of the Senate Budget Committee.

Critics of the pay-as-you-go budget rule note that it doesn't reduce the automatic growth of Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid, since it applies only to new initiatives. It could, however, endanger President Bush's tax cuts, which are due to expire in 2010. Extending them for five years would cost more than $1.2 trillion, the Congressional Budget Office says. The rule was in effect but waived in 2001, when most of the tax cuts were enacted but not paid for.

"Every dollar of federal spending, no matter how wasteful, will be defended to the death by whoever receives it," says Brian Riedl, a budget analyst at the conservative Heritage Foundation. "Gimmicks usually win out."

Push To Add Real Estate Funds To Savings Plan Is Rebuffed (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, November 21, 2006

Don't bet the mortgage that the Thrift Savings Plan will add a real estate investment fund, or any other option, soon.

A consultant hired by the TSP said yesterday that the retirement savings program for government employees is generally comparable to 401(k) and similar plans offered in the private sector and did not recommend any changes.

"Our review of the program leads us to the conclusion that the core of the investment program is well-structured and there are no gaps in the investment lineup," Ennis Knupp, a consultancy in Chicago, said in a report.

About 200 House members are co-sponsoring a bill that would add a real estate investment fund to the TSP, which prompted the Federal Retirement Thrift Investment Board to order the $140,000 study. After the board signaled opposition to adding a real estate option and sought the study, the chief sponsors of the bill put it on hold.

The board, chaired by Andrew M. Saul, was briefed by representatives of Ennis Knupp yesterday, but board members did not mention the proposed legislation. A board spokesman said copies of the consultant's study had been sent to congressional committees that oversee the TSP.

The National Association of Real Estate Investment Trusts has pushed for adding a real estate fund, contending that it would help government employees diversify their portfolios.

The association's spokesman said the consultant's report is being reviewed but portrayed its findings as predictable. "Given the TSP administration's longstanding opposition to adding new choices to the TSP lineup, we're not terribly surprised that the report validated the TSP management viewpoint," Ron Kuykendall, the spokesman, said.

Real estate investment trusts, or REITs, are publicly traded companies that own and usually manage real estate, such as office buildings, shopping centers, apartments, hotels and warehouses. They are often called "liquid real estate" because they provide a way to invest in an array of commercial properties without having to buy them directly. REITs are required to pay out most of their taxable income to shareholders.

DOJ_NMG_0096957

A spokesman for Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.), one of the chief proponents for adding a real estate fund to the TSP, said Davis "looks forward to continuing to discuss with federal employees why he thinks they would benefit from a REIT option."

In reviewing REITs for the TSP, the consultant found they have outpaced most U.S. stocks over the past decade and have performed particularly well in the past five years, with an annualized return exceeding 19 percent.

But Ennis Knupp concluded that REITs remain a "sub-sector" of the stock market and that participants can gain exposure to REITs through the TSP's large, common stock index fund and its small-company index fund. The consultant also raised concerns that the REIT market might have difficulty in accommodating cash flows in excess of $200 million on some days, a possibility based on the TSP's experience with its international fund.

In addition to REITs, the consultant reviewed growth and value stock funds, emerging markets stocks, non-U.S. bonds, commodities and Treasury inflation-protected securities, known as TIPS.

Russell Ivinjack, an Ennis Knupp principal, said his team found more disadvantages than advantages in the six asset classes, suggesting that the TSP should stick with its four broad index funds, a government securities fund, and five life-cycle funds that automatically shift to less risky investments as a participant nears the time to draw down savings.

Private-sector survey data examined by Ennis Knupp indicated that most 401(k) participants select investment options similar to those of TSP participants, he said. The data, he added, "confirms this program is in the mainstream."

Saul noted that the TSP hit $200 billion in assets this month -- "really a milestone." The TSP has more than doubled in size in the past four years, making it one of the largest retirement savings programs in the world.

Textile Fiasco (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 21, 2006

Congress's failure to pass Permanent Normal Trade Relations with Vietnam embarrassed President Bush on his visit to Hanoi last week. But this failure is an even bigger fiasco than it appears because of the White House's pandering to the U.S. textile industry. It's a case study in how protectionists never stay bought.

The power of the textile lobby is an old story, and the Bush Administration bowed to it by negotiating extraordinary quota provisions with Vietnam. In particular, it agreed to allow quotas to be reimposed if there are import surges in Vietnam textiles to the U.S. once the deal is implemented. But that wasn't enough for the textile crowd, who induced GOP Senators Lindsey Graham (South Carolina) and Elizabeth Dole (North Carolina) to put a hold on the bill. Never mind that the bill has bipartisan support and many more than the 60 Senate votes needed to overcome a filibuster.

But instead of insisting that Republicans bring the bill to a vote, the Administration chose to make one more protectionist concession. In a September letter to the two GOP Senators, Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez and Trade Representative Susan Schwab agreed to "self-initiate anti-dumping investigations" against Vietnamese apparel under certain circumstances. That is, the government declared that it will serve as the textile lobby's protectionist front man.

This is stunning. For one thing, the government almost never initiates anti-dumping actions. The last time we can recall it happening was on softwood lumber in 1991. Under the anti-dumping laws, the industry itself is supposed to show evidence that it is being harmed by specific imported products.

More amazing still, the U.S. textile industry doesn't compete with apparel -- such as trousers, shirts, sweaters -- that American retailers import from Vietnam. It makes yarn or fabric. So the Bush Administration is promising to protect the U.S. yarn industry against a surge in imports of other textile products. It would be as if the U.S. agreed to protect U.S. car makers against a surge in foreign automobile tires. The trade precedent here is dangerous, and probably violates World Trade Organization rules.

What's going on is that the U.S. textile industry is trying to protect its interests not in the U.S. but in Central America. If the Vietnam bill passes, apparel from Vietnam may well be able to undercut the price of similar goods from Honduras. Those Central American plants buy U.S. yarn, so the textile lobby is trying to block exports from Vietnam to protect its own exports to Honduras.

In other words, under the promises made by the Bush Administration, the winners would be big yarn-spinning companies like Parkdale Mills. The losers would be American consumers who would pay more for their clothing.

In the event, even this wasn't enough to get the Vietnam trade deal through Congress in time for the President's trip. The bill failed in the House in part because some Republicans decided to take a slap at the White House for its contributions to this month's electoral rout. Meanwhile, U.S. retailers that import apparel are understandably furious at the protection double-cross and wonder if this bill is now worth their support. The bill could still return for a vote in this lame-duck Congress, but trade bills are never a sure thing.

This fiasco is another illustration that tactical protectionist concessions rarely yield the strategic free-trade gains that supporters claim. The Bush White House justified its steel tariffs and farm subsidy blowout in the first term as the price of passing trade promotion authority, but the global backlash has been extreme. The Doha Round may not even make it to a vote in Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0096958

We doubt President Bush is aware of all this, but the White House aides and Cabinet officers who bollixed up the Vietnam bill owe him an apology. So far they've managed only to turn a vehicle for more open markets into a precedent for more protectionism.

OTHER NEWS:

Leading Economic Indicators Inched Higher In October (WSJ)

By Michael S. Derby

The Wall Street Journal, November 21, 2006

NEW YORK -- An indicator of future economic activity inched higher in October, a private research group said Monday, suggesting that recent weakness in the housing market hasn't been severe enough to offset lower gas prices and a rising stock market.

Separately, the National Association of Realtors reported that existing home sales in the third quarter dipped to a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 6.27 million units nationwide, down 12.7% from the same period a year ago.

The Conference Board, an industry-backed research group based in New York, said its composite index of leading economic indicators for October rose by 0.2% to 138.3, after a revised 0.4% advance the month before. The index was equal to 100 in 1996. October's rise matched forecasters' expectation.

WALL STREET JOURNAL VIDEO

1

WSJ's David Wessel discusses2 an economists' poll of the housing market and whether the worst of the bust is behind us. · Alan Hubbard, director of the National Economic Council3, discusses the latest economic numbers, including the impact of a slower housing market, and the "importance of keeping taxes low."

The index is designed to predict economic activity in the three to six months ahead. October's modest increase fit with economists' view that growth is moderating. The index fell in both July and August before edging modestly higher in September. It has been down four of the last seven months. The index stood at 139.1 in January -- its peak so far this year.

"The impact of a slower housing market on consumers and slower profit growth on business isn't completely offset by lower gas prices and a rising stock market," said Ken Goldstein, an economist with the Conference Board. He added the economy "is unlikely either to reheat or get significantly cooler" and the current pace of cool economic growth could continue into the spring.

The private research group noted that six of the 10 components making up the leading index rose for the month, led by money supply and consumer expectations. The biggest negatives were vendor performance and building permits. The reported noted, "strengths and weaknesses have been roughly balanced among the leading indicators in recent months."

In other details, the group reported that its index of coincident indicators was up 0.1% to a reading of 123.7, after September's revised gain of 0.2%. The lagging index rose 0.2% to 124.1, the same gain as the prior month.

Home Sales Fall

Sales of existing homes fell in 38 states during the summer, led by steep declines in Arizona, Florida and California, as the once-booming housing market showed further signs of a steep slowdown, said the National Association of Realtors.

The declines were the largest in once-booming areas of the country. Sales fell by 36% in Arizona; 34.2% in Florida and 28.6% in California. In all, nine states had sales declines in the summer of 20% or more compared to the third quarter of 2005.

The weakness in sales also affected prices with 45 metropolitan areas experiencing price declines, according to a separate survey the Realtors did of 148 metropolitan areas. The price survey showed that the median -- or midpoint -- price for an existing home sold in the third quarter dipped to $224,900, down 1.2% from a year earlier.

Sales rose in 10 states, and in two states -- New Hampshire and Vermont -- the Realtors did not have available data.

The nationwide 12.7% fall in sales was from a summer 2005 pace of 7.18 million units, which was the second highest in history. The all-time record sales pace was an annual rate of 7.19 million units set in the April-June quarter of last year. Sales of both existing and new homes set records for a fifth consecutive year in 2005 but have been falling steadily this year as conditions in the housing market have deteriorated.

The plunge in housing shaved a full percentage-point off economic growth in the July-September quarter with economists predicting a similar reduction in the current quarter.

But David Lereah, the Realtors' chief economist, said he believed the decline in prices in formerly red-hot areas of the country was setting the stage for a rebound next year. "With the market in full transition, buyers now have choices and sellers are more willing to negotiate," he said. "Under these circumstances, it's no surprise that overall home prices are slightly below a year ago."

DOJ_NMG_0096959

Is The Worst Over For The Housing Bust? (WSJ)

By Phil Izzo

The Wall Street Journal, November 21, 2006

After several years of double-digit percentage increase, housing prices stopped soaring this year. The 49 economists responding to the WSJ.com forecasting survey expect home prices, measured by the government's Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight index, to rise 2.8% this year and to fall by 0.5% next year. That contrasts with a 13.4% increase in 2005.

"We're nearing the end of the slowdown for most markets," said Ethan S. Harris at Lehman Brothers. Prices still have some ways to fall before they'll stabilize, but there are signs that most drastic parts of the downturn – marked by a sharp pullback in demand and new construction – have run their course.

The economists' predictions for home prices next year vary widely, from an increase of 7%, predicted by Kurt Karl and Arun Raha of Swiss Re, to a 10% decline, expected by Maury Harris of UBS. Mr. Harris, for his part, said he expects a large inventory of vacant newly constructed homes to push prices lower in the first half. Construction companies "built much more than were justified because of investor interest," he said.

While 20 economists predicted home prices would rise next year, 24 forecast a decline. Just eight of the economists forecast gains greater than 2.1%, which is their average forecast for consumer-price inflation through mid-2007. The Ofheo index, which is closely watched by economists, has never posted a year-to-year decline.

Richard DeKaser, an economist at National City Corp., a big mortgage provider, said he thinks the worst is over. "We're starting to see inventories topping out and possible declining," he said. Mr. DeKaser forecast a 4.4% increase in prices this year and a 1.8% decline next.

The housing market, of course, doesn't move uniformly across the country; some regions or individual cities often have price changes decidedly above or below the national average.

Mr. Harris of Lehman expects price declines next year to be confined to "bubble" markets, such as those in Florida, California and cities in Nevada and Arizona, where large numbers of investors have artificially inflated prices. "There's no reason for prices to be falling in areas without a bubble," he said. "People are just slowing down purchase decisions."

Allen Sinai, at Decision Economics Inc., believes the worst of the bust is over, but he feels housing remains a big risk to the economy. The housing sector subtracted 1.1 percentage points from third-quarter gross domestic product, according to preliminary numbers from the U.S. Commerce Department.

ABOUT THE SURVEY

The Wall Street Journal surveys a group of more than 50 economists throughout the year. Broad surveys on more than 10 major economic indicators are conducted semiannually, at midyear and at year-end. Between each semiannual survey, four monthly updates are conducted for the most closely watched forecasts. This is the monthly survey for November. For prior installments of the semiannual and monthly surveys, see: WSJ.com/Economists5.

The economists trimmed their forecasts for fourth-quarter economic growth: Their average estimate puts gross domestic product growth at a 2.3% rate in the fourth quarter, down from the 2.5% rate they forecast in the October survey. They expect growth to remain at that rate through the first half of 2007 and then to accelerate later in the year. On average, the economists predicted growth of 2.8% during the second half 2007. GDP is the broadest measure of economic output.

The housing slowdown is expected to hit consumer spending, but the "consumer won't cave in and drive us into a recession," said Mr. Sinai. Steady interest rates, controlled inflation, stabilizing energy prices and a solid jobs market will support the economy, he said.

Indeed, new data released Monday indicated that weakness in the housing sector is being offset by other areas of the economy. The Conference Board, an industry-backed research group based in New York, said its composite index of leading indicators for October rose by 0.2% to 138.3, in line with expectations. September's reading was revised up to a 0.4% advance. The index is designed to predict activity in the three to six months ahead.

"People say all bubbles end in disaster, but this is a small bubble. Home prices are just about 20% too high. We need to take it seriously, but in the history of bubbles, this will go down as one of the smaller ones," said Lehman's Mr. Harris.

Among other findings in the survey:

· Economists expect a relatively happy holiday for retailers, forecasting a 5.1% rise in sales from last year.

· Some 57% expect Fed policy to be the biggest factor in the economy and markets over the next year, topping Iraq or the budget and tax legislation.

· Just eight of 56 economists expect the Federal Reserve to raise rates beyond the current 5.25% rate before June 2007.

DOJ_NMG_0096960

· Economists expect just 107,000 new jobs a month over the next year, down from 109,800 forecast in October and 179,400 at the high for this year's surveys, in February.

Homes' Losing Streak To Continue (USAT)

By Noelle Knox

USA Today, November 21, 2006

Home prices will drop further through the end of the year, the National Association of Realtors projected Monday, after news that prices fell in 45 metro areas last summer, as weakness in the housing markets spread to more areas.

The drag on median home prices has gone beyond the industrial cities, where job losses have taken a toll on housing. Now, markets in Florida, California and Arizona, where prices had shot up higher than many working families could afford, are falling back to Earth.

The 45 metro areas that saw year-to-year price declines in the third quarter were the most since the NAR's record-keeping began in 1979.

"We had the biggest boom ever, so you'd expect we would have the broadest price drop," says David Lereah, chief economist for the NAR. "In the fourth quarter, you are going to see a meaningful drop in every region of the country."

Nationally, the median price of an existing single-family house fell to $224,900 in the third quarter, 1.2% lower than in the same period last year.

The Detroit area was the worst hit; prices there fell nearly 11% in the July-September period from a year earlier. Sarasota, Fla., was second, with a 9% drop in the median single-family home price.

Four Florida metro areas were among the 10 regions with the steepest price drops in the third quarter. And in California, prices fell in San Diego and Sacramento.

"Florida has responded a lot quicker than California, which is good news for Florida because they're going to get the correction over with faster than California," Lereah says. "I'm not sure about California. They've got the problem of the biggest price correction to make because they have a more serious affordability problem."

Still, just as the real estate boom didn't lift every housing market, the slowdown isn't hitting every area. More than 100 metro areas posted price gains over the summer, including 21 that saw double-digit gains.

Nevertheless, the number of metro areas that suffered price declines jumped from 26 in the April-June period, and the trend could continue for the next few quarters as sellers in more cities are forced to cut prices to woo buyers.

"When you see a large number of metro areas posting declines," says Joel Naroff of Naroff Economic Advisors, "it tells you it's a widespread phenomenon."

Most of the metro areas that have seen the deepest price declines this year are in such states as Michigan, Ohio and Indiana, which have suffered huge job losses in manufacturing. These are also areas where foreclosures are highest, further depressing prices.

Though buyers in the region enjoy more opportunities now, many are reluctant to purchase because of the weak job climate in the industrial Midwest, says Mark Hull of Re/Max Realty Group in Detroit.

"For sellers, it's almost a nightmare," Hull says. "A property can be marketed with every kind of tool you can think of, and unless there are really, really great incentives that make the property 20% below what the market price should be, they're just sitting there."

Wall St Plays It Safe As Deals Surge (FT)

By Michael Mackenzie

Financial Times, November 21, 2006

Wall Street stocks delivered a cautious performance in New York on Monday, as some $50bn in proposed merger deals across copper, steel, exchanges and real estate captured investors' attention.

Consolidation in the steel sector was a major theme, in the wake of Russia's Evraz Group announcing on Monday that it intends buying US steelmaker Oregon Steel Mills valuing the company around $2.3bn. The $63.25 per share purchase represents a 7 per cent premium over Oregon's close last week. Shares in Oregon jumped to a high of $64.40, and settled higher by $4.81 or 8.2 per cent at $63.77. Late last week, as talk of takeover deals in the global steel industry gathered pace, Oregon's shares rose 3.7 per cent.

Meanwhile, the Nasdaq, tendered an offer to buy the rest of the London Stock Exchange, in a deal that would value its shares at $5.1bn and build upon its current 25 per cent holding in the LSE. Shares in Nasdaq were slightly off their high of $37.83, up 3.1 per cent at $37.71. The LSE rejected the new offer, saying it "substantially undervalued" the exchange.

DOJ_NMG_0096961

"We believe Nasdaq's final offer fails to recognize the outstanding growth record and prospects of our group on a stand-alone basis let alone the exchange's unique global position," said Clara Furse, chief executive of the LSE.

Another blockbuster deal in the spotlight was Freeport-McMoRan Copper & Gold saying it would acquire Phelps Dodge in a $25.9bn deal including cash and stock. The new entity would be the world's largest publicly traded copper company.

Shares in Phelps, soared to a high of $123.96 and ultimately gained $25.45, or 26.8 per cent to $120.47. Free-port shares were down $1.77 cents, or 3.1 per cent at $56.63, after earlier rising to $59.70.

The private equity firm Blackstone Group said it was buying Equity Office Properties Trust, the largest office-building owner and manager in the US, for $20bn. Shares in the company hit a high of $47.94, and closed up $3.42, or 7.7 per cent at $48.14. The BBG real estate investment trust index closed up 3.2 per cent after the news.

The latest surge in deals, dictated in part by private equity firms hunting for opportunities "heightens the risk for short sellers," argues Citigroup. "When markets slip initially and then reverse to the upside, as has happened several times over the last few weeks, hedge funds have to cover painful losses."

After opening in the red, stocks briefly recovered ground, led by the semi-conductor sector and Microsoft setting a new 52-week high of $29.97 after an upgrade from Credit Suisse. Shares in Microsoft closed 1.7 per cent firmer at $29.89, while the Philadelphia Semiconductor index was up 1.5 per cent after booking a gain of 5.7 per cent last week. Marvell Technology was 9.5 per cent higher at $20.45, Broadcom was 5.7 per cent higher at $37.11, and Novellus gained 7.7 per cent to $33.10.

The Nasdaq Composite lead other indices during the day and settled 6.86 points, or 0.3 per cent firmer at 2,452.72.

The S&P 500 slid 0.70 points, or 0.05 per cent to 1,400.50, having reversed an early fall below the 1,400 threshold it closed above on Friday.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average fell 26.02 points, or 0.21 per cent to 12,316.54, while in contrast small capitalised stocks rose. The Russell 2000 index gained 0.3 per cent to 790.62.

Despite the paring of modest gains in equity prices during the afternoon, a closely watched measure of equity volatility sank towards historic lows.The Chicago Board of Trade's VIX index fell below 10, to 9.91, before it closed at 9.97. Historically, such a low level in VIX has reflected very high appetites for risk taking and has usually been followed by a sharp rise in the volatility measure.

"Falling volatility is partly an indication of investor optimism. As long as it keeps falling it confirms (or supports) the uptrend in stocks," noted Ken Tower, chief market strategist at CyberTrader.

Helping offset weakness in the Dow was Dupont, after a favourable press report over the weekend, and shares gained 1.3 per cent higher at $47.87.

In the chase for high net worth banking clients, Bank of America has announced a deal to buy U.S. Trust from Charles Schwab for $3.3bn. Shares in Bank of America were barely changed at $54.90.

Other steel companies that enjoyed solid gains on Friday were also higher early on Monday, before paring some of those gains.

Shares in US Steel, rose 3.1 per cent to $72.75, down from a high of $76.16, after a rise of 9.3 per cent on Friday. Steel Dynamics, was up 2.9 per cent at $61.83, down from a peak of $63.75, after prior session gain of 3.8 per cent, Nucor, rose 0.6 per cent to $57.47, after earlier reaching $59.79, and that followed a rise of 3.5 per cent late last week, while AK Steel was up 3.5 per cent at $15.16, in the wake of a 4.8 per cent rise on Friday.

In earnings news, home improvement retailer, Lowes posted third quarter profit of 46 cents a share, beating the 43 cents forecast of analysts. The company also lowered guidance for the fiscal fourth quarter, saying it expects to earn 36 to 38 cents a share, below the 41 cents a share seen by analysts. Its shares had rebounded from a low of $29.50 and were 0.3 per cent firmer at $30.58.

After a blockbuster debut on Friday, that resulted in its shares rising 125 per cent, the New York Mercantile Exchange had reversed an earlier rise to $140, and closed down 2.1 per cent at $130.27.

Ahead of the Thanksgiving holiday on Thursday, stocks may well endure a period of consolidation, and while some analysts caution the market's solid run has stretched valuations, others disagree.

"We do not think that we have hit any peaks in the market yet," noted analysts at Citigroup in research on Monday. "To a great degree, equity markets are not overvalued" and applying various valuation methods, "argues more forcefully for larger cap stocks since they are the ones that appear more favourably valued."

Meanwhile, the appetite of investors for risky assets may also be turning towards equities at the relative expense of other markets as the end of the year approaches.

"Many traders feel that the easier risky asset trade is directly in equities, given a belief that valuations are less extended than in the credit market or emerging currencies," said Alan Ruskin, chief international strategist at RBS Greenwich Capital. "This logic makes perfect sense," he said noting "the Fed is more clearly on a path that is likely to soft land the economy than any time in the last 6 months," after the tone of recent inflation and housing market reports.

DOJ_NMG_0096962

In equity fund flows, Emerging Portfolio Fund Research noted net outflows from dedicated US funds for the week ending November 16 were $861.6m. They noted "a second week of net outflows, due mainly to investors retreating from a popular energy sector ETF," that was hit by redemptions. "Otherwise, US equity funds would have received inflows, with money flowing into both the Large Cap Equity Funds and Small Cap Equity Funds," said EPFR. In contrast, "Mid Cap Equity Funds saw outflows for the week," they added.

The Dow Slips In Rare Interruption Of Record Surge Of Past Six Weeks (WSJ)

By Peter A. Mckay

The Wall Street Journal, November 21, 2006

The Dow Jones Industrial Average edged lower, a rare setback in a string of records that has lasted more than six weeks.

The blue-chip average yesterday fell 26.02 points, or 0.2%, ending at 12316.54, up 14.9% on the year. Shares in the drug maker Merck, a Dow component, slid 1.1% after it disclosed an 11% ownership stake in FoxHollow Technologies, a medical-device maker.

The announcement was part of a wave of deal-making on Wall Street, which seemed to hold back stock indicators tracking big-name companies that typically act as acquirers during periods of corporate consolidation.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index barely held above the psychologically important 1400 level, finishing down just 0.05%, or 0.70 point, at 1400.50, up 12.2% on the year.

Indexes with a larger proportion of small companies likely to be gobbled up in deals fared better. The Nasdaq Composite Index rallied 0.3%, or 6.86 points, to 2452.72, up 11.2% on the year. The Russell 2000-stock index rose 0.3%, or 2.15 points, to 790.62, up 17.4% on the year.

In general, the markets' tone was muted to begin a holiday-shortened trading week. As investors and brokers begin to take off for vacation, such periods tend to produce low trading volume and few major price moves.

Binky Chadha, chief U.S.-equity strategist at Deutsche Bank, said yesterday's deals were consistent with the current environment of low interest rates, which keeps borrowing costs low for companies, and Wall Street's consensus view that the U.S. economic growth is slowing gradually.

In a recent report to clients, Mr. Chadha recommended that investors continue to bet on a rally in stocks. But he also advised taking some cautionary steps, such as buying big-name companies with significant foreign revenue streams, just in case the slowdown in U.S. growth turns out worse than expected, or it doesn't slow enough to keep the Federal Reserve from raising its interest-rate targets again.

"We've been telling people to walk the line between these two alternative scenarios to the baseline forecast" of most firms for a moderate slowdown, Mr. Chadha said.

He estimated an approximate 25% chance the slowdown will miss Wall Street's expectations in some way in the months ahead.

Unseasonably warm weather in the Northeastern U.S. pushed prices for crude oil and natural gas lower. Natural-gas futures for December delivery took the bigger hit in percentage terms, off 2%, or 16 cents, to $8.019 per million British thermal units, off nearly 29% on the year at the New York Mercantile Exchange.

In economic news, the Conference Board said its index of leading economic indicators rose 0.2% in October, slightly less than the 0.3% rise analysts expected.

The Dow's decline yesterday halted a six-day advancing streak. But the blue-chip average did set a new intraday record of 12355.23 before it fell back for the day.

Outside the U.S., stocks fell in dollar terms, despite a rally to a five-year high in China. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, excluding U.S. shares, fell 0.56%, or 1.29 points, to 229.25.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks fell.1 Total trading volume for stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange was 2.56 billion shares, as 1,695 stocks advanced and 1,623 declined.

Bond prices rose.2 The 10-year note gained 2/32 point, or 62.5 cents for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield down to 4.601%. The 30-year bond rose 6/32 to yield 4.681%.

The dollar strengthened.3 Against the Japanese currency, the dollar rose to 118.04 yen, compared with 117.76. The euro fell to $1.2814, compared with $1.2826.

Merger Monday (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0096963

The Wall Street Journal, November 21, 2006

For the second time in a month, investors awoke Monday morning to a slew of big-ticket mergers and acquisitions. Yesterday's tally was at least $52 billion in M&A activity before the market opened for the normally slow Thanksgiving week. Three weeks ago, a spate of deals totalling over $10 billion helped boost the market just ahead of the midterm elections.

Not all these deals will end happily; mistakes and miscalculations are part and parcel of the capital-allocation game. But the very fact that billions of dollars are being put on the table in an attempt to shift assets to their highest and best uses is a sign that the animal spirits that give the U.S. economy its dynamism are alive and well. The time to worry about an economy is when no one wants to take such risks.

A closer look at who's buying and selling also reveals some notable trends in the capital markets. For example, yesterday's deals included the biggest private-equity buyout in history, with the Blackstone Group announcing its agreement to take private Equity Office Partners, a commercial-real-estate trust, for $36 billion, including assumed debt. This adds yet another exclamation point to the rising tide of companies going -- or being taken -- private.

We've argued that the Occam's razor explanation for this trend is that overregulation and lawsuits have tipped the balance in favor of private management for many investors. Managers who want to spend more time taking risks, and less time talking to lawyers, are increasingly turning to private equity to reduce their hassles and improve their returns. Money will flow to where the returns are, and these days more and more investors seem to think that more money can be made outside the hyper-regulated public equity markets.

As a political matter, this should worry anyone who believes that the development of a broad investor class is good for the preservation of capitalism. But as an economic matter, it is largely irrelevant whether the shares are publicly traded or not. We doubt the employees of such profitable closely held concerns as Cargill or Koch Industries fret much that their shares aren't listed on any public exchange. What they care about is that their companies are successful.

Another place merger money is going is overseas. This may help explain Nasdaq's $5 billion hostile bid for the London Stock Exchange, which was rebuffed yesterday. As more and more international companies list their shares overseas rather than in New York, having a foothold outside the U.S. has come to be seen as a survival strategy for the formerly comfortable U.S. stock exchanges. They have to follow the money if the money won't come here.

Globalization is also a piece of the puzzle in Freeport McMoRan's deal to buy the larger Phelps Dodge for $26 billion and so create the largest U.S.-based mining company. Swallowing larger competitors is often a tough meal to digest, but Freeport's managers said they felt they needed the scale to compete on a global stage. The acquisition of Oregon Steel Mills by Russian Steel Maker Evraz also fits this bill.

Domestically, meanwhile, Bank of America and Schwab seem to have agreed that U.S. Trust, the private wealth manager that Schwab picked up in 2000 at the height of the dot-com boom, is worth more in the hands of a bigger bank than it is under Schwab's discount-broker umbrella.

We have no idea whether this is right. But it is the genius of the market economy that those evaluations are made by the actors involved. Sometimes, as with the U.S. Trust deal, an acquisition done in one economic environment comes to be re-evaluated in another. That can be disruptive in the short term, but it makes the society as a whole more prosperous if underperforming assets can be better managed. And Schwab at least is fortunate to be unloading its earlier purchase at a profit.

The stock-market indexes were flat to slightly down yesterday, but merger waves such as this one tend to buoy the markets as savvy traders place bets on who the next target will be. The world is awash in capital at the moment, interest rates are low, and rising stock prices make stock and cash purchases possible. If politicians and government officials are worried about the trends in private equity and investment overseas, they might want to look at their own policies that have encouraged both trends.

Meanwhile, a vibrant market for corporate control keeps managers alert and hunting for new opportunities. Whatever the bad individual bets, the current merger wave is a sign of continuing economic vitality.

URL for this article:

http://online.wsj.com/article/SB116408311620729250.html

Copyright 2006 Dow Jones & Company, Inc. All Rights Reserved

This copy is for your personal, non-commercial use only. Distribution and use of this material are governed by our Subscriber Agreement and by copyright law. For non-personal use or to order multiple copies, please contact Dow Jones Reprints at 1-800-843-0008 or visit www.djreprints.com.

Flaws Seen In Markets For Utilities (NYT)

By David Cay Johnston

New York Times, November 21, 2006

A growing chorus of large industrial power users, municipal utilities and consumer groups say there is a reason the price of electricity has not fallen since the federal government opened the heavily regulated utility industry to competition a decade ago. The new markets, they argue, do not work right.

They point to a variety of reasons.

For one thing, when electricity producers offer to supply power for use the next day, utilities pay everyone the highest price accepted. One study in Texas, where electricity bills have been rising sharply, found that because of this auction system, consumers pay a lot more than they would have under the old system where the state regulated prices.

They also contend that producers can withhold power or limit production, with little risk of penalty, even when demand is at its highest, meaning prices soar.

"Shutting down a power plant in July is like the mall closing on the weekend before Christmas, but in July last year, 20 percent of generating capacity was shut down in California," said Robert McCullough, an economist whose Oregon consulting business is advising some of those contending in lawsuits that prices are being manipulated.

The government agency that oversees the electricity market — the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission — set the rules before allowing market prices for electricity to replace regulated prices. A coalition of large industrial companies filed a complaint in September, arguing that the energy commission had failed to ensure proper competition and that it had stymied efforts by others to investigate allegations of improper conduct by withholding some of the data it collects.

"The 'markets' that are rolling off the commission's production line are not fit for their public purpose," wrote Robert A. Weishaar Jr., the lawyer for the industrial companies.

The commission dismisses the critics, saying that where it has determined that a market for electricity exists, the prices in that market are assumed to be "just and reasonable," the standard set in federal law. The commission's rules seek to curb monopoly power, but not oligopoly power, in which a few firms control the market. The commission says that anyone manipulating markets will be discovered either by the monitors in each regional market, by competitors or utilities that buy power, by the commission or even by the public.

Allowing producers of electricity to compete for utility customers should assure the lowest possible price, the commission says.

But the opposite has sometimes been true.

For eight hours last May, for example, the price of a megawatt of power in New England leaped from about $50 to almost $1,000. The region's electricity exchange attributes the spike to congested transmission lines, but has kept the identities of the high bidders secret.

Its own studies say that the exchange's rules make it possible to inflate prices artificially during periods of high demand and that at least one producer has manipulated prices in the past, though its identity was not disclosed.

Officials of other exchanges all said they had strict rules to ensure that capacity is not withheld from the market to inflate prices artificially.

But critics of the current system have found ammunition in a study at Carnegie Mellon University by Sarosh N. Talukdar, who used computer models to simulate a market in which 10 utilities bought electricity and 10 producers sold it.

In that experiment, the buyers and sellers learned to manipulate the price within 100 rounds of bidding, capturing from 50 percent to 90 percent of the prices an unregulated monopoly would have charged. Instead of falling, prices soared.

Earlier experiments at Cornell University and George Mason University found the same thing, with simulated trading by students, professors and even members of Congress.

Such high prices suggest collusion, which is illegal in real markets, but collusion was impossible in Professor Talukdar's experiments because the trades were made by simple computer programs, not humans.

"My studies show it is easy to learn from the signals given by others how to get the benefits of colluding without breaking the law," Professor Talukdar said.

"Economists have this faith in markets, this blind faith that markets are always a good thing," the professor said, "but the design of markets matters a great deal and the design must be verified to see if it really works as a free market."

Professor Frank A. Wolak, a Stanford University economist who favors competitive pricing, said the current mix of markets for wholesale power and regulated utilities to deliver them cannot produce the benefits of competition. And he warned that "even small flaws in the design of markets can cause enormous harm to consumers in very little time."

Why have prices not fallen in the electricity market, when prices dropped sharply after competition was introduced in other previously regulated industries?

Rising fuel costs are one major reason. But the electricity market also turns out to be different in some fundamental ways from other kinds of markets. Efforts to induce competition, the critics say, have failed to properly take that into account.

DOJ_NMG_0096965

In the markets for everything from stocks and commodities to real estate, airline trips and trucking services, for example, buyers always have the option to walk away from a deal — whether the purchase be company shares, frozen pork bellies, houses, plane tickets or space in a tractor-trailer.

But many utilities in about half the states, including New York, California, Connecticut, Illinois, Maryland and Texas, must buy power every day — usually because they were encouraged or forced by regulators to sell their own generating plants and no longer produce electricity themselves.

And every utility must buy power at some point, to meet peak demand on hot summer days.

Unlike the stock market, where vast numbers of strangers buy and sell, the electricity markets involve a relative handful of buyers and sellers. In New Jersey, for example, just 10 generators won bids this year to supply a third of the state's base load of power for the next three years at prices 55 percent higher than the previous year's three-year bid.

Similarly, California has 1,400 power plants, but ownership of those plants is so concentrated that just six generating companies in that state can set an artificially high price of electricity virtually all the time, research by Carnegie Mellon University shows.

Moreover, in many markets some buyers and sellers are related, a corporate parent owning generating plants that sell to a sister utility. Often the bidders are brokers, including Wall Street investment houses like Goldman Sachs and Morgan Stanley, and that arrangement hides the identity of the real power generators.

Trades also repeat each day, which means that those that generate power learn from not just what the weather report says about demand for power, but from the trading patterns of their competitors in producing power and the utilities that buy it.

Another important aspect is secrecy. Individual stock investors can make sure they got a fair price by checking the prices paid just before and after their trade. But the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission and the electricity exchanges stamp many trading records confidential.

The federal commission's spokesman, like those for several of the exchanges on which electricity is bought and sold, said that market monitors employed by the electricity exchanges ensure the integrity of the trades. But utility customers have challenged whether the monitors are blind to price rigging and errors.

Another factor is the very nature of electricity, which must be produced, transmitted and consumed in an instant. Car makers can cut production when vehicles do not sell. Investors who hold too much of a particular stock can sell it in blocks over time to get the best price. But electricity cannot be held in inventory.

Finally, the electricity market appears to be particularly balanced on a fine edge. The Chadbourne Park law firm, in a newsletter for investors in electricity generating stations, cautioned that tiny changes in generating capacity could make them rich or wipe them out. It concluded that having 2 percent more generating capacity than a market needed to meet demand would mean "very low electricity prices," while a 2 percent shortage of electricity would cause "significant price spikes," which means outsize profits for power plant owners.

Citgo Brings Discounted Heating Oil To Region (WP)

By Steven Mufson

The Washington Post, November 21, 2006

At 10 a.m. today, Minnie Davis, a 65-year-old widow who lives with three of her grandchildren on North Capitol Street, is scheduled to get some unusual visitors -- the Venezuelan ambassador, the chief executive of Citgo Petroleum and former congressman Joseph P. Kennedy II.

The occasion: The arrival of a Venezuelan-backed program to bring 7.5 million gallons of deeply discounted heating oil to as many as 37,000 low-income households in Maryland, Virginia and the District and free heating oil to some homeless shelters.

The program has the blessings of Venezuela's populist President Hugo Chavez, who has used it to demonstrate that he cares about the poor in the United States as well as Venezuela -- while tweaking President Bush, who he called "evil" in a September speech at the United Nations.

Many people have dismissed the assistance as a publicity stunt, but for some, it will have a real impact nonetheless.

Last year, working through Kennedy's Citizens Energy, the program reached people in Massachusetts and other parts of the Northeast. Now the program has been extended to the nation's capital.

It works like this: Citgo, a wholly owned subsidiary of Petroleos de Venezuela SA, is providing heating oil at a 40 percent discount to Citizens Energy, which Kennedy started during the oil shock of the late 1970s to help low-income people grapple with high energy costs. His company then provides up to 200 gallons of discounted heating oil not only to the very poor but also to people who earn too much to qualify for federal heating oil assistance but who still earn little enough to be struggling.

DOJ_NMG_0096966

Citizens Energy is targeting 400,000 households in 16 states. If Citizens Energy reached all the target households, Citgo's discount -- about $1 a gallon -- would be worth $40 million. But because most people do not know they are eligible or how to take advantage of the program, the actual number who end up receiving aid might be a little more than a tenth as much.

Is it genuine concern on the part of Citgo and Chavez, or is it a public relations stunt?

"It's not only morally righteous, it's good business," said Kennedy in a telephone interview yesterday. "When you're selling to the world's largest market a gigantic percentage of your overall sales in crude oil, you take a little percentage and show that you have concerns about how low-income people are going to keep up with the enormous price of keeping warm."

That doesn't appear to be self-evident to other oil companies or members of the Organization of the Petroleum Exporting Countries. Kennedy said yesterday that he had written to every OPEC member and every major oil company but that Citgo was the only one that agreed to help.

At the same time, Kennedy said, "when you really stop and think about it, last year, Venezuela sold the United States 556 million barrels of crude oil and product. We are now topping off one-half of 1 percent, which they are selling at 40 percent off, which is effectively last year's full price. Let's keep things in some perspective."

David McCollum, a spokesman for Citgo of Houston, said the company initiated the program after members of Congress appealed after Hurricane Katrina sent prices soaring last year.

Though it might seem odd that Venezuela -- where per capita income is only about $4,810, a little more than one-tenth of U.S. per capita income -- would be giving aid to the United States, McCollum said that the heating oil assistance would not be depriving Venezuelan citizens.

"The product we are using is heating oil, and obviously it is never used in Venezuela," he said. "It's not that cold. So we're not taking anything away from the people of Venezuela."

He said the company expected the program to cost Citgo, which refines and markets oil products in the United States only, between 1 and 3 percent of the company's profit if everyone eligible took advantage of the offer.

Slain Journalist's Family Files $20 Million Lawsuit (WP)

By Henri E. Cauvin

The Washington Post, November 21, 2006

The children of slain New York Times reporter David E. Rosenbaum filed a $20 million lawsuit yesterday against the District and Howard University Hospital, claiming that their father was a victim of official negligence and medical malpractice.

Filed in D.C. Superior Court, the lawsuit comes less than a month after a jury convicted a 42-year-old man of murdering Rosenbaum during a robbery. The other suspect in the case had pleaded guilty shortly before the two were to go on trial.

The crime occurred on a quiet Northwest Washington street in a usually safe part of the city, stunning the neighborhood and many people who had known Rosenbaum. He was 63 and had just retired after three decades at the Times. Days later, questions surfaced about the emergency care he received at the scene on Gramercy Street and at Howard University Hospital, where he died Jan. 8, two days after the attack.

Those questions led to one damning revelation after another. Rosenbaum was misdiagnosed as a drunk. The ambulance bypassed the closest hospital because one of the emergency medical technicians had personal business to attend to near Howard. At Howard, Rosenbaum was not seen by a physician for more than 90 minutes and was not given a neurological evaluation until he had been there almost four hours, the lawsuit says. Daniel and Dorothy Rosenbaum say in their suit that these actions contributed to their father's death.

"If any one of them had done their job properly, this wouldn't have happened and he'd be alive," Patrick Regan, the lead attorney for the family, said yesterday during a news conference.

A spokeswoman for the D.C. attorney general said city lawyers are reviewing the suit, and a spokeswoman for Howard University Hospital did not respond to a call seeking comment.

The District's handling of the case has drawn rebukes from city leaders, including Mayor-elect Adrian M. Fenty (D), who met last week with the family and pledged yesterday to fix the problems highlighted by Rosenbaum's death.

"Every District resident deserves to be safe and protected by our police and emergency personnel," Fenty said, adding that he would support efforts by the police, fire and emergency medical service "to hold personnel accountable in all areas of performance."

The D.C. inspector general's office, in a report released in the summer, found what it called "apathy, indifference and complacency" in the agencies involved.

Family members were particularly disturbed by the failings of the police department.

DOJ_NMG_0096967

More than a month before Rosenbaum was attacked, a retired police officer doing renovation work on a townhouse in Southeast Washington was attacked. But the police did not treat the beating as a crime and did not follow up on a promising lead -- calls made on the victim's cellphone soon after it was taken from him in the attack.

Officials learned later that the calls were made to the houses of the two men ultimately convicted of killing Rosenbaum: Percey Jordan, who was found guilty by a jury last month, and his cousin, Michael Hamlin, who pleaded guilty in September.

When Jordan was arrested in connection with Rosenbaum's death, the victim of the earlier robbery realized that he had been attacked by the same man.

Rosenbaum's family members said their suit is about changing the culture that led to the series of errors.

"Things are broken in the city," Marcus Rosenbaum, Rosenbaum's brother, said yesterday. "They are broken in Howard University Hospital. And something needs to be done to see that they get fixed."

He said that monetary damages are a means to that end: "When you sue, all you can sue for is money, and we wanted to get people's attention."

Rosenbaum Family Files Suit Against City, Hospital (WT)

By Matthew Cella

The Washington Times, November 21, 2006

The family of David E. Rosenbaum yesterday filed a $20 million lawsuit claiming that negligence by the District and Howard University Hospital contributed to the journalist's death after he was robbed and beaten in January.

"We see this lawsuit as a way that we can put some pressure on both the city and on Howard University Hospital to fix the things that are broken," said Marcus Rosenbaum, the victim's brother.

The first hearing in the case is scheduled for February before Superior Court Judge Robert Morin.

Mr. Rosenbaum, 63, was robbed and beaten Jan. 6 while walking near his Northwest home. He died two days later.

The lawsuit follows closely the findings of the city's inspector general, who issued a report in June citing an "unacceptable chain of failure" in the response.

According to the report, responding D.C. police officers failed to recognize that a crime had occurred, did not search the victim for identification and did not write an incident report.

The report said firefighters who responded to the scene did not assess or treat Mr. Rosenbaum correctly. They detected the odor of alcohol and discounted other potential causes of Mr. Rosenbaum's symptoms because of it.

In addition, the ambulance was delayed when the crew got lost on the way to the scene from Providence Hospital in Northeast, and the ambulance driver decided to take Mr. Rosenbaum to Howard University Hospital instead of the closer Sibley Memorial Hospital because Howard was nearer to her home.

The report also said Howard University Hospital workers failed to properly triage Mr. Rosenbaum when he was brought in, and they failed to follow their own procedures for monitoring patients for signs of trauma.

Police closed the case one week later with two arrests.

Percey Jordan Jr., 42, was convicted last month on nine charges, including first- and second-degree murder while armed, robbery and credit-card fraud. He faces life in prison without the possibility of release when he is sentenced on Jan. 12.

Michael C. Hamlin, 24, pleaded guilty to charges including second-degree murder and agreed to testify against Jordan as part of a plea deal. Hamlin, who would have faced life in prison, faces a maximum of 60 years in prison when he is sentenced Dec. 19, but he likely will receive a more lenient sentence.

The Rosenbaum family also accused police of failing to investigate a similar attack against a former police officer in which Jordan and Hamlin were the chief suspects. That attack occurred about two months before Mr. Rosenbaum's death.

Mayor-elect Adrian M. Fenty said yesterday that he will "support every effort" by the D.C. police and fire department "to hold personnel accountable in all areas of performance."

Mayor Anthony A. Williams yesterday issued a two-sentence statement that repeated nearly word for word parts of statements he issued Jan. 19 and June 16.

"My heart goes out to all of the family and friends of David Rosenbaum. This was a terrible tragedy, and last January the city lost a good man and a great reporter," Mr. Williams said. "I want everyone who lives and works in the District to have the utmost confidence that our policies and procedures are the best they can be to ensure our safety."

Reporter's Kin Sue City And Hospital (NYT)

By The New York Times

The New York Times, November 21, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0096968

WASHINGTON, Nov. 20 — The family of a retired reporter for The New York Times who was fatally beaten in January near his home here sued the District of Columbia and Howard University Hospital on Monday, contending that he would be alive but for their negligence.

The suit, seeking $20 million, blames the city's Police and Fire Departments and the hospital for the death of the reporter, David E. Rosenbaum, 63, who was beaten on the head by two robbers on the night of Jan. 6. An inquiry established that Mr. Rosenbaum was at first presumed to be intoxicated and so was not treated with urgency. He died of brain injuries two days later in the hospital.

The inquiry, by the inspector general's office of the district, found that "multiple individual failures" and "alarming levels of complacency" among police officers, firefighters, ambulance technicians, doctors and nurses caused inexcusable delays in treating Mr. Rosenbaum.

The men held in the case, Percey Jordan Jr. and his cousin Michael Hamlin, were arrested soon after surveillance cameras photographed them using Mr. Rosenbaum's credit cards. Mr. Jordan, 42, was convicted of murder, robbery, conspiracy and credit-card fraud last month. Mr. Hamlin, 24, had pleaded guilty earlier to similar charges and testified against his cousin. The men face decades in prison when they are sentenced.

Small Mistakes Cause Big Problems (USAT)

By Brad Heath

USA Today, November 21, 2006

If you're reading this in New York, you're probably too drunk to drive.

That's because lawmakers accidentally got too tough with a get-tough drunken-driving law, inserting an error that set the standard for "aggravated driving while intoxicated" below the amount of alcohol that can occur naturally.

The one-word mistake makes the new law unenforceable, says Lt. Glenn Miner, a New York State Police spokesman. However, drivers with a blood-alcohol content of 0.08% or higher can still be prosecuted under other state laws.

In the legislative world, such small errors, while uncommon, can carry expensive consequences. In a few cases around the nation this year, typos and other blunders have redirected millions of tax dollars or threatened to invalidate new laws.

In Hawaii, for instance, lawmakers approved a cigarette-tax increase to raise money for medical care and research. Cancer researchers, however, will get only an extra 1.5 cents next year — instead of the more than $8 million lawmakers intended. That's because legislators failed to specify that they should get 1.5 cents from each cigarette sold, says Linda Smith, an adviser to Gov. Linda Lingle.

When such mistakes happen, they often come during the last-minute rush of legislative sessions, says Bruce Feustel, a senior fellow at the National Conference of State Legislatures. What's important, he says, is that lawmakers can fix them before they cause any harm.

Courts generally intercede only in the most obvious cases, says University of Notre Dame law professor John Nagle. If judges tried to change every legislative error, Nagle says, "you get the courts trying to figure out what they think is a mistake that might not be a mistake at all."

New York's mistake came in a bill meant to set tougher penalties and curb plea bargains for drivers well above the legal intoxication standard. Instead of specifying blood alcohol as a percentage, as most drunken-driving laws do, New York set its threshold as 0.18 grams — "so low you can't even measure it," Miner says.

Lawmakers plan to fix the mistake the next time they convene, says Mark Hansen, a spokesman for the state Senate's Republican majority. He says it's not clear how the mistake happened, or why nobody caught it before legislators voted.

The latest gaffe was in Arizona, where a misplaced period on the state's ballots raised questions about a cigarette tax voters approved Nov. 7. The law called for an increase of 80 cents per pack, but the ballot had .80 cents per pack.

The state plans to start collecting the tax when the vote is final, "but who knows what might happen?" says Arizona Revenue Department spokesman Dan Zemke.

"Somebody might go to court and say that's enough to throw the whole thing out."

Winner Named For Florida Seat; Loser Files Suit (NYT)

By Terry Aguayo

The New York Times, November 21, 2006

MIAMI, Nov. 20 — A Republican House candidate was named the winner on Monday in a disputed race in Sarasota where thousands of votes may have been lost by electronic machines, and the Democratic candidate immediately sued for a new election.

DOJ_NMG_0096969

The Republican, Vern Buchanan, won by 369 votes in the Nov. 7 election, according to results confirmed by the Florida Elections Canvassing Commission, which is made up of Gov. Jeb Bush; Tom Gallagher, the state chief financial officer; and Senator Daniel Webster of Winter Garden, all Republicans. The results, which fill the seat given up by Representative Katherine Harris, a Republican, were confirmed in a machine recount and a manual one.

But the losing candidate, Christine Jennings, argued in documents filed in Leon County Circuit Court in Tallahassee that touch-screen voting machines had malfunctioned and not registered votes for her.

More than 18,000 Sarasota County residents who cast votes in other races on the ballot did not register votes in the House race. Hundreds of voters said they had had trouble casting a vote for Ms. Jennings, the complaint said.

If the votes were never recorded by the machines, they would not have been detected in the recount. The state also conducted an audit of the electronic voting machines.

"The voters of Sarasota and of the entire country deserve answers as to what went wrong," Ms. Jennings, a banker, said at a news conference. "This is not about Democrats; this is not about Republicans."

Several voter rights groups are joining Ms. Jennings's battle and said they planned to file a lawsuit on Tuesday to call for a new vote.

"The vote totals in the certification are wrong because they do not include thousands of legal votes cast in Sarasota County but not counted due to the pervasive malfunctioning of electronic voting machines," the candidate's complaint reads.

Mr. Buchanan, a car dealer, called the action a delay in the process and a challenge to a lawful election.

"The votes have been counted, recounted, and counted again," Mr. Buchanan said. "It is time for Christine Jennings to put the interests of the public before her own self-interests and concede this election."

Republican Declared Winner In Fla. House Race (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, November 21, 2006

TALLAHASSEE, Nov. 20 -- Florida officials certified Republican Vern Buchanan on Monday as the winner of the House seat being vacated by Rep. Katherine Harris (R). The loser immediately sued for a new election, arguing that touch-screen voting machines had malfunctioned.

Christine Jennings contested her 369-vote loss in the 13th District, asking a judge to order a new election because of problems in Sarasota County, where more than 17,000 voters who cast ballots in other races Nov. 7 did not do so in the congressional contest.

That rate is nearly six times as high as it is in the other counties in the congressional district or on Sarasota's paper absentee ballots, Jennings says. Though she lost in the four other counties in the district, she did well in Sarasota County, winning there by six percentage points.

Buchanan, a wealthy auto dealer, said that there was no evidence of machine malfunctions. He attributed the huge Sarasota undervote to angry voters turned off by negative campaigning.

"I guess the theory is if you don't win, sue," he said, urging Jennings to concede and "stop listening to the high-price lawyers and out-of-town special-interest groups."

The state is conducting an audit of the Sarasota voting machines separate from the recount and legal challenge.

In 2001, as Florida's secretary of state, Harris had pushed for an election overhaul that outlawed punch-card ballots and required counties to use touch-screen devices or optical scan machines that read paper ballots.

Meanwhile, an unofficial tally in New Mexico's 1st District shows Rep. Heather A. Wilson (R) winning her race against Patricia Madrid by 879 votes, out of more than 210,000 cast. The results were scheduled to be finalized late Monday.

Three other House races remain unresolved:

Â· In Ohio's 2nd District, a few counties began counting provisional and absentee ballots in the race between Rep. Jean Schmidt (R) and Victoria Wulsin. Schmidt led by about 2,800 votes, though nearly 9,000 votes could remain to be counted in the district.

Â· In Ohio's 15th District, Rep. Deborah Pryce (R) was ahead of Mary Jo Kilroy by more than 3,500 votes. About 19,000 ballots remain to be counted, with results expected next week.

Â· In North Carolina's 8th District, election officials were recounting votes that last week gave Rep. Robin Hayes (R) a 339-vote lead against Larry Kissell. Kissell is considering a hand recount.

Democrat's Challenge In Fla. 13 Focuses On Undervotes (CQ)

By Rachel Kapochunas

Congressional Quarterly, November 21, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0096970

Florida election officials on Monday declared Republican Vern Buchanan as the winner of the race in the state's southwestern 13th District. But Democratic nominee Christine Jennings is formally challenging the results, arguing that voting machine errors in one county account for Buchanan's apparent lead.

The office of Florida Republican Secretary of State Sue M. Cobb certified the results of a manual recount of ballots that gave Buchanan a 369-vote edge over Jennings, a former bank president, in the race to succeed two-term GOP Rep. Katherine Harris. Buchanan, a wealthy auto dealer, has maintained a narrow lead throughout the initial vote count and two recounts.

But Jennings is refusing to concede. At a press conference this morning in Tallahassee, Jennings' campaign announced it was officially contesting the election results — and that it had filed a complaint in a Florida circuit court, citing "statistical and eyewitness evidence of significant machine malfunctions."

At issue are more than 18,000 "undervotes" — cast ballots on which voters declined to choose either Buchanan or Jennings — in Sarasota County, the most populous county in the 13th District. The undervote rate there was much higher than in any of the other counties in the 13th.

Jennings defeated Buchanan in Sarasota County, 53 percent to 47 percent. Democrats argue that if the undervote rate in Sarasota County was comparable to the undervote rate in the other counties, Jennings surely would have beaten Buchanan.

Kathy Dent, the Republican supervisor of elections in Sarasota County, and others have suggested that the campaign's negative tone may have turned people away from participating in this race. Other analysts say that voters might have overlooked the 13th District contest because of where the candidates' names were placed on Sarasota County ballots.

But Jennings' attorney Kendall Coffey said Monday that the machines were at fault and needed to be examined. "This is clearly a case of machine error — not ballot design error and not voter error," Coffey said.

Buchanan's campaign, meanwhile, said in a statement Friday — entitled "The Myth of the Missing Votes" — that undervoting is fairly common. It noted that there were more than 12,000 undervotes in Sarasota county in the 2004 contest between Harris and Democratic nominee Jan Schneider, though the percentage of Sarasota-area voters who undervoted in the 13th District race in 2004 was much lower than in the Buchanan-Jennings race.

The Florida Secretary of State's office was supposed to commence an audit of Sarasota County's voting systems, but that has been delayed. Jennings' camp filed an emergency petition Nov. 13 to secure voting machines and data involved with the audit. Then, the campaigns were supposed to identify staff members who would participate in the audit; Jennings' campaign on Friday accused Buchanan of "dragging his feet" by "delaying" the hiring of experts to participate on their behalf.

Jennings' campaign said the Florida Secretary of State's office "will not work with the Jennings campaign either" as a result of the breakdown, according to a release Friday. But the secretary of state's office has repeatedly said it will cooperate with both campaigns.

Buchanan and Republican officials have publicly called on Jennings to concede. The People For the American Way Foundation and other organizations sympathetic to Jennings have called for a new election. Both Buchanan and Jennings have participated in freshman orientation activities.

GOP Holds House Seat Of Katherine Harris (USAT)

USA Today, November 21, 2006

Republicans retained the congressional seat of Rep. Katherine Harris, state election officials ruled Monday. Republican Vern Buchanan was certified the winner over Democrat Christine Jennings by 369 votes.

Jennings immediately filed a lawsuit seeking a new election because of alleged irregularities. She cited Sarasota County, where more than 17,000 ballots cast in other races Nov. 7 on the touch-screen voting machines did not indicate a vote in the House contest.

Buchanan said there was no evidence of machine malfunctions. Harris lost her bid for the Senate.

Three House races remain undecided.

·In Ohio's 2nd District, Republican Rep. Jean Schmidt led Democrat Victoria Wulsin by 2,800 with nearly 9,000 votes possibly still uncounted.

·In Ohio's 15th District, Republican Rep. Deborah Pryce led Democrat Mary Jo Kilroy by more than 3,500 votes. About 19,000 ballots remain to be counted. Results are expected next week.

·In North Carolina's 8th District, election officials were recounting votes that last week gave Republican Rep. Robin Hayes a 339-vote margin over Democrat Larry Kissell.

Judge: Military may treat detainee's heart

The military is not required to send a Guantanamo Bay detainee to a civilian hospital for medical treatment, U.S. District Judge Paul Friedman ruled. The decision means terrorism suspect Saifullah Paracha must choose between having a cardiac catheterization to detect heart problems such as blockages performed at the U.S. military base in Cuba or not at all.

DOJ_NMG_0096971

Doctors at Guantanamo successfully completed the same procedure in 2003, the Justice Department said. Paracha, 59, had argued that if something goes wrong, doctors must perform emergency heart surgery. The wealthy Pakistani businessman and television producer wanted to be transferred to a hospital in the USA or Pakistan.

Paracha is being held for allegedly helping al-Qaeda. His son, Uzair, was sentenced in July in federal court in New York to 30 years in prison on similar charges.

Clinton Won Easily, But Bankroll Shows The Toll (NYT)

By Anne E. Kornblut And Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, November 21, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 20 — She had only token opposition, but Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton still spent more on her re-election — upward of $30 million — than any other candidate for Senate this year. So where did all the money go?

It helped Mrs. Clinton win a margin of victory of more than 30 points. It helped her build a new set of campaign contributors. And it allowed her to begin assembling the nuts and bolts needed to run a presidential campaign.

But that was not all. Mrs. Clinton also bought more than $13,000 worth of flowers, mostly for fund-raising events and as thank-yous for donors. She laid out $27,000 for valet parking, paid as much as $800 in a single month in credit card interest and — above all — paid tens of thousands of dollars a month to an assortment of consultants and aides.

Throw in $17 million in advertising and fund-raising mailings, and what had been one of the most formidable war chests in politics was depleted to a level that leaves Mrs. Clinton with little financial advantage over her potential rivals for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination — and perhaps even trailing some of them.

The campaign's financial record has fueled some criticism among Democratic activists and prompted concern among Mrs. Clinton's supporters, including complaints from some of her fund-raisers that her top aides exercised a lack of discipline.

As of mid-October, when her campaign last filed a disclosure statement with the Federal Election Commission, the senator had about $14 million on hand. That figure did not take into account spending or fund-raising in the final three weeks of the campaign, although the final tally is not expected to change much.

The Democratic Daily, a liberal Web site, accused Mrs. Clinton of "blowing a shameful $36 million" on a shoo-in campaign. The only other Senate candidate to come close to her spending level was Senator Rick Santorum, Republican of Pennsylvania, who spent about $24 million unsuccessfully defending his seat.

Mrs. Clinton's cash on hand is certainly less than the $20 million to $30 million some of her advisers early this year predicted she would have in the bank as she moved from her Senate re-election toward a decision about a presidential campaign. She is now in the same ballpark as two fellow Democrats, Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts, who had $13.8 million in his account as of Sept. 30, according to election commission records, and Senator Evan Bayh of Indiana, who had $10.6 million. The law allows money left in a Senate campaign fund to be transferred to a presidential campaign.

Aides to Mrs. Clinton said she was not available for comment. Asked whether she was satisfied with the way the money had been spent, and whether the campaign's expenditures were within the norms of politics today, the executive director of her campaign organization, Patti Solis Doyle, replied in an e-mailed statement: "We're very pleased with the outcome of this election: the bottom line is victory with 67 percent of the vote, a substantial increase among independents and Republicans, and a list of several hundred thousand donors, beneficial in this and future campaigns."

Yet the way she spent the money troubled some of Mrs. Clinton's supporters, many of whom have been called on repeatedly over the years to raise and give money for Bill Clinton's two presidential campaigns, his legal expenses, his library, his global antipoverty and AIDS-fighting program and now his wife's political career. One Clinton supporter said it would become harder to tap repeat donors if it appeared that the money was not being well spent.

Nonetheless, the senator is among the most formidable fund-raisers in her party and could raise a large amount of money quickly if needed.

Since 2001, when she took office, Mrs. Clinton has spent at least $36 million on her re-election. For 2005 and 2006 through Oct. 18, she spent $29.5 million; a final tally will not be available until next month.

At that level, she spent nearly twice as much as Senator Charles E. Schumer, her Democratic colleague from New York, did in his 2004 re-election campaign, when he spent $15.5 million and won 71 percent of the vote, four points more than Mrs. Clinton won this year.

For her money, Mrs. Clinton also won a slightly smaller percentage of the vote in New York this year than did Eliot Spitzer in his successful race for governor. Mr. Spitzer, who raised nearly $41 million for his campaign, won 69 percent of the vote.

Mark Penn, Mrs. Clinton's pollster and longtime adviser, received at least $1.1 million. Mandy Grunwald, her longtime communications strategist, received more than $930,000. Hudson Media Partners, an offshoot of the Glover Park Group consulting firm where two prominent Clinton advisers, Howard Wolfson and Gigi Georges, work, received nearly $200,000.

Campaign aides said much of the consulting work went toward building a donor list that would be vital in a presidential race. But they did not specify the work done by each of the consultants or say exactly how much of the money they received went to preparing for a presidential run rather than Mrs. Clinton's Senate re-election. And the figures have raised eyebrows among the people who raise money for her.

"We're not in this business to make consultants rich," said one fund-raiser for Mrs. Clinton who was granted anonymity in order to speak freely about the direction of the campaign.

"The wasting of money — it drives everybody crazy," the fund-raiser said. "She'd better get a handle on this if she is going to run for president."

Beyond the level of spending, there is also some concern within the Clinton camp about the adequacy of the controls on what is being spent.

A close friend of Mrs. Clinton, Maggie Williams, received a $37,500 consulting fee, paid to her firm, Griffin Williams Critical Point Management, at the end of July.

Asked what the payment was for, Mrs. Clinton's campaign aides checked and subsequently responded that the payment had been a mistake. They said it should have been for less than $5,000 to reimburse Ms. Williams, who served as chief of staff to Mrs. Clinton in the White House, for travel costs. They said Ms. Williams would return the extra money. Ms. Williams, who was said by Mrs. Clinton's aides to be traveling, did not return a call to her office.

"Donors, like voters, increasingly expect candidates to exercise fiscal discipline," said Mark McKinnon, an adviser to Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona and a possible presidential candidate, and a veteran of President Bush's two penny-pinching campaigns for the White House.

Political campaigns are expensive affairs for any candidate, especially those running in a state as big as New York. Some of Mrs. Clinton's expenditures, including the more than $10 million for direct mail fund-raising solicitations, will pay off if she runs for president by giving her an expanded list of individual donors around the nation.

She has now amassed a database that includes several hundred thousand new donors, 90 percent of whom contributed $100 or less, her advisers said. Under the new campaign finance law, such small donors are considered crucial to raising the large sums of money needed for a presidential campaign.

Other types of expenses are seen by campaigns as necessary good-will gestures toward donors and other supporters; Mrs. Clinton's campaign cited this in justifying the roughly $51,000 she spent on professional photographers to provide pictures of her with guests. The candidate also sought to generate good will among her fellow Democratic candidates by giving more than $2.5 million to the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee and other party groups.

Candidates routinely use campaign money for all types of expenses. Representative Corrine Brown, Democrat of Florida, spent $24,000 of her campaign money this year on flowers; her campaign said she sent them to the families of constituents who died. Representative Richard W. Pombo, Republican of California, spent $17,250 on balloons for a single event in July.

Mrs. Clinton's aides offered varying explanations for her spending record. Some, speaking on the condition of anonymity because they are barred from discussing Mrs. Clinton's intentions for 2008, said much of the spending amounted to an investment in voter and fund-raising databases that could form the basis of a presidential campaign. Others said the money went to ensuring as convincing a victory as possible.

"We in fact did what we said we would do, which was raise it for a campaign in 2006," said Ann Lewis, the communications director for her campaign.

The most expensive components of any political campaign are often direct mail solicitations and television advertising, and Mrs. Clinton paid Media Strategies Research, a Democratic firm in Denver, $1.58 million in the third quarter of the year alone. She spent at least $7 million on advertising over all.

Yet Mrs. Clinton has also continued to travel and entertain in style. Around $160,000 was spent on private jet travel for her and her advisers in 2006. Her catering and entertaining bill was at least $746,450, with tabs ranging from a $124,155 bill at the New York Hilton to a $2,500 bill for a backroom fund-raiser at Ben's Chili Bowl, the famous Washington hot dog shop.

Women's Report Card For 2006 Vote (CSM)

By Linda Feldmann

The Christian Science Monitor, November 21, 2006

WASHINGTON

When the winners of the Nov. 7 elections are sworn in in January, Democratic women - and some Republicans - will have cause to cheer: The House will have its first female speaker, Nancy Pelosi (D) of California. Congress will have its largest corps of women ever - 16 in the Senate and at least 71 in the House, from both parties.

DOJ_NMG_0096973

And in the states, women will hold nine governorships, tied with the record set in 2004, and other elective statewide jobs that could position them for higher office. Sarah Palin (R) will become Alaska's first woman governor. For the first time, the chair of the National Governors Association will be a woman, Gov. Janet Napolitano (D) of Arizona.

In state legislatures, a record 2,426 women were general-election candidates, and unofficial results show 1,735 winning, which would be a record. In addition, women appear set to build on their record number of top leadership spots in state legislatures.

Women voters were also pivotal this year. While a majority of both women and men nationwide voted Democratic on Nov. 7 - 56 percent of women and 51 percent of men - the gender gap proved decisive for Democrats in a handful of key Senate races.

In Virginia, where Democrat Jim Webb beat Republican incumbent George Allen by a fraction of a percent, 55 percent of women voted for Mr. Webb versus 45 percent of men. In particular, it was women of color who made the difference.

In Montana, where race was not a factor, 52 percent of women voted for the Democrat, Jon Tester, versus 48 percent of men. Mr. Tester beat incumbent Sen. Conrad Burns (R) by just a few thousand votes.

In Missouri, 51 percent of women voted for Democrat Claire McCaskill, who beat incumbent Sen. Jim Talent (R), while only 46 percent of men did. As in Virginia, it was African-American women who made the difference.

Was this another Year of the Woman? Not exactly. Back in 1992, women made stunning gains, jumping from 32 to 54 House members and from two to six senators. Since then, the gains have been steady. The Senate is now at a record 16 women, and women in the House have averaged an increase of one or two seats per year. This year, the increase in the House was a little larger than usual - at least four seats. (In Louisiana, the Dec. 9 runoff between two Democrats, Rep. William Jefferson and challenger Karen Carter, could put another woman in the House. In Florida, Vern Buchanan (R) was certified the winner Monday in his tight race against Democrat Christine Jennings, but Ms. Jennings is suing.)

Ultimately, women remain far from achieving equality. In the next Congress, the record 87 women members will represent 16 percent of the 535 seats. In state legislatures, women currently hold 1,686 of the 7,382 seats, or 22.8 percent. In statewide elective executive office - positions such as governor, attorney general, and secretary of state - women hold 78 of the 315 positions, or 24.8 percent. (The figure will drop to 76 in January.)

The key, say women political activists, is that most of the numbers continue to head upward. "And certainly, 2006 is the year of the woman leader," says Democratic pollster Celinda Lake, pointing to Ms. Pelosi and the incoming state legislative leaders. In addition, California's two Democratic woman senators will chair committees starting in January, with Dianne Feinstein running the Rules Committee and Barbara Boxer running Environment and Public Works.

At EMILY's List, a political action committee that helps Democratic woman candidates who support abortion rights, 2006 was by far the group's busiest year. The group endorsed, funded, and advised a record number of candidates, including 19 women who were Democratic nominees for Republican-held House seats. Of those, 16 were in races considered competitive by the nonpartisan Cook Political Report. So far, with four races still undecided, only two women have won, a point that has raised eyebrows. Among the 36 Democratic men running in competitive, Republican-held districts, 22 won.

Many of the most highly touted EMILY's List candidates - including Tammy Duckworth of Illinois, Diane Farrell of Connecticut, and Lois Murphy of Pennsylvania - did not win.

Did gender play a role in any of the races? Officials at EMILY's List say it's impossible to say, but they are now analyzing each contest in depth. Three of the still-undecided races involve two woman candidates, so gender could not be a factor there. On a Seattle Times blog, debate raged last week over why Democratic challenger Darcy Burner lost narrowly to Rep. David Reichert (R). Times reporters cited e-mails from Ms. Burner, who suggested that being female hurt her - especially at a time of war.

Woman political activists say that the big picture is what counts - and in the end, a record number of women will take seats in Congress come January. The increasing ranks of women at lower levels of government mean that the farm team for future, higher-level races is growing, they add.

Still, building toward gender equality remains a steep climb. "If it were easy to get women elected, we wouldn't need to exist," says Ramona Oliver, a spokeswoman for EMILY's List. "And trying to get newcomers elected on top of that is probably the toughest job in politics."

Kansas Republican Eyes Presidential Bid (AP-Y)

By Sam Hananel

AP, November 21, 2006

Sen. Sam Brownback, who is considering a White House bid in 2008, said Monday the Republican field has room for a "full-scale Ronald Reagan conservative" and pledged to make a final decision next month.

DOJ_NMG_0096974

The Kansas senator said he was not discouraged from running by the Democrats' strong gains in this month's midterm elections, including majority control of the House and Senate.

"It does not make it less likely," he said in an interview. "I really believe that the basic conservative ideas and ideals were not repudiated. Our execution was."

A more daunting challenge for Brownback are the better known potential candidates. Arizona Sen. John McCain and former New York City mayor Rudy Giuliani have set up presidential exploratory committees. Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney and Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., also are weighing bids.

"I think there's room for a full-scale Ronald Reagan conservative in the field," Brownback said. "I fully agree that other people have much higher name identification than I do. No question about that. But I think what you have to look at is the policy positions they get out once you have an effective campaign."

Brownback, who was elected in 1996, is a forceful foe of abortion and embryonic stem-cell research. He also has taken a prominent role in the fight against genocide in Sudan's Darfur region.

Brownback has made several trips to Iowa, New Hampshire, Michigan and other states that hold early presidential nominating contests. While national polls show McCain and Giuliani running strong, similar polls have shown Brownback in the low single digits.

He dismisses the early surveys.

"Where are my positions and others versus the base of the party?" he asked.

Dueling Conservatives (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, November 21, 2006

Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona and a likely 2008 presidential candidate, seemed to struggle yet again to firm up his position with the right on Sunday, as he faces the prospect of a primary fight with, among others, Gov. Mitt Romney of Massachusetts.

Mr. McCain, far right, appearing on “This Week” on ABC, said he thought Roe v. Wade, the Supreme Court decision that established a constitutional right to abortion, should be overturned. But he sometimes strayed from the orthodoxy of social conservatism. He presented himself as a supporter of the “don’t ask, don’t tell” policy imposed by President Bill Clinton in 1993 to allow gay men and lesbians to serve in the military. He said he did not believe homosexuality was “a sin.” And while he said he opposed same-sex marriage, he seemed to countenance civil unions.

And how did Mr. Romney spend his Sunday? He announced that he would ask his state’s highest court to order a question banning same-sex marriage onto the ballot if legislators failed to do so.

Romney Prepares To Run For President (FT)

By Rebecca Knight

Financial Times, November 21, 2006

Mitt Romney, the outgoing governor of Massachusetts, appears to be on the verge of confirming what many political observers have long speculated: he intends to seek the Republican party’s presidential nomination in 2008.

Mr Romney – who first drew national attention when he took over leadership of the struggling 2002 Salt Lake City Winter Olympic Games – convened a meeting of his top advisers and leading supporters at the weekend to discuss the potential launch of his White House bid. According to an aide to his Commonwealth Political Action Committee, the gathering was “to thank those who have been supporters” over the past year.

The governor has always been coy about his presidential ambitions. But an aide to the committee said he planned over the coming holidays to discuss a possible presidential run with his family and will “make a decision one way or another after the first of the year”.

Mr Romney has recently added several influential political consultants to his roster including Alex Castellanos, a veteran Republican image-maker known for his take-no-prisoners television commercials against Democratic candidates. Mr Castellanos has produced ads for President George W. Bush and presidential candidate Bob Dole, among others.

In addition, Mr Romney’s PAC has hired Sally Bradshaw, one of the top political advisers to Governor Jeb Bush of Florida, and Barbara Comstock, a one-time strategist for the Republican National Committee.

The high-profile recruits and last weekend’s talks come at time when the field of Republican hopefuls is thinning. Senator John McCain of Arizona is still widely considered the frontrunner but the demise of Senator George Allen, Republican of Virginia, who had been considered a leading 2008 presidential contender until a string of slip-ups over the summer, is considered a boon to a potential Romney candidacy.

DOJ_NMG_0096975

In spite of the more open playing field, many political observers, including Charles Stewart, a political science professor at MIT, are sceptical about Mr Romney's chances. "The thing about nominations is that it comes down to popular appeal and the judgment of professionals," he said.

While Mr Romney succeeds at portraying himself as a "solid, good guy", Prof Stewart said he loses points with professionals for the way he has treated Massachusetts "as a political whipping boy". In various out-of-town speeches, Mr Romney has portrayed the state's liberalism as a foil to cast himself as a conservative fighting blue-state waste, according to Prof Stewart.

"He is running against Massachusetts by playing to his conservative base at the expense of the state where he is governor," he said.

Ahead To 2008 (WT)

By Rick Amato

The Washington Times, November 21, 2006

As the line of Republican candidates running for the White House in 2008 begins to form, there is one candidate making preparations to run whose name voters outside of San Diego and Washington will be hard-pressed to recognize, but that could change in time. I'm speaking of the outgoing chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, California Rep. Duncan Hunter.

It is easy to dismiss Mr. Hunter's chances. After all, not since James Garfield in 1880 has a sitting member of Congress been elected to the White House, and then of course, there's that whole name recognition thing. However, there is something interesting about Mr. Hunter that should not be overlooked. He is a social conservative in what is expected to shape up as a socially moderate Republican field. Historically, social conservatives have done very well with voters in early primary states such as Iowa and South Carolina. (Mr. Hunter introduced H.R. 552 the Right to Life Act, which proposes to "implement equal protection for the right to life of each born and preborn human person."). He is further to the right on social issues than either John McCain, Rudy Giuliani or Mitt Romney.

A Vietnam veteran, Mr. Hunter was first elected to Congress in 1980, when he won in a long-shot bid over 18-year Democratic incumbent Lionel Van Deerlin. When asked why he is up to the challenge of a presidential run Mr. Hunter told me, "because I believe national security and a strong military are more important issues today than ever before. The Iranians and North Koreans are acquiring more advanced weapons systems, China is an emerging superpower and, we are living in an increasingly dangerous world. America is headed in to a new era, an era of terrorists with high technology. My message will be one of 'peace through strength.' I encourage voters to examine my record and consider my experience as chair of Armed Services and my work on national security issues."

On Iraq, Mr. Hunter points to a pattern he says America has followed for the past 60 years, "My campaign message on Iraq will consist of a three-step process: Establish a free government, which we've done, establish a military that will protect that government, and then leave Iraq."

Regarding Iraq, Mr. Hunter provided me with a letter he recently wrote to President Bush urging the president "to accelerate the process of deploying Iraqi forces to security environments that force them to engage in difficult military operations. Such operations will allow the forces to become battle-hardened ... as the battle in Iraq has intensified, so has the need to send Iraqi battalions into the heart of battle."

On the issues of border security and illegal immigration, Mr. Hunter has been a vocal critic and an advocate of tougher illegal immigration laws. "I don't look at the border as an immigration issue, I look at it as a national security issue. After we built the border fence along the San Diego-Tijuana region, smuggling and drugs were reduced in that area by 90 percent. The president just signed the 700-mile border fence bill, which I wrote on the House side. We simply have to have better border security."

Mr. Hunter expects to formally announce his candidacy sometime after the first of the year. History suggests that voters in early primary states will recognize and embrace a message of peace through strength, conservative social values and conservative illegal immigration policy. Now Duncan Hunter is hoping they recognize his name.

Rick Amato is a radio talk-show host and political commentator.

Out Of The Bush Family Shadow (LAT)

By Peter Wallsten

The Los Angeles Times, November 21, 2006

MIAMI — Her father left the White House 14 years ago, and her brother is midway through his second term as president. But Dorothy Bush Koch is only now stepping into the spotlight with a new book about the first President Bush and about her family.

DOJ_NMG_0096976

And she has a few gently pointed words to say about life as the lone daughter in the country's most powerful political family.

Introducing her book at a Miami event on Sunday, "Doro," as she is known to her siblings, said it was nearly impossible to convince strangers that the generation of George W. Bush, Jeb, Neil and Marvin also included her.

"It's as if they are finding out about the fifth Beatle," she said.

After Jeb Bush, the brother who is also Florida's governor, introduced her at Miami Book Fair International, Koch added bluntly: "Thank you, Jeb, for letting people know that I actually do exist.

"The traditional path to making a name for yourself in our family is running for elective office, and I couldn't do that because, for one thing, all the really good offices were taken," Koch said wryly.

Koch lives in the Maryland suburbs of Washington and devotes much of her time to raising money for causes (including her relatives' political campaigns). She is a mother of four. Her husband, Robert, is the president of the San Francisco-based Wine Institute, a lobbying group for the wine industry.

Koch's book walks through the life and times of her father, George H. W. Bush, a war hero at age 20 after he was shot down fighting the Japanese in 1944.

He went on to serve in Congress, run the CIA, head the Republican National Committee and win election as vice president for eight years and president for four.

Koch worked on the book for two years, conducting 135 interviews with friends, family and even political opponents of her father, including the man he beat for the presidency in 1988, Michael Dukakis.

One intriguing element of Koch's presentation Sunday, though, was what she implied but did not directly state about the contrasting images of the family's two presidents, one of whom is known as the consummate diplomat and the other who has labeled himself the "war president."

Twice on Sunday, she noted that among the accomplishments she most admired about her father was his ability to manage the end of the Cold War "without a shot being fired."

The book aims to cement the legacy of the country's 41st president as a war hero and thoughtful world leader, but it comes as the 43rd president is struggling to preserve his own legacy amid an increasingly violent Iraq war — a war that many say his father would not have waged.

The book also comes as the current President Bush, in trying to find his way forward in Iraq, is increasingly reaching back to his father's foreign policy team for advice and leadership.

The title of Koch's book, "My Father, My President: A Personal Account of the Life of George H. W. Bush," suggests that Koch does have her favorite between the family's two presidents.

Though much has been made of whether the current President Bush has accomplished more than his father — winning two terms in the White House and toppling Saddam Hussein — Jeb Bush spoke Sunday of how he never aspired to outdo his father.

Instead, he was haunted by the desire to live up to his dad's example.

"If you start with the premise that your dad is as perfect as a person can be — and, typically, guys try and aspire to be like their dad … think about how traumatic that's been," he said.

"But I figured out if I could be half as good and kind and generous and compassionate as my father, then that would be pretty good," he added.

"And once I figured that out, I stopped worrying about getting therapy."

When a questioner at the Sunday event asked about the two presidents' differing decisions on Iraq, Koch instinctively deferred to her brother, and he deferred to well-worn family talking points.

"When the current president and President 41 are together, we're talking about sports and we're talking about our families," the governor said. As for their approaches to Iraq, Jeb Bush added: "It's never come up, to be honest with you."

Gov. Bush said Koch's 586-page book would probably serve as the official presidential memoir. He said their father did not intend to write his own.

As any loyal daughter would, Koch seeks to convey the record as she and her family see it.

Writing about the famous 1988 Willie Horton presidential-campaign ad, Koch lauds it as an effective portrayal of Dukakis' support of a weekend furlough program for violent criminals. Horton, an African American, was serving a life sentence for murder when he committed a rape while released for a weekend furlough.

Democrats and civil rights leaders called the ad race-baiting. It took on new resonance last month, when the Republican Party aired a controversial attack ad against a black Senate candidate in Tennessee.

The former president told his daughter that critics were wrong about the Willie Horton ad.

"I felt we did the right thing," he said, adding later: "It was definitely a crime issue."

DOJ_NMG_0096977

Koch did convince the two presidents to reflect a bit on their relationship with each other. The current president said his father had been paying too much attention to attacks coming from Democrats these days, whereas the elder Bush said: "I know George is strong and can take it, too — but it still burns the hell out of me."

Inside The Beltway (WT)

By John Mccaslin

The Washington Times, November 21, 2006

Overt review

"Katie Couric's The Brand New Kid" made its world premiere at the Kennedy Center during the weekend, and while the "CBS Evening News" anchorwoman says she was unable to make the opening performance, Valerie Plame of CIA-leak fame was in the audience and sends her rave reviews.

"I got a note from Valerie Plame, who said she really liked it," Miss Couric told Inside the Beltway by telephone yesterday from New York. "She wrote, 'It was so well done and enjoyable for all of us. It teaches important values. And fun songs. Good work!' "

The musical, playing at the Kennedy Center's Family Theatre through Dec. 17, is based on a children's book Miss Couric authored in 2000, titled "The Brand New Kid." It centers on a second-grader who enrolls in a new school, only to taunted by the other children. The teasing stops when the new arrival is befriended by one of the school's more popular students.

"I was going to go to opening night, but my daughters, typical, had plans, so I'm going to take them another time. I'm excited to do it," said Mrs. Couric, adding that the opportunity for the book to be made into a musical "was a pleasant surprise."

"And of course the Kennedy Center -- you can't do much better than that," she said.

Mrs. Plame and her husband, former ambassador Joseph C. Wilson IV, are parents of twins, a boy and girl, born in 2000.

Death notice

"Your item must have hit a raw nerve this time," writes Washington resident Jesse H. Merrell, who had called our attention Friday to a $75 fine levied against Luther L. Miller of Garfield Street Northwest -- who, according to a D.C. government notice put his trash containers "out for collection @ the wrong time or place."

Mr. Merrell has written repeatedly to the city's fathers, informing them that his old neighbor "Luther L. Miller is dead -- has been for nearly 30 years."

He once enclosed a copy of Mr. Miller's death certificate, but similar notices and fines addressed to Mr. Miller kept arriving at his neighbor's old house. Mr. Merrell even offered to drive Mayor Anthony A. Williams to the Old Stone Church Cemetery in Lewisburg, W.Va., to see for himself that Mr. Miller in no way, shape or form could be emptying his trash.

"On Feb. 2, 2002 -- after an unbelievable fourth letter -- I wrote and asked if I took you to see his tombstone in Lewisburg, would that help?" Mr. Merrell wrote to the mayor.

Now, we are pleased to report that Luther L. Miller might finally be resting in peace.

"I got a call from an aide to the mayor this afternoon," says Mr. Merrell, "thanking me for bringing it to their attention. I felt like saying I had been bringing it to their attention for some time, but was polite and let it go. He said he was going to ... get it corrected. I'm not holding my breath, however."

Read about baseball

We couldn't help but be amused yesterday when President Bush, visiting a pair of faux Indonesian classrooms in Jakarta, was asked by a small boy what his hobbies had been when he was growing up.

Observed the White House pool report: "Bush didn't miss a beat: 'Baseball. I liked baseball. That was my hobby. Sports.' Then, perhaps realizing that sports was the wrong thing to push in a classroom, even a fake one, the president added: 'The best thing that I did was to learn how to read.' Continuing in that vein, the last thing we heard before being pushed out was Bush cautioning the kids that 'there are people who watch TV too much.' "

Offer a toast

Craig Wolf, who served as counsel to the Senate Judiciary Committee and specifically its chairman, Sen. Orrin G. Hatch, Utah Republican, has become the new president and CEO of the Wine & Spirits Wholesalers of America.

"We are entering a dynamic era, and the membership has every confidence that Craig ... will effectively advance the wine and spirits wholesalers' interests to policy-makers and the general public during this period of increasing attacks seeking the deregulation of alcohol in this country," says association Chairman Stan Hastings.

We might also mention that Mr. Wolf was once a federal and state prosecutor, and he is also a captain in the U.S Army Reserve Judge Advocate General's Corps.

·John McCaslin, whose column is nationally syndicated, can be reached at 202/636-3284 or jmccaslin @washingtontimes.com.

DOJ_NMG_0096978

Bush Gets A Dose Of Democracy On Visit To Indonesia (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, November 21, 2006

BOGOR, INDONESIA — In the last overseas stop of his five-day Asian tour, President Bush met here Monday with President Susilo Bambang Yudhoyono, the first directly elected president of the nation with the world's largest Muslim population.

The visit came after a week of demonstrations against Bush, and its brief length, 6 1/2 hours, reflected security concerns in a country where terrorists have staged large-scale and deadly attacks.

About 2,000 protesters from Muslim, student, and labor groups showed up to protest U.S. policies in Iraq and Afghanistan, saying it was Bush who was spreading terror. In Surabaya, East Java, about 100 students were reported to have clashed with police at a McDonald's after staging a protest at the U.S. Consulate. No arrests were reported.

Bush cited the demonstrations as evidence of Indonesia's democracy, saying, "It's not the first time, by the way, where people have showed up and expressed their opinion about my policies."

Indonesia, where Islam is firmly rooted and democracy is still emerging, is a religious and political laboratory for the policies Bush says are the answer to Islamic-based terrorist movements. The president put Indonesia on his agenda for a trip, which began Thursday in Singapore and then went to Vietnam for an economic meeting of Pacific Rim leaders, to support Yudhoyono "as a moderate and progressive leader," said Derek Mitchell, a Pentagon official during the Clinton administration.

Indonesia had not done as much as Bush might have wanted to impose the rule of law, but there was "a sense that this is moving in the right direction," said Mitchell, who specializes in Asia and is a senior fellow at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, a Washington think tank.

Nearly 90% of Indonesia's 238 million people are Muslims. That amounts to approximately one-sixth of the Muslim world. After four decades of authoritarian rule, the nation's first democratic elections were held seven years ago; Yudhoyono was elected in 2004.

"The elections were open, the elections were clean, the elections were fair. And you elected a good president who is working hard to — in a tough job," said Bush of Yudhoyono at the news conference in one of the nation's six presidential palaces.

Indonesia is an equatorial archipelago made up of more than 17,000 islands, 6,000 of them inhabited, covering an area roughly three times that of Texas. It has a long history of ethnic strife along with the more recent onset of Islamic terrorism.

It is a base of the terrorist organization Jemaah Islamiah and has increasingly cooperated with the U.S. in counter-terrorism efforts, particularly in the wake of bombings in 2002 and 2003. The targets have included a nightclub frequented by tourists in Bali and a Marriott hotel in Jakarta.

The president flew by helicopter to Bogor from the Halim Perdanakusuma International Airport air base near Jakarta, 35 miles to the north, rather than traveling by motorcade.

The flight took him over the crowded capital's outer reaches, above roofs of crinkled metal and others of tile atop small, squat homes and trash heaps spilling out of backyards under lush, tropical growth.

He landed near the grounds of the 150-year-old Greek Revival-style palace, which is generally used for ceremonial purposes and other government functions.

Its 70 acres of lawns and giant ficus trees, behind high walls and in some locations rolls of new razor wire, harbor a herd of 600 white-spotted miniature deer, descendants of animals brought here from India several centuries ago for the hunting pleasure of a Dutch governor-general.

Bush made the short trip from the Marine One helicopter landing zone to the palace in an armored Chevrolet Suburban that bore neither the U.S. or Indonesian flags nor the presidential seal.

As he hopped with both feet from the high-riding vehicle, his image on a television screen prompted boos — and a few calls of "terrorist" — from some of the Indonesian reporters awaiting the news conference.

After dinner with Yudhoyono, Bush set out for Hawaii. He is scheduled to return to Washington tonight.

Bush Ends Trip At Careful Stop In Indonesia (NYT)

By David E. Sanger

The New York Times, November 21, 2006

BOGOR, Indonesia, Nov. 20 — President Bush made a six-hour, carefully orchestrated visit to Indonesia on Monday, praising the country's first directly elected president and seeking to defuse the widespread anger here, in the most populous Islamic country, over the continued American presence in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0096979

Mr. Bush, whose visit to Indonesia three years ago was consumed with talk of counterterrorism, this time appeared focused on fighting bird flu, bolstering a small program to aid Indonesian schools and promoting growth.

And in an afternoon of meetings at an ornate presidential palace that is a legacy of Dutch colonial rule, Mr. Bush held a closed-door session with what the White House called "civic leaders" of Indonesia.

Protestors and their "Stop Bush Now" placards could get no place near the Bogor palace, which is an hour outside of Jakarta and heavily protected by troops and fences. But Mr. Bush turned the Jakarta protests into a example of how far Indonesia has come in allowing free expression.

"It's not the first time, by the way, where people have showed up and expressed their opinion about my policies," Mr. Bush, looking tired at the end of a grueling trip, said with a smile. "But that's what happens when you makes hard decisions."

State Department surveys show that the percentage of Indonesians who say they have a favorable view of the United States has declined to 30 percent, from 75 percent six years ago.

The Indonesian president, Susilo Bambang Yudhoyono, gave only the most gentle public prod to Mr. Bush, talking about a "proper timetable" for withdrawal from Iraq, but then echoing Mr. Bush's view that the timetable had to be linked to national reconciliation there and the training of new security forces.

When a reporter asked Mr. Yudhoyono whether he had urged Mr. Bush to begin a withdrawal of forces from Iraq, Mr. Bush interjected: "I'll be glad to answer it for him — no, no he didn't. But he can answer it for himself."

In Mr. Bush's struggle to demonstrate that he can still achieve his initial objective in Iraq — a stable, democratic government in a demographically diverse Islamic nation — he often holds up Indonesia as an example of success and proof that Islam and democracy are compatible.

Since Suharto's departure from power in 1998, a real democracy has begun to take root. In its recent report card on the country, Freedom House judged that "the political system is open and democratic in its basic structures," even while some of its institutions still "function poorly or are sanctuaries of undemocratic and abusive behavior."

But to Mr. Bush, Indonesia's greatest accomplishment has been to suppress extremist groups, especially Jemaah Islamiyah, considered an affiliate of Al Qaeda.

"I believe the vast majority of people want to live in moderation and not have extremists kill innocent people," he said at a news conference in the ornate receiving rooms of the palace.

Despite the country's recent progress, however, Mr. Bush once again did not stay the night in Indonesia, at the insistence of the Secret Service. On his previous visit, he stopped in Bali, a Hindu resort island in a nation of Muslims, and held what turned out to be a contentious session with Indonesian scholars and religious scholars. He was criticized after that visit for failing to come to the heart of Indonesia.

So on Monday he flew into the airport in Jakarta, the capital. But he never ventured into the city. Instead, he stayed behind the fenced wall of the palace compound, save for his helicopter ride from and to the airport, where Air Force One was standing by for the trip onward to Hawaii.

Protestors were kept away by troops and rolls of barbed wire. In Jakarta, the authorities appeared to have jammed some cellular telephone networks.

At one point during the news conference, Mr. Bush was asked to describe the risks of adding more forces to Iraq, a step that Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona, is pressing.

Mr. Bush, who has described in detail the risks of pulling out of Iraq too soon, sidestepped the question. "I haven't made any decisions about troop increases or troop decreases, and won't until I hear from a variety of sources, including our own United States military," he replied.

Among the groups expected to present their recommendations to the president are the joint chiefs of staff and a bipartisan study group led by a former secretary of state, James A. Baker III, and a former congressman, Lee H. Hamilton.

So far, Mr. Bush has used those groups' ongoing studies to justify declining to talk about his plans for the Iraq mission. "There's no need to comment on something that may not happen," he said. "But if it were to happen, I will tell you the upsides and the downsides."

Bush Brushes Off Protests Over Middle East (FT)

By John Aglionby In Bogor, Indonesia

Financial Times, November 21, 2006

US President George W. Bush on Monday dismissed suggestions he should alter his policies to win over opponents in the Muslim world, insisting his desire to promote democracy and freedom were echoed by the majority of people around the world.

DOJ_NMG_0096980

Speaking during a seven-hour visit to Indonesia, the world's most populous Muslim nation, at the end of his Asian tour, Mr Bush welcomed the fact that thousands of people had been demonstrating for days across the sprawling archipelago against his visit and policies in Iraq and the Middle East.

"I applaud a society where people are free to come out and express their opinion," he told a press conference with his host, President Susilo Bambang Yudhoyono. "It's not the first time people have shown up to express their views on my policies. That's what happens when you make hard decisions."

People should instead appreciate the message he was trying to spread around the world, Mr Bush said. "I believe people desire to live in a free society," he said. "People want to live in moderation and not have extremists kill innocent people. Our policies are to promote that kind of government. Democracies yield peace. Democracies don't kill each other. To say democracy is anti-religious is wrong. It's the opposite of that."

Indonesia's transition from a dictatorship in 1998 to its currently directly-elected president is considered one of the world's best democracy success stories.

The vast majority of Indonesian Muslims are moderate but it is also the home of extremist groups who carried out at least one major terrorist attack each year between 2002 and 2005, including two bombings on the tourist resort island of Bali that killed more than 220 people.

Anti-Bush demonstrations have been thousands strong in the last few days, small by Indonesian standards, and the vast majority have passed off without incident.

Protesters were kept well away from Mr Bush but he received strong face-to-face criticism in a meeting with nine Indonesian civil society leaders.

"I wanted to tell him that he has to take a different approach to the Middle East and to Iraq," said Ysuni Sabi, from Aceh province. "He's not going to get peace unless he's harder on Israel and more accommodating towards Palestine."

The president's bilateral talks covered general matters such as promoting cooperation in trade, investment, health, education, alternative fuel technology and military links. No new initiatives were announced.

Mr Bush said the two leaders did not discuss a dispute involving Exxon Mobil's right to develop a gas field near the Natuna islands in the South China Sea. Jakarta has said Exxon had forfeited its right to the block while the company insists its contact expires in 2009. The two sides have agreed to negotiate to try and reach a common position that is likely to involve adjusting the share of profits each side receives.

Mr Bush also said he had not decided whether to adjust troop levels in Iraq.

"I haven't made any decisions about troop increases or decreases, and won't until I hear from a variety of sources, including our own United States military," he said.

Bush Calls Indonesian Protests A Good Thing (USAT)

By David Jackson

USA Today, November 21, 2006

BOGOR, Indonesia — President Bush was due to arrive in Hawaii today, ending a five-day trip during which he talked with world leaders about stopping North Korea's nuclear weapon's program.

In Indonesia, the last stop on the trip, several thousand anti-American protesters that included hard-line Islamists staged demonstrations Monday against U.S. policy in Iraq. Bush said the protests were symbolic of the kind of free expression the United States is trying to establish in Iraq.

"Indonesia is an example of how democracy and modernization can present an alternative to extremism," Bush said after meeting with President Susilo Bambang Yudhoyono in a 19th-century palace built by the nation's Dutch former colonial rulers.

"To say spreading democracy is anti-religious — it's the opposite of that. Democracy means you can worship any way you choose, freely," he said.

Before Indonesia, Bush visited Singapore and Vietnam, where he discussed free trade and measures aimed at reining in North Korea's nuclear weapons program. Bush spent a little more than six hours here amid tight security before flying to Hawaii, where he is to have breakfast with U.S. troops.

In a meeting with reporters in Indonesia, Bush said he has not decided about future troop levels in Iraq and is still consulting with advisers. The administration is also awaiting the report from a special committee on Iraq led by former secretary of State James Baker and former U.S. representative Lee Hamilton.

Indonesia replaced a dictatorship on its own in the late 1990s, so it's not a good example for Iraq, said William Liddle, an Ohio State University specialist on Indonesia.

"The Indonesians created this for themselves; they weren't occupied by somebody," said Liddle of the country that consists of more than 17,000 islands.

DOJ_NMG_0096981

Derek Mitchell, an Asia specialist with the Center for Strategic & International Studies in Washington, said the Islamic Middle East doesn't consider Indonesia as a model. “They see them as outliers,” he said.

Indonesia has 190 million people and 87% are Muslim, the State Department said. The country is having troubles with militant Islam. The State Department says the Indonesian Islamic militant group Jemaah Islamiyah has been behind four terror attacks that killed more than 240 people since 2002.

On Iraq, Yudhoyono said the “global community” needs to help strengthen the Baghdad government before the United States can leave.

Indonesian attitudes toward the United States have gone up and down during Bush's presidency, according to the Pew Global Attitudes Project.

In 2002, a year after the 9/11 attacks, 61% of Indonesians held a favorable view of the United States, according to Pew. That dropped to 15% in 2003 after the U.S. invasion of Iraq, and then rose to 38% in 2005 after the United States helped Indonesia recover from the December 2004 tsunami that killed 167,000 Indonesians.

U.S. Urges IAEA To Deny Iran Reactor Aid (AP)

By George Jahn, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 21, 2006

The United States said Monday it would accept Iran's request for U.N. aid on seven nuclear projects but urged the International Atomic Energy Agency to deny assistance for a plutonium-producing reactor that can be used to make a bomb.

The decision reflected U.S. recognition that it was futile to try to block IAEA help to Iran on all eight projects because of opposition by most of the agency's 35-nation board. It also appeared prompted by an IAEA ruling that neither the reactor nor the other projects posed a proliferation threat.

Some diplomats accredited to the Vienna-based U.N. nuclear watchdog agency also suggested it could reflect a U.S. decision to tread relatively lightly while Washington weighs the possibility of direct dialogue with Iran on reducing violence in Iraq. The diplomats spoke on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to speak publicly about the closed meeting.

U.S. officials declined comment.

"We are prepared to join consensus" on approving the seven other requests from Iran if the agency's board agrees to deny aid to Iran on building the Arak research reactor, said Gregory L. Schulte, the chief U.S. delegate to the IAEA.

But Schulte suggested there would be no compromise on Arak, describing it as being "capable of producing plutonium for one or more nuclear weapons each year," once completed, likely in the next decade.

"Given past board decisions, continued questions about Iran's nuclear program, and the risk of plutonium being diverted to use in a weapons, the United States joins with others who cannot approve this project," he said. His comments to the closed committee meeting on IAEA technical aid to member countries were made available to The Associated Press.

The council's main concern is Iran's defiance of a demand that it freeze uranium enrichment, but the Arak heavy water reactor is also worrying because of its ability to produce plutonium.

A Security Council resolution in July demanded that Iran stop all enrichment-related activities. But it did not specifically mention Arak, saying only that Tehran had to stop all "reprocessing activities."

The European Union also urged the board to refuse approving aid for the Arak project once it moves from its committee meeting to a full session on Thursday.

"Our concern is that such a reactor would in the future produce significant quantities of plutonium and would involve a significant proliferation risk," an EU statement said.

Canada and Australia also urged that help on Arak be denied, said a diplomat coming out of the closed meeting.

In contrast, Russia and China — the key blockers of tough U.N. Security Council sanctions on Iran backed by the U.S. and some European allies — suggested they had no objections to IAEA help on Arak, said the diplomat. Cuba went the furthest, demanding that the board approve the Arak project, she said.

Normally, the United States is at the forefront in demanding tough action against Tehran for defying U.N. Security Council demands that it freeze uranium enrichment.

But with council agreement on sanctions bogged down because of Russian and Chinese efforts to block severe punishment, diplomats said the Americans took a back seat at the Vienna meeting. Instead, France took the lead on demands that all eight Iranian projects be reviewed and possibly refused.

In Tehran, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad — whose country sees the United States and Israel as its greatest enemies — was cited on the Web site of Iran's Broadcasting Company as saying the Islamic republic would succeed in developing a full nuclear program, despite "pressure by the U.S. and Israel."

DOJ_NMG_0096982

Even nonaligned nations traditionally supportive of Iran were likely to approve some form of denying Iran help for Arak, but the other seven projects were less controversial.

One asks for help in developing nuclear capabilities for medical use. Another seeks legal aid for the Russian-built Bushehr reactor, which even the Americans have accepted as not posing a threat to nuclear proliferation. And the five others ask for assistance in administrative or safety aspects of nuclear power, according to a list made available to the AP.

Denying Iran help with Arak — where it is seeking agency assistance to make sure the reactor is environmentally safe — would do little to slow construction of that facility or affect Tehran's other potential avenue to weapons production — uranium enrichment. Still, it would maintain at least symbolic pressure even amid the Security Council deadlock.

Ali Ashgar Soltanieh, Iran's chief delegate to the IAEA, said his country's request would benefit the international community by increasing outside involvement in Arak.

"By adopting this project, the agency's presence ... will be much more," he said.

Report: Israeli Spies Active In Iran (JERP)

The Jerusalem Post, November 21, 2006

Iran has developed and tested a trigger device for a nuclear bomb, Israeli agents stationed there have told the White House, according to a report published in The New Yorker Monday morning.

35 nations meet on denying Iran technical help for building plutonium-producing reactor

According to the report, written by Seymour M. Hersh, the White House received the information but did not pass it on to the CIA.

The report also stated that in the past six months, Israel and the United States had been working together to support a Kurdish resistance group known as the Party for Free Life in Kurdistan.

The group had been conducting clandestine cross-border forays into Iran, as "part of an effort to explore alternative means of applying pressure on Iran," Hersh said he was told by a government consultant with close ties to the Pentagon civilian leadership. The government consultant reportedly said Israel was supplying the Kurdish group with "equipment and training." The group had also been given "a list of targets inside Iran of interest to the US." An Israeli government spokesman denied that Israel was involved.

The Israeli intelligence presented a stark contrast to recent CIA estimates on Iran's nuclear program, which claimed that Teheran was far from attaining a nuclear bomb.

The New Yorker article seemed to suggest that there was a difference of opinion between the CIA, the White House and the Pentagon regarding the progress of Iran's nuclear weapons program.

The CIA's opinion was based on technical information gathered from satellites and other hi-tech devices that suggested high levels of radiation had not been detected.

However, the White House and the Pentagon dispute the CIA's findings. Pentagon officials have urged that the Israeli intelligence be given due consideration and said data gathered by satellites and ground sensors was insufficient. They added that more emphasis should be given to information supplied by agents.

"We live in an era when national technical intelligence" - data from satellites and on-the-ground sensors - "will not get us what we need. HUMINT [human intelligence] may not be hard evidence by that standard, but very often it's the best intelligence we can get," said a Pentagon consultant.

The White House reportedly was refusing to reveal to the CIA the source of the Israeli information, the location of the site of the experiments, or the number of tests that had been carried out.

"The problem is that no one can verify it," a former senior intelligence official told Hersh. "We don't know who the Israeli source is. The briefing says the Iranians are testing trigger mechanisms" - simulating a zero-yield nuclear explosion without any weapons-grade materials - "but there are no diagrams, no significant facts. Where is the test site? How often have they done it? How big is the warhead - a bread box or a refrigerator? They don't have that."

And yet, the official said, the report was being used by White House hawks within the administration to "prove the White House's theory that the Iranians are on track. And tests leave no radioactive track, which is why we can't find it." Still, he said, "The agency is standing its ground."

Talk Of Another Middle East Preventive War Is Folly (FT)

By Gideon Rachman

Financial Times, November 21, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0096983

James Baker will have heard many views as he prepares his much awaited report on Iraq. But he is unlikely to have heard anything as strikingly original as the suggestions offered to him by Ali G when Mr Baker gave the comedian an interview a couple of years ago.

The self-styled spokesman for youth suggested to Mr Baker that it might be problematic that Iran and Iraq had such similar names. Wasn't there a real danger, he asked, that an order might be issued to an American pilot and "the geezer don't hear it properly and bomb Iran not Iraq"? "No danger," replied the former secretary of state evenly.

But now, as he settles down to draft his report, Mr Baker might reflect that perhaps Mr G was on to something. It turns out that there is a country in the Middle East that is bent on developing nuclear weapons, which is funding terrorism and de-stabilising the region and which has a dangerously erratic president. But that country's name is Iran – not Iraq. Maybe America and its allies invaded the wrong place by mistake?

Some of the neo-conservatives who pressed hardest for the invasion of Iraq seem to have reached this conclusion. In an article for Foreign Policy magazine that is almost as surreal as an Ali G interview, Joshua Muravchik of the American Enterprise Institute acknowledges a whole string of errors and misapprehensions that lay behind the decision to invade Iraq. But then – with scarcely a pause for breath – he urges President George W. Bush "to bomb Iran's nuclear facilities before leaving office".

It would be easy to dismiss these views as ravings from a discredited ideological sect. But that would be a mistake. In recent months, I have heard senior British and French diplomats also discuss the possibility that Iran's nuclear ambitions might ultimately have to be dealt with by military action. The problem is that most people who follow the issue closely believe that Iran is, indeed, intent on developing nuclear weapons – and some argue that it is only a year or so away from crossing the threshold at which possession of the bomb becomes inevitable.

America could well make a big new effort to negotiate with Iran in the wake of the Baker report. If that fails, sanctions could be wheeled out. But, realistically, neither course is likely to divert Iran away from its nuclear ambitions.

The rise of President Mahmoud Ahmadi-Nejad has also darkened the outlook. Even Kofi Annan, the United Nations secretary-general, was unsettled by a meeting with the Iranian president in Tehran last August. According to one person present at the meeting, Mr Ahmadi- Nejad explained that the US and Britain were still enjoying the benefits of winning the second world war and then added: "We will cut them down to size."

By combining Holocaust denial with talk of a world without Israel or the US and a determination to develop nuclear weapons, Iran's president has put his country into considerable danger. President Bush has said that: "You have got to assume that leader, when he says he would like to destroy Israel, means what he says." Angela Merkel, the German chancellor, has compared Mr Ahmadi-Nejad's rhetoric to that of Hitler, adding that: "In the early 1930s, many people said that it is only rhetoric."

But there is a problem with the oft-stated argument that the Iranian president must be taken at his word. For if you were to take Mr Ahmadi- Nejad literally, you would have to believe that Iran does not have a nuclear-weapons programme – for that is what he says. The Iranian president can hardly be accused of explicitly threatening to nuke Israel, given that Iran denies having a nuclear-weapons programme in the first place.

So we are back to the balance of probabilities. The Atlantic Monthly recently ran a poll of 38 of America's leading foreign policy experts, ranging from neo-cons to liberals. One of their questions was whether they "thought it likely that Iran would use its nuclear weapons offensively, either by directly attacking other countries or by passing the weapons to terrorist groups"? The majority – 86 per cent of the sample – said they thought this unlikely.

But even if the risk that Iran would actually use a nuclear weapon is very small, some argue that it cannot be lived with. This argument is what Dick Cheney, vice-president, has called "the 1 per cent doctrine". If there is a 1 per cent chance that America's enemies might use a nuclear weapon, the US must act as if it was a 100 per cent certainty.

It sounds like a tough-minded way of preventing the very worst from happening. But on many occasions in the past 60 years, the US and its allies have had to live with a more than 1 per cent chance that their adversaries might use nuclear weapons – the Cuba missile crisis for example. On all these occasions, the Americans wisely steered away from preventive war. Even Winston Churchill, the neo-cons' hero, spent the 1930s arguing for re-armament – not for a first strike on Nazi Germany.

One influential advocate of bombing Iran accepts that it is very improbable that the Iranians would actually use nuclear weapons. His concern is that, once Iran had nuclear weapons, it would embark on an uninhibited pursuit of regional hegemony – supporting terrorism and insurgencies across the Middle East and seeking to control the global oil market.

These are all serious and worrying possibilities. If they could be averted by the fabled "surgical strike" on Iranian nuclear facilities, modelled on the Israeli raid on Iraq's nuclear programme in 1981, such a course would be worth considering. But almost nobody thinks that it would be possible to dispose of Iran's nuclear facilities so easily. They are thought to be dispersed widely around the country and buried underground. Military experts talk of the need for hundreds or thousands of bombing raids, stretched over many days – and even that might merely set back Iran's nuclear programme a few years.

DOJ_NMG_0096984

Iran would also certainly retaliate. It could unleash Shia militias on allied troops in Iraq, encourage Hizbollah and Hamas to stage new attacks on Israel and block the Strait of Hormuz, through which 40 per cent of the world's oil flows. So military strikes that were launched because of the fear of the destabilising effects of a nuclear Iran would have created the very instability and bloodshed that they were meant to avert. If Iraq has taught America and its allies anything, it is that it is much easier to start a war in the Middle East than to finish one.

Israel Orders Investigation Of Bomb Use In Lebanon (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, November 21, 2006

JERUSALEM, Nov. 20 — The Israeli military chief of staff, Lt. Gen. Dan Halutz, ordered an inquiry on Monday to determine whether the armed forces had followed his orders when it used large numbers of cluster bombs during the monthlong war with Hezbollah in Lebanon this summer.

Several human rights groups have criticized Israel's use of cluster bombs in the fighting, saying they were dropped in or near populated areas.

Cluster bombs are not prohibited in warfare, but much controversy surrounds them, because they contain many small "bomblets" that explode over a wide area and may strike unintended targets. In addition, some bomblets do not explode when they hit the ground and effectively become land mines that can be detonated by civilians long after the fighting has stopped.

General Halutz visited an army base on Monday and told Army Radio that "one of the things that must be investigated is the way in which the orders were given and implemented."

He said: "Were the orders explicit? I believe they were. Now all we need to do is to see whether we had or did not have departures from the commonly accepted rules of use."

The general did not specify what orders he gave regarding cluster munitions, and it was not clear whether he prohibited them, or placed certain restrictions on their use. General Halutz, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Defense Minister Amir Peretz have all faced widespread criticism over the war, which many Israelis feel was mismanaged. There have been calls for General Halutz to resign, but he has said he has no plans to quit.

The military said Maj. Gen. Gershon Hacohen would head the investigation.

The Lebanese say they are still suffering numerous wounds and deaths caused by bomblets detonated by civilians since the war, more than three months ago. So far, thousands of unexploded bomblets have been found at hundreds of sites in Lebanon, according to Lebanese officials and international groups searching for them.

The United Nations Mine Action Coordination Center has estimated that Israel fired as many as four million cluster submunitions, and that up to one million may not have detonated. Israel fired many of the munitions with its Multiple Launch Rocket System, which can fire 12 rockets in a minute.

Hezbollah has also been accused of using cluster munitions among the 4,000 rockets it fired into Israel during the fighting, which began July 12 and lasted until Aug. 14.

In a statement, the Israeli military said that cluster munitions used in Lebanon were directed only at "legitimate military targets" and that after the fighting ended Israel provided maps to the United Nations forces to assist in finding unexploded bomblets.

Israel has received cluster munitions from the United States for many years, and also makes its own. In August, the State Department began investigating whether Israel used cluster bombs in Lebanon in violation of secret agreements that restrict their use.

In a separate development, an aide to the Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, said the president's Fatah movement had suspended talks with the militant faction Hamas on a national unity government. "We would say talks are suspended now," the aide, Nabil Amr, told a news conference in the West Bank city of Ramallah.

However, Prime Minister Ismail Haniya, of Hamas, said in the Gaza Strip that "talks are continuing on the highest level."

Fatah and Hamas have been talking for months but have been unable to reach an agreement on a new government, which would seek to win a restoration of international aid that was cut after Hamas came to power in the spring elections. The most recent discussions have sought to establish a cabinet of professionals and technocrats who are not linked directly to either Hamas or Fatah.In an Israeli airstrike on Monday night, two Hamas militants traveling in a car in Gaza City were killed, and several passers-by were wounded, Palestinian medical officials said. In the West Bank, a 17-year-old Palestinian youth who approached soldiers brandishing a gun, which turned out to be fake, was also killed, [a news agency] reported.

Murder Update (WSJ)

By Michael Young

DOJ_NMG_0096985

The Wall Street Journal, November 21, 2006

BEIRUT -- The Syrian regime is discovering what a nuisance Rafik Hariri, the late Lebanese prime minister, can be. Last Friday, the U.N. Security Council approved a draft plan for a mixed Lebanese-international court to try those responsible for Hariri's assassination on Feb. 14, 2005. Damascus, the main suspect in the crime, is palpably anxious. That anxiety played out in Lebanon 10 days ago, when six ministers named by pro-Syrian politicians resigned rather than take part in Beirut's formal endorsement of the tribunal proposal. The plan was subsequently passed by a reduced Lebanese government, but the full approval process is not over.

Five of the six ministers who resigned were appointed by or affiliated with the two main Shiite parties, Hezbollah and the Amal movement, while the sixth is Lebanese President Emile Lahoud's man. Their resignations came amid a struggle for power between pro-Syrian groups and the anti-Syrian parliamentary and cabinet majority -- dating back to the summer war between Israel and Hezbollah. While some saw the outcome of the conflict as a victory for the militant Shiite group, that was hardly the case. Israel displayed incompetence, but Hezbollah found itself militarily neutralized in its vital space of south Lebanon, at least for now. The Lebanese army and international peacekeepers are deployed in the border area, and Hezbollah cannot impose a new war on its battered Shiite community, which continues to suffer the consequences of Israel's terrible retribution.

With little room to maneuver in the south, Hezbollah has tried to compensate in Beirut by demanding greater representation in the cabinet. The anti-Syrian majority has resisted this, arguing that the government performed well last summer, making change unnecessary. The real issue, however, is the return of Syrian hegemony. Hezbollah and its allies want enough ministerial seats so they can veto decisions they dislike that go to a cabinet vote. By so doing, they can continue to protect Syria in the Hariri investigation, and also block the majority's policies that they don't like. A final U.N. report is due out on Hariri's killing in the coming months (the chief investigator, Serge Brammertz, has until mid-2007 to publish his findings), and Hezbollah fears that any accusation against Syria might also be turned against itself. * * *

All this has significant repercussions for the U.S., particularly after the Democratic midterm elections victory. Syria never accepted its forced withdrawal from Lebanon last year, and has worked tirelessly since then to reimpose its writ here. Now there is new hope in Damascus: Influential American voices are suddenly suggesting a reversal of course toward Iraq's neighbors. It was music to Syrian President Bashar Assad's ears to hear James Baker, the Republican co-chairman of the Iraq Study Group, advocating dialogue with Syria and Iran in an interview last month: "I don't think you restrict your conversations to your friends." The Iraq Study Group's report, expected in the coming weeks, will possibly include such an invitation. Syria's Lebanese foes fear they will pay if the U.S. and Damascus cut a deal.

If so, it wouldn't be the first time for Mr. Baker. In 1990, he was a leading light in President George H.W. Bush's administration, which ceded Lebanon to Syria in exchange for President Hafez Assad's agreement to be part of the international coalition against Iraq. An inveterate "realist," Mr. Baker is not likely to balk at negotiating with Mr. Assad if it means the U.S. can buy some peace of mind as it transforms its presence in Iraq. His proposal is unpopular at the White House, and last week Mr. Bush made that known to Mr. Baker and his colleagues. However, because of his electoral defeat, the president, pressed by a Congress avidly searching for new ideas, might find less latitude to ignore Syria down the road.

Unless, of course, the U.N. incriminates Syrian officials in the Hariri murder. That Mr. Assad realizes the fatal implications of this connection was evident when British Prime Minister Tony Blair recently sent a senior adviser, Sir Nigel Sheinwald, to Damascus for a chat. The visit, reportedly approved by Washington, aimed to see if Syria could be enticed away from Iran. If The Economist is correct, and the magazine spoke to Mr. Sheinwald upon his return, the Syrian president has four conditions: an end to the Hariri investigation, a guarantee that the U.S. would not undermine his regime, a return of Syrian influence in Lebanon, and the handing back of the Golan Heights, occupied by Israel in 1967. No doubt Mr. Assad would demand much the same from the U.S. if it ran to Damascus to "engage" him on Iraq, assuming the Syrian leader would consider conceding to Washington in a moment of strength what he refused when he was weak.

There seems to be a consensus in the U.S., whether in Congress or in the administration, that there is no going back on upholding Lebanese sovereignty or in finding Hariri's killers. But it is not clear to many in Washington that asking Syria and Iran for help in Iraq, if that's what the Iraq Study Group advises, will drastically limit the administration's ability to deny both countries' gains in Lebanon. For Syria and Iran, Lebanon is vital in their broader quest for power in the Middle East. They will collect there on whatever is offered to the Americans in Iraq, and the retreating administration already has far fewer means to prevent this.

Mr. Baker and his fellow realists, custodians of stalemate in their own way, want the U.S. to return to its previous approach to the region, where interests defined behavior more than values -- particularly democracy. But if engagement with Syria, or even Iran, is on the cards, then the U.S. might have to surrender the one genuine triumph it can point to after Mr. Bush formulated a democratic project for the Middle East: the peaceful, popular overthrow by the Lebanese of Syria's debilitating domination. The U.S. might also find itself having to relinquish that all-too-rare happening in the region: a vigorous international legal process that promises to punish a state-sponsored crime. Yielding on Lebanon will not advance American interests; it will only damage them more, turning the severe setbacks in Iraq into a full-scale regional rout.

DOJ_NMG_0096986

Wherever one stands in the spectrum of U.S. foreign-policy thinking, the Hariri tribunal is a mechanism that should satisfy all. Democracy defenders see in it an institutional means of buttressing Lebanon's independence from Syria -- presuming that U.N. investigators demonstrate Syrian involvement in Hariri's elimination. Realists will gain a splendid stick with which to force Syrian compliance with American priorities elsewhere in the Middle East, including Iraq. The court's mandate does not oblige presidents to put in an appearance (though there is no immunity from crime, meaning they can be sentenced in absentia), so Mr. Assad can be destabilized if his involvement is proven, but not necessarily forced from office. It would make him conveniently vulnerable to outside coercion.

That's why events in Lebanon are so important. Syria's Lebanese allies are trying to undermine the Hariri investigation from within, and are expected to escalate their efforts very soon, maybe even this week. It makes no sense for the U.S. to hand them more ammunition by prematurely transacting with Mr. Assad before the U.N. completes its task and assigns responsibility for the assassination.

Mr. Young, a Lebanese national, is opinion editor at the Daily Star newspaper in Beirut and a contributing editor at Reason magazine.

Pessimism Deepens In Postwar Lebanon (WP)

By Anthony Shadid

The Washington Post, November 21, 2006

BEIRUT -- A racket filled the air outside Mohammed Jassar's shop in a swath of Beirut devastated in this summer's war with Israel. Hammers delivered a cadence to the clamor of bulldozers, saws and drills trying to rebuild. The noise was almost as loud as the invective these days in Lebanese politics, paralyzing a country that has never quite known peace. Jassar has had enough. Three weeks, he blurted. After that, he'd decide whether to leave Lebanon.

"This is a country scared of its future," he said.

Lebanon has emerged from the 33-day war with Israel only to find itself lately in one of the most pronounced political crises it has experienced in a generation. At first glance, the issues dividing it are somewhat arcane: the legitimacy of an international tribunal to try those suspected of killing former prime minister Rafiq al-Hariri in 2005, and the representation in the cabinet for the opposition, which comprises Hezbollah, another Shiite Muslim faction and a Christian ally. But the stakes are far higher, in effect the future of the country: What groups and their patrons -- the United States, France, Syria or Iran -- will guide Lebanese politics?

There is a cinematic quality to the events, a commotion that resembles a film's opening credits: snippets of hurried conversation, incendiary news broadcasts, glimpses of politically loaded posters draped over streets, and a pessimism, deep and intransigent, that has become a national pastime.

"This is what is so tragic about it," said Fawwaz Traboulsi, a historian and professor at Lebanese American University. "We've been reduced to people who are frightened by the worst and hoping for something that might be less bad."

Lebanon is blessed and cursed by its diversity. The logic of coexistence among 18 religious sects, often with their own readings of history, dictates a tolerance and occasional cosmopolitanism that stands out in an Arab world becoming ever more atavistic and resentful. On display these days in Beirut, though, is that diversity's more menacing side.

On television, a Christian-owned station has introduced broadcasts with the ominous phrase: "Is it the silence before the storm?" Another station, loyal to Hariri's son Saad, a key figure in the governing coalition, has shed any pretense of objectivity, airing footage of this summer's war. A voiceover asks: "Who was responsible?" What does it matter? We won, answers Hezbollah's station, al-Manar.

Hezbollah's iconography still adorns the city, depicting "The Divine Victory" and "Victory from God." One poster portrays Israeli soldiers crying. "The invincible army," it mocks. Along the city's fault lines, the Hezbollah icons mix with posters hung by Hariri's followers. "We will not forget," they read over portraits of Lebanese killed since 2005 in a string of assassinations that many here blame on Syria, an ally of Hezbollah.

"Everyone is hanging up a picture," one resident quipped as he saw a poster unfurled.

Vitriol has reigned on talk shows since Hezbollah first threatened mass demonstrations last month to topple the government of Prime Minister Fouad Siniora, and everyday conversations are punctuated with talk of emigration. A new word has entered political discussions: Does Lebanon stand on the brink of "Iraqization"?

Some shop owners say customers have stocked up on milk, rice and other staples. And, if it could get any grimmer, a statement attributed to al-Qaeda announced the network's arrival in Lebanon "to work on destroying this corrupt government which takes orders from the American administration."

DOJ_NMG_0096987

"Pity Lebanon," said Ali Zein, a store owner in the city's southern suburbs, whose 5-year-old son, Mohammed, plied the sidewalk in his toy car. "People are living like there's always a crisis. If it's not war, it's protests. If it's not protests, it's war."

He shook his head when asked the last time the country felt settled.

"We're always between stability and chaos," he said.

This month's crisis erupted after two ministers from Hezbollah, three other Shiites and an allied politician resigned from Siniora's cabinet on Nov. 11. The resignations followed the breakdown of talks on granting Hezbollah and its allies greater representation, a move that would effectively give Hezbollah a veto over government decisions.

On Sunday, Hezbollah's leader, Hasan Nasrallah, said the government now faced a choice: either resign in favor of what he called a national unity government or hold early parliamentary elections. If neither demand is met, he said, his followers have planned days, even weeks, of protests to topple a government he said was beholden to the United States. Hezbollah's critics, such as Druze politician Walid Jumblatt, have described the campaign as a backdoor coup d'etat.

But memories of the 15-year civil war that ended in 1990 remain vivid, and even the politicians responsible for fueling the current crisis have warned against events spiraling out of control. Nasrallah called civil strife a red line and repeatedly insisted protests would be peaceful. Jumblatt ruled out counter-protests that might ignite clashes in the streets. "Let them assume responsibility for this," he said.

"The street in Lebanon is not a normal street, where the people go down to voice their objections or demands," Talal Salman, the editor of the Beirut daily as-Safir, who has long advocated Hezbollah's cause, wrote Monday. "Rather, it is a space for confrontation."

Still reeling from this summer's war and mired in economic troubles, Beirut shows little sign of enthusiasm for the kind of demonstrations Salman fears. But Lebanese politics are defined by a certain inertia, with perhaps six sectarian leaders, nearly all dating from the civil war, often counting on their most devoted constituents to conflate their own survival with their leaders' ambitions. An editorial cartoon in the London Arabic daily Asharq al-Awsat on Monday showed two men fighting on a paved road sweeping them toward a waterfall.

"It's not in my hands. Really, I don't know what's happening in this country," said Sami Khreis, 22, who owns a store in Beirut's Shiite Muslim southern suburbs. "Everyone has their grievance, everyone has their gang. What do I tell you?"

The sounds of reconstruction echoed off the street; it was the only work in town, he said. Hezbollah had given him two crisp $100 bills to repair his window shattered by an Israeli bombing. But he was still grim.

"Nobody knows what's going to happen. But everyone knows it will be something new. Maybe peace, but I don't think so. I think we're at the doorstep of something else." He arched his thick eyebrows. "I think so, but God willing, no."

Across town in Aisha Bakkar, a traditional Sunni neighborhood, a cheerful and charming Mohammed Saidoun held court in his Future Cafe, adorned with pictures of Hariri, his son Saad and black-and-white shots of the Beirut of 65-year-old Saidoun's childhood. He spoke low, in almost conspiratorial tones, a holdover from his days as a Tammany Hall-style enforcer for Sunni leaders in the neighborhood.

"The politicians talk, and the people get more tired," he said. "The war started 31 years ago, and it's still going on."

Saidoun retains strong ties to Saad Hariri, the most influential Sunni leader, and patron after patron entered the cafe to ask for favors. At one point, a group of young boys passed through, asking for copies of the posters that read: "We will not forget." "Give them three or four," he ordered an assistant. He lamented how so many young men were stopping by, asking whether he could help them purchase weapons.

"There's not a youth in Beirut who doesn't want a gun," he said, shaking his head. "They're scared."

He worried about protests, sure that no one would emerge victorious from a confrontation. But if Hariri's son -- "Sheik Saad" to Saidoun -- ordered his followers into the streets, the choice for him was an easy one.

"Bottom line, if Sheik Saad tells me to demonstrate, I will, along with my family, friends and everybody I know."

"Sheik Saad," he said, "is my soul."

Palestinian Unity Government Talks Stall (AP)

By Mohammed Daraghmeh, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 21, 2006

The rival Hamas and Fatah parties froze talks Monday on forming a Palestinian unity government, Fatah officials said, a new setback in efforts to form a more moderate coalition acceptable to the West.

The deep differences raised questions about the ability of the sides to reach a deal that could end months of painful economic sanctions that have bankrupted the Palestinian government and caused widespread hardship in the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

DOJ_NMG_0096988

The sudden announcement of a breakdown came after months of negotiations that appeared to be heading toward formation of a Cabinet of independent experts to replace the Hamas-led body. Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas of Fatah met late Sunday with Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of the ruling Islamic group Hamas in Gaza, and officials said the session was cordial.

But Abbas aide Nabil Amr said Monday that the talks had reached a standstill.

"We would say talks are suspended now," he told a news conference. "What we have agreed upon is only the first mile over the 1,000-mile road."

It wasn't clear whether the suspension was the sign of a real crisis or simply a negotiating tactic by Abbas' weakened Fatah Party.

Hamas officials denied any serious trouble. "Talks are continuing on the highest levels," Haniyeh said.

However, no new talks were scheduled.

The two sides earlier agreed on a U.S.-educated academic as the candidate for prime minister to replace Haniyeh, and crafted a foundation for a joint government that would leave negotiating with Israel up to Abbas, while Hamas would deal with day-to-day issues.

Hamas won parliamentary elections and took office in March. The U.S. and Europe then cut off aid to the Palestinian government, labeling Hamas a terror group for its history of suicide bombings and other attacks against Israelis.

The West insists that before it would restore aid, the Palestinian government had to recognize Israel, renounce violence and accept past peace accords. Hamas refused — its ideology does not accept the existence of a Jewish state in an Islamic Middle East.

Even if the sides reach agreement, it remains unclear whether the "division of labor" formula, with the moderate Abbas handling diplomacy while Hamas sticks to its hard line, would be acceptable to the West.

Hamas political leader Khaled Mashaal held talks overnight in Damascus, Syria, with Abbas envoy Ahmed Qureia, but the meeting focused on proposals for bringing Hamas into the PLO, a separate issue that has long been under discussion without progress.

Relations with Israel have deteriorated since Hamas took office, especially after Hamas-linked militants captured an Israeli soldier in a cross-border raid in June.

In London, Israel's Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni said Monday that Syria was the reason talks between the Palestinian factions have been troubled. Whenever Hamas has shown signs of cooperation with Abbas, Syria has sent messages saying "don't do it," she said.

"It is not even about a Syrian interest," Livni told an audience at the International Institute for Strategic Studies. "They want to dictate the Palestinian conflict.

She also said Syria was interfering with efforts to release the captured soldier. She said any time the two sides got close to a deal, "the order came from Syria saying not to release him."

Israel has been carrying out a military offensive in the Gaza Strip since the capture, while Palestinian militants continue to fire homemade rockets into southern Israel, launching at least nine rockets Monday. No injuries were reported. Last week, an Israeli woman was killed in a rocket attack.

After nightfall Monday, two Hamas militants were killed in an Israeli airstrike on a car in Gaza City, Hamas officials said. The Israeli military said it targeted a car carrying "terrorist activists." Hamas threatened revenge.

Following the airstrike, Palestinians streamed to a house in Gaza City after they said the owner, a Hamas activist, received a warning from Israel that the house was to be targeted in an attack. Such demonstrations foiled three previous Israeli attacks on houses in recent days.

Last week, Israeli forces wrapped up a deadly, destructive sweep through the northern Gaza town of Beit Hanoun in an unsuccessful attempt to stop the rocket barrages. The next day, errant Israeli shells killed 19 members of a Gaza family.

U.N. High Commissioner for Human Rights Louise Arbour began a trip to the region by visiting Beit Hanoun. "I'm basically here to express my concern and bring some comfort, I hope, by showing these victims that the world has not abandoned them," she said. The commission has voted to condemn Israel for the shelling.

She also called on Palestinians to stop firing rockets into Israel and said the perpetrators of rocket attacks should be held accountable.

Israeli Map Says West Bank Posts Sit On Arab Land (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, November 21, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0096989

JERUSALEM, Nov. 20 — An Israeli advocacy group, using maps and figures leaked from inside the government, says that 39 percent of the land held by Israeli settlements in the occupied West Bank is privately owned by Palestinians.

Israel has long asserted that it fully respects Palestinian private property in the West Bank and only takes land there legally or, for security reasons, temporarily.

If big sections of those settlements are indeed privately held Palestinian land, that is bound to create embarrassment for Israel and further complicate the already distant prospect of a negotiated peace. The data indicate that 40 percent of the land that Israel plans to keep in any future deal with the Palestinians is private.

The new claims regarding Palestinian property are said to come from the 2004 database of the Civil Administration, which controls the civilian aspects of Israel's presence in the West Bank. Peace Now, an Israeli group that advocates Palestinian self-determination in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, plans to publish the information on Tuesday. An advance copy was made available to The New York Times.

The data — maps that show the government's registry of the land by category — was given to Peace Now by someone who obtained it from an official inside the Civil Administration. The Times spoke to the person who received it from the Civil Administration official and agreed not to identify him because of the delicate nature of the material.

That person, who has frequent contact with the Civil Administration, said he and the official wanted to expose what they consider to be wide-scale violations of private Palestinian property rights by the government and settlers. The government has refused to give the material directly to Peace Now, which requested it under Israel's freedom of information law.

Shlomo Dror, a spokesman for the Civil Administration, said he could not comment on the data without studying it.

He said there was a committee, called the blue line committee, that had been investigating these issues of land ownership for three years. "We haven't finished checking everything," he said.

Mr. Dror also said that sometimes Palestinians would sell land to Israelis but be unwilling to admit to the sale publicly because they feared retribution as collaborators.

Within prominent settlements that Israel has said it plans to keep in any final border agreement, the data show, for example, that some 86.4 percent of Maale Adumim, a large Jerusalem suburb, is private; and 35.1 percent of Ariel is.

The maps indicate that beyond the private land, 5.8 percent is so-called survey land, meaning of unclear ownership, and 1.3 percent private Jewish land. The rest, about 54 percent, is considered "state land" or has no designation, though Palestinians say that at least some of it represents agricultural land expropriated by the state.

The figures, together with detailed maps of the land distribution in every Israeli settlement in the West Bank, were put together by the Settlement Watch Project of Peace Now, led by Dror Etkes and Hagit Ofran, and has a record of careful and accurate reporting on settlement growth.

The report does not include Jerusalem, which Israel has annexed and does not consider part of the West Bank, although much of the world regards East Jerusalem as occupied. Much of the world also considers Israeli settlements on occupied land to be illegal under international law. International law requires an occupying power to protect private property, and Israel has always asserted that it does not take land without legal justification.

One case in a settlement Israel intends to keep is in Givat Zeev, barely five miles north of Jerusalem. At the southern edge is the Ayelet Hashachar synagogue. Rabah Abdellatif, a Palestinian who lives in the nearby village of Al Jib, says the land belongs to him.

Papers he has filed with the Israeli military court, which runs the West Bank, seem to favor Mr. Abdellatif. In 1999, Israeli officials confirmed, he was even granted a judgment ordering the demolition of the synagogue because it had been built without permits. But for the last seven years, the Israeli system has done little to enforce its legal judgments. The synagogue stands, and Mr. Abdellatif has no access to his land.

Ram Kovarsky, the town council secretary, said the synagogue was outside the boundaries of Givat Zeev, although there is no obvious separation. Israeli officials confirm that the land is privately owned, though they refuse to say by whom.

Mr. Abdellatif, 65, said: "I feel stuck, angry. Why would they do that? I don't know who to go to anymore."

He pointed to his corduroy trousers and said, in the English he learned in Paterson, N.J., where his son is a police detective: "These are my pants. And those are your pants. And you should not take my pants. This is mine, and that is yours! I never took anyone's land."

According to the Peace Now figures, 44.3 percent of Givat Zeev is on private Palestinian land.

Miri Eisin, a spokesperson for Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, said that Israeli officials would have to see the data and the maps and added that ownership is complicated and delicate. Baruch Spiegel, a reserve general who just left the Ministry of Defense and dealt with the separation barrier being built near the boundary with the West Bank, also said he would have to see the data in detail in order to judge it.

DOJ_NMG_0096990

The definitions of private and state land are complicated, given different administrations of the West Bank going back to the Ottoman Empire, the British mandate, Jordan and now Israel. During the Ottoman Empire, only small areas of the West Bank were registered to specific owners, and often villagers would hold land in common to avoid taxes. The British began a more formal land registry based on land use, taxation or house ownership that continued through the Jordanian period.

Large areas of agricultural land are registered as state land; other areas were requisitioned or seized by the Israeli military after 1967 for security purposes, but such requisitions are meant to be temporary and must be renewed, and do not change the legal ownership of the land, Mr. Dror, the Civil Administration spokesman, said.

But the issue of property is one that Israeli officials are familiar with, even if the percentages here may come as a surprise and may be challenged after the publication of the report.

Asked about Israeli seizure of private Palestinian land in an interview with The Times last summer, before these figures were available, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said: "Now I don't deny anything, I don't ignore anything. I'm just ready to sit down and talk. And resolve it. And resolve it in a generous manner for all sides."

He said the 1967 war was a one of self-defense. Later, he said: "Many things happened. Life is not frozen. Things occur. So many things happened, and as a result of this many innocent individuals on both sides suffered, were killed, lost their lives, became crippled for life, lost their family members, their loved ones, thousands of them. And also private property suffered. By the way, on all sides."

Mr. Olmert says Israel will keep some 10 percent of the occupied West Bank, including East Jerusalem, possibly in a swap for land elsewhere. The area Israel intends to keep is roughly marked by the route of the unfinished separation barrier, which cuts through the West Bank and is intended, Israel says, to stop suicide bombers. Mr. Olmert, however, describes it as a putative border. Nearly 80,000 Jews live in settlements beyond the route of the barrier, but some 180,000 live in settlements within the barrier, while another 200,000 live in East Jerusalem.

But these land-ownership figures show that even in the settlements that Israel intends to keep, there will be a considerable problem of restitution that goes beyond the issue of refugee return.

Mr. Olmert was elected on a pledge to withdraw Israeli settlers living east of the barrier. But after the war with Hezbollah and with fighting ongoing in Gaza, from which Israel withdrew its settlers in the summer of 2005, his withdrawal plan has been suspended.

In March 2005, a report requested by the government found a number of illegal Israeli outposts built on private Palestinian land, and officials promised to destroy them. But only nine houses of only one outpost, Amona, were dismantled after a court case brought by Peace Now.

There is a court case pending over Migron, which began as a group of trailers on a windy hilltop around a set of cellphone antennas in May 1999 and is now a flourishing community of 50 families, said Avi Teksler, an official of the Migron council. But Migron, too, according to the data, is built on private Palestinian land.

Mr. Teksler said that the land was deserted, and that its ownership would be settled in court. Migron, where some children of noted settlement leaders live, has had "the support of every Israeli government," he said. "The government has been a partner to every single move we've made."

Mr. Teksler added: "This is how the state of Israel was created. And this is all the land of Israel. We're like the kibbutzim. The only real difference is that we're after 1967, not before."

But in the Palestinian village of Burqa, Youssef Moussa Abdel Raziq Nabboud, 85, says that some of the land of Migron, and the land on which Israel built a road for settlers, belongs to him and his family, who once grew wheat and beans there. He said he had tax documents from the pre-1967 authorities.

"They have the power to put the settlement there and we can do nothing," he said. "They have a fence around the settlement and dogs there."

Mr. Nabboud went to the Israeli authorities with the mayor, Abu Maher, but they were told he needed an Israeli lawyer and surveyor. "I have no money for that," he said. What began as an outpost taking 5 acres has now taken 125, the mayor said.

Mr. Nabboud wears a traditional head covering; his grandson, Khaled, 27, wears a Yankees cap. "The land is my inheritance," he said. "I feel sad I can't go there. And angry. The army protects them."

Bomb Kills 8, Injures 60 On India Train (AP)

By Manik Banerjee, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 21, 2006

A bomb exploded and tore through two cars of a passenger train Monday in a remote area of eastern India, killing at least eight people and wounding about 60 others, officials and Indian media said.

DOJ_NMG_0096991

Suspicion for the blast in West Bengal state quickly fell on two groups: communist rebels active in wide swaths of rural India or militants fighting for an independent homeland in the neighboring state of Assam.

A spokesman for Northeastern Railways, T. Rabha, told The Associated Press that the bomb had been planted in one of train's cars and exploded about 6:20 p.m. near the Belacoba station, about 345 miles north of Calcutta.

The blast was so powerful it blew away the side and roof of one of the cars, the Press Trust of India reported.

At least six passengers died at the scene and 53 others were wounded, Rabha said, adding that the death toll could rise because some of those injured were in serious condition. PTI, citing railway police official Tushar Bhattacharya, later reported that the death toll had climbed to eight with about 60 wounded.

Witnesses said there was a flash followed by a deafening explosion. There were two small explosions immediately afterward, PTI reported.

"Some of the passengers jumped out of the coach in panic, while many received burns," PTI quoted witnesses as saying.

Prasad Ranjan Roy, Home Secretary of West Bengal state, said initial suspicion pointed to either Maoist rebels or Assamese militants. He suggested the blast could be the work of the relatively small Kamtapur Liberation Organization, an Assamese group tied to the larger United Liberation Front of Asom.

But, he cautioned: "We are trying to get details."

Although the Maoists are active in the area, they rarely attack civilians.

The Assamese separatists, in contrast, do target civilians and have intensified their attacks since the federal government ended a temporary six-week cease-fire on Sept. 24 amid deadlocked peace talks.

The insurgents have been fighting since 1979 for Assam's independence, saying India's central government — 1,000 miles to the west — exploits the northeast's rich natural resources while doing little to improve its poor infrastructure or to alleviate widespread unemployment.

They have been known to plant bombs in cities and towns, attack police and military posts, and blow up oil pipelines. At least 10,000 people, most of them civilians, have died in Assam since the insurgency began.

Apart from the rebellions in Assam, dozens of other insurgencies have festered for years across India's six other northeastern states. Nearly all are fighting for autonomy or independent homelands for the region's indigenous peoples, most of them ethnically closer to Burma and China than to the rest of India.

Mumbai's train network was targeted July 11 when seven bombs exploded on crowded commuter trains, killing more than 200 people. Thirteen men have been arrested in the bombings. Police suspect the bombs were planted in overhead luggage racks inside the coaches.

Associated Press Writer Wasbir Hussain in Gauhati contributed to this report.

U.S. Sets Jan. 1 Deadline For Sudan To Act On Darfur (WP)

By Glenn Kessler And Nora Boustany

The Washington Post, November 21, 2006

Andrew Natsios, the U.S. special envoy to Sudan, said yesterday that the Bush administration will resort to an unspecified "Plan B" if the Sudanese government does not agree by Jan. 1 to complete negotiations on an expanded international peacekeeping force for its troubled Darfur region.

Khartoum has adamantly rejected a U.N. Security Council resolution calling for a U.N.-led force, so the Bush administration and the United Nations have backtracked and instead sought to win the government's agreement for a hybrid force of African Union and U.N. troops. U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan announced last week that Sudan had agreed in principle to such a joint force but that numerous issues must be resolved before Khartoum gives final approval.

The Sudanese government claimed yesterday that the tentative agreement was a "diplomatic victory," but the official news agency, SUNA, minimized the role of the United Nations, saying only that the world body would provide "assistance." The agency said the government objects to the overall size of the force and has questions about the appointment of the force commander.

The AU currently has 7,000 ill-equipped troops in Darfur, an area the size of France, and the U.N. resolution passed in August calls for as many as 22,500 military and police personnel. The agreement announced by Annan would allow for as many as 17,000 troops and 3,000 police.

Natsios, speaking to reporters, declined several times to explain what he meant by "Plan B," saying he was not trying to make a threat. "On January 1st, either we see a change or we go to Plan B," Natsios said, explaining that on that day the AU's mandate will expire and Annan will step down as secretary general. He also noted that Congress will shift from Republican to Democratic control in January.

DOJ_NMG_0096992

The United States has repeatedly dangled incentives to Sudan if it helps end the violence in Darfur. "Plan B is a different approach to this," Natsios said, adding that it is "open-ended."

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice warned in September that Khartoum faces "a choice between cooperation and confrontation." U.S. officials have said that, besides new sanctions, the United States could take action against top Sudanese officials who have been implicated in what the United States has labeled acts of genocide in Darfur or could establish a "no-fly zone" to thwart Sudanese military attacks against the civilian population.

The Darfur conflict broke out in early 2003, when African rebel groups attacked police stations and military outposts. The United Nations and human rights groups accuse the central government of supporting a militia known as the Janjaweed in an effort to crush the rebellion. About 2,000 villages have been destroyed across Darfur, as many as 450,000 people have died, and more than 2 million people have been left homeless since the crisis began.

Natsios rejected Khartoum's claims that a U.N.-led international force would mean a return to colonialism. "We have a humanitarian and human rights agenda in Darfur, and that's it," he said. "We want this resolved because the human cost of this has been so horrific."

Earlier, at a meeting at the Brookings Institution, Natsios was confronted by an official from the Sudanese Embassy who said that Sudan has "every single right to be suspicious about these things because of broken promises of the U.S. government and the international community over there."

Natsios responded: "We have suspicions, too. We suspect there are people in the regime who believe a military solution is necessary." He noted that three times in the past three weeks, unarmed civilians have been brutally attacked, and he cited one incident that left 200 dead, mostly women and children.

"If a pattern develops, then a more confrontational approach will take place," Natsios said. "The United States will not accept any of this other process if it is simply a disguised attempt to avoid dealing with the reality of what is happening to people on the ground."

Many analysts believe that Khartoum has become emboldened to resist international pressure because of its increasing oil wealth. China, which holds veto power on the U.N. Security Council, is a major investor in Sudan's petroleum industry.

But during the Brookings meeting, both Natsios and Jean-Marie Guahenno, U.N. undersecretary general for peacekeeping, said the Chinese representatives at the talks last week, held in the Ethiopian capital, Addis Ababa, had signaled that their country was taking a more constructive approach.

Guahenno cautioned that the stability from the Horn of Africa to the Sahel band to the west to Niger is at risk if the Darfur crisis begins to spill across borders.

"There is a lot at stake," he said. "There is the local-national dimension of nomads versus agriculturalists, of Arabs versus Africans. When all these tensions become part of the narrative, it will be very dangerous."

U.S. Threatens 'Plan B' If Sudan Ignores Deadline (AFP)

AFP, November 21, 2006

The US envoy to Sudan warned Khartoum to meet a January 1 deadline for full acceptance of a UN plan to deploy international peacekeepers to Darfur or face tougher action to end atrocities in the war-torn region.

"There's a point, January 1st, either we see a change or go to Plan B," Andrew Natsios, President George W. Bush's special envoy to Sudan, told reporters.

Natsios, who helped negotiate a tentative agreement last week for sending a joint African Union-United Nations force to Darfur, said the Khartoum government had yet to give its approval for the timing, size and command structure of the peacekeeping operation.

He refused to elaborate on what Plan B would entail if no response was forthcoming by January 1 beyond saying it's "a different approach" to the negotiated deployment of peacekeepers.

"I think making threats is not a wise thing to do," he said when pressed to provide details. "I'm not going to go into that."

Human rights groups and former US officials have called for unilateral military action, possibly by NATO forces, if Sudan continues to refuse the deployment of a robust peacekeeping force to Darfur, where more than 200,000 people have died in three-and-a-half years of ethnic civil war.

Other options for action include sanctions targeting companies owned by ruling party officials, financial action against foreign firms operating in Sudan and efforts to prosecute government leaders for crimes against humanity.

Natsios said the January 1 deadline was non-negotiable since that is when the mandate expires for an African Union force which has been unsuccessfully trying to end the fighting in Darfur.

"There is no other force after that from anywhere," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0096993

UN Secretary General Kofi Annan, the architect of the latest peacekeeping deal, also steps down on January 1 and is committed to enacting the arrangement before leaving office, he said.

"If we want to get this resolved, then January 1st needs to be the deadline," he said.

The UN Security Council passed a resolution in August demanding the deployment of some 20,000 UN troops to take over from the under-funded and ill-equipped African Union force in Darfur.

But President Omar al-Beshir, whose government is accused of backing Arab militia responsible for most of the atrocities in Darfur, refused to accept the UN deployment.

Amid a new wave of massacres in the region, Annan brokered an agreement in principle with Sudan last week to deploy a hybrid force that would primarily involve African soldiers but with UN logistical support and a joint command.

But Sudanese officials have since sent mixed messages about whether they fully accepted the deal.

Natsios said Washington had sent a clear signal to Sudan's leaders that further attacks on civilians in the region would not be tolerated.

"There is an issue we're not negotiating, and that is the atrocity issue -- human rights abuses are not negotiable," he said.

Even if Khartoum agrees to the revised UN package, it will take months to deploy thousands of peacekeepers to the remote region, he said.

The war in Darfur erupted in February 2003 when rebels from minority tribes took up arms to demand an equal share of national resources, prompting a heavy-handed crackdown from government forces and a proxy militia called the Janjaweed.

According to the UN, more than 200,000 people have died and 2.5 million more have been displaced in three years of fighting.

Sudan Hails New Peacekeeping Agreement (AP)

By Alfred De Montesquiou, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 21, 2006

President Omar al-Bashir's government on Monday hailed a new agreement with the United Nations over peacekeepers in Darfur as a diplomatic breakthrough for Sudan, but said serious differences remain over the force's makeup and command.

It was the first official word by Khartoum of its acceptance of the deal, announced Thursday in Addis Ababa. But there were signs the government might still resist hopes for a robust U.N. deployment to bring an end to the continuing bloodshed.

U.N. chief Kofi Annan said the deal calls for a mixed U.N.-African Union force of up to 20,000 troops. If so, that would mean a dramatic reversal of Khartoum's staunch resistance to deploying any U.N. troops in Darfur

But the Sudanese cabinet statement on Monday spoke only of U.N. "assistance" to the African force and depicted the agreement as a defeat for a Security Council resolution that called for a peacekeeping force fully under U.N. control.

The cabinet, which gathered Sunday, "backed the outcome of the (Sudanese) government meetings ... concerning the provision of a package of assistance from the U.N. to the African Union," the official SUNA news agency said.

SUNA said al-Bashir and his government "showed happiness over what it sees as a diplomatic victory" over advocates of the Security Council resolution on Darfur.

The agency said the president and his ministers still differ with the U.N. on whether the force commander should be from the African Union, or simply from the African continent. The cabinet also has objections to the overall size of the force, SUNA said.

But the government decided these issues are "a technical matter that could be resolved, and not a political one," the news agency said.

The comments could signal that Sudan will try to reduce the U.N. role in the peacekeeping force. But they could also be part of an effort by the government to save face, after abandoning its earlier position that U.N. troops were unacceptable.

Al-Bashir is scheduled to visit Libya Tuesday for a meeting on Darfur hosted by Libyan leader Moammar Gadhafi. Delegations are expected from Sudan, Chad and Egypt.

Gadhafi on Sunday denounced any deployment of U.N. troops in Sudan as "colonialism," and said the Sudanese army could do a better job than peacekeepers at stopping the violence in Darfur.

"The presence of international forces in Darfur would be a new return to colonialism," he said. "... Since when were the colonialist powers concerned about us? In the past, they treated us like animals and took us as slaves in their ships."

The African Union force of 7,000 currently in the Darfur region has not been able to stop the bloodshed. More than 200,000 people have been killed and 2.5 million driven from their homes in years of fighting.

When the deal was announced last week, the U.N. and AU said that all parties, including Sudan, had agreed in principle on a mixed force.

DOJ_NMG_0096994

Under the agreement, the joint U.N.-AU statement said, troops for the force would be drawn from African countries to the extent that was possible. But, the statement added, "backstopping and command and control structures will be provided by the UN."

Sudanese Foreign Minister Lam Akol later insisted Khartoum had never agreed to a "mixed force" but instead to one in which AU soldiers and command would merely receive support from the U.N.

Samani al-Wasila, a Sudanese state minister for foreign affairs, repeated Monday in Cairo that the agreement "does not give the right to the international troops to intervene in the region."

Sudanese hard-liners have fiercely opposed any U.N. presence in Darfur, and at one point al-Bashir said he would personally lead armed resistance to U.N. peacekeepers.

This stance appeared to soften in recent days.

In the official army newspaper Al-Quwat Al-Musalaha, Ibrahim Ahmed Omar, the spokesman for al-Bashir's National Congress Party, suggested indirectly that the party had accepted that the U.N. will at least partly direct the peacekeeping force in Darfur.

"We will not accept that the U.N. have the full command of the African Union force in Darfur," he was quoted as saying.

But some U.N. officials worry Khartoum was only buying time to let its army and militia conduct mount more attacks in the region.

Another official, U.N. humanitarian chief Jan Egeland said Sunday that army support for the janjaweed milita has only increased and that the forces are still killing civilians daily. The Sudanese government denied the claim.

Associated Press Writer Mohamed Osman in Khartoum and Salah Nasrawi in Cairo contributed to this report.

Boy's Wish: Kill Them All (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof

The New York Times, November 21, 2006

GOZ BEIDA, Chad

"If I had a gun," Ismail Hassan said venomously from his hospital bed, "I would shoot Arabs."

"Surely not women and children?" I remonstrated.

"Every one of them," Ismail snarled.

Ismail is a 15-year-old boy, and that conversation underscores how Chad is falling off a cliff, with escalating hatreds, violence and insecurity. He is a member of one of the black African tribes now being hunted down by the Sudanese-sponsored janjaweed Arab militia, at first in Darfur alone and now in Chad as well.

After the janjaweed attacked his village and shot his father, Ismail raced forward to cover his father's body with his own. That courage didn't move the janjaweed, who simply shot Ismail as well.

The genocide that started in Darfur in 2003 is now threatening to topple the governments of Chad and the Central African Republic. If these two countries collapse into chaos and civil war for years to come, then neighboring countries like Cameroon and Niger will be threatened as well — and the death toll triggered by the Darfur genocide will eventually number in the millions.

None of this was — or is — inevitable. In late 2003 and early 2004, some Republican appointees in the Bush administration (particularly in the Agency for International Development) were among the first to push for a government response to the slaughter in Darfur, but the White House wasn't interested.

Then in 2004, Colin Powell boldly used the "genocide" label to describe Darfur, over initial Pentagon and White House objections, and several of his aides drafted a set of policy options to confront the genocide. Those included pushing the French to use fighter aircraft from their base in Chad to intimidate the janjaweed, pushing Egypt to be more involved, recruiting peacekeeping troops from Pakistan and Bangladesh, and generally using American diplomatic muscle to push harder for a solution.

None of those things happened, partly because of reluctance from the White House and Pentagon, and partly because of resistance from France and other countries. So the genocide in Darfur has steadily expanded.

Arabs here in Chad repeatedly complain now that the black Africans steal their cattle, poison their wells, occupy their land, and shoot at them. I don't see much basis to those charges, for the Arabs have assault rifles and rocket-propelled grenades (supplied by the Sudanese), while the black Africans have bows and arrows, but this narrative is widely held among Arabs.

"We consider them our enemies and they consider us their enemies," said Brahim Wadia, the patriarch of a group of Arabs who were grazing their cattle on what had been a black African farm. "So each side will shoot the other and kill the other."

Mr. Brahim and most members of his entourage were light-skinned, and they were civil to me (considering it white solidarity?). But that same morning nearby, several black Africans who tried to recover food from their burned and abandoned village were shot dead.

DOJ_NMG_0096995

One person in Mr. Brahim's party was a boy of about 13 with black skin who looked unlike the others. He appeared physically unable to speak, and it wasn't clear if he had been hired as a herdsman or captured in a raid and enslaved.

The most common question I get from readers about Darfur is: What can I do? The simplest answer is to write or call the White House and members of Congress. (See how your representative does on the issue at www.darfurscores.org). Imagine if Mr. Bush had made Darfur an important issue at the Asian summit meeting last week, if he had returned via Cairo for a meeting with Arab leaders, if he had dispatched Condi Rice to Chad to shore it up.

Beyond pushing our own government, we can write the embassies of countries like France and Egypt that could play especially crucial roles. The same is true of China, which provides Sudan the guns used to shoot children like Ismail. We in the news business, including Arab and European television networks, could use a few pokes to appreciate that genocide is newsworthy.

The heroic efforts of aid groups in Darfur and Chad — 13 aid workers have been killed in Darfur since May — deserve support as well. (I list some groups active in Darfur in my blog, nytimes.com/ontheground.) The aid workers risk their lives daily to try to save people, putting up with janjaweed, scorpions, camel spiders and pit toilets inhabited by bats. They can use our backup.

Loose-cannon Kadafi (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, November 21, 2006

LIBYAN DICTATOR Moammar Kadafi might have given up his quest for weapons of mass destruction, but the fallout from his mouth can still threaten millions.

Kadafi on Sunday dropped a bomb on the extraordinarily sensitive negotiations to resolve the humanitarian crisis in Sudan's Darfur region, urging his fellow tyrants in Khartoum to reject a deal to send United Nations troops to the troubled area. "Western countries and America are not busying themselves out of sympathy for the Sudanese people or for Africa but for oil and the return of colonialism to the African continent," he bellowed.

Not only is this absurd — the U.N. already has 10,000 peacekeepers in southern Sudan sent in 2005 to stabilize a separate conflict there, and to date they haven't seized any Sudanese oilfields or founded any colonies — it's reckless. The Sudanese government's fears of ulterior motives by the international community have for years prompted it to block efforts to send U.N. troops to Darfur, where government-armed militias have slaughtered hundreds of thousands and displaced millions more. Though the cabal in Khartoum is probably more worried about international prosecution for war crimes than about colonialism, such views have provided it with political cover and support throughout the Arab world. And Kadafi enjoys considerable clout in Africa because of his oil wealth and status as a conflict mediator.

A deal to finally end the atrocities in Darfur is teetering on a knife's edge. Last week, Khartoum and international negotiators seemed to have accepted a compromise agreement under which a hybrid U.N. and African Union force of about 20,000 would replace the 7,000 African Union troops now in Darfur. Yet since then, the Sudanese government has sent mixed signals about whether it would really acquiesce.

There is reason to fear that Sudan is only stalling for time. In recent weeks it has restricted aid organizations and journalists from traveling in Darfur while launching a new military offensive that has killed hundreds of civilians there. Meanwhile, the mandate for the existing African Union force expires Dec. 31; if no deal to augment and replace it has been reached by then, the killings will doubtless intensify.

Before an international force can be mobilized, there are still delicate political decisions to be made, such as whether it would be empowered to protect villagers or simply monitor the carnage. To resolve them will require an unusual degree of unity among players as diverse as the Arab League and the U.N. Security Council. That's tough enough to achieve without a loose cannon like Kadafi flapping his gums.

Why Only Darfur? (WP)

By Anne Applebaum

The Washington Post, November 21, 2006

There was a photograph: a weeping Sudanese woman, standing before a freshly dug grave. There were statistics: 400,000 people dead, 2.5 million driven from their homes, "untold thousands" raped. There was an appeal: "Innocent civilians are being slaughtered in Darfur. You can end it," and a Web address, http://www.dayfordarfur.org.

This advertisement -- which appeared on a full page of the International Herald Tribune last week, and previously in Le Monde, the Guardian, and many other newspapers in Europe and the United States -- was truly arresting. But what really made me look twice was the slogan across the top: "When all the bodies have been buried in Darfur, how will history judge us?"

DOJ_NMG_0096996

"How will history judge us?" Like much of the grass-roots campaign that has sprung up to oppose the genocide in Darfur, this slogan is intended to evoke the genocides of the recent past. Earlier this fall 120 survivors of the horrors of the Holocaust, Cambodia, Rwanda and Bosnia signed an open letter calling for a U.N. peacekeeping force in Sudan. The stunning variety of organizations that have joined the Darfur campaign -- they range from Amnesty International to the World Evangelical Alliance to the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum-- also speaks to the evocative nature of the Sudanese conflict.

And their call upon the witness of history has made an impact. Indeed, it is fair to say that were it not for the Christian, Jewish, human rights, genocide-prevention groups and others that have been talking about Sudan with such dedication, the massacres of Darfur might not be on the international agenda at all. The ads and the rallies got "people in the street talking about something that happens far away," as an activist at Global Day for Darfur told me. Public interest has forced politicians to act.

The result: The United Nations is trying to form a multilateral peacekeeping brigade in Darfur, and the White House and Tony Blair are involved, too. And yet -- it is not simple to explain why this particular grass-roots action has been so successful. After all, Darfur is not the only place in the world where there has been mass murder, even ethnic mass murder, on a large, historically familiar scale. The North Korean regime has for years run concentration camps, directly modeled on the camps of Joseph Stalin's Soviet Union. But though there is excellent documentation of Pyongyang's camps -- the U.S. Committee for Human Rights in North Korea even has satellite photographs on its Web site -- and though some religious and university groups have made an effort, the level of interest, and therefore perhaps of U.N. involvement, is much lower.

The same is true of arbitrary arrests in Iran, some of which have also targeted particular ethnic groups for intimidation or elimination. For that matter, Saddam Hussein's use of chemical weapons to murder tens of thousands of Kurds never caught the popular imagination, not before the war and not afterward.

I can offer no scientific explanation as to why the tragedy of Darfur conjures up the specter of history's judgment and why other tragedies do not. But the answer must lie in the fact that this conflict has so few strategic or geopolitical implications. Because it seems to be in no one's "interest" to do so, a call for U.N. intervention in Darfur surely feels -- at least to Americans and Europeans who haven't followed China's involvement in Sudan's oil industry -- like an act of real charity, and not more evidence of the West pursuing its interests.

Equally important is the fact that Sudan plays no real role in Western domestic politics. Any discussion of North Korea will still evoke the Cold War, any conversation about Iran must touch on radical Islam. By contrast, when most of us look at Sudan, all we see is what Jan Egeland, the U.N. humanitarian coordinator, last weekend called"acts of inexplicable terror."

Taking a stand against genocide in Sudan does not require anyone to take a parallel stand on communism, the war on terrorism or the war in Iraq. It does not imply that you are left-wing, right-wing, pro- or anti-Bush. Once the United Nations is there, this may change: The U.S. intervention in Somalia immediately politicized what had also appeared to be an apolitical conflict. But at the moment, it is still possible to think of Darfur as an appropriate target for neutral humanitarianism.

None of this, I should emphasize, is meant to disparage the work of the extraordinary Darfur coalition, which has pushed an obscure and terrible war into the international spotlight. Nor do I mean to deny that "history will judge us," for surely it will. But when future generations look back on this era, they will judge us not only for how we responded to the most primitive and the most apolitical of horrors. They will also judge us by the consistency with which Western and international institutions battled sophisticated totalitarianism in all its forms: That is, they will judge us by the United Nations' application of its own declarations on human rights, by America's ability to live up to the rhetoric of its leaders, by Europe's willingness to stand behind its stated values.

The creation of an international coalition to end genocide is a stunning achievement, but its goals are still not deep or broad enough.

Muslim Birthrate Worries Russia (WT)

By Michael Mainville

The Washington Times, November 21, 2006

MOSCOW -- Low domestic birthrates and rising immigration from the former Soviet republics are producing explosive growth in Russia's Muslim community, which is on a track to account for more than half the population by midcentury.

"Russia is going through a religious transformation that will be of even greater consequence for the international community than the collapse of the Soviet Union," said Paul Goble, a specialist on Islam in Russia and research associate at the University of Tartu in Estonia.

Two decades ago, the Sobornaya Mosque was the only Islamic house of worship allowed in the Soviet Union. It stood largely empty, filling only with the occasional large foreign delegation from an Islamic country.

Today, it is one of four mosques in Moscow serving a Muslim population of about 2.5 million. On Fridays and holy days, it overflows with worshippers, leaving many to kneel on newspapers outside, their foreheads pressed against the concrete.

DOJ_NMG_0096997

As in many countries with growing Islamic populations, tensions are also on the rise. Many ethnic Russians fear their country is losing its traditional identity, while many Muslims are offended by widespread discrimination and a lack of respect for their faith.

Russia's Muslim community is extremely diverse, including Volga Tatars, the myriad ethnicities of the North Caucasus and newly arrived immigrants from Central Asia. But they all share birthrates that are far higher than Russia's ethnic Slavs, most of whom are Orthodox Christians.

Russia's overall population is dropping at a rate of 700,000 people a year, largely because of the short life spans and low birthrates of ethnic Russians. According to the CIA World Factbook, the national fertility rate is 1.28 children per woman, far below what is needed to maintain the country's population of nearly 143 million. The rate in Moscow is even lower, at 1.1 children per woman.

Russia's Muslims, however, are bucking that trend. The fertility rate for Tatars living in Moscow is six children per woman, Mr. Goble said, while the Chechen and Ingush communities are averaging 10 children per woman. At the same time, hundreds of thousands of Muslims from Tajikistan, Uzbekistan and Kazakhstan have been flocking to Russia in search of work.

Russia's Muslim population has increased by 40 percent since 1989, to about 25 million. By 2015, Muslims will make up a majority of Russia's conscript army and by 2020 one-fifth of the population.

"If nothing changes, in 30 years, people of Muslim descent will definitely outnumber ethnic Russians," Mr. Goble said.

For many Slavic Russians, the prospect of becoming a minority in their country is terrifying.

"Russia is historically a Slavic, Orthodox Christian land, and we need to make sure it stays that way," said Alexander Belov, the head of the Movement Against Illegal Immigration, an increasingly powerful lobby that has organized dozens of rallies in recent months.

Attacks on mosques have been on the rise, and in September an imam in the southern city of Kislovodsk was fatally shot outside his home. During days of rioting in August, mobs chased Chechens and other migrants out of the northwestern town of Kondopoga.

Sensing the nationalist mood, Russian authorities have begun to crack down with laws designed to defend Orthodox Christianity and restrict the activities and movement of Muslims.

Most Muslims living in Russia are not immigrants, but natives of lands seized by the expanding Russian empire. Islam is recognized as one of Russia's official religions, along with Orthodox Christianity, Judaism and Buddhism.

But few nationalists distinguish between immigrants from ex-Soviet countries and non-Slavic Russian citizens. Mr. Belov, for example, said non-Slavs should be restricted from living in "traditional Russian lands."

"The Muslims of Russia have roots here. We have been part of Russia for centuries," countered Rusham Abbyasov, a spokesman for Russia's Council of Muftis, which represents Islamic spiritual leaders in the country. "It is not right to say that Russia is a Christian country. These people either don't know the history, or they are ignoring it."

Mr. Goble said that after decades of Soviet religious repression, most Muslims in Russia are secular. But with interest in Islam surging, they are open to being influenced by extremist ideas, "especially if they feel excluded from Russian society."

Western governments should encourage Russia to integrate Muslims into society and avoid discrimination, he said. "When Muslims are in the majority in Russia, they'll remember whether we spoke out for their rights or failed to."

A Bid To Bring The Female Voice To Islamic Law (CSM)

By Ben Arnoldy

The Christian Science Monitor, November 21, 2006

NEW YORK

For centuries, devout Muslims have looked to the fatwa - an opinion based on religious reasoning of a learned individual or committee - for direction on how to resolve moral dilemmas ranging from the mundane to the sublime. And for centuries, Muslim women have conceded the ground, for the most part, to the men who issue these opinions.

That's beginning to change.

Meeting in New York over the weekend, Muslim women from 25 countries began laying groundwork for the first international all-female council formed to issue fatwas. Their idea: to ensure that women's perspectives on Islamic law become part of religious deliberation in the Muslim world - particularly on issues such as domestic violence, divorce, and inheritance.

"There's this growing sense on the part of literate Muslim women ... that there is a vital need for women to confront the Islamic tradition and to work on a par with men in interpreting the sources," says Ann Mayer, an expert in Middle Eastern law at the University of Pennsylvania's Wharton School of Business. "Otherwise you end up with a very sexist bias in the readings."

The number of women officially sanctioned to issue fatwas is hard to pin down, but certainly tiny. The emergence of such women, known as muftias, usually makes headlines: A religious school in India installed three in 2003, and the Turkish government last year hired two assistant muftias, its first. Governments and schools try to license who can issue fatwas, but Islam stipulates only certain prerequisites, such as knowledge of the Koran and Arabic. As a result, the ranks of unofficial authorities are deeper and the barriers to women surmountable.

DOJ_NMG_0096998

Whether the opinions of a women's council will carry any weight, especially in conservative cultures, is another matter.

Its advent is proving to be controversial even among Muslim women who share many goals of those launching the council.

"Advancing the idea of reinterpreting the texts has to be done, but I am totally against this initiative because it will have negative effects," says Rebab al-Mahdi, a political scientist at the American University in Cairo. It will be portrayed as part of "a Western cultural invasion," she adds. "This is what conservative clerics always say, and people listen."

For others, doubt is mingled with hope.

"I share some cynicism, but at the same moment, symbols are sometimes important," says Pakistani-born Asma Barlas, a politics professor at Ithaca College in New York and a prominent advocate of jettisoning what she calls male-centric and incorrect interpretations of the Koran. "These little steps, ... even if they don't change anything, do send a message that women are getting together and trying to make their voices heard."

The group is also up against the inertia of tradition. Throughout history, few Muslim women were prominent jurists, though scholars are uncovering more, including, some say, Aisha, the prophet Muhammad's wife. Some question whether much within the religion is open to new interpretation and, by extension, reform. Others note that fatwas are nonbinding and may have little effect on civil law and state judgments.

Still, Muslim women have recently brought change by citing the Koran and other Islamic sources:

· In Malaysia, a group called Sisters in Islam used Koranic scholarship to rebuff efforts to exclude Muslims from a domestic-abuse law.

· In Saudi Arabia, an effort this summer to push women further back at a crowded holy site in Mecca was thwarted with the help of a female Islamic scholar's arguments.

· In the United States, the forthcoming English translation of the Koran by a woman, the first ever, finds an alternate meaning in a verse widely interpreted to give husbands authority to beat their wives as a last resort.

The New York gathering, called the Women's Islamic Initiative in Spirituality and Equity, plans to seat the new council - perhaps seven members - within a year. Drawn from diverse schools within Islam, the members will be versed in Islamic law. The group also plans to give scholarships for more women to pursue advanced training - open to women in places like Morocco, Egypt, and Iran - in an effort to broaden the qualified pool.

"Islam is a religion of law, and it is important to express the principles of social justice within the framework of Islamic law," says Daisy Khan, executive director of the American Society for Muslim Advancement and leader of the effort. "This is why we need muftias, in order to do that. Otherwise, it falls on deaf ears."

Traditionally, religious legal authority was local, vested in muftis and other leaders who attained their status via government appointment or community esteem. But today's global communications are challenging that, as more Muslims seek religious opinions far and wide through the Internet. The women's council takes advantage of this: Its members will be in different places, taking questions and conferring over the Web.

Given this wider marketplace of ideas, the new council's credibility will be determined by the quality of its legal reasoning, and whether its logic strikes a chord, say several scholars and observers.

"There is a sense among many Muslims - particularly, but not exclusively, women - that Islamic jurists are out of touch, that their guidance is not adequate to the modern world. And if this shura council succeeds in bridging that gap, it may be speaking to an audience that doesn't currently consider itself bound by the pronouncements of existing groups," says Kecia Ali, assistant professor of religion at Boston University.

"But this is going to be a tremendously challenging task because religious authority, even scholarly authority, has always been contested," she adds. "It is in matters related to women, marriage, sexuality that Muslim intellectuals on both conservative and modernist sides of the spectrum have chosen to wage their epic battle."

For others, the council has a credibility problem right out of the gate. "It should not have happened in New York, because it will set back the agenda of women given the current political upheaval [over the Iraq war]," says Mohammad Reda, a Syrian-American Muslim in the Boston area often sought out for his religious opinions. He supports the idea that "women should stand up and give their own opinions on women's issues," but says American efforts to force change in the Muslim world, as in Iraq, mean reformers now must avoid links to the US. The New York conference used money from nongovernmental foundations, some based in the US.

Conference attendees say a muftia council could prompt wider support for women's struggles. "The women who we're trying to help, for them religion is very important," says Zainah Anwar, head of the Malaysian group Sisters in Islam. "It's empowering for them to know that their desire to not be beaten by their husband can actually be justified in the name of Islam."

DOJ_NMG_0096999

Unelected Mexican Leftist Claims Office (AP)

By Mark Stevenson

AP, November 21, 2006

Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador launched a parallel government Monday and prepared to swear himself in as Mexico's "legitimate" president, a ceremony the leftist hopes will keep alive protests to undermine the man who officials say defeated him at the polls.

The inauguration ceremony is the latest chapter in Lopez Obrador's unsuccessful battle for the presidency. He claims fraud and dirty campaign tactics were responsible for President-elect Felipe Calderon's narrow victory in the July 2 vote, and his parallel government could spend the next six years calling for street protests that have already dented the economy and prompted travel warnings from the U.S. Embassy.

While the red-green-and-white presidential sash to be draped across Lopez Obrador's shoulders Monday will lack legal recognition, he hopes to assume the moral leadership of millions of poor Mexicans.

Based in Mexico City, Lopez Obrador's parallel government has its own Cabinet, but it will not collect taxes or make laws and relies on donations to carry out its plans.

One of its first orders of business will be trying to prevent Calderon's Dec. 1 inauguration.

"We're not going to give the right free rein," Lopez Obrador said in a final stop in the southeastern state of Veracruz this weekend. "We're going to confront it."

Thousands of Lopez Obrador's supporters were gathering in the afternoon in Mexico City's main Zocalo plaza, carrying signs lashing out against not only Calderon but the Roman Catholic Church and mainstream media.

"Calderon will have to be retrained or will have to go," said Maria de Lourdes Carranza, 50, a Mexico City office worker.

Marco Ramirez, 34, a university researcher watching the crowd from a sidewalk cafe, said he believed many of the demonstrators were receiving money from the Mexico City government, which is run by Lopez Obrador's Democratic Revolution Party.

"This affects the country's image," he said. "It puts out a very bad image."

It remains to be seen whether Lopez Obrador can keep up the momentum. Some members of his leftist Democratic Revolution Party, or PRD, have already expressed disagreement with Lopez Obrador's strategy of using Congress — where the PRD is now the second-largest force — as an arena for protests rather than negotiations.

Writing in the Mexico City daily Reforma, columnist Armando Fuentes described Lopez Obrador's "swearing in" ceremony as "laughable" and "a circus act, a farce."

But Oscar Aguilar, a political science professor at the Iberoamerican University, cautioned that the leftist could successfully undermine Calderon.

"The problem is that he's not a Don Quixote because the social and political conditions are fertile ground for this kind of leadership," Aguilar said. "Many of the poor ... see this type of leadership as a solution."

Protesters have held the center of the southern city of Oaxaca for months, demanding Gov. Ulises Ruiz's ouster, despite the presence of federal police. Many worry that Lopez Obrador will follow suit and renew street protests, including those in which his supporters seized Mexico City's center for nearly two months this summer.

Some citizens appear to be tiring of political unrest.

This month, Mexico City was rattled when several bombs exploded at political offices and banks. No one was injured, and a small, radical group not tied to Lopez Obrador claimed responsibility.

The violence has affected one of the country's main sources of income. Revenue from tourism was down 4.3 percent in the first nine months of 2006, as compared to 2005.

President Vicente Fox cautioned in a speech Monday that "the electoral process is the path that Mexicans have to preserve a peaceful, orderly, civilized and pluralistic public and political life."

Some of Lopez Obrador's closest aides have suggested they will follow Bolivia's example and try to use protests to force Calderon from office, as demonstrators did with a succession of leaders there. Lopez Obrador has not ruled that out.

"Nobody wants violence in our country, but there are people who give grounds for violence," Lopez Obrador said last week. "There are a lot of people who say that, after July 2, the path of electoral politics in no longer viable."

Yes, He Lost Mexico's Vote, So He's Swearing Himself In (NYT)

By James C. Mckinley Jr.

The New York Times, November 21, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0097000

MEXICO CITY, Nov. 20 — Don Quixote, move over. The losing leftist candidate for president swore himself in on Monday as “the legitimate president of Mexico” before a huge crowd of his avid fans, ignoring rulings by federal electoral authorities and the courts that he narrowly lost the election last July.

The candidate, Andrés Manuel López Obrador, a former Mexico City mayor who took on Mexico’s entrenched oligarchy, chose the anniversary of the Mexican revolution for the event. He has continued to assert that his opponents used fraud to deny him victory.

Appearing on a stage in the historic Constitution Plaza, with Mexican flags and an enormous eagle banner behind him, Mr. López Obrador promised to goad the government of the president-elect, Felipe Calderón, a conservative from the National Action Party of President Vicente Fox, into adopting his proposals.

About 100,000 people crowded into the square and roared with approval when a copy of the traditional green, white and red presidential banner was placed across his chest.

“We are assembled here to confront a fraudulent election,” he said, “and to take on a regime of corruption and privileges, to start the construction of a new republic.”

Mr. López Obrador maintains that powerful business leaders colluded with Mr. Fox’s party to mount a smear campaign depicting him as a dangerous leftist totalitarian. He also says Mr. Fox’s party made a pact with the centrist former governing party, the Institutional Revolutionary Party, to defeat him in northern states.

Both accusations are true to a degree, but the nation’s highest electoral court ruled that those actions were not enough to skew the election results. Mr. Calderón, 44, a former energy minister, won by 240,000 votes.

Mr. López Obrador, who is 53, said he intended to have members of his Democratic Revolution Party introduce legislation in Congress, then use public pressure to force the laws through. Among his proposals are measures to break up near monopolies, improve health care, raise the minimum wage and cut government salaries.

He said he intended to continue touring to promote his ideas.

Earlier in the day, Mr. Fox took a veiled swipe at Mr. López Obrador at an event marking the anniversary of the 1910 revolution, saying society should never permit strongmen and populists to trample civil liberties. “Elections are the path that Mexicans have to preserve a political and public life that is plural, peaceful, orderly and civilized,” he said.

It remained to be seen if Monday’s political theater was a graceful exit for a candidate who could never acknowledge defeat, or truly the start of a unified left-wing movement to challenge the oligarchy of politicians and business executives who have controlled the country for a century.

The crowd was smaller than at Mr. López Obrador’s previous rallies, and divisions have appeared in his party. Some supporters have threatened to storm the dais to try to prevent Mr. Calderón from taking the oath of office on Dec. 1, while others are negotiating with his party, hoping to get the new president to adopt part of their agenda in return for political peace.

Forming a shadow government is astute politically, some analysts said, because it could keep Mr. López Obrador in the public eye during Mr. Calderón’s six-year term and set up a possible run in 2012.

Most of the people who turned out to support him, however, have high hopes that he will somehow deliver on his campaign promises despite losing. “He is our last hope,” said Consuelo Sánchez Quiroz, a 64-year-old retired hotel worker. “Fox and Calderón are both for the businessmen.”

But others saw the ceremony on Monday as a grand romantic gesture, something Don Quixote could relate to. “It’s something that goes beyond material things, it’s something more spiritual,” said Beatriz Ramírez, a 54-year-old psychologist, “to believe in the future, in a more equal society, to believe that some day it will become reality.”

Mexican Leftist Declares Himself 'President' (LAT)

By Héctor Tobar

The Los Angeles Times, November 21, 2006

MEXICO CITY — Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador, the leftist who claims to have been cheated out of victory in July's presidential election, took an "oath of office" Monday as the "legitimate president" of Mexico in an elaborate ritual his many detractors here ridiculed as a farce.

The ceremony in this capital city came less than two weeks before the inauguration of the man who officially won the election, conservative Felipe Calderon. As many as 100,000 people attended the event, in which Lopez Obrador, the city's 52-year-old former mayor, also swore in a six-man, six-woman shadow Cabinet.

"It is an honor to be the legitimate president of Mexico and above all the leader of free men and women like you," Lopez Obrador told the crowd after leftist senator and human rights activist Rosario Ibarra de Piedra placed a "presidential sash" over his shoulder.

DOJ_NMG_0097001

Lopez Obrador has styled himself as the defender of this nation's impoverished majority. His self-coronation wasn't the first time in Mexico's tumultuous history that a losing candidate had proclaimed himself the "legitimate president" (three did so between 1910 and 1940), and it may not augur well for Mexico's future political stability.

"He is not doing this to make sure that Calderon governs in the name of the poor. He's trying to make sure that Calderon can't govern at all," Denise Dresser, a political analyst here, said of Lopez Obrador's decision to create a parallel government. "He is leading many Mexicans to believe that change in this country cannot occur through peaceful means."

On Sept. 5, after weeks of partial recounts and legal pleadings alleging fraud, Mexico's highest electoral court proclaimed Calderon the winner of the presidential election by 234,000 votes, or 0.56 percentage point.

Calderon did not comment Monday on his rival's inauguration. The newspaper Reforma published a poll that found two in three Mexicans believed Lopez Obrador had "little or no" credibility. But one in five respondents thought he was right to proclaim himself president.

Lopez Obrador urged his followers not to recognize Calderon's government.

"We are congregated here because in the face of the electoral fraud of July 2, we have decided to abolish the regime of corruption and privilege," he said. "We will begin the construction of a new republic."

Monday's swearing-in took place amid a festive atmosphere in Mexico City's central plaza, the Zocalo, with a contingent of invited foreign dignitaries that included Brazilian community activists and the Cuban singer Silvio Rodriguez.

Supporters chanted "Presidente!"

"I'm here because I voted for him and because I believe he is the legitimate president of Mexico," said Josafat Lagos, 56, an accountant. "The hope of the people is that he will be a counterbalance to the abuses and corruption of the powerful."

On Friday, Ruben Aguilar, spokesman for outgoing President Vicente Fox, said he did not believe many Mexicans would see Lopez Obrador as the "legitimate president."

"The citizens of this country won't be fooled," Aguilar said. "This is a mature society. The people voted … they made their decision."

Lopez Obrador's critics in Mexico and abroad denounced his decision to proclaim himself president as a dangerous farce — the "Republic of the Ugly Duckling," some commentators here have called it.

Much of the Mexican media, and many political observers, lambasted the inauguration as a "caricature" and the desperate act of an egomaniac.

"Lopez Obrador has become a parody of himself, a bad joke," said Jaime Sanchez Susarrey, a Guadalajara professor and author. "He's lost a great deal of legitimacy, even among his own supporters."

In an interview published Monday in the daily newspaper La Jornada, Lopez Obrador said he didn't care about "the attacks and jokes of the right," because he would rule "in the name of the people" against a "neo-fascist regime that only benefits a privileged minority."

Calderon, Lopez Obrador said, is "a puppet, a little manager at the service of the powerful, who will always be rejected by the people."

Legislators of Lopez Obrador's leftist Democratic Revolution Party, or PRD, have promised to prevent Calderon from being inaugurated before a joint session of Congress on Dec. 1, much as they kept Fox from delivering his state of the nation address in September.

Calderon has resisted pleas from Fox and others that he take the oath of office at another location. His attempts to negotiate with legislators of the PRD have been rebuffed. A showdown in the halls of Congress appears inevitable.

Lopez Obrador will support his "government" through popular donations. He said Monday that its main activities would consist of proposing legislation to Congress and monitoring the actions of the Calderon administration.

Calderon will face numerous challenges to his authority, including popular movements led by charismatic radicals in the southern states of Oaxaca and Chiapas. Drug cartels often operate with impunity in border cities such as Nuevo Laredo and the impoverished southern states of Guerrero and Michoacan.

"Calderon is going to have to prove, in a short time, that free markets and liberal democracy still work," Dresser said. "If he doesn't, he's going to have someone on the streets [Lopez Obrador] pointing out that they don't work."

Mexico's long history is dotted with parallel Congresses and parallel presidencies, many of which have arisen in times of social conflict and change.

In the 20th century, three men called themselves "president-elect" or "provisional president" after what they said were fraudulent elections: Francisco I. Madero in 1910, Jose Vasconcelos in 1929 and Alfredo Almazan in 1940.

Of those, only Madero eventually took office, after issuing the call to arms on Nov. 20, 1910, that sparked the Mexican Revolution.

After two years in office, Madero was assassinated in a coup d'etat.

DOJ_NMG_0097002

AMLO's Antics (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 21, 2006

When Mexico's hard-left presidential candidate Andres Manuel López Obrador lost the country's most closely contested election in history in July, those who know him warned he would not go away, no matter the cost to the nation. AMLO -- as the Mexican press calls him -- is proving them right.

Yesterday was the 96th anniversary of the Mexican Revolution. But Mexicans didn't get to celebrate in the nation's capital with their traditional parade of horses and revolutionary period costumes. President Vicente Fox canceled the event to avoid a confrontation with AMLO. The endlessly sore loser from the Revolutionary Democratic Party chose the same venue to stage a farcical self-swearing-in ceremony, declaring himself Mexico's next president. This was the third time since July that AMLO and his PRD derailed a Mexican tradition.

Mr. Fox understands the risks AMLO poses to his legacy and to the country. Yesterday while honoring Mexican martyr and hero Francisco Madero, Mr. Fox unmistakably spoke to the Mexican people about the tactics of AMLO: "[Madero] taught us that society must never permit, under any circumstances, that our liberties be violated by caciques (bosses) and caudillos."

That's a direct verbal challenge. But in practice, Mr. Fox has largely appeased AMLO's bullying. This may have encouraged PRD circus acts such as yesterday's. Worse, it may have emboldened the more extreme elements in Mexican politics that have been holding the southern city of Oaxaca hostage since May. The next test of Mexico's rule of law will come December 1 when president-elect Felipe Calderón is supposed to be sworn in. Hard liners are already pledging to crash the event. Perhaps this time Mexico's elected leadership will draw a line in the sand.

Traditional Ways Spread AIDS In Africa, Experts Say (NYT)

By Elisabeth Rosenthal

The New York Times, November 21, 2006

NKOLONDOGO, Cameroon — When Innocent Zamba Manga was born this summer, doctors advised his mother, Marise, who is H.I.V. positive, not to breast-feed, because nursing can pass the virus that causes AIDS from mother to child. Mother and baby left the hospital with bottles and formula supplied by a Catholic charity.

But the very next week, the proud parents took their baby to the father's village in the south of Cameroon, to take part in a traditional birth and naming ceremony. Custom required the new mother to nurse little Innocent, so she did. And she continued for two weeks.

"Why would you risk his health in this way?" scolded Dr. Suzie Tetang Moyo, sighing deeply in frustration when she saw the parents recently at her clinic on a dirt road here in this rural district north of the capital, Yaoundé.

As researchers spend more time studying Africa's overwhelming pediatric AIDS problem, they are finding that the routes of transmission may be different than in the industrialized countries, and that strategies for preventing the disease's spread must be adapted to local realities.

In developed countries, the only real risk factor for children is that they can get H.I.V. from their mothers at birth.

But here, researchers have come to agree, a host of traditional ceremonies and practices are creating transmission routes unique to Africa — dangers that have, up to now, been ignored.

There are naming ceremonies, like Innocent's, that require nursing. But there is also a host of potentially even more hazardous moments, such as when body fluids of different people are mixed.

In scarification ceremonies for ethnic identification and cutting for ritual healing, blades are used in sequence again and again. There is also the practice of communal breast-feeding a single baby by numerous women, common in many tightly knit villages.

In a country like Cameroon, where more than 5 percent of the population and 11 percent of pregnant women are infected with H.I.V. — the vast majority unknowingly — such practices could lead to a wildfire spread.

"If we are only biology, biology, biology, then we are only doing half of our mission," said Marcel Manny Lobe, director of the new International Reference and Research Center for H.I.V.-AIDS in Yaoundé. "We need also to do the sociology and anthropology and then make biological interventions."

Researchers here and elsewhere in Africa are just beginning to study the role of these common traditional practices of rural Africa, to determine if they account for a small or large portion of H.I.V. transmission. "We don't know enough about this important topic, but there is no doubt that traditional practices are spreading H.I.V. It's a growing concern," said Dr. Edward J. Mills, an epidemiologist at McMaster University in Hamilton, Ontario, who has done extensive work in South Africa.

DOJ_NMG_0097003

"Unaids has been ignoring it," he said, referring to the United Nations agency that deals with the disease. "I think it's because people think it's culturally insensitive to talk about. Even if it turns out to be only a minor amount, it's a preventable amount so we really need to address it."

In Batié, a village three hours from Yaoundé, most people go to both traditional healers and medical doctors, and traditional treatments often involve blades to cut the skin.

On a recent afternoon, Berlin Simeu, a villager, visited the darkened hut of Sop Kamtchewo, a healer, in a ceremony intended to ward off illness and witchcraft.

With a razor blade that had been wrapped in a sheet of paper, the healer made three short cuts on his patient's body — one each on his wrist, back and shoulder. A fruit was placed on the wounds to draw out any bad influences.

It was unclear whether or how the blade would be cleaned before its next use.

Yves Moumbe, a doctor in Batié, said that almost all of his patients with H.I.V. went to traditional healers before they saw him.

"It is not clear if they are using any sterile technique at all," Dr. Moumbe said. "They don't have much knowledge of H.I.V. and how it is spread. So it could be a serious problem."

An estimated 70 percent of Africans use traditional healers as their primary source of health care, a function of tradition and availability.

In Africa, there is one medical doctor for every 40,000 people, but one traditional healer for every 500.

In one small survey, 50 percent of ritual healers were H.I.V. positive, doctors at the International Reference and Research Center for H.I.V.-AIDS in Yaoundé said.

"We're used to saying this is all about sexual intercourse, but now we have to remind people it can be elsewhere in the body, and there are other dangers as well," said Bertrice Mabule, who started the Children's Education and Health Foundation to promote H.I.V. awareness in Batié.

A 2004 study in the journal Tropical Doctor by Dr. Etete J. Peters at the University of Calabar in southeastern Nigeria concluded that there was "a serious risk inherent in the practices of Nigerian traditional healers" because of "the continuous usage of unsterilized instruments and cross contamination of patients' blood and body fluid in their practices."

Though Dr. Peters has continued to work with the healers, he said there was little financing to carry out H.I.V. sensitization campaigns directed at this group, so "such awful practices persist in Nigeria and Africa in general."

In much of rural Cameroon, tiny scars are made to identify members of different ethnic groups, with large numbers of children scarred simultaneously.

"You see them everywhere, three lines on a cheek, on the forehead — the Pygmies make slashes between the eyebrows," said Serge Florent Moudt, an H.I.V. educator who works at the Center in Yaoundé as well as in the West Province, his home. "It's a real worry."

If just one child in a village had H.I.V., a common blade could spread the virus to dozens who come after him. The same is true for group circumcisions.

"There are traditionally African aspects of this fight," said Jean Stéphane Biatcha, executive secretary of African Synergy, an AIDS prevention group. "We're taking the message to rural areas where traditions are very strong, and you have to work carefully and slowly."

Another traditional practice that government officials acknowledge could be spreading HIV is communal breast-feeding, the norm in many rural villages.

Polygamy is legal in Cameroon, and a chieftain might have 30 or 40 wives, Mr. Biatcha said, because wealthy men routinely marry the wives of male relatives who have died. It is common for the wives — or even friends — to help out by nursing each other's infants. In fact, it is an essential service if a mother has to go to work or take a trip into the city.

But again, in a country where studies have found that 11 percent of women of child-bearing age are infected with H.I.V., the practice presents an open conduit for childhood infections.

Mr. Biatcha said people were generally unaware of such risks, so the first step was information.

In the last few years, an increasing number of medical doctors have warmed to collaborating with the traditional healers, to encourage safe practice and to use them as AIDS educators.

"We have to open a dialogue with the traditional healers," said Dr. Mills, the epidemiologist. "They may well be spreading H.I.V., but instead they could be part of the solution."

Nepali King Faulted In Dissident Crackdown (WT/AP)

By Binaj Gurubacharya

The Washington Times, November 21, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0097004

KATMANDU, Nepal -- A government commission investigating Nepal's bloody crackdown on pro-democracy demonstrators blamed the violence on King Gyanendra and recommended punishing him, officials said yesterday.

The findings by the panel investigating the crackdown are a further blow for the king, who has seen his status plummet since the uprising forced him to give up absolute power, and an ominous portent for the centuries-old institution of the monarchy in this Himalayan nation.

After receiving the commission's report, Prime Minister Girija Prasad Koirala vowed to punish those held culpable for the crackdown, in which hundreds were injured and hundreds detained, with some claiming torture.

Commission member Harihar Birahi said that as chairman of the Cabinet at the time of the crackdown, the king was responsible for the harsh treatment of the protesters, who eventually forced Gyanendra to cede power and reinstate parliament after 14 months of direct rule by the monarch.

Holding Gyanendra guilty thrusts the future of the Nepalese monarchy back under the spotlight. The landmark case marked the first time a monarch faced investigation in this country where kings -- thought by tradition to be reincarnations of the Hindu god Lord Vishnu -- have held near-absolute power.

The commission did not recommend a punishment, and Nepal has no laws addressing crimes committed by a king.

A yet-to-be elected constituent assembly is expected to decide the monarchy's fate. Centrist parties favor a constitutional monarchy with a ceremonial role for the king, while the Maoist rebels -- who are in peace talks with the government -- want to abolish the monarchy.

Gyanendra has already been stripped of his powers, command over the army and his immunity from prosecution.

Several people who worked under the king during the period of direct rule that ended in April were interrogated by the commission.

The commission also sent written questions to Gyanendra, but the king did not respond.

Besides Gyanendra, the commission also found 201 officials in the king's administration responsible for the bloody crackdown. They included the chiefs of police and the armed forces.

Gyanendra's reign has been filled with turmoil that began on his ascent to power in 2001, after the death of his brother, King Birendra, in a bizarre palace massacre.

After becoming king, he remained unpopular with the people. Taking direct control of the government in 2005 eroded most of his remaining support.

A Discredit To The United Nations (NYT)

The New York Times, November 21, 2006

The old, unreformed United Nations Human Rights Commission was selective and one-sided, but occasionally managed to do some good work. That may be more than can be said for its successor body, the Human Rights Council, born earlier this year of a weak-kneed compromise from which the United States stood honorably apart. If this is the best the U.N. can do at reforming itself, it isn't worth the effort.

The council is new, but its deliberations have already fallen into a shameful pattern. When it comes to the world's worst and most consistent human rights violators, like China, Iran, North Korea, Myanmar and Sudan, there has been a tendency to muffle words and conclusions and shift the focus from individual and political rights to broader economic and social questions.

But when it comes to criticizing Israel for violations committed in a wartime context that includes armed attacks against its citizens and soldiers, the council seems to change personality, turning harshly critical and uninterested in broader contexts.

As the council prepares to resume deliberations next week, an ad hoc coalition of human rights violators is pushing for an end to the practice of singling out individual countries for special criticism and follow-up investigations.

Those critical reports and follow-ups were the most useful thing the old unreformed commission used to do. The problem was that many other deserving targets were shielded by their diplomatic allies. Moving away from the practice altogether would be a decided step backward.

To inspire respect and support, the United Nations must be more than a self-protective club of sovereign states. The test of that is whether it is willing to defend the basic human standards embodied in a succession of United Nations declarations and conventions. The new Human Rights Council now seems headed for a failing midterm grade.

Political Poison (WP)

The Washington Post, November 21, 2006

FOR THE PAST 15 years it has been commonly assumed that Russian leaders gave up the Soviet practice of murdering political dissidents, inside and outside of the country. Maybe not. British authorities say they are investigating the apparent poisoning of Alexander Litvinenko, an outspoken critic of Russian President Vladimir Putin, who is fighting for his life in a London hospital after ingesting highly toxic thallium. A former agent of the KGB secret service and its successor, the Federal Security Service (FSB), who sought asylum in Britain six years ago, Mr. Litvinenko had alleged that the agency maintained a secret poisons laboratory. Along with many others, he also charged that the Kremlin was behind the 2004 poisoning of Ukraine's pro-Western president, Viktor Yushchenko.

DOJ_NMG_0097005

There's no concrete evidence as yet that the FSB or Mr. Putin is behind the poison attacks -- but there is plenty of reason for suspicion. Mr. Litvinenko was investigating the recent murder of the country's best known opposition journalist, Anna Politkovskaya, who was gunned down in her apartment building on Oct. 7. She, too, was hospitalized in 2004 and said she believed she had been poisoned. Ms. Politkovskaya's editor at the newspaper Novaya Gazeta, Yuri Shchekochikhin, died after a suspected poisoning three years ago. No one has been arrested in these murders, but Mr. Putin publicly disparaged Ms. Politkovskaya while implausibly charging that his political enemies were somehow behind her death.

Former colleagues of Mr. Putin in the KGB don't doubt who is responsible. One, Oleg Kalugin, pointed out that the president pushed the Russian parliament to authorize the secret service to take action against "terrorists" outside the country. Another, Oleg Gordievsky, the former KGB chief in Britain, told the Times of London that he believed the attack was "state-sponsored" and was carried out by another former Russian agent. We trust that the British authorities will vigorously investigate the attack on Mr. Litvinenko -- who is now a British citizen -- and that Prime Minister Tony Blair will take seriously the possibility that a colleague in the Group of Eight sanctioned a political murder attempt in London.

While Mr. Litvinenko's story was emerging over the weekend, President Bush was pictured exchanging jollities with his "friend Vladimir" at a summit in Vietnam. Does Mr. Bush regret having given so much support to a leader who has dismantled his country's nascent democracy and whose opponents keep turning up in hospitals and morgues? If so, he's keeping his own secret.

DOJ_NMG_0097006

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Wednesday, November 22, 2006 8:26 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Attorney General's News Briefing for Wednesday, November 22, 2006
Attachments:	agnb061122.pdf; agnb061122.doc

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 22, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:
Holiday Publishing Notice 3
US Asks 4th Circuit To Reinstate Padilla Terrorism Charge 3
Reno Joins Former DOJ Officials In Criticizing Anti-Terror Strategy....3
Gonzales Says Supermax Problems Are Being Addressed....4

Homeland Response:
Seattle Barber Shop Owner Flees To Somalia Ahead Of Sentencing 5
DNI Unveils First Comprehensive Terror Threat Information-Sharing Plan....5
DHS Investigating Removal Of Muslim Clerics From Flight 5
Consultants' Report Finds Fault With DHS Contracting Procedures....6
TSA, Airlines Making Major Push To Warn Travelers Of Restrictions....6
FBI Seen As Struggling With Muslim, Arab Outreach Efforts....6

War News:
Bush Visits Troops In Hawaii 7
Bush, Maliki To Meet In Jordan 7
Former President Bush Defends Son In UAE Speech....8
Baker Report Almost Ready; Pentagon Drafting Alternative....8
Lieberman Blasts Democrats Urging "Cut And Run" Iraq Policy....9
Congressman-Elect Generated Questionable Iraq Intelligence....10
Syria, Iraq Renew Diplomatic Relations....10
Bomb Fails To Kill Iraqi Speaker Inside Green Zone....10
Iraqi Government Hamstrung By Distrust....11
Marine Snipers Find Few Targets....11
Marines Issue Flame-Resistant Flight Suits To Ground Troops....11
Parents Stand By Haditha Suspect....11
US, Afghan Officials Say More Troops, Equipment Needed..12
Pakistan Arrests 39 Suspected Taliban In Quetta 12
US Accused Of "Shameful" Record Of Abandoning Allies....12
Army Turns To New Recruiting Slogan 12

DOJ:
GAO Finds Room For DOJ Improvement In Information Classification Practices....13

Corporate Scandals:
DOJ Drops Effort To Restore Lay Conviction....13

Criminal Law:
DOJ Decides Against Probe Of Porter Fundraising Allegation 14
Three Aryan Brotherhood Members Sentenced To Life 14
Three Gang Members Sentenced To Live For Targeting Blacks 14
Ohio Brokers Acquitted Of All Bribery Charges....15
Tennessee License Examiner Sentenced To Prison For Taking Bribes....15
Federal Agents, Philadelphia Police Arrest Suspect In 1989 Racial Murder 15
Judge Agrees To Freeze Hedge Fund Manager's Assets Over Alleged Fraud 15
Federal Agents, Florida Police Arrest Suspects In DOT Laptop Theft....15
Key Prosecution Witness Testifies Jeffs Coerced Underage Marriage....16
Curbs On Sex Offenders Seen As Ineffective, Inhumane....16
FBI Establishes Western Pennsylvania Corruption Hotline 17
FBI Investigating Former Louisiana Charity Grant Office 17
Baltimore Council Mulls Taping Of Police Interrogations 17
Maryland Man Sentenced To Life For Killing Stepdaughter ..17
Greek Authorities Pursue Charges Against Getty Antiquities Curator....18
New York To Overhaul System Of Town, Village Courts....18

Civil Law:

Whistleblowers Help US Recover $1.3 Billion In Fraud Cases 19
DC Circuit Overturns Dismissal Of FOIA Suit Over Immigrant Convicts 19
Bankruptcy Attorneys Adjusting To Decline In Filings 19

Civil Rights:

Maryland Disputes DOJ Findings On Juvenile Center Conditions 20
Monitor Finds Mississippi Juvenile Centers Still Not Meeting Standards 20
Day Laborers Win New York Racial Bias Suit 20
Georgia Prosecutors Probe Police Shootings 21
Maryland Gay Custody Battle Stalls In Court 21
Breast-Feeding Mothers Rally To Protest Restrictions 21
US 22nd In Gender Gap Ranking 22

Antitrust:

Municipal Bond Dealers Brace For Expanded Probes 22
DOJ Says Windows Vista Complies With Microsoft Judgment 23
Oshkosh Truck Gets Antitrust Clearance To Purchase JLG . 24
Suit Accuses Quiznos Of Antitrust Violations, Fraud 24
SCOTUS To Hear Landmark Patent Case 24
Speculation Swirls Over Future Mergers 25
Qantas Considers Takeover Approach From Texas Pacific, Macquarie 25
Union Ruling Clouds Suez-Gaz De France Agreement 25
Firm Exonerated Of Antitrust Allegations Wins Baldrige Award 26
EU Clears UCB Bid For Schwarz Pharma 26
Equities Exchange Said To Be Bigger Deal Than Talks Between Nasdaq-LSE 26
Columnist Says Airline Mergers Will Not Fix Industry Problems 27

Environment/Indian Affairs:

Company Blames Farmers, "Act Of God" For Rice Contamination 27
WPost Says Government Flu Strategy Wanting 28
Mining Companies Eye Navajo Land 28
NRC Tests Find Contaminated Water Under Indian Point 28

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Gonzales Says FBI Will Add Southwest Colorado Agent 28
CBS To Air "Criminal Minds" Episode Written By FBI Profiler 28
Rhode Island Drug Sweep Nets Dozens Of Arrests 29
Philadelphia Inquirer Highlights DEA Internet Pharmacy Investigation 29
In Colombia, US Pulls Some Resources Out Of Anti-Drug Effort 29
Seneca Nation Tobacco Merchant Reaches Compliance Deal With ATF 29
NYTimes Criticizes Allen's Concealed Weapons Bill 30

Immigration:

Bush, Congress Said To Be Unwilling To Construct Border Fence 30
Governors Seek Additional Federal Money For Jailing Illegal Immigrants 30
US Wrestles With Fate Of Deportees Who Face Danger In Native Land 31

Tax:

Snipes Says He Is Scapegoat In Tax Fraud Case 31

Congress-Administration:

Bush Open To Considering Tax Hike As Part Of Social Security Deal 31
Democrats Not Expected To Block Gates Nomination 32
Rangel Says Draft Proposal Was Meant To Ignite Debate 32
USDA Representative Defends "Hunger" Omission In Report 33
Controversial HHS Official Prescribed Birth Control In Private Practice 33
Democrats Unlikely To Advance Liberal Interest Groups' Agenda 33
Dodd Faces Balancing Act Between Business, Democratic Base 33
Democrats Set Sights On Prime Capitol Real Estate 33
Point Man On Financial Crimes To Leave Treasury 34
Senate Panel To Review DC's Medicaid Program 34
IBM, Cray Win DARPA Supercomputer Contract 34
Husband Of US Trade Representative Dies 34
Spellings Is First Cabinet Secretary To Appear On "Jeopardy." 34
Retired Admiral Teaching At Naval Academy Profiled 34
White House Communications Move To Internet Infrastructure 35
Democratic House Aide Cleared In Leak Probe 35
Attention Given To Pelosi's Attire Considered 35
Paulson Criticized For Lack Of Political Savvy 35
Dorgan Defends Pessimistic View Of Trade Deficit 36
Bush Daughter's Purse Stolen In Argentina 36
Bush Called Uncivil For Use Of Term "Democrat Party." 37

DOJ_NMG_0097009

Other News:

White House Predicts Slower Economic Growth 37
Wilson, Schmidt Claim Victory In NM1, OH2 37
Giuliani Forms Federal Presidential Exploratory Committee 38
McCain Stance On US Troop Levels In Iraq Said To Pose Political Risks 38
Romney Seen As Methodically Moving Toward Presidential Bid 38
Brownback Reaching Out Beyond Christian-Conservative Base 38
Religious Group Withdraws Wal-Mart Boycott 38
US Teen Birthrate Falls To All-Time Low 39
Assassination Threatens To Destabilize Lebanon; Complicates Debate Over Syria 39
Two Kidnapped Gaza Red Cross Workers Released 41
Study Says 39% Of Land Used By Israeli Settlers Owned By Palestinians 41
Court Rules Israel Must Register Same-Sex Marriages Performed Abroad 41
US Seeks More Market Access In India For Agricultural Commodities 41
Cnooc, PetroChina Sings Investment Deals In Vietnam 42
China's Military Buildup Designed To Compete With US Navy 42
Goodlatte To Lead Congressional Ag Tour Of South America 42
Populism Seen As Losing Appeal For Latin American Voters 42
Maoist Rebels In Nepal Sign Peace Deal With Government .43
Bangladeshi Villagers Get Internet Access 43
WSJournal Says Russia Likely Responsible For Ex-KGB Agent's Poisoning 43
HIV/AIDS Program Shows Improvement In Seven African Countries 43
NYTimes Urges IAEA To Deny Iran Nuclear Assistance 43

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages 44

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington 45

TERRORISM NEWS:

Holiday Publishing Notice. In observance of Thanksgiving, the Attorney General's News Briefing will not be published on Thursday, November 23.

US Asks 4th Circuit To Reinstate Padilla Terrorism Charge. The AP (11/22, Anderson) reports, "Federal prosecutors have asked an appeals court to reinstate a key terrorism charge against an alleged Al Qaeda operative, Jose Padilla, contending a judge erred in finding that it duplicated other counts in the same indictment." The AP notes, "The pleading filed with the 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals late Monday argues that the charge dismissed by U.S. District Judge Marcia Cooke is a distinct offense in the case. Judge Cooke ruled in August that the first count of the indictment against Padilla and two others — charging a conspiracy to 'murder, kidnap, and maim persons in a foreign country' — was essentially the same as two other terrorism support counts. The dismissed charge is the only one in the case that carries a potential life prison sentence."

Reno Joins Former DOJ Officials In Criticizing Anti-Terror Strategy. The Washington Post (11/22, A6, Eggen) reports, "Former attorney general Janet Reno has taken the unusual step of openly criticizing the Bush administration's anti-terrorism strategy -- joining seven other former Justice Department officials in warning that the indefinite detention of U.S. terrorism suspects could become commonplace unless the courts intervene." The Post continues, "In a friend-of-the-court brief filed in the case of alleged enemy combatant Ali Saleh Kahlah al-Marri, the former prosecutors assert that criminal courts are well equipped to prosecute terrorism suspects while guaranteeing the constitutional rights of defendants arrested on U.S. soil. … Reno, reached at her Florida home yesterday, said she would let the brief 'speak for itself. I've been following this, and it reflects my concerns about the detention and treatment of people who have been determined to be enemy combatants in a manner that is not clear how it is being done.'" The Post adds, "In their brief, Reno and the other former Justice Department officials said: 'The government is essentially asserting the right to hold putative enemy combatants arrested in the United States indefinitely whenever it decides not to prosecute those people criminally -- perhaps because it would be too difficult to obtain a conviction, perhaps because a motion to suppress evidence would raise embarrassing facts about the government's conduct, or perhaps for other reasons.' … The filing in the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 4th Circuit is a highly unusual move for Reno. She has generally maintained a low profile since leaving the helm of the Justice Department in 2001 and has said little publicly about the policies of her successors, John D. Ashcroft and Alberto R. Gonzales. … The brief is also notable because its signatories include two U.S. attorneys from the Reagan years -- W. Thomas Dillard and Anton R. Valukas -- in addition to prosecutors from the Clinton and Carter administrations and Philip A. Lacovara, a counsel to the Watergate special prosecutor. … 'While we respect the right of other legal minds to be heard on these issues, we believe we are on firm legal footing in this case as both the magistrate judge and district court concluded,' Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said yesterday."

DOJ_NMG_0097010

Bloomberg (11/22, St.onge) reports, "Reno and the others said the Bush administration is trying to set a dangerous precedent that would let the government indefinitely imprison any non-U.S. citizen considered an enemy. The former U.S. officials were joined by at least four human rights groups making similar arguments. … Al-Marri, 41, was the first defendant removed from the U.S. criminal justice system and deemed an illegal enemy combatant. He was studying in the U.S. and living in Illinois when he was arrested in late 2001. The Justice Department unsealed the indictment in December 2002, and he was declared an enemy combatant about six months later. A citizen of Qatar, al-Marri has been held at a U.S. Navy Prison in South Carolina since June 2003. … The Justice Department said it stands by its decision to try al-Marri as a suspected terrorist outside the criminal court system. … 'These are complex and difficult legal issues,' said Justice Department spokeswoman Kathleen Blomquist in an e-mailed statement today. 'While we respect the right of other legal minds to be heard on these issues, we believe we are on firm legal footing.'"

More Commentary. The Denver Post (11/22) editorializes, "U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales told The Denver Post editorial board Monday that the administration can hold Guantanamo Bay detainees indefinitely, without any judicial proceeding through the 'period of hostilities.' Which is to say, indefinitely. … The administration has categorized an untold number of detainees as 'unlawful enemy combatants,' saying they are members of a non-state terrorist group. It's a different class of detainee than POWs, typically uniformed combatants captured during battlefield-style warfare. The U.S. in previous wars has held enemy combatants. But the Military Commissions Act of 2006 broadened the definition of illegal enemy combatant to include those providing support to terrorists. As such, they have no right to a real day in court. 'We have no obligation to bring people to justice,' Gonzales said. … And even when military commission proceedings begin, Gonzales predicted slow going due to defendants' legal maneuverings. … 'At every opportunity they're going to bring challenges,' he said. But these opportunities have shrunk considerably." The Post adds, "In fact, Congress gave the president the authority to use military commissions in a bill that included one particularily controversial provision - denying the detainees a procedure known as habeas corpus, a right that obligates the government to justify imprisonment before a federal judge. … With the removal of habeas rights, the detainees have no way of challenging their status in federal court. That alone has spawned litigation that seems sure to make its way to the U.S. Supreme Court. … As for those who are in detention at the military prison in Guantanamo Bay, the denial of habeas corpus is unnecessary and un-American. While the U.S. Supreme Court almost certainly will get a crack at this questionable law, members of Congress shouldn't wait. They should review the military commissions act as an early order of business in 2007 and at the very least restore the right of habeas corpus to those imprisoned at Guantanamo. … It is a step that will bring the U.S. back into line with our own traditions and rights."

Gonzales Says Supermax Problems Are Being Addressed. The AP (11/22) reports, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales acknowledged the federal government has made mistakes at the ultra-high-security Supermax prison in Colorado, including inadequate monitoring of inmate mail and phone calls, but he said steps are being taken to address the problem. … 'Have mistakes been made? Have there been some problems there? No question about it, like there are at every facility,' Gonzales said Monday. 'But we've taken steps to address them.'" The AP continues, "Supermax, in the town of Florence about 80 miles south of Denver, houses some of the nation's most dangerous inmates, including Unabomber Ted Kaczynski, al-Qaida conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui and Oklahoma City bombing conspirator Terry Nichols. … Local and federal officials have criticized the prison in recent weeks over staffing levels, security measures and fencing." The AP adds, "A Justice Department report in September criticized the prison for not properly screening mail and other communications. Last month, a federal arbitrator found staff cuts had made the facility more dangerous. Both Colorado's senators, Republican Wayne Allard and Democrat Ken Salazar, and local officials have raised concerns about security and communications. … Gonzales said all inmate mail is now being read and a large portion of phone calls are monitored as they occur. The rest are recorded and reviewed by translators later, though a shortage of qualified Arabic translators has caused a delay."

DOJ_NMG_0097011

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Seattle Barber Shop Owner Flees To Somalia Ahead Of Sentencing. The Seattle Post-Intelligencer (11/22, Shukovsky, 124K) reports, "Ruben Shumpert, who federal agents allege made his Rainier Valley barber shop a kind of 'anti-American training ground for Muslims' where children were taught 'how to shoot and fight the Americans,' has telephoned the FBI to say he won't be going to prison anytime soon. Shumpert, who faces sentencing on federal counterfeiting and weapons charges, has fled to Somalia," noting in the call to the FBI agent that Somalia has no extradition treaty with the US. The Post-Intelligencer notes, "Shumpert -- an African American convert to Islam -- was among more than a dozen, mostly African immigrants from Islamic countries arrested by the FBI's Joint Terrorism Task Force two years ago on a mix of charges, including immigration fraud and bank fraud. Shumpert was never charged with any terrorism crimes, but court documents paint a picture of his barber shop…as a gathering place for adherents of radical Islam where he showed children videotapes of 'fighting, shooting and killing with images on Shumpert's computer screen of al-Qaida and the Taliban.'"

The AP (11/22, Johnson) reports, "Shumpert's lawyer, James Vonasch, said the government told him only that his client had left the country. … Vonasch also said that Shumpert claims to speak some Arabic, and that an FBI agent who worked the case got a call from him within the past two weeks. 'The agent implied it was an unpleasant conversation, but he didn't supply me with the details,' Vonasch said. Vonasch said Shumpert's wife and two young children are still in Seattle. The FBI questioned the wife about Shumpert's whereabouts, he said."

DNI Unveils First Comprehensive Terror Threat Information-Sharing Plan. The Wall Street Journal (11/22, A10, Christie, Block, 2.04M) reports, "More than five years after" 9/11, "U.S. intelligence officials have unveiled the first comprehensive plan to help federal, state and local officials share information about terrorist threats." The Journal notes, "A senior U.S. intelligence official said President Bush asked the DNI to create a framework to allow the Department of Homeland Security and the Federal Bureau of Investigation to better coordinate their threat assessments and warnings to state and local authorities. The White House has grown increasingly concerned about the poor quality of information sharing between the federal government and the states. State and local officials cautiously welcomed the plan," but "many warned the effort wouldn't work without federal money and muscle to provide better technology and to put an end to traditional interagency turf battles."

DHS Investigating Removal Of Muslim Clerics From Flight. The removal of 6 Muslim religious leaders from a US Airways flight in Minneapolis Monday night and subsequent calls for an investigation into the incident from civil rights groups have prompted widespread media attention. ABC World News (11/21, story 6, 2:35, Gibson, 8.78M) reported "the Department of Homeland Security's Office for Civil Rights has opened a review" of the incident. "Passengers thought the clerics were acting suspiciously. The clerics claim they were simply trying to pray. One thing for sure: Five years after 9/11, air travelers are still very nervous." Former National Security Advisor Richard Clarke was shown saying, "All too often airlines give in to a few passengers who feel uncomfortable. Rather than the airlines and the Transportation Security Agency telling those passengers who feel uncomfortable that it's okay, that these people are just different, not terrorists."

NBC Nightly News (11/21, story 3, 2:45, Williams, 9.87M) reported the incident "raises an uncomfortable question in our post-9/11 age of suspicion and fear of terrorism, what is legitimate and what is intolerant?" Omar Shahin, Muslim Clergyman: "The way they took us off the plane, it's a humiliation, 100%." NBC (P. Williams) continued, "Investigators say US Airways told them that some of the men moved to empty seats after boarding and refused to follow crew instructions. But the clerics say they did nothing wrong."

DOJ_NMG_0097012

The New York Times (11/22, Sander, 1.16M) reports, "The incident prompted the Council on American-Islamic Relations and officials for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People in Washington to call Tuesday for Congressional hearings on racial profiling and an investigation by the Justice Department and the Transportation Security Administration. Nihad Awad, executive director of the Islamic advocacy group, said this was hardly the first time Muslims had encountered problems with stereotyping by the airline."

In an article appearing on no fewer than 41 news websites, the AP (11/21, Lohn) reported the clerics "said Tuesday they were victims of discrimination and called for a boycott of the airline." Meanwhile, "Shahin expressed frustration that — despite extensive efforts by him and other Muslim leaders since even before the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks — so many Americans know so little about Islam, which requires prayer five times a day."

Fox Special Report (11/21, story 6, 3:10, Herridge) reported, "A Homeland Security official told FOX that it's standard practice to review allegations of racial profiling by the Muslim community, but based on statements by the TSA and federal law enforcement, a Homeland Security official said it appears the proper procedures were followed."

McClatchy Newspapers (11/22, Von Sternberg, Miller) reports, "Before passengers boarded, one became alarmed by an overheard discussion. 'They seemed angry,' he wrote in a police statement. 'Mentioned 'US' and 'killing Saddam.' Two men then swore slightly under their breath/mumbled. They spoke Arabic again. The gate called boarding for the flight. The men then chanted 'Allah, Allah, Allah.'""

The Washington Times (11/22, Hudson, 88K) reports, "Patrick Hogan, spokesman for the Minneapolis-St. Paul Metropolitan Airports Commission, said the men reportedly made anti-American statements relating to the Iraq war, asked to change seats once inside the cabin, and that one requested an extender to make his seat belt larger even though he did not appear to need it. 'There was some peculiar behavior,' Mr. Hagmann said."

Consultants' Report Finds Fault With DHS Contracting Procedures. The Washington Post (11/22, A1, O'Harrow, Higham, 690K) reports in a front page article, "Private consultants hired by the Department of Homeland Security have found widespread problems with its contracting operation, including nearly three dozen contract files that could not be located. Files that could be found often lacked basic documentation required under federal rules, such as evidence that the department negotiated the best prices for taxpayers, according to a copy of the consultants' report obtained by The Washington Post." The Post adds, "Last year, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, Deputy Secretary Michael P. Jackson and others at the agency acknowledged having trouble with contracting and promised to do better." However, "the confidential report adds weight to critics' contentions that contracting problems persist."

TSA, Airlines Making Major Push To Warn Travelers Of Restrictions. USA Today (11/22, 1A, Frank, 2.27M) reports on its front page that in "an unprecedented campaign to warn travelers about new restrictions on carry-on bags," the TSA "is staging events at 66 airports to alert passengers that they can carry only limited amounts of liquids, aerosols and gels on airplanes. Airports are warning of the restrictions with ads, billboards and workers who hand out plastic bags that travelers must use to pack carry-on liquids." TSA spokeswoman Ellen Howe said the agency "is very focused on keeping waits down."

USA Today (11/22, 3A, Frank, Copeland, 2.27M) also reports, "This Thanksgiving poses one of the biggest recent tests to the nation's aviation system — whether or not airport security lines will flow smoothly despite a record number of passengers and new security rules. Many travelers and officials are nervously optimistic." USA Today adds, "The weekend's significance is underscored by an awareness campaign by the TSA, airlines and airports to highlight new restrictions on the amount of liquids, aerosols and gels passengers can carry on airplane cabins. News stories, posters, ads and e-mails have inundated travelers in virtually every major city and smaller areas from Eau Claire, Wis., to Midland, Texas."

FBI Seen As Struggling With Muslim, Arab Outreach Efforts. Under the headline "FBI Struggles To Win Trust Of Muslim, Arab Communities," McClatchy (11/22, Taylor) reports in an 1,845-word story taking a largely negative tone toward the FBI, after 9/11 "Arab and Muslim communities became the bureau's top targets," but now "the FBI has embarked on an aggressive national outreach program. The bureau's efforts, which include mosque visits and one-on-one meetings, have become so pervasive in certain cities that some young Muslim-Americans refer to the agency as the 'Friendly Brotherhood of Islam.' Yet across the country, many participants wonder what the interactions achieve when mistrust remains the biggest obstacle." McClatchy notes FBI Assistant Director John Miller said of the outreach efforts, "I would expect there to be friction. I'd also expect that we'd be able to talk about it."

DOJ_NMG_0097013

WAR NEWS:

Bush Visits Troops In Hawaii. Fox News' Special Report (11/21, Hume) reported President Bush "headed back to Washington tonight after meeting with US troops in Hawaii. The President went through the chow line at Hickam Air Force Base and thanked the troops for their service. Later he received a briefing at the US Pacific Command headquarters."

The AP (11/22, Loven) reports President Bush "circled the globe on his Asian journey but never strayed far from the subject of Iraq. He dined with U.S. troops in Hawaii before heading home Tuesday, telling them their efforts 'will determine how your children and grandchildren live.'" Bush "found himself in front of cameras on Tuesday at Hickam Air Force Base condemning the assassination earlier in the day of an anti-Syrian Lebanese leader. Bush was briefed in Hawaii at the Oahu headquarters of the U.S. Pacific Command, whose territory spreads from the West Coast of the U.S. to the Indian Ocean. Before that he ate and chatted with the troops, at an open-sided mess hall."

Three Police Officers From Bush Motorcade In Hawaii Injured In Accident. NBC Nightly News (11/21, story 6, 0:40, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "There was a serious accident today involving at least three motorcycles in President Bush's motorcade in Hawaii during a brief stopover on the President's way back to Washington from his Asia trip. Three Honolulu police officers could be seen lying on the grass near their overturned vehicles after apparently hitting a stretch of wet pavement during a light rain. Two of the officers were taken away by ambulance. Tonight we're told one is listed in serious condition. The other is stable. No word on the third police officer."

The Washington Post (11/22, Argetsinger, Roberts, 690K) reports in its "Reliable Source" column that "yesterday morning, as POTUS headed to Hickam Air Force Base on Oahu, three local police officers accompanying the motorcade crashed their motorcycles on a rain-slicked street. Two officers were hospitalized, White House officials said -- one with broken bones, the other with a neck injury."

White House Aide Beaten, Robbed In Hawaii. The KITV-TV WH Staffer Beaten/Robbed in HI (11/22) reports, "The acting director of the White House Travel Office was robbed and beaten in Waikiki early on Tuesday morning outside a nightclub, according to Honolulu police." Pitts "left the bar alone," and "walked through International Marketplace, where he was confronted by three men beaten up and robbed." His "passport and international phone were also taken," and he was treated at Queen's Medical Center. Pitts had "accompanied President George W. Bush on a brief visit to Hawaii," but "did not return with the president to Washington."

The Washington Post (11/22, Argetsinger, Roberts, 690K) reports in its "Reliable Source" column that a White House aide "was badly beaten and robbed during the president's stopover in Hawaii on the way back from Asia. Gregg Pitts, acting director of the White House Travel Office, suffered a broken nose in the Monday night mugging on a Honolulu street and was left behind in a hospital yesterday while the rest of the presidential entourage continued back to D.C." T

Bush, Maliki To Meet In Jordan. The Los Angeles Times (11/22, Moore, 850K) reports, "President Bush will meet with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki next week in Jordan to discuss methods to speed up the handover of military responsibilities from US troops to Iraqi security forces, White House officials said Tuesday. The session, scheduled at the end of Bush's planned trip to a North Atlantic Treaty Organization summit in Latvia, will allow the two leaders to 'review the situation in Iraq more generally and talk about the way ahead,' said national security advisor Stephen Hadley, speaking to reporters on Air Force One as the president returned to Washington from Asia." Hadley "said Bush and Maliki would focus on the progress of a committee recently formed to speed the shifting of security responsibilities to Iraqi forces."

The Washington Post (11/22, A17, Baker, 690K) reports Hadley also said, "We're not looking for a big, bold announcement. … This is an opportunity for the president and Prime Minister Maliki to get together, to get a report from this commission they have adopted. This is obviously an important time for both Iraqis and Americans in developing a way ahead." The Washington Times/AP (11/22) runs a similar report.

DOJ_NMG_0097014

Former President Bush Defends Son In UAE Speech. The Los Angeles Times/AP (11/22, Krane) reports former President George H.W. Bush "took on Arab critics of his son Tuesday during a testy exchange at a leadership conference" in Abu Dhabi, capital of the United Arab Emirates, a US ally. Bush said, "My son is an honest man." The AP adds the UAE "used to be safe territory for former President Bush, who brought Arab leaders together in a coalition that drove Saddam Hussein's troops from Kuwait in 1991. But gratitude for the elder Bush, who served as president from 1989-93, was overshadowed at the conference by hostility toward his son, whose invasion of Iraq and support for Israel are deeply unpopular in the region." A woman in the audience "bluntly told Bush after his speech," "We do not respect your son. We do not respect what he's doing all over the world." The AP adds Bush, 82, "appeared stunned as others in the audience whooped and whistled in approval." A college student "told Bush his belief that US wars were aimed at opening markets for American companies and said globalization was contrived for America's benefit at the expense of the rest of the world. Bush was having none of it." Bush said, "I think that's weird and it's nuts. To suggest that everything we do is because we're hungry for money, I think that's crazy. I think you need to go back to school." The "hostile comments came during a question-and-answer session after Bush finished a folksy address on leadership by telling the audience how deeply hurt he feels when his presidential son is criticized." But Bush "also told the audience its derisive hoots were mild compared to the reaction he got in Germany in the 1980s, after persuading the country to deploy US nuclear missiles."

Baker Report Almost Ready; Pentagon Drafting Alternative. The Washington Times (11/22, Scarborough, 88K) reports, "The Pentagon is drafting its own new options for winning in Iraq, in part, to give President Bush counterproposals to fall back on in case the Iraq Study Group comes up with ideas he does not like, defense officials say." Meanwhile, "study group co-chairman Lee H. Hamilton, a former Democratic representative from Indiana, told The Washington Times yesterday that he and co-chairman James A. Baker III, secretary of state in the first Bush administration, have nearly completed a first draft report." Hamilton "said the two men hope to complete it this weekend, give it to the eight other Iraq Study Group members in time for a meeting next week to review it."

Kaplan Says Iraq Reinforcing "Realist Dictum." In an op-ed for the Washington Post (11/22, 690K), Robert Kaplan writes, "The debacle in Iraq has reinforced the realist dictum, disparaged by idealists in the 1990s, that the legacies of geography, history and culture really do set limits on what can be accomplished in any given place." But "the [1990s] experience in the Balkans reinforced an idealist dictum that is equally true: One should always work near the limits of what is possible rather than cynically give up on any place. In this decade idealists went too far; in the previous one, it was realists who did not go far enough."

Ignatius Says Iraqis Have To Follow Saudi Model. In his Washington Post (11/22, 690K) column, David Ignatius writes, "What are the lessons in Saudi Arabia's move back from the brink of potential disaster? The most important is that the Saudis decided to take charge of their own security rather than relying on an America that many in the kingdom resented. ... How does this apply to Iraq? Like the Saudis, the Iraqis will have to save themselves, working within the authentic political framework of their culture, religion and region. The more we try to substitute our will for theirs, with more American troops or exhortation, the more we enfeeble them. ... Only the United States can broker the regional conference that will allow a political transition in Iraq. That's our leverage now -- diplomatic clout, more than military power."

More Commentary. In her New York Times column (11/22), Maureen Dowd says, "It's hard to remember when America has been so stuck. We can't win and we can't leave. The good news is that the election finished what Katrina started. It dismantled the president's fake reality about Iraq, causing opinions to come gushing forth from all quarters about where to go from here. The bad news is that no one, and I mean no one, really knows where to go from here. The White House and the Pentagon are ready to shift to Plan B. But Plan B is their empty term for miraculous salvation." Dowd notes in a parenthetical comment, "Dick Cheney and his wormy aides, of course, are still babbling about total victory and completing the mission by raising the stakes and knocking off the mullahs in Tehran. His tombstone will probably say, 'Here lies Dick Cheney, still winning.'"

DOJ_NMG_0097015

Lieberman Blasts Democrats Urging "Cut And Run" Iraq Policy. On Fox News' Hannity and Colmes (11/21) Sen. Joseph Lieberman, discussing Senate colleagues who campaigned against him, said, "Obviously, some of the things that happened were disappointing and I guess you don't forget them." Asked what could cause him to switch parties, Lieberman said, "I really do hope that I don't get to that point. … I guess if my party began to take positions in the Senate that were an accumulation that I felt was so wrong for our country, I might think about switching. But I'm not expecting that. … I know it's a 51-49 senate. But I have got to tell you every time there is a disagreement I am not going to threaten to pick up my vote and go to the other side of the Senate chamber." Lieberman went on to vow he will speak out against Democrats who are urging the US to "cut and run" from Iraq, saying, "They are now proposing that we begin a withdrawal of American troops from Iraq within the next four to six months. I think that would -- that's a road to disaster, that's basically the beginning of giving up on Iraq. And as bad as things are in Iraq today, they would be dramatically worse if we just pick up and leave. … We cannot let that happen. Iraq is now a central battlefield in the war on terrorism and we have got to have a success strategy there."

Lieberman Hires Former Christian Coalition, McCain Aide As Spokesman. The New York Times (11/22, Leibovich, 1.16M) reports Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman "announced Tuesday that he had hired a new spokesman, which is not in itself that noteworthy, except that the said spokesman, Marshall Wittmann, is one of the great career vagabonds, ideological contortionists and political pontificators ever to inflict himself on a city full of them." Lieberman, "a longtime Democrat of Connecticut who was re-elected as an independent and calls himself an 'Independent Democrat,' has not ruled out becoming a Republican." Wittmann, meanwhile, is "a Trotskyite turned Zionist turned Reaganite turned bipartisan irritant turned pretty much everything in between — including chief lobbyist for the Christian Coalition, the only Jew who has ever held that position." Wittmann "suffered through a two-year dry patch from 2002 to 2004 when he was a spokesman for Senator John McCain, the Arizona Republican, a job that largely required him to suppress his inner quotemeister for his boss's even-more-impressive knack for drawing attention." Now Wittmann will "once again have to stifle his pundit proclivities to the greater good of Mr. Lieberman." Even though "he has a new boss, Mr. Wittmann still swears deep and abiding affection for Mr. McCain. And the feeling is apparently mutual: Mr. McCain said through an aide that Mr. Wittmann was 'a dear friend.'" All of which "raises the question of what happens if Mr. McCain runs for president and invites Mr. Wittmann to join his campaign." Wittmann said, "One thing I've learned in the press world is that I don't answer hypothetical questions."

Reed Calls For "Phased Redeployment," "Regional Dialogue." Sen. Jack Reed, on MSNBC's Hardball with Chris Matthews (11/21) said, "The President should be stepping up immediately. He can't wait…until next January until we take over or for the Iraq Study Group. He should immediately send over a high-ranking envoy to Baghdad…to start negotiating key elements -- when will they take out their militia, how will they divide oil revenues. … If that's left to next January, then we and he have wasted valuable time. He's wasted valuable time." Reed went on to say the US should "begin a phased redeployment within Iraq and…begin a regional dialogue."

Al Qaeda Portraying Democratic Win As "American Madrid." In a Washington Times op-ed (11/22), Walid Phares, senior fellow with the Foundation for the Defense of Democracies, says, "The latest audio by al Qaeda's Iraq commander -- posted 48 hours after the midterm elections -- sends a clear signal to the readers of the jihadi strategic mind: Al Qaeda and its advisers around the world want to provoke an 'American Madrid.' Portraying the United States as a bleeding bull in disarray, the war room projects its wish to see America's will crippled." The video "attempts to…convince the jihadists that the United States is now defeated in Iraq and beyond. While no reversal of the balance of power has taken place on the ground, the jihadi propaganda machine is linking the shift in domestic politics to a withdrawal from Iraq." It also attempts to "spread political chaos at home. Jihadists portray the Democratic takeover of Congress and the resignation of Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld (and maybe others) as signs of American weakening in the resolve to fight jihadism." The terminology "used in the videotape is a powerful indicator that al Qaeda's political network relies on Western-educated minds, familiar with political processes in the United States and serving as advisers to the jihadists." The Jihaidsts "aim at sapping American public morale during a time when reorganization is taking place in the U.S. government."

DOJ_NMG_0097016

Congressman-Elect Generated Questionable Iraq Intelligence. The Los Angeles Times (11/22, Miller, 850K) profiles Democratic Rep.-elect Chris Carney, who, "of all the Democrats who rode a wave of public anger over Iraq to election victories this month," had the "most unlikely credentials as a war critic." Carney was "part of a controversial intelligence unit at the Pentagon that was responsible for some of the most alarming -- and, it turned out, unfounded -- prewar claims about Iraq." The Pentagon unit "was created and run by one of the Iraq war's principal architects, then-Undersecretary of Defense Douglas J. Feith." Carney "took part in briefings at the White House and the Pentagon that disparaged the CIA for underestimating the relationship between Baghdad and the terrorist network. Vice President Dick Cheney and other administration officials frequently touted the findings to bolster the case for war." Despite his background, Carney "campaigned as an antiwar Democrat and said he got a 'very warm reception' when he arrived at Capitol Hill this week to take part in orientation activities for incoming members." Carney "is not apologetic about his work at the Pentagon." Said Carney, "I certainly stand by the fact that I believe there was some sort of relationship." He added that on "a scale from zero to 10, with zero being no relationship and 10 perfect operational coordination," Carney said, "the Iraq-Al Qaeda link was 'somewhere in the 2.5 range.'" The Times adds that "appears to be a more qualified assessment than the so-called Policy Counterterrorism Evaluation Group presented to policymakers during a series of briefings in 2002."

Syria, Iraq Renew Diplomatic Relations. ABC World News (11/21, story 4, 0:15, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "In Iraq today, Syria and Iraq re-established diplomatic ties, after 24 years. The US and Iraq have said that Syria is going to have to do a lot more to stop weapons and insurgents flowing across its border into Iraq."

Fox News' Special Report (11/21, Hume) asked, "What impact will the suspicion of Syrian involvement have on the prospects of getting Damascus to help end the violence in Iraq?" Fox went on to report, "At the State Department, a top ranking official welcomed Iraq having neighborly relations with Syria and Iran, but asked when those countries will behave like a good neighbor towards Iraq?" Under-Secretary of State Nicholas Burns: "The Syrian government permits people, insurgent fighters to cross its border to go into Iraq to kill American soldiers and Iraqis. That ought to stop. The Iranian government we believe has given assistance, material and otherwise, to Shiite insurgent groups attacking Sunni Iraqis but also attacking American and British forces. That has to stop." Fox added, "All this regional jockeying comes as the Bush administration is re-evaluating its conduct of the war in Iraq and has thus far resisted calls for the U.S. to engage more directly with Damascus and Tehran."

The Financial Times (11/22, Biedermann) reports "the move comes as the US and other western powers are exploring the option of enlisting Syrian and Iranian help in stabilising Iraq." But "there are no signs yet that Damascus is preparing to change its policies on the ground in Iraq, where it has been accused of supporting the insurgency." Similarly, the Christian Science Monitor (11/22, Murphy, 59K) says the US "has repeatedly accused Iran and Syria of stirring up violence inside Iraq, but recently the notion of isolating them as punishment has lost favor in Washington. A growing number of...Bush's advisers are urging direct dialogue with both nations. They argue that engagement could convince Syria to do more to prevent foreign fighters from entering Iraq; Iran could exert more influence on Iraq's dominant Shiite political parties (and their militias) to compromise more."

Bomb Fails To Kill Iraqi Speaker Inside Green Zone. The New York Times (11/22, Wong, 1.16M) reports, "A bomb exploded in an armored car belonging to the speaker of Parliament, wounding the American security guard who was driving it out of a parking area in the government Green Zone and disrupting a meeting of lawmakers nearby, a parliamentary aide said. Though the speaker, Mahmoud al-Mashhadani, was not in the vehicle and was unscathed, the assassination attempt was one of the most serious breaches of security yet within the Green Zone, the heavily fortified government district on the west bank of the Tigris River." The bomb "was planted inside a decoy armored car that was part of the speaker's regular convoy and resembled the one he usually used, said the parliamentary aide, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to talk publicly about the attack."

The Washington Post (11/22, A17, Trejos, 690K) reports Lt. Col. Christopher C. Garver, a spokesman for US forces in Iraq, said "bomb-sniffing dogs then detected explosives in another vehicle." Bomb "specialists detonated that car, which set off a series of blasts that caused a fire but injured no one and caused no major damage to nearby structures." Garver "said he was not sure how the explosives made it so far into the Green Zone, which houses the Iraqi government, the US and British embassies and thousands of foreign troops and private contractors. Anyone trying to enter the zone must pass through several checkpoints -- first to get into the complex, then to enter individual buildings."

DOJ_NMG_0097017

Joint US-Iraqi Raid Kills Nephew Of Iraqi Lawmaker. The CBS Evening News (11/21, story 2, 1:55, Couric, 7.66M) reported "a joint US-Iraqi force, just the type the Pentagon is trying to build, raided a neighborhood in Baghdad today, capturing seven suspected militiamen. But the raid had some unintended victims." CBS (Palmer) added, "It was dawn in the Shiite slum of Sadr City when calamity struck from the sky. An American air strike had accidentally killed a baby boy in his family home. 'His father was injured, so was his mother,' says the neighbor. 'Who will protect us?' US and Iraqi forces smashed through houses here looking for criminals they believe kidnapped an American soldier last month. The dead child's uncle is a member of Iraq's parliament. Now he says there's no way he's going back to help govern this broken country."

Iraqi Government Hamstrung By Distrust. The Los Angeles Times (11/22, Daragahi, 850K) reports Iraqis "elected their leaders in December, hoping that a government by the people would do something for the people. Eleven months later, officials acknowledge that their efforts have been mostly a failure," and "government involvement often creates a bigger problem than it solves." Despite US "pressure for results, Iraq's elected officials have been unable to overcome their mistrust of one another and improve security or tackle the major political and economic issues — from murderous cops to the sewage woes of Amil." Now, "fed up with ministers he says were foisted on him by political factions, Prime Minister Nouri Maliki has promised a Cabinet reshuffle. He is scheduled to convene the body this week to address the deepening political divisions and a threatened walkout by the Sunni Arab bloc." But "his resolve may not be enough to overcome the government's inherent frailties and limitations."

Marine Snipers Find Few Targets. The New York Times (11/22, Chivers, 1.16M) reports on the operations of Marine snipers in Anbar province: "This was this sniper team's 30th mission in Anbar Province since early August. They had yet to fire a shot. More than three years after the insurgency erupted across much of Iraq, sniping — one of the methods that the military thought would be essential in its counterinsurgency operations — is proving less successful in many areas of Iraq than had been hoped, Marine officers, trainers and snipers say." Snipers "are seeing fewer clear targets than previously, and are shooting fewer insurgents than expected." Insurgents, after four years, have become "more savvy and harder to kill." Marines also attribute the decline in sniping to "rules and conditions placed on them by senior military leaders."

Marines Issue Flame-Resistant Flight Suits To Ground Troops. USA Today (11/22, Vanden Brook, 2.27M) reports, "Marine commanders are outfitting their troops with flame-resistant flight suits in Iraq to ward off burns from the No. 1 killer here: roadside bombs. It's another sign of how troops in the field have adapted to the deadly insurgency. Earlier in the war, troops added their own armor to vehicles and devised their own makeshift electronic jamming devices to foil the growing power and sophistication of the bombs they encountered. ... So far, the Marines have issued more than 12,000 fire-resistant suits, said Capt. Jeff Landis, spokesman for the Marine Corps Systems Command. ... The Army also has begun to issue fire-resistant flight suits to tank and truck drivers in Iraq, said Lt. Col. Carl Ey, an Army spokesman at the Pentagon. Next year, the Army plans to issue fire-resistant pullovers, boots and socks, records show."

Parents Stand By Haditha Suspect. The Washington Post (11/22, A3, White, 690K) reports on the family of Haditha murder suspect Lance Cpl. Justin Sharratt: "The Sharratts have remained silent until now because they did not know what to say. They have avoided learning details of their son's possible involvement in the shootings while they have struggled to understand what might have happened in a war zone thousands of miles away. They have privately fumed about politicians -- such as Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.) -- who have publicly stated that their son was part of a brutal, vengeful slaughter. And they are livid that no one in the Marine Corps has stepped forward to defend their son." The Post adds, "Military officials familiar with the investigation said there is some evidence that could show wrongdoing, including images, taken by an unmanned aircraft, that appear to show that a group of civilians shot near their car -- which had approached the Marine convoy after the bomb went off -- were executed. At least one Marine has told officials that he saw another Marine standing over the bodies and emptying his rifle's clip into them, according to two people closely familiar with the case."

DOJ_NMG_0097018

US, Afghan Officials Say More Troops, Equipment Needed. The AP (11/22, Baldor) reports US and Afghan defense officials said, "More troops and sophisticated equipment are needed to bolster Afghanistan's security forces, but it is not clear whether more U.S. troops will be deployed there." Lt. Gen. Karl Eikenberry "told Pentagon reporters that U.S. officials will wait until after next week's NATO summit in Latvia to see how many troops other countries plan to provide before deciding if more U.S. forces must be sent to Afghanistan." Eikenberry said, "I think it will be best at this point to wait and see what NATO is able to provide. There's more meetings that are taking place on the military staff. And this is very high on their agenda." The AP adds US military leaders "have been pushing NATO members to meet their commitments and provide more troops in Afghanistan. For months, officials have said that NATO nations have provided only 85 percent of the support they promised." The Afghan minister of defense, Gen. Abdul Rahim Wardak, "who met Tuesday with Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, said his country needs more firepower, transport planes and armored vehicles. The Afghans have asked for additional helicopters and aircraft that can move troops and supplies through the mountainous regions."

Relatively Stable Afghan North, West Become "Time Bomb." The Financial Times (11/22, Morarjee) reports in a 1,600 word map-supported article, "On Nato maps, Afghanistan's southern provinces and eastern areas along the border with Pakistan are shaded a fiery red, reflecting the hot spots of a persistent insurgency. By contrast, the northern and western provinces are shown in green, dotted with yellow to indicate pockets of instability. But the colour-coding is deceptive. The government and its international backers can no longer take the relative peace of the north and west for granted. It is becoming clear that warlords and commanders from other ethnic groups are increasingly a menace." Reportedly "angry about being pushed aside" by the Karzai government, Northern Alliance warlords who "swept the Taliban from power" make the north a "ticking time bomb," as described by an unnamed diplomat. The FT continues, "Local militia commanders are rethinking their backing of the central government and Islamic militants are moving to mobilise support outside their southern strongholds by exploiting the factional fault-lines in the north and the west." Furthermore, "the bulk of the 2,700 troops in the north are German and are constrained by caveats that would not allow them to leave their bases to intervene in a big clash in the region. Italian, Spanish and Lithuanian troops in the west are similarly hidebound."

Pakistan Arrests 39 Suspected Taliban In Quetta. The AP (11/22, Sattar) reports Pakistan police "arrested 39 Afghans suspected of being Taliban fighters in the southwestern Pakistani city of Quetta, an official said Tuesday, though an Islamist group insisted the detainees were only students." The arrests "late Monday and early Tuesday came in separate raids on rented houses in areas with large Afghan refugee populations, said Chaudhry Mohammed Yaqoob, chief of police in Baluchistan province, whose capital is Quetta." Police are "interrogating the suspects to learn if any senior Taliban figures were among them, Yaqoob said. Afghan officials have alleged Taliban leader Mullah Omar is in Quetta, but Pakistan has rejected the claim."

US Accused Of "Shameful" Record Of Abandoning Allies. In his Los Angeles Times (11/22, 850K) column, Max Boot writes about perceived Iraqi unwillingness to fight for the "American-backed government": "Would you stake your life on a regime whose existence depends on Washington's continuing support? Given our long, shameful record of leaving allies in the lurch, that has never seemed to be a smart bet. We have been betraying friends since our first overseas conflict, against the Barbary pirates who captured ships off the African coast and enslaved their crews." Boot lists Eastern Europe, Vietnam, Iran, and Iraq (in 1991) as other examples of US irresolution. He concludes, "If we do scuttle out of Iraq prematurely, Afghans and others whose support we seek will get the message again: Don't trust Uncle Sam. The least we can do is to assure those Iraqis who have worked closely with American forces — whether as janitors, translators, soldiers or bureaucrats — that, if we do leave, they and their families will receive asylum in the United States."

Army Turns To New Recruiting Slogan. The Washington Post (11/22, A19, Tyson, 690K) reports, "The Army, facing another tough recruiting season, launched a $200 million-a-year advertising campaign this month and unveiled a new slogan: 'Army Strong.' ... The television ads, launched nationwide for Veterans Day along with Internet placements and other outreach, omit all but the most fleeting images related to the all-volunteer Army's biggest endeavor ever: the war in Iraq. ... There are obvious reasons the Army might not want to underscore to potential recruits, and their parents, that signing up these days almost inevitably means deployment to combat zones in Afghanistan or Iraq, where the majority of the more than 2,850 killed and 21,000 wounded have been soldiers." The Post adds that "by far the most popular recent slogan, according to soldiers interviewed, was 'Be All You Can Be,' which lasted 20 years until a recruiting downturn saw it changed in 2001."

DOJ_NMG_0097019

DOJ:

GAO Finds Room For DOJ Improvement In Information Classification Practices.

Government Computer News (11/22, Hostetler) reports, "The Justice Department needs a standard classification system and needs to address its staffing shortage, according to a report issued by the Government Accountability Office." GCN continues, "DOJ and its bureaus, specifically the FBI, were under review to determine if the department implemented the National Archives and Records Administration's Information Security Oversight Office (ISOO) recommendations to correct problems in their document classification systems. … ISOO is responsible for oversight of national security classification programs for Executive Branch agencies. GAO conducted the study because of the important role information protection and sharing plays in preventing terrorist attacks, the report said." GCN adds, "DOJ ranks third in the number of documents classified in the executive branch, behind the Defense Department and the CIA. Within DOJ, the FBI handles 98 percent of that work. … In any DOJ entity, a document can be classified in one of five ways: Limited Office Use Only, For Office Use Only, Law Enforcement Sensitive, Propriety Information or DEA-sensitive (specific to DEA). Each of these designations have 'unique definitions and safeguard requirements,' but they do not have 'specific guidance on the types of information that merit each designation,' the report said. … Without specific guidelines, employees do not know if the information warrants a sensitive but classified distinction. The components of DOJ do not train their employees to make these decisions nor do they oversee the process by which employees label the information."

The Washington Times (11/22, Seper) reports, "The Justice Department's classification program, which determines what information could reasonably be expected to damage the country's national security if disclosed publicly, is at risk because of a lack of adequate staffing, according to a government report." The Times continues, "In a 50-page report yesterday, the Government Accountability Office said the department's classification-management program needs to assess its 'optimum' manpower requirements, develop a strategy to meet them, and then implement internal controls 'to ensure proper use of sensitive but unclassified designations.' … 'The September 11 attacks showed that agencies must balance the need to protect and share sensitive information to prevent future attacks,' the report says. 'Agencies classify this information or designate it sensitive but unclassified to protect and limit access to it.'" The Times adds, "But, according to the GAO, the department is at risk because it has not addressed the problem of insufficient staffing to effectively manage and oversee the program, noting it has one staff member to cover departmentwide training issues and three staffers to oversee 3,500 locations under the program. … 'According to the program manager, with these resources, the security office was reacting to classification issues that arose rather than being proactive to prevent them,' the GAO said. … Staffing increases for the Justice Department program were recommended by the National Archives' Information Security Oversight Office, which reviewed security procedures in July 2004 and April 2005. GAO was asked this year to see how well the department and the FBI had responded to the request. … The GAO said Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales should determine what staffing he needs to carry out the responsibilities of the department's classification-management program and devise a strategy to make those resources available and use them effectively."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

DOJ Drops Effort To Restore Lay Conviction.

Bloomberg (11/22, Calkins) reports, "The U.S. government dropped an attempt to restore the convictions of Enron Corp. founder Kenneth Lay, who died six weeks after being found guilty of spearheading the fraud that destroyed the company." Bloomberg continues, "Lay died of a heart attack in July after being convicted in May of 10 fraud and conspiracy charges. U.S. District Judge Sim Lake threw out the verdicts under a legal principle that erases convictions of defendants who die before they can appeal." Bloomberg adds, "The government moved (Monday) to withdraw a Nov. 16 notice of an appeal of Lake's decision. Steven Tyrrell, chief of the Justice Department's fraud section, said in the document the government made the move after a bill to change the law was introduced in Congress. He didn't elaborate. … 'Now, from a criminal standpoint, Ken Lay is forever exonerated,' said Ed Tomko, a former federal prosecutor who defended another Enron executive against fraud charges." Bloomberg notes, "Tomko said efforts to change the law are 'largely meaningless' to Lay's criminal case, because lawmakers can't apply punishments retroactively. … 'It might mean something to the next case,' Tomko said. 'But the government is already chasing Ken Lay's money in a civil case.' … U.S. authorities last month filed a civil forfeiture case against Lay's estate, seeking $12.5 million for victims of Enron's collapse. The government asked for a jury trial to re-establish Lay's responsibility for the fraud. … Justice Department spokeswoman Jaclyn Lesch and Samuel Buffone, Lay's appellate lawyer, declined to comment on the government's decision not to appeal."

DOJ_NMG_0097020

CRIMINAL LAW:

DOJ Decides Against Probe Of Porter Fundraising Allegation. The Las Vegas Review-Journal (11/21, Tetreault) reported, "The Justice Department has decided not to pursue an accusation that Rep. Jon Porter made fundraising calls from his congressional offices earlier this year, a practice that would be illegal if proved, officials confirmed Monday. The charge was leveled by a former Porter staffer who offered e-mails in support of his charge against the Nevada Republican." The Review-Journal added, "Bryan Sierra, a Justice Department spokesman, said, 'The FBI looked at it and the matter was declined.' … Porter said he took the news as vindication 'by the highest law enforcement in the land,' and that the accusation was suspect from the start. 'This was something raised two weeks before the election by a disgruntled ex-employee,' he said."

The AP (11/22) reports, "Nevada state Democratic Party chairman Tom Collins said Justice Department officials said late last week that the FBI probe was not moving forward. Collins said no reason was provided. … 'You have to look at who hires these guys in the Justice Department,' Collins said. 'This is just the typical Bush-Cheney cover-up stuff. Jon Porter has done nothing to clear his name.'"

Three Aryan Brotherhood Members Sentenced To Life. The AP (11/22, Flaccus) reports from Santa Ana, CA, "A federal judge sentenced three suspected leaders of the violent Aryan Brotherhood prison gang to life terms Tuesday, saying the sentences were the only just response to three decades of orchestrated murders and attempted murders in some of the nation's toughest penitentiaries." The AP continues, "Barry 'The Baron' Mills, 58, was sentenced to four consecutive life terms without possibility of parole, a sentence automatically imposed after a jury deadlocked earlier this year on the death penalty. Tyler 'The Hulk' Bingham, 59, also escaped the death penalty but received three consecutive life terms without possibility of parole. … A third defendant, Edgar 'The Snail' Hevle, was sentenced to three consecutive life terms and will likely die in prison. He had not been eligible for the death penalty." The AP adds, "Carter said the sentences were appropriate for crimes 'spanning well over 30 years of murder and organizational murder.' … 'It's almost inconceivable and the duration of time is almost inconceivable,' Carter said of the string of murders, attempted murders and other crimes before handing down the sentence. … The defendants have 10 days to file appeals with the 9th Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals."

Three Gang Members Sentenced To Live For Targeting Blacks. The Washington Times (11/22, Seper) reports, "Three Los Angeles-area Hispanic gang members have been sentenced to life in prison in what federal prosecutors called hate-crime attacks that randomly targeted black non-gang members, including women and children." The Times continues, "Gilbert Saldana, 27, Alejandro Martinez, 28, and Fernando Cazares, 25, were sentenced Monday to consecutive life terms without the possibility of parole by U.S. District Judge Percy Anderson in Los Angeles for their roles in the slaying of two black men in 1999 and 2000." The Times adds, "Judge Anderson said the men, members of the Avenues gang, maintained a 'reign of terror' over the Highland Park area northeast of Los Angeles that had 'far-reaching consequences.' Under federal sentencing guidelines, the judge could have imposed lesser sentences but declined to do so. … Prosecutors said the men tried to drive blacks out of the neighborhood in a six-year conspiracy of violence and threats." The Times adds, "Law-enforcement authorities said the prosecution was one of the first prominent cases in which the Justice Department targeted street gang members with hate-crime laws normally used to prosecute white supremacist groups. … In October, Robert B. Loosle, special agent in charge of the criminal division at the FBI's Los Angeles office, told a House subcommittee that gangs and other criminal enterprises pose increasing concerns for the international law-enforcement and intelligence communities. … Calling gangs 'more violent, more organized and more widespread than ever before,' Mr. Loosle estimated that there are 30,000 gangs nationwide with 800,000 members affecting 2,500 communities."

DOJ_NMG_0097021

Ohio Brokers Acquitted Of All Bribery Charges. The Columbus Dispatch (11/22, Niquette) reports, "After about three hours of deliberation," a federal jury in Akron yesterday "acquitted two Cleveland-area brokers accused of conspiring to bribe the former chief financial officer at the Ohio Bureau of Workers' Compensation with use of a Florida condominium. The…jury returned not-guilty verdicts on all charges against Michael W. Lewis and Daniel P. O'Neil after closing arguments in which their attorneys argued that the government's key witness was not credible. … The verdict is a setback for the state and federal task force investigating allegations of corruption at the bureau. The investigation has produced convictions for 10 public figures so far, including Gov. Bob Taft and coin dealer Thomas W. Noe, who was sentenced Monday to 18 years in state prison." The Dispatch notes, "Lewis and O'Neil were charged with two counts of conspiring to bribe the bureau's Terrence W. Gasper and one count each of lying to an FBI agent about Gasper's role in purchasing the Florida condo in 1998."

Tennessee License Examiner Sentenced To Prison For Taking Bribes. The Murfreesboro Post (11/22, Marchesoni) reports, "One former driver's license examiner in Rutherford County was sentenced Monday to 19 months in prison and two years of supervised probation after his release, a federal prosecutor said. Ex-examiner Bruce Conklin of Murfreesboro pleaded guilty in July to accepting more than $30,000 in bribes in connection with his job. … Conklin and five other people were charged in January in a six-count federal indictment as part of the 18-month Operation Crooked Highway probe. Driving school employees paid the examiners to obtain driver's licenses and one-year driving certificates of driving for immigrants at the school who didn't complete the required 36 hours of training or had questionable documents about citizenship." The Post notes, "The FBI, Internal Revenue Service, federal Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents and the Department of Safety investigated the case."

Federal Agents, Philadelphia Police Arrest Suspect In 1989 Racial Murder. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (11/22) reports, "Authorities have charged a white man with murder and ethnic intimidation in the shooting of a black man 17 years ago. Thomas Gibison, 35, was arrested without incident before dawn Nov. 7 at his home in Newark, Del., FBI spokeswoman Jerri Williams said Tuesday. Gibison is also charged with conspiracy and a firearms violation in the killing of 34-year-old Aaron Wood of Philadelphia on April 16, 1989." The AP notes, "He was arrested by a task force that included Philadelphia authorities, FBI agents and members of the federal bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives." The Philadelphia Inquirer (11/22, Arnold, 385K) adds, "Law enforcement officials said they could not disclose specific details related to the killing or the exact details of what led authorities to Gibison."

Judge Agrees To Freeze Hedge Fund Manager's Assets Over Alleged Fraud. The AP (11/22) reports, "The Securities and Exchange Commission said on Tuesday that a federal judge has agreed to freeze the assets of a New York hedge fund manager accused of bilking investors out of millions of dollars. Spiro Germenis, the hedge fund manager, has been accused of diverting money from Oracle Services Inc. and Oracle Evolution LLC for his own use. He has fled to Greece, according to the SEC. … 'We're aware that an investigation by the U.S. attorney's office and the FBI is ongoing in addition to the SEC action that was just filed,' said Zachary Margulis-Ohnuma, an attorney for Germenis's wife, Maria Germenis. He said that Mrs. Germenis was 'doing every thing she can to cooperate with the authorities.'"

Federal Agents, Florida Police Arrest Suspects In DOT Laptop Theft. The Miami Herald (11/22, Lebowitz, 286K) reports, "Authorities investigating the July theft of a federal agent's laptop containing the sensitive personal information of 133,000 Floridians, believe they have broken up a ring of computer thieves who may be responsible for its disappearance. Two men are facing charges related to the theft of other laptops from vehicles near the Latin American Grill in Doral, where the agent's laptop was stolen from his parked sport-utility vehicle on July 27." The Herald notes Juan Esteban Calle and Carlos Andres Leon "were arrested during an extensive surveillance operation by DOT inspector general, the FBI and Miami-Dade police at Doral area restaurant parking lots -- including the same restaurant where the agent's laptop disappeared. With video cameras rolling, Calle used a lock-punching device similar to the one used in the DOT theft to open a passenger-side door and steal a decoy laptop with a tracking device attached."

DOJ_NMG_0097022

The AP (11/22, Anderson) also reports on the arrest and adds, "The inspector general's statement said no evidence of credit fraud had occurred since the laptop went missing. … A second DOT inspector general's office laptop was also stolen during a hotel conference in Orlando in April. t contained sensitive information on about 9,500 individuals, all of whom were on the stolen Miami laptop as well. The Orlando investigation has made less headway and is continuing, the inspector general's office said."

Key Prosecution Witness Testifies Jeffs Coerced Underage Marriage. USA Today (11/22, 3A, Wagner, 2.27M) reports, "In tearful testimony, the lead prosecution witness against polygamist church leader Warren Jeffs said Tuesday that she was threatened with banishment if she did not marry her cousin at age 14. The woman, now 20 and married to a different man, described being coerced by Jeffs and other leaders of the religious sect during a preliminary hearing. 'This was the darkest time in my entire life.'" USA adds, "During cross-examination, defense attorney Tara Isaacson sought to portray the woman as a willing participant in the wedding and argued that Jeffs did not know the couple had sex. Isaacson introduced sweetheart notes the couple had traded and quoted from the girl's journal, in which she expressed enthusiasm about being singled out for marriage. The woman testified that the entry was written before she learned the identity of her partner." CNN Newsroom (11/21, Tuchman, 3:00 p.m.) noted Jeffs "was on the FBI 10 most wanted list for months," and reported, "He had a smile on his face for most of the morning," but when the woman took the stand, "his smile then disappeared. … She says that, the entire time at the wedding -- this is a quote – 'The entire time I was there, I was crying. I was so scared. I wanted to die.'" ABC World News (11/21, story 9, 0:15, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "A judge is deciding whether Jeffs will be tried as an accomplice to rape."

In a widely-distributed story, the AP (11/22, Dobner, Foy) reports, "Prosecutors completed their case Tuesday, and 5th District Judge James Shumate said the preliminary hearing would resume Dec. 14. Jeffs' defense team plans to call two witnesses, including the woman's current husband. On Tuesday, one of Jeffs' lawyers introduced photographs of a smiling, laughing couple and got the woman to acknowledge Jeffs never explicitly ordered her to have sex with her new husband." The AP adds, "Raised in the faith since birth, Jeffs' accuser said she felt a heavy responsibility to 'the entire community' in the days leading to the marriage ceremony. 'I was scared. 'I didn't have any place to go,' said the woman." The Salt Lake Tribune (11/22, Adams), identifying the woman as "Jane Doe IV," reports she testified about "her attempts to get…Jeffs to release her from the union. But Doe also admitted she never explicitly accused her husband of rape in those conversations with Jeffs. 'I said to Warren he was touching me and doing things I didn't like,' said Doe, now 20. 'I didn't tell anybody I was being raped.'"

The New York Times (11/22, Dougherty, 1.16M) notes, "The woman testified that she had told Warren Jeffs that she did not want to be married. … She said Mr. Jeffs had told her that her marriage to her cousin 'was a revelation from God' and ordered her to prepare for the wedding." However, Jeffs lawyer Walter Bugden Jr. "told the news media after the hearing that the state was conducting 'religious persecution' and predicted that Mr. Jeffs would be acquitted." Bugden added, "Officiating at a wedding ceremony does not make Mr. Jeffs an accomplice to rape." NPR's All Things Considered (11/21, Norris, Berkes) also reported on the hearing, including clips of the anguished testimony from the witness.

Curbs On Sex Offenders Seen As Ineffective, Inhumane. The Washington Post (11/22, A1, Whoriskey) reports, "As convicted sex offenders go, they seem to pose little danger. … One is 100 years old. Another can barely walk and is in the late stages of Alzheimer's disease. Another is dying of heart disease in a nursing home. .. .Yet under a new Georgia law, thousands of registered sex offenders, even the old and feeble, could be pushed from their homes and hospices." The Post continues, "As states around the country have sought in recent years to control the whereabouts of convicted sex offenders, Georgia's law stands out as one of the toughest, a testament to the daunting public fears regarding children's safety. … The roughly 10,000 sex offenders living in Georgia have been forbidden to live within 1,000 feet of a school, playground, church or school bus stop. Taken together, the prohibitions place nearly all the homes in some counties off-limits -- amounting, in a practical sense, to banishment." The Post adds, "Since the law's enactment in July, however, a federal judge, human rights advocates and even some of the sheriff's departments that are supposed to enforce the measure have suggested that the zeal for safety may have gone too far. … The residency law applies not only to sexual predators but to all people registered for sexual crimes, including men and women convicted of having underage consensual sex while in high school. … Advocates for the sex offenders say the law is unfair to people who have served their sentences and been deemed rehabilitated. Many police officers, prosecutors and children's advocates also question whether such measures are effective. Most predators are mobile, after all, and by upending their lives, the law may make them more likely to commit other offenses, critics say."

DOJ_NMG_0097023

FBI Establishes Western Pennsylvania Corruption Hotline. The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (11/22, Ward, 230K) reports, "In an effort to combat public corruption in Western Pennsylvania, the FBI has established a telephone hot line that people can call to file complaints of possible abuse by elected and appointed officials. Tips…can be made anonymously; they will be followed up on by investigators." The Post-Gazette notes, "Public corruption has been stated as one of the highest priorities of the U.S. Department of Justice."

FBI Investigating Former Louisiana Charity Grant Office. The New Orleans Times-Picayune (11/22, Russell) reports, "A state office that oversaw a series of controversial charities tied to African-American legislators is being scrutinized by the FBI, Gov. Kathleen Blanco's office confirmed Tuesday in announcing that it had complied with a subpoena for records from the department. … Critics commonly derided the grants -- and similar money doled out to rural districts -- as legislative 'slush funds' that governors could use as an incentive to get reluctant legislators to vote their way." The Times-Picayune adds, "It's unclear what the FBI is looking for. But earlier this year, James Bernazzani, the special agent in charge of the FBI's New Orleans field office, announced his intention to investigate two charities that were financed by the Office of Urban Affairs. Both of the groups -- Care Unlimited and Orleans Metropolitan Housing & Community Development -- have longtime ties to U.S. Rep. William Jefferson, D-New Orleans. … Bernazzani said little Tuesday, acknowledging only that 'during the course of an ongoing investigation, the FBI served subpoenas on select offices.'"

Baltimore Council Mulls Taping Of Police Interrogations. The Baltimore Sun (11/22, Jones) reports, "The Baltimore City Council is reviewing a bill that would require the videotaping of police interrogations of witnesses or suspects in violent crimes -- a measure opposed by police but endorsed by public defenders who represent suspected criminals." The Sun continues, "Councilman James B. Kraft, chairman of the council's public safety subcommittee, said he introduced the legislation because he believes it would decrease the number of allegations of improper behavior by police officers. Kraft said a video would protect officers against false charges, and witnesses against intimidation or illegal questioning." The Sun adds, "Representatives of the Police Department -- who say they generally record statements but do not use video -- said at a hearing Tuesday that they have doubts about using cameras, and one high-ranking detective called it "costly" and potentially harmful for prosecutors. … Col. Fred H. Bealefeld III, chief of detectives, said at the hearing that his department is studying a video system used in Chicago. Bealefeld said it cost that department millions of dollars to install and run the cameras in interrogation rooms. .. .But the Office of the Public Defender dismissed the cost issue and praised the proposal, saying it could be a significant development in criminal proceedings."

Maryland Man Sentenced To Life For Killing Stepdaughter. The Baltimore Sun (11/22, Mcmenamin) reports, "A 36-year-old convicted sex offender was sentenced Tuesday to life in prison without parole for stabbing, strangling and beating to death his 13-year-old stepdaughter before setting her body and their family's Essex rowhouse on fire to cover up the killing." The Sun continues, "Carl Preston Evans Jr., whose arrest in August 2005 highlighted problems with the state's sex offender registry, also received two consecutive 15-year prison terms, one for the at tempted murder of his infant daughter and one for arson. … Baltimore County Circuit Judge Kathleen G. Cox, who pronounced sentence, characterized the killing as 'a monstrous, monstrous crime,' and pointed out that nothing Evans said, either in court or to an investigator who prepared a pre-sentence report, has shed any light on the motive behind it." The Sun adds, "A Baltimore County jury convicted Evans in September of first-degree murder in the death of Breaunna Floyd, who was stabbed 24 times, strangled and beaten before being doused with gasoline and set on fire. … The jury also convicted Evans of arson for setting fire to the family's row home on Foxridge Lane in Essex in July 2005 and of attempted second-degree murder for leaving then-7-month-old Mosett Evans in the burning house."

DOJ_NMG_0097024

Greek Authorities Pursue Charges Against Getty Antiquities Curator. The Los Angeles Times (11/22, Zirganos, Frammolino, Felch) reports, "Greek authorities have recommended that felony criminal charges be filed against former J. Paul Getty Museum antiquities curator Marion True for her role in the acquisition of a 2,500-year-old gold funerary wreath considered one of the museum's masterpieces." The Times continues, "The Police Headquarters of Athens announced today that the city's chief prosecutor had concluded an initial investigation with the recommendation that five unnamed people -- three foreigners and two Greek citizens — be charged with looting, selling and receiving the gold funeral adornment." The Times adds, "The press release did not name the individuals involved and said only that the object was purchased by a 'private American museum' in 1993 for $1.15 million. A senior Greek official familiar with the case said that the museum was the Getty and that True was among the five defendants. … Under the Greek system, the case will pass to an investigating magistrate who will conduct his own investigation, a process that is expected to take weeks or months." The Times notes, "The Greek announcement comes amid negotiations between the Getty and officials from the Hellenic Ministry of Culture over the return of the wreath and a statue of a female torso, or kore. .. Already this year, the Getty has returned two other objects requested by Greek officials: a 5th century BC marble relief and a 4th century BC inscribed tombstone. The tombstone, or stele, was purchased by J. Paul Getty himself in 1955."

Getty Breaks Off Antiquities Talks With Italy. The New York Times (11/22, Eakin, Povoledo) reports, "In an abrupt change of course, the J. Paul Getty Museum in Los Angeles announced yesterday that it had broken off negotiations with the Italian government and made a 'unilateral' decision to cede only some of the antiquities that Italy says were looted from its soil." The Times continues, "In a six-page letter to the Italian culture minister, Francesco Rutelli, the Getty's director, Michael Brand, said the museum had decided to turn over 26 artifacts. Referring to other treasures sought by the Italians, he said that Italy had 'no valid legal claim' to a prized bronze sculpture in the Getty's collection, and that evidence regarding a limestone cult statue it wanted returned was 'inconclusive.' … Mr. Brand also wrote that the Getty would continue to study the cult statue, regarded by experts as possibly depicting Aphrodite, and would transfer title to Italy if new research lent weight to the country's claim that it had been illegally excavated on its territory." The Times adds, "The museum's move carries significant risks for the Getty. Unlike deals to return disputed art that Italy negotiated this year with the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York and the Museum of Fine Arts in Boston, the ceding of art by the Getty carries no guarantee of loans from Italy or other reciprocal benefits. … The Getty's decision follows nearly a year of tense negotiations over an Italian claim for 52 objects in the museum's collection. The claim rests largely on evidence that has emerged in the trial in Rome of Marion True, a former Getty curator, and Robert Hecht, an American art dealer, on charges of trading in illegally excavated antiquities."

New York To Overhaul System Of Town, Village Courts. The New York Times (11/22, Glaberson) reports, "New York's top judicial officials outlined a plan on Tuesday to begin reforming the state's 300-year-old system of town and village courts, which have been criticized for decades as outmoded, poorly supervised and unfair." The Times continues, "The plan, announced here by the state's chief judge, Judith S. Kaye, included changes that have been recommended for years by defense lawyers and legal experts. Among them were plans to increase training for the justices, to improve their supervision and to better monitor whether they are protecting basic legal principles like the constitutional right to a lawyer. … The courts — known as justice courts — are also to be required for the first time to keep a word-for-word record of their proceedings, like other courts in the state." The Times adds, "While the officials said that many town and village justices are diligent, Judge Kaye said a sweeping reform program was called for by what she called enduring concerns about the courts. The system has survived a century of calls for radical overhaul by governors and commissions, and an important legal challenge in the 1980s. … As outlined by a series of articles in The New York Times in September, the courts have survived in part because the justices — most of them not even lawyers — have longstanding and deep ties to the upstate political system, and because of the substantial cost of replacing them with more professional courts. … The plan announced on Tuesday is the most specific and ambitious effort in years to address significant parts of the system's troubled dealings."

DOJ_NMG_0097025

CIVIL LAW:

Whistleblowers Help US Recover $1.3 Billion In Fraud Cases. The AP (11/22, Jordan) reports, "Whistle-blowers tipped off the government to $1.3 billion worth of fraud cases over the past year, largely at hospitals or other health care providers, the Justice Department said Tuesday." The AP continues, "In all, the department recovered $3.1 billion in settlements -- what prosecutors said was a record amount -- from individuals and companies during the 2006 fiscal year that ended Sept. 30. … 'Many of these cases were initiated by whistle-blowers,' said Assistant Attorney General Peter D. Keisler, who oversees the department's civil division. … He called the $1.3 billion identified by whistle-blowers a recovery level 'probably greater than most years, smaller than a couple.' In return, whistle-blowers were paid $190 million over the year for alerting the government to the fraud." The AP continues, "The single largest settlement, worth $920 million, came against Dallas-based Tenet Healthcare Corp., the nation's second-largest hospital chain. Following claims from six whistle-blowers, prosecutors accused Tenet of overbilling the government for $806 million in Medicare payments and paying $49 million in kickbacks to doctors who referred patients to the health care chain. … Tenet operates 66 hospitals in 12 states, mostly in the Southeast. Overall, fraud settlements with health care companies accounted for $2.2 billion -- more than two-thirds of the annual total." The AP adds, "Whistle-blowers have helped the government recover an estimated $18 billion since 1986, when Congress approved laws to strengthen their protections. … 'Today, individual citizens are making the same kind of important difference in exposing fraud by those who do business with the government,' said Sen. Charles Grassley, R-Iowa, who helped write the laws. … Until now, the government had never recovered $3 billion or more in fraud cases, and passed the $2 billion mark for the first time in 2003, Keisler said."

DC Circuit Overturns Dismissal Of FOIA Suit Over Immigrant Convicts. The Austin American-Statesman (11/22, Carr) reports, "A federal court of appeals ruled Tuesday that a lower court erred in dismissing a case that sought records under the Freedom of Information Act about illegal immigrant convicts who are not deported." The AAS continues, "The U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia ordered the trial court to settle factual disputes between Cox Newspapers, which owns the Austin American-Statesman, and the Justice Department over the privacy rights of illegal immigrants convicted of a crime. At the heart of the case is whether privacy rights outweigh the public's right to know that they have been released into the community. … 'We're gratified that the judges agreed with us that the trial court shouldn't have granted the government's motion for summary judgment,' said Andrew Alexander, chief of the Cox Washington bureau. Cox will confer with its lawyers to determine how to proceed, he said." The AAS adds, "The information is essential for assessing whether the government is properly enforcing deportation laws, Alexander said. … 'At its core, the case involves a bedrock American principle that citizens should have access to information that enables them to evaluate the performance of their government,' he said. … The Justice Department declined to comment other than to say it would review the five-page ruling. … The department's lawyers have argued that it has turned over some of the information requested by Cox under the Freedom of Information Act request filed three years ago, including the convicts' native countries, dates taken into custody and dates of release, the legal documents show. … But personally identifiable information such as full names, dates of birth, alien registration numbers and FBI numbers would invade the privacy of convicted illegal immigrants and serve no public interest, Justice Department lawyers wrote in legal briefs."

Bankruptcy Attorneys Adjusting To Decline In Filings. The California Recorder (11/22, Elinson) reports, "An improving economy isn't good news for everyone. With fewer businesses going broke, the pace of traditional work for bankruptcy lawyers has slowed considerably -- for now." The Recorder continues, "Industry experts say a big reason is because money is flowing more freely -- especially from hedge funds and private equity groups -- to keep businesses afloat that might have filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy in leaner times. … But bankruptcy lawyers are evolving, and some even say the rivers of money may run dry in the near future -- possibly during the next economic downturn. … 'There has never been liquidity like this before -- never close to it in my 32 years,' said Frederick Holden Jr., a partner in Orrick, Herrington & Sutcliffe's bankruptcy and debt restructuring practice group in San Francisco. 'I hope for everyone that it doesn't cause any problems, but it seems unlikely.'" The Recorder adds, "While not a universally held belief, Holden and several other bankruptcy lawyers told The Recorder they expect to see more Chapter 11s filed by late 2007. … It would certainly be better for business, because in the last two years filings have dropped dramatically. In the 2004 fiscal year, a total of 10,113 businesses filed for Chapter 11 in U.S. Bankruptcy Court. In 2005, 5,856 businesses filed, and in 2006, only 5,475 businesses filed, according to statistics released by the courts."

DOJ_NMG_0097026

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Maryland Disputes DOJ Findings On Juvenile Center Conditions. The Baltimore Sun (11/22, Garland) reports, "The Ehrlich administration has sent a sharply worded letter and nearly 500 pages of supporting documents to the U.S. Justice Department, challenging a finding that the state has run a Baltimore center for juvenile offenders in an unsafe and unconstitutional manner." The Sun continues, "A Justice Department report issued in August said youths held at the 144-bed center on North Gay Street "suffer significant harm and risk of harm" because there isn't enough staff on hand and treatment plans are inadequate. … The report noted youth-on-youth assault rates 47 percent higher than the national average for such facilities. … But state officials say the report was written nearly a year after federal officials inspected the Baltimore City Juvenile Justice Center in September and October 2005 and that the concerns they raised have been addressed. … 'We strongly disagree with the Justice Department's findings,' said Edward Hopkins, a spokesman for the Maryland Department of Juvenile Services. 'We believe their conclusions are wrong.'" The Sun adds, "The highly critical Justice Department report was regarded as an embarrassment for Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr., who had made juvenile justice reform a key issue when he campaigned for the office four years ago. The report lays the foundation for a possible lawsuit that could lead to a court order forcing the state to change the way it runs the juvenile center. … In a 16-page, footnoted letter dated Nov. 6, Maryland Juvenile Services Secretary Kenneth C. Montague Jr. called on federal officials to drop the matter. The letter was released yesterday after The Sun requested a copy. … Cynthia Magnuson, a spokeswoman for the Justice Department's Civil Rights Division, said the federal agency would have no comment on the details of the state's response. … 'We stand by our letter, and we remain willing to work with the state to reach a resolution,' Magnuson said."

Monitor Finds Mississippi Juvenile Centers Still Not Meeting Standards. The Jackson (MS) Clarion-Ledger (11/22, Goodman) reports, "A court monitor for the state's two juvenile training facilities has once again reported that the state has failed to meet most of the conditions required under an agreement to bring the schools up to standard." The Clarion-Ledger continues, "In May 2005, Mississippi entered a four-year decree to end a Justice Department lawsuit over abuse allegations at the Oakley and Columbia training schools. … The fourth report from monitor Joyce Burrell, filed Wednesday, covers the period May 1 through Aug. 31. … It says that while some progress was made during that period, much more is required to come into compliance." The Clarion-Ledger adds, "Burrell noted improvements in student staffing ratios, and the improved cleanliness of floors, walls, ceilings, baseboards, youth rooms, bathrooms and common rooms. 'In the short term, staff are to be commended for pitching in many extra hours to do a thorough cleaning and some painting of the buildings,' she wrote. … But she also noted unresolved setbacks in education and staffing issues, including difficulty in retaining new hires long enough to get problems under control. The problem must be addressed, she said, so that the department's youth services can reach optimum staffing levels and cut down on overtime."

Day Laborers Win New York Racial Bias Suit. The AP (11/22, Fitzgerald) reports from White Plains, NY, "A suburban village discriminated against Hispanic day laborers when it closed a hiring site and stepped up police patrols on the streets where they looked for work, a federal judge ruled Monday. … 'Since August 2004, and continuing into this past summer, the defendants have engaged in a campaign designed to drive out the Latino day laborers who gather on the streets of Mamaroneck to seek work,' Judge Colleen McMahon wrote. 'The fact that the day laborers were Latinos, and not whites, was, at least in part, a motivating factor in defendants' actions.'" The AP continues, "McMahon did not specify a remedy for the village of Mamaroneck, about 25 miles north of New York City, giving the two sides 10 days to make suggestions. And in a footnote at the end of the decision, she suggested there was still time for a settlement. … Attorney Kevin Plunkett, who represented the village, said it was a stretch for the judge to determine that discrimination played a role in the crackdown. He said the quality of life for residents of Mamaroneck - not race - was the chief concern of village officials. … 'This group of people just happens to be Hispanic,' he said. 'What happens if 50 other people were assembled in the community? That has to be addressed.'" The AP notes, "The village had argued that it was only enforcing existing laws when it beefed up the police presence in the area around the park and set up traffic checkpoints that inconvenienced the contractors who came looking for temporary workers. … Six Hispanic immigrant workers - all identified as John Doe for fear of retaliation by police or immigration authorities - took the village to court in September, seeking an injunction against what they called selective law enforcement and ethnic discrimination. They said the village violated their right to equal protection when they cracked down on the laborers."

DOJ_NMG_0097027

Georgia Prosecutors Probe Police Shootings. The AP (11/22, Weber) reports, "Prosecutors in a suburban county plan to review 14 shootings by police, including eight fatalities, amid concern about the high number of killings compared with the nation's two largest cities." The AP continues, "DeKalb County prosecutors will also investigate the death of another person in police custody who was not shot, and they expect to be asked to look into four more fatal shootings by police, Adora Andy, a DeKalb County district attorney's office spokeswoman, said Monday. … 'We will review the documents, and we will determine the appropriate course of action,' Andy said. … Prosecutors could pursue criminal charges against officers if warranted." The AP adds, "The review of shootings and in-custody deaths involves 15 incidents from Jan. 1 through Sept. 12, Andy said, adding that her office expects to get another request from the police department to review the shootings since then. … Monday's police materials omitted a fatal police shooting Sept. 2, and Andy said she expected to get that later. … Andy declined to say why Police Chief Nick Marinelli made the request. She also would not disclose what reports he has turned over. … Marinelli has defended the department's actions since an Associated Press investigation published Sept. 28 showed that the nine fatal shootings this year by DeKalb County police at that time was more than the six in New York City and equal to the Los Angeles number."

Maryland Gay Custody Battle Stalls In Court. The Washington Times (11/22, Miller) reports, "Two Baltimore County judges have delayed ruling in a child-custody case that has forced a 7-year-old girl to spend time with her adoptive mother's former lesbian partner, despite objections from a court-appointed child-welfare specialist." The Times continues, "A social worker for Baltimore County Circuit Court reported in August that the ex-partner's overnight visits with the girl 'probably caused acute underlying turmoil' for the child, according to court records. … 'At this time, she seems emotionally vulnerable and experiencing severe anxiety in response to the crisis that this dispute has precipitated,' social worker Cheryl Taylor says in the report. 'Overnight weekend visits seem to pose particular separation threats and anxiety for [the girl] at this time.'" The Times adds, "The report remains sealed, but excerpts of Miss Taylor's findings are cited elsewhere in the court record. … Miss Taylor notes that the girl told everybody involved in the case -- including her mother, her mother's former partner and the family pediatrician -- that she does not want the visits to continue. The social worker also has recommended that the child 'remain in long-term psychotherapy.' … Still, two successive judges presiding over the case have delayed ruling on the emergency request by the mother, identified as Janice M., to stop the court-ordered visitation. … Judge John O. Hennegan put off ruling on the mother's request in August. The case last month was transferred to Judge Michael J. Finifter, who scheduled a hearing for Jan. 28."

Breast-Feeding Mothers Rally To Protest Restrictions. The Washington Post (11/22, D1, Kang) reports, "Karen Gral knows how difficult it is to travel with small children: standing in long lines with squirming toddlers, dealing with new security rules that prohibit liquids -- including some baby foods -- and lugging strollers, car seats and diaper bags through airports. … For her, the finish line is sitting on the airplane and breast-feeding her hungry and worn-out 16-month-old to sleep." The Post continues, "So when the Alexandria mother of two heard that a family was kicked off a Delta Air Lines flight last month because the mother refused to cover her baby with a blanket while breast-feeding, Gral decided to join 70 people at Reagan National Airport yesterday for a "nurse-in" in front of the Delta ticket counter. Similar protests were held at more than 30 airports around the country, including Baltimore-Washington International Thurgood Marshall Airport, where 62 people gathered in support of Arlington native Emily Gillette. … 'Breast-feeding is the most natural thing in the world. What was Emily supposed to do? Not feed her child? Not give her child comfort?' said Gral, while nursing her son, Garrett, who was wearing a white onesie that read, 'I'm a Breast Man.'" The Post adds, "Delta has said it regrets the incident with Gillette, which took place aboard one of its contract carriers, Freedom Airlines. … 'Delta Air Lines fully supports a mother's right to breast-feed on board our aircraft, and we were very disappointed in the decision to move Ms. Gillette from the flight,' said Gina Laughlin, a Delta spokeswoman. … Many showed up at National to push airlines to adopt more supportive policies for nursing mothers and to encourage federal legislation that protects breast-feeding in public and pumping milk in the workplace."

DOJ_NMG_0097028

US 22nd In Gender Gap Ranking. The Financial Times (11/22, Daneshkhu) reports the US "lags at 22nd place behind developed and even a couple of developing countries in a study of inequality between men and women, mainly because it has few women in politics. This is in spite of the ascent of Nancy Pelosi who is set to become the first woman to head the US House of Representatives." Sweden is "the only country where men and women form equal numbers among all ministers and parliamentarians. Cherie Booth, a human rights barrister and wife of Tony Blair, UK prime minister, said there were more women in parliament in Iraq and Afghanistan – two countries not covered by the report – than in the UK." The study "of 115 countries published on Tuesday by the World Economic Forum, a Swiss-based think-tank, measures the gender gap based on economic, political, educational and health-based criteria in a benchmarking exercise aimed at improving women's position in society." The individual country rankings "show Sweden, Norway and Finland at the top of the league, having closed about 80 per cent of the gender gap, with Yemen, Saudi Arabia and Chad at the bottom, with a gender gap of about 50 per cent."

ANTITRUST:

Municipal Bond Dealers Brace For Expanded Probes. The Wall Street Journal (11/22, C5, Rosenberg) reports, "Municipal-bond dealers held their cards close to their vests as the market faces nationwide criminal and civil probes into possible abuses over their dealings in a wide range of muni-bond transactions." The Journal continues, "The U.S. Justice Department's Antitrust Division and the Securities and Exchange Commission are investigating questionable practices at a number of firms, with leading providers of guaranteed investment contracts, or GICs, having received federal subpoenas recently." The Journal adds, "The Bond Buyer, a leading muni-bond publication, reported yesterday that the practices may go beyond GICs and could include 'virtually every investment product or derivative' brokered or provided by various firms over the past six to 14 years. … Most executives at dealer firms, as well as portfolio managers, declined to comment on the situation. … 'In general, everybody's just looking at it and seeing what's going on here, doing a lot of work to get the material together that they're looking for,' said one senior executive at a Wall Street investment firm. Asked if most of the major firms have been subpoenaed, he said: 'I have no idea because I'm not talking to anybody about it.'" The Journal notes, "An executive at a smaller West Coast-based firm said he had seen no impact on the muni market since news of the investigations broke. However, activity in the market -- as in other areas of the financial markets -- has been muted this week ahead of the Thanksgiving Day holiday. … According to the Bond Buyer, 'dozens' of firms in the $2.2 trillion muni market have been asked for information by the Justice Department and SEC. The Bond Buyer said the parallel criminal and civil investigations 'go far beyond GICs and may cover thousands of investment products and derivatives entered into in connection with muni-bond transactions that could total hundreds of billions of dollars.' Yet, only a small amount of these transactions will be subject to criminal or civil allegations, the publication reported."

Bloomberg (11/22, Preston, Selway) reports, "U.S. investigators have demanded that banks and brokers provide information on derivatives as part of an investigation into anti-competitive practices in the $2 trillion municipal bond market, according to a lawyer hired by one of the firms subpoenaed in the probe." Bloomberg continues, "The Justice Department is looking into whether bids were rigged on investment contracts sold to local governments. Investigators are also seeking information on interest-rate swaps and other financial products that governments buy to guard against swings in borrowing costs, said Mark Scott, the former director of tax-exempt bonds for the Internal Revenue Service who is now a partner with Vinson & Elkins in Washington. … 'It's pretty broad,' said Scott, who is representing a client subpoenaed by investigators whom he wouldn't identify. 'They are going to get truckloads of information.'" Bloomberg adds, "The investigation, which also includes the Securities and Exchange Commission, is the broadest criminal probe ever of the municipal bond industry and has resulted in more than a dozen subpoenas being issued last week to brokers, banks and insurance companies, including American International Group Inc. and General Electric Co. … Regulators are looking at whether brokers for U.S. local governments violated the law while arranging bids for guaranteed investment contracts, where a portion of the hundreds of billions of dollars raised in the tax-exempt bond market every year is placed until it is needed for projects."

DOJ_NMG_0097029

DOJ Says Windows Vista Complies With Microsoft Judgment. Information Week (11/22, Gonsalves) reports, "U.S. prosecutors say Windows Vista and the latest version of Internet Explorer apparently comply with the requirements of the 2002 antitrust judgment against Microsoft." IW continues, "In a joint status report filed Tuesday with the U.S. District Court in Washington, D.C., prosecutors said Microsoft appeared to be complying with the judgment, which found Microsoft abused its Windows monopoly and set down rules for the software maker to follow to avoid future anti-competitive behavior. Prosecutors and Microsoft have been submitting joint reports on compliance to the court every six months." IW adds, "The Justice Department and a court-approved technical committee are monitoring the development of Vista to assure compliance with the court order. The monitoring includes extensive testing of Vista and Internet Explorer 7 betas. … The committee and Microsoft developed a bug-tracking system to help ensure that Vista ships without any 'known issues related to its treatment of middleware under the final judgments,' prosecutors said in the report. … 'Plaintiffs are pleased to report that this system has been a success,' prosecutors said. 'Microsoft addressed all outstanding middleware-related bug issues prior to Vista being released to manufacturing.'"

CNET News (11/22, Broache) reports, "According to the report, Microsoft and the technical committee have been offering a downloadable program that is designed to help Microsoft's competitors in the fields of Web browsers, e-mail and instant-messaging clients, and media players to make their programs "Vista-ready" before the new operating system ships. … The program serves as a single source for all the registry settings needed for applications 'to attain equal visibility on Windows XP and Vista systems,' the technical committee said. The program's goal is to reduce the chance that people will experience difficulties in changing default software to non-Microsoft products, for instance. It also aims to make it easy to locate third-party applications in the start menu, desktop, task pane and other commonly used surfaces, after installing them. … Microsoft said it had also contacted 30 competing software makers and had invited them to work alongside company engineers at its Redmond, Wash., campus lab for Vista Readiness." CNET adds, "Since the last status report filing in May, government attorneys said they received 25 complaints alleging antitrust concerns about competing middleware but said they concluded that none of those gripes had merit. … Although the matters were not raised by U.S. regulators, some possible antitrust repercussions of security and file-formatting features in Vista were recently flagged as concerns by European and Korean regulators. Microsoft said last month that it had implemented changes that address those complaints."

Jury Selected For Microsoft Antitrust Class Action Trial In Iowa. The Des Moines Register (11/22) reports, "Jury selection in the Microsoft anti-trust case in Polk County District Court was completed today with seven men and five women selected to hear the class action law suit." The Register continues, "The case is expected to take several months to try with witnesses that will include Microsoft founder Bill Gates and chief executive officer Steve Ballmer." The Register adds, "Plaintiffs' lawyers, led by Des Moines attorney Roxanne Conlin, are seeking damages of up to $329 million for Iowans who purchased Microsoft product between 1994 and this year. … The crux of their case is that anti-competitive actions by Microsoft resulted in overcharges and extra expenses to Iowa consumers. … The Iowa case is the last of several dozen state lawsuits against the giant computer software company. The state cases were filed after a federal anti-trust action against Microsoft was settled in 2000. …

DOJ_NMG_0097030

None of the other state cases has ever gone to a jury for a decision. All were either settled out of court or dismissed, officials for both sides have said. … The jury is expected to be seated late next week. The trial will begin with what is expected to be a lengthy list of jury instructions from Polk County District Court Judge Scott Rosenberg about how Iowa law applies to the situation and how the case will proceed."

Oshkosh Truck Gets Antitrust Clearance To Purchase JLG. The Milwaukee Business Journal (11/22) reports, "Oshkosh Truck Corp.'s proposed purchase of JLG Industries Inc. has cleared federal regulatory review with the passage of a required waiting period for the deal." The Journal continues, "The companies jointly announced Tuesday the expiration of the 30-day waiting period under the Hart-Scott-Rodino Antitrust Improvements Act of 1976 in connection with the proposed merger of a wholly-owned subsidiary of Oshkosh with JLG." The Journal adds, "The expiration of the Hart-Scott-Rodino waiting period satisfies one of the conditions to Oshkosh's acquisition of JLG. Consummation of the merger, which is expected to occur in early December, remains subject to other customary closing conditions, including approval of the merger by JLG's shareholders."

Suit Accuses Quiznos Of Antitrust Violations, Fraud. The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel (11/22, Gores) reports, "A lawsuit accuses Quiznos Sub of forcing Wisconsin franchisees of the sandwich chain to buy food and supplies at inflated costs and sell food at artificially low retail prices, making the restaurants unprofitable." The Sentinel continues, "The class-action lawsuit, filed in federal court in Green Bay on behalf of 28 Wisconsin franchisees of Denver-based The Quiznos Franchise Co. and its affiliates, seeks compensation for lost investments and asks for punitive damages and an end to what it calls an 'illegal business scheme.'" The Sentinel adds, "The lawsuit alleges the company has systematically defrauded its franchisees by building the brand at the expense of its operators in the field. … The suit contends Quiznos omits or misrepresents key facts about Quiznos business operations in an effort to induce people to buy a franchise. … But too many people who buy a franchise find that the cost of food and supplies in comparison to the selling price of items on the menu keeps franchisees from realizing a profit, Chris Bray, president of the Toasted Subs Franchisee Association, said Tuesday. That's because, the lawsuit alleges, Quiznos forces franchisees to work with Quiznos-mandated suppliers and pay them what the lawsuit describes as 'excessive prices for goods and services.'"

The AP (11/22) reports, "The lawsuit, which seeks millions of dollars in damages for lost investments, accuses Quiznos of fraud, violations of federal and state antitrust laws, racketeering, breach of contract and violations of Wisconsin's fair dealership law, attorney Justin Klein said Tuesday." The AP continues, "The first Quiznos, featuring toasted sandwiches, opened in Denver in 1981 and the company has grown to more than 4,500 restaurants, becoming the fastest-growing restaurant chain in the country, trailing only Subway as the nation's No. 2 sandwich shop -- not counting hamburgers. … 'Quiznos has been taking advantage of its franchisees for years through practices that we contend are illegal and in violation of the franchise agreement,' said Chris Bray, president of the Toasted Subs Franchisees Association Inc., a trade group that help organize the class-action suit. … Bray, who owns two Quiznos stores in Texas and has been a franchisee for nine years, said Quiznos 'has slowly, methodically and deliberatively modified the business model, year over year, to make it economically favorable to them, to the detriment of the franchisees. It is time to put a stop to this.'"

SCOTUS To Hear Landmark Patent Case. USA Today (11/22, Biskupic) reports, "Call it the case of the gas pedal, prescription drug and gift bow. … The variations and costs of those and many other items could be affected by a Supreme Court patent case that could be one of the most important intellectual-property disputes to ever come before the justices." USA continues, "With abortion, affirmative action and other high-profile issues before the court this term, a patent case normally would be a yawner. However, KSR International v. Teleflex, a dispute between competing makers of adjustable gas-pedal systems in vehicles, arises as the justices have shown increasing interest in U.S. law protecting inventions. … The case essentially tests how to determine when an invention is truly new and different, and should receive a patent that entitles its inventor to the exclusive right to make, use and sell the item. That standard can make a difference in how people and companies spend time and money on inventions. If it is too easy to get a patent for a small variation on a previous invention, there is more of a chance that competitors could infringe on it, so companies might acquire patents solely for defensive reasons. If it is too difficult to get a patent for a small but unique adaptation of an item, it could discourage research and development." USA adds, "The question in the oral arguments scheduled for Tuesday focuses on how to determine when an invention is 'obvious,' and therefore not worthy of protection. At issue is whether a standard used by the U.S. appeals court that hears patent cases allows patents for changes too small to matter. … The dispute is being watched closely by manufacturers, from the tiremaker Michelin to gift-packaging producer Hallmark."

DOJ_NMG_0097031

Speculation Swirls Over Future Mergers. The Wall Street Journal (11/22, C1, Zuckerman) reports, "Who's next? … That's the question on the lips of investors, traders and investment bankers on the heels of a deluge of mergers and acquisitions." The Journal continues, "Some say consumer-oriented stocks, health-care providers, gaming and tech companies could become acquisition targets in the months ahead. Some point to Sprint Nextel, Hilton Hotels, and home builders such as Lennar, Ryland Group and D.R. Horton as possible targets. Private-equity firms are circling home-service company ServiceMaster, say people familiar with the matter. … Others are focusing on companies with steady cash flows and a large percentage of shares owned by company executives, or companies run by older executives who may be willing to sell out." The Journal adds, "There has been so much deal activity this year that it looks like anyone could be fair game. Targets have included companies with stable cash flows but poor growth prospects, even in sectors that haven't seen many mergers in the past. … But investors shouldn't get carried away betting on possible takeovers. Not only are they tough to predict, these deals also are somewhat less lucrative than they once were. The average premium paid over market prices for shares of companies subject to an acquisition bid this year is 17%, down from 25% in 2000, according to Thomson Financial. .. Some analysts say the acquisitions are a sign that stock prices remain reasonably priced, despite the recent run-up in the market that has pushed stock indexes to new highs. Some short sellers -- investors who bet on stock-price declines -- have become cautious. They are reluctant to establish big positions against even stocks with weak outlooks, worried that any wager against a company will turn into a loser on word of a lucrative deal. This wariness is adding to the market's upward momentum. … Mostly, all the wheeling and dealing stems from lots of money sloshing around the global markets, as interest rates remain low. Investors are shoveling money at private-equity firms, which buy public companies or businesses with an eye toward reselling them later at a profit, and at high-yield but risky loans and junk bonds backing acquisitions. That suggests many deals are financial bets, not strategic business moves, perhaps reducing their chance for success."

Qantas Considers Takeover Approach From Texas Pacific, Macquarie. The Wall Street Journal (11/22, A11, Mcfarland) reports, "Qantas Airways said it is considering a takeover approach by Texas Pacific Group and Macquarie Bank Ltd., amid market speculation it will soon receive an offer valuing the Australian flag carrier at up to 11 billion Australian dollars (US$8.5 billion)." The Journal continues, "In a brief statement, Qantas didn't provide further details on the nature of the approach, but a senior dealer said the group is expected to offer up to A$5.50 a share. Qantas shares soared on the news, with its stock gaining as much as 20% to a morning high of A$5.25 in Australia. … 'The approach is confidential and incomplete and is being investigated by Qantas,' Cassandra Hamlin, the carrier's acting company secretary, said in a statement to the Australian Stock Exchange, indicating other options such as a regional merger with Singapore Airlines might be on the table. … Qantas also said in a statement it has 'undertaken over a period of years discussions with a range of individuals and companies, including airlines, on possible partnerships, joint ventures and acquisitions.'" The Journal adds, "SIA, which competes with Qantas for passengers on lucrative routes to Europe and North Asia, said it isn't in talks with Qantas. … Macquarie Bank said it has no comment on the Qantas statement, repeating a statement made to Dow … The private-equity sector has targeted Australian companies in recent months with multibillion dollar bids. To date, the largest bid has come from a consortium led by Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co and including Texas Pacific, Blackstone Group LP and Bain Capital LLC, for Coles Myer Ltd. The retailer recently rejected the A$18.2 billion bid as inadequate."

Union Ruling Clouds Suez-Gaz De France Agreement. The Wall Street Journal (11/22, A11, Gauthier-Villars) reports, "A Paris court ruling could upset the schedule for the planned €43.43 billion ($55.65 billion) merger of French utilities Suez SA and Gaz de France SA, and potentially thwart the deal altogether, handing a victory to French energy-sector workers and dealing a major blow to France's government." The Journal continues, "The unexpected ruling, which GdF tried but failed to get annulled last night via an appeal, said state-run GdF can't approve the merger until it gives unions more information about the deal's impact on jobs. This means a crucial GdF board meeting that had been called for today to determine the merger's final terms is likely to be called off." The Journal adds, "The ruling, which was upheld late last night by an appeals court, may cause the merger schedule to be pushed back at least until March -- missing the original year-end deadline -- because Suez and GdF will have to redraft merger terms to factor in 2006 earnings, according to lawyers involved in the deal. Pushing through the highly politicized merger in the middle of the French presidential elections, planned for April, could also be tricky because the opposition left-wing Socialist Party opposes the deal."

DOJ_NMG_0097032

Firm Exonerated Of Antitrust Allegations Wins Baldrige Award. USA Today (11/22, Jones) reports, "A San Diego company that in 2002 was the target of Senate antitrust hearings on Tuesday was one of three companies awarded the 2006 Malcolm Baldrige National Quality Award, perhaps the most prestigious award given to business by the federal government." USA continues, "Premier purchases $27 billion a year of medical supplies and services for 1,500 hospitals. In 2002 the company was accused of accepting something akin to payola from large manufacturers that kept small companies and their cutting-edge products from being sold to hospitals." USA adds, "The accusations were untrue, CEO Richard Norling said in an interview Tuesday, but the scrutiny proved to be a learning experience for the company. He says Premier also learned as it went through the Baldrige process and made changes designed to allow small companies in the medical industry to better compete. … Norling said it 'feels incredibly good,' to come full circle from being a company under scrutiny. He said that Baldrige examiners were aware of the company's history and had asked him if there was anything that might turn up later to tarnish Baldrige's image if it were to go out on a limb and give Premier the award. … 'The Baldrige Award's judges determined that Premier … lived up to (the award's) very high standards,' Baldrige director Harry Hertz said in an e-mail. 'Premier has been a leader in setting ethical practice guidelines.'"

EU Clears UCB Bid For Schwarz Pharma. The AP (11/22) reports, "Belgian drugmaker UCB SA won EU approval Tuesday to take over Germany's Schwarz Pharma AG, clearing the last regulatory hurdle to the deal." The AP continues, "The acquisition, which Schwarz's board is recommending to shareholders, would create a new company with revenue of more than 3.3 billion euros ($4.23 billion) and yearly research and development spending of 770 million euros ($986.91 million)." The AP adds, "UCB said it received a green light from U.S. regulators on Nov. 10 and was now waiting for Schwarz shareholders to tender their shares by a Dec. 8 deadline. … The European Commission cleared the deal despite overlaps between the two because they both produce a small number of over-the-counter and prescription medicines in some European countries, from antihistamines, iron supplements, heart disease drugs and asthma treatments. … But their combined market shares were not high enough to see them disrupt the market, it said."

Equities Exchange Said To Be Bigger Deal Than Talks Between Nasdaq-LSE. In a Wall Street Journal (11/22) op-ed, Wall Street Journal Europe editorial writer Kyle Wingfield discusses Nasdaq's latest attempt to acquire the London Stock Exchange, saying that the "context for understanding the relative importance of a potential Nasdaq-LSE tie-up," or a New York Stock Exchange-Euronext one, for that matter, "arrived last week. That's when seven leading investment banks announced plans to jointly run their own equities exchange in Europe." The mergers among traditional exchanges "are like pennies dropped from a window compared to the piano that the investment banks have sent hurtling down." According to Wingfield, the genesis of the investment banks announcement began with the "European Union's directive on markets in financial instruments." Among other obligations, the directive "imposes stricter price-publishing requirements on trading firms both before and after trades. The result is that seven investment banks -- Citigroup, Credit Suisse, Deutsche Bank, Goldman Sachs, Merrill Lynch, Morgan Stanley and UBS -- figured that if they have to boost their price reporting, they might as well go a step further and have their own trading platform." Wingfield adds, "It is admittedly a bit hyperbolic to suggest that stock-exchange mergers are suddenly irrelevant," but "business as usual won't cut it. And that probably means more mergers -- maybe even a few that matter."

DOJ_NMG_0097033

Columnist Says Airline Mergers Will Not Fix Industry Problems. In his column for the Wall Street Journal (11/22, A15), Holman Jenkins writes, "Last's week proposed merger of US Airways and Delta Air Lines is the leading edge of a consolidation wave that will finally fix the problems of the airline industry … and check out our selection of historic bridges for sale." Jenkins continues, "Life affords most other industries legal and structural ways to shield themselves from all-out price warfare -- through patents and branding, product differentiation, or various kinds of competitive 'friction.' Not so the airlines. The Internet has made pricing transparent. Lenders allow start-up or discount carriers to fly the latest, spiffiest models. The high-margin business traveler accounts for a smaller share of the market nowadays, and even he's become a lot less price-insensitive. And no industry is more discommoded by antitrust's primitive and ill-advised intolerance of cooperative behavior by competitors." Jenkins adds, "Don't expect consolidation to change this, even if the current murmurfest really does result in a flurry of deals to reduce the Big Six to two or three. There's a lesson in the special genius of US Airways CEO Doug Parker's proposed acquisition of Delta … what makes his deal appealing points to why other carriers are unlikely to rush into mergers of their own. Their costs in pain and anguish would be the same or greater, but with little prospect of being able to charge significantly higher fares, even in an industry where the number of competitors is reduced. … Alas, one thing that might help -- a relaxation of antitrust rules to allow airlines to enter and exit code-sharing agreements at will -- almost certainly won't transpire. Such a break with intellectual precedent would be the most direct way to turn a chronically unstable airline industry into one that is reasonably prosperous and provides the optimum of service in terms of frequency and destinations even in the grimmer parts of the business cycle." Jenkins concludes, "There was a time when Washington might have been willing to experiment with such a daring notion if only to get itself off the hook for the pension plans of failing carriers. Delta's then-President Fred Reid publicly ventured three years ago at an industry conference the hopeful possibility that the 'Department of Justice and the Department of Transportation ought to have an additional arrow in their quiver, to enable scheduling, pricing and yield management to be done in a centralized entity [by alliances of airlines] which was immune from antitrust laws.' … It will take at least another industry meltdown to put such a heterodox brainstorm back on the table. Ditto the equally adventurous idea of allowing foreign ownership of U.S. domestic carriers. Until then, investing in airline shares will be a game for speculators, not buy-and-holders."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Company Blames Farmers, "Act Of God" For Rice Contamination. The Washington Post (11/22, A5, Weiss) reports, "The company that created the experimental variety of genetically engineered rice found this summer to have contaminated the U.S. rice supply contends that rice farmers and an 'act of God' are to blame for the inadvertent release of the unapproved crop. … Those are among the assertions by Bayer CropScience of Research Triangle Park, N.C., in response to a class-action lawsuit filed by hundreds of farmers in Arkansas and Missouri." The Post continues, "The 30-page response offers the first clue to how the company plans to defend itself against the 15 class-action lawsuits filed by farmers, who allege that they stand to lose millions of dollars because of the contamination. … Lawyers for the farmers said they had expected the company to deny responsibility, but were offended by its attempt to blame farmers. The lawyers said their clients had no reason to suspect that the seeds they were planting in recent years were contaminated by Bayer's unapproved variety. … 'The farmers are innocent victims,' said Don Downing, a principal at Gray, Ritter & Graham PC, the St. Louis firm that filed the largest suit, in U.S. District Court in eastern Missouri." The Post adds, "Denying any culpability, the Bayer response variously blames the escape of its gene-altered variety of long-grain race, LL601, on 'unavoidable circumstances which could not have been prevented by anyone'; 'an act of God'; and farmers' 'own negligence, carelessness, and/or comparative fault.' … Bayer conducted field tests of LL601 from 1999 to 2001 in Louisiana, then dropped the project without seeking government approval to market it. This year, LL601 was found to be widespread in U.S. long-grain rice, prompting Europe to cut off imports and throwing the rice futures market into turmoil."

DOJ_NMG_0097034

WPost Says Government Flu Strategy Wanting. The Washington Post (11/22, A20, 690K) reports says in an editorial, "The Department of Health and Human Services released a progress report on its preparations for a flu pandemic in the United States." But "a report released by the World Health Organization earlier this month said that strains of the H5N1 'bird flu' virus -- a likely candidate for mutation into a pandemic flu -- might be developing resistance to Tamiflu and other antivirals." The WHO report "was pessimistic about the effectiveness of the vaccines against strains of the virus they were not designed to fight. In other words, if a pandemic flu began spreading tomorrow, the government's most effective strategies for saving lives could be old-fashioned quarantine and public education, techniques akin to those used during the great flu pandemic of 1918. It is not surprising, then, that the federal government currently estimates that as many as 2 million people could die if a virulent and contagious strain of flu hit the United States." Added American assistance "to the understaffed WHO in Indonesia, Thailand and Vietnam could save many more American lives than 50 million courses of antivirals."

Mining Companies Eye Navajo Land. In Part 4 of "Blighted Homeland," a four-part series on uranium contamination on Navajo tribal land, the Los Angeles Times (11/22, Pasternak) reports, "Decades after the Cold War uranium boom ended, leaving a trail of poisonous waste across the Navajo Nation, the mining industry is back, seeking to tap the region's vast uranium deposits once again. Companies are staking claims, buying mineral rights and applying for permits on the edge of the tribal homeland. They make no secret of their desire to mine within the reservation as well. … Mining companies are extracting uranium in Texas, Wyoming and Nebraska, and are taking steps to mine in Colorado. But Navajo country, covering some 27,000 square miles in Arizona, New Mexico and Utah, is the biggest prize of all — 'the Saudi Arabia of uranium,' in the words of Mark Pelizza, a vice president of Uranium Resources Inc."

NRC Tests Find Contaminated Water Under Indian Point. The AP (11/21) reports, "Government tests indicate that amounts of radioactive material found in ground water under the Indian Point nuclear power plants were seven times higher than reported by the laboratory hired by the complex to test for leaks. Testing conducted for the Nuclear Regulatory Commission and the state Department of Environmental Conservation revealed that strontium 90 levels from the August samples ranged from 5 to 30 picocuries per liter. … Nonetheless, the NRC and state health officials have said for more than a year that the public is not in danger because the radioactive isotope is not reaching any sources of drinking water."

Residents Concerned About Indian Point "String Of Problems." WRNN-TV New York (11/21, 7:06 p.m) reported, "From radioactive leaks, to control rod malfunctions, to emergency siren failures, Indian Point has suffered from a string of problems over the past few years, forcing to shut down for months at a time and earning the worst rating in the country. For some residents, their concern is a matter of security. On 9/11 one of the planes that struck the world trade center flew directly over the plant on its way to New York City."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Gonzales Says FBI Will Add Southwest Colorado Agent. The Durango Herald (11/21, Hanel) reported, "The Federal Bureau of Investigation will send a new special agent to the Four Corners in large part to deal with a combined murder rate on the two Ute Indian reservations that is 20 times the state average." Sen. Ken Salazar "said he secured the commitment from Attorney General Alberto Gonzales on Friday. The region currently has one FBI agent," and it "might get an additional federal prosecutor, as well, according to Salazar." The Herald added, "The new FBI agent will have to go through the typical federal application and hiring process, said Special Agent Renee Vonder Haar, the FBI's spokeswoman in Denver. She doesn't know how long it will take to hire a new agent."

CBS To Air "Criminal Minds" Episode Written By FBI Profiler. Under the headline "FBI Profiler Inspires Actor," USA Today (11/22, Keveney, 2.27M) reports, "Jim Clemente keeps a picture in his wallet of a boy he helped save as a member of the FBI's Behavioral Analysis Unit. It reminds him of why he does his job. It reminds the actors on CBS' Criminal Minds of the real people they portray. 'I saw that he carries this picture with him wherever he goes, and that the saving of these children is what his life is all about,' says Mandy Patinkin, who became friends with Clemente during research for his role as BAU profiler Jason Gideon." USA adds, "Now, in a rare occurrence for an agent still with the FBI, Clemente has written a Minds episode, tonight's 'Lessons Learned' (9 ET/PT), in which the agents interrogate a Guantanamo Bay detainee in the hope of stopping an imminent terrorist attack in the USA. Clemente, 47, says the collaboration works well, creating an accurate picture of the BAU for the public and alerting other law enforcement agencies to its services, particularly in cases in which time is of the essence. 'In one hour, they can reach 15 million people,' he says."

DOJ_NMG_0097035

Rhode Island Drug Sweep Nets Dozens Of Arrests. The Providence Journal (11/22, Smith) reports, "In an investigation aimed at especially brazen drug dealing on street corners, the city police and federal drug agents have arrested 70 people on narcotics and weapons charges and are seeking to arrest another 27." The Journal continues, "Law enforcement authorities began rounding up the suspects last week, punctuating an investigation nicknamed Operation Crackdown that was announced yesterday. Some corners where the drug peddlers stood three, four or five deep, depending on the weather or the time of day, have been cleared, said police Sgt. Fabio Zuena." The Journal adds, "The operation incorporates a new approach in which seven suspects with minor criminal records were separated from the crop destined for arrest and will be offered what Police Chief Dean M. Esserman called 'a second chance' to straighten out their lives and avoid another arrest. … Those seven — four juveniles and three adults — will be called into a room for a dose of 'tough love' by their neighbors, community leaders and the police, Esserman said, and offered education, substance-abuse treatment and employment opportunities. … They will be told, he said: 'You may not return to that corner. We don't have to catch you. We've already caught you. We just have to have the [arrest] warrant signed the moment you return to that corner.' Then an array of social services will be pressed on them." The Journal notes, "Operation Crackdown was described as unusual in its duration and scope. Beginning in April and lasting through last month, investigators researched the drug-dealing hot spots throughout Providence and focused on an area of Upper South Providence with the Lockwood Plaza public-housing development as the epicenter. … They identified 104 people as investigation targets, including the seven who are avoiding immediate arrest, and made a number of undercover purchases of cocaine and handguns. Esserman and Mayor David N. Cicilline said that list makes it 'the largest narcotics and gun investigation' in Providence police history. Brian Crowell, assistant special agent in charge of the New England division of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency, said the 72 arrested are 'the most ever targeted in a single drug investigation in Rhode Island.'"

Philadelphia Inquirer Highlights DEA Internet Pharmacy Investigation. In a continuing report on a DEA international Internet pharmacy case, the Philadelphia Inquirer (11/22) reports Temple grad student Akhil Bansal and his dad in India "are making millions smuggling pills to Americans who buy them online. Today's installment begins as DEA agents race to Australia, hoping to head off a move that could ruin their big case. It is October 2004." Andrew Shackleton "lived in Australia, where he appeared to run a multimillion-dollar online pill ring. DEA believed that Shackleton used pill suppliers around the globe, including bit players such as Temple University graduate student Akhil Bansal." The DEA "hoped to extradite Shackleton and charge him under a U.S. law – 'operating a continuing criminal enterprise.' The law had been aimed for use against mobsters and drug kingpins. This would be among the first uses against Internet pill pushers."

On its Web site, the Philadelphia Inquirer (11/21) also has posted surveillance video it says shows drug shipments being unloaded from a vehicle.

In Colombia, US Pulls Some Resources Out Of Anti-Drug Effort. In Bogota, the Miami Herald (11/21, Dudley) reports, "After several years of trying to wean farmers from the drug trade in the conflictive southern province of Caquetá, the U.S. government is winding down its funding of alternative development programs in the region. The pullout comes amid a flurry of criticism of U.S.-backed efforts to eliminate illegal drug production in Colombia, and just before the U.S. Congress is expected to vote to continue aid for counter-drug programs in this nation of 41 million people." At first, Plan Colombia "seemed to be working in Caquetá. … But now both parts of the effort seem to be in retreat. According to politicians from the area and analysts of the military, the Colombian army is quietly withdrawing some troops from the province. … Meanwhile, the United States has stopped funding economic development programs in the Caquetá region."

Seneca Nation Tobacco Merchant Reaches Compliance Deal With ATF. The Buffalo (NY)

DOJ_NMG_0097036

News (11/22, Herbeck) reports, "A prominent Seneca Nation tobacco merchant who has tangled several times with the federal government has agreed to change his business practices and forfeit $1.25 million to the government." The News continues, "Scott B. Maybee, one of the largest Seneca tobacco merchants in the region, signed a recent federal court agreement promising that his cigarette companies will closely adhere to federal laws during all future sales. … The agreement is believed to be the first of its kind between a Native American mail-order tobacco business and the federal government, federal officials said Thursday." The News adds, "Maybee runs three Salamanca-based companies that employ about 200 people to do mail-order and Internet cigarette sales. His business was the subject of a lengthy investigation by the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms & Explosives. … In court papers, U.S. Attorney Terrance P. Flynn agreed that the government will not criminally prosecute Maybee for any activities uncovered during the investigation. … Maybee, in turn, will forfeit $1.25 million to the government, in six payments spread out over the next two years."

NYTimes Criticizes Allen's Concealed Weapons Bill. The New York Times (11/22, 1.16M) says in an editorial, "As a last little gift to America, Senator George Allen, who was narrowly defeated by James Webb this month, has introduced what may be his final piece of legislation: a bill that would allow the carrying of concealed weapons in national parks. The argument behind the bill is that national park regulations unfairly strip many Americans of a right they may enjoy outside the parks. The bill has passed to the Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources, where we hope it will die the miserable death it deserves." If Americans "want to feel safer in their national parks, the proper solution is to increase park funding, which has decayed steadily since the Bush administration took office." Make "no mistake. Senator Allen's bill would make no one safer. It can only endanger the public."

IMMIGRATION:

Bush, Congress Said To Be Unwilling To Construct Border Fence. CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (11/21) reported President Bush "signed the bill for a border fence before the election. Cynics called it an election year ploy. It turns out they may have something. They noted that Congress had approved only 700 miles of fencing covering just about 1/3 of the border with Mexico and had failed to fully fund it. Now, with the election behind us, many say it will simply never be built. … The building of this fence…is a construction project that is going nowhere fast." Bush "signed it into law, but no one wants to pay for it. Proof, say critics, that neither the President nor congress has any intention of building a fence or of cracking down on illegal immigration. … Incoming chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee Bennie Thompson has already made it clear that he doesn't want a physical fence along the border with Mexico. He believes in a virtual fence. That puts him on the same page with Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, who is also promoting technology as the answer to securing the border."

National Guard Draws Criticism From Border Patrol Union. Fox news' Special Report (11/21, Hume) reported, "President Bush's decision in May to send the National Guard to the U.S.-Mexican border to support efforts to curb illegal immigration was greeted with both fanfare and catcalls. Supporters said it would enhance national security. Critics claim it would be ineffective at best. So, how is that program working out?" Fox went on to report, "even if a member of the National Guard actually spots someone crossing over from Mexico into the United States, all he can really do is look, listen, and get on the radio. … Critics say when you are talking about billions of dollars, that's a problem." National Border Patrol Council's T. J. Bonner: "The projected cost of operation Jump-Start for the full duration is going to be $1.9 billion. … That's a tremendous amount of taxpayer funds. And to what end?" Fox added, "the President of the border patrol union says the money would be better spent directly on more border patrol agents rather than expensive backup." Bonner: "This is a big P.R. campaign. And it's a flop." Fox adds, "supporters insist since operation jump-start began, the number of crossings are down and arrests of illegals along some stretches of the border are down 40%. Indicating, they say, the program must be working."

Governors Seek Additional Federal Money For Jailing Illegal Immigrants. The AP (11/22) reports, "Governors of nine states, including Arizona and California, are urging President Bush to include full reimbursement for states' costs of imprisoning illegal immigrants convicted of crimes when he submits his proposed federal budget next year." The AP continues, "Arizona Gov. Janet Napolitano's office said she and California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger were spearheading the effort to increase funding for the State Criminal Alien Assistance Program administered by the U.S. Justice Department." The AP adds, "Until the federal government secures the border, the SCAAP funding is needed and deserved by states that have 'to fill this gap by policing the regions and incarcerating criminal aliens at their own considerable expense,' said the letter, which was dated Monday and released Tuesday. … Other state governors who signed the letter were Bill Richardson of N.M.; Thomas Vilsack, Iowa; Christine Gregoire, Wash.; Phil Bredesen, Tenn.; Jon Corzine, N.J.; Ted Kulongoski, Ore.; Brad Henry, Okla.; and Kathleen Sebelius, Kan. Gov. Anibal Acevedo Vila of Puerto Rico also signed the letter." The AP notes, "The letter is the latest in a series of steps taken publicly and behind the scenes by governors to press for increased SCAAP funding. … In July, Gregoire sent an invoice for nearly $50 million to the Justice Department for unreimbursed costs of housing criminal illegal immigrants in state prisons. … Napolitano has sent similar invoices since late 2004."

DOJ_NMG_0097037

US Wrestles With Fate Of Deportees Who Face Danger In Native Land. The New York Times (11/22, Bernstein) reports, "On the evening of Nov. 2, a young corporate lawyer in New Jersey received a frantic call from a charity client, a 46-year-old Harlem grocery clerk with a history of petty crime. He was in custody on an airplane in Newark on his way to Mogadishu, the capital of his native Somalia, a country so dangerous that to the lawyer's knowledge, no one had been deported there in years." The Times continues, "The courts were closed, and a federal judge who heard an emergency motion the next day ruled that the clerk, Mohamad Rasheed Jama, was already outside United States jurisdiction. … So, after a stop in Nairobi, where he was handed over to Kenyans, Mr. Jama stepped off an airplane in Mogadishu — and into the hands of Islamist militants, who soon accused him of being an American spy and began demanding money. … 'They were extremely angry,' said his lawyer, Emily B. Goldberg, relating the last frightened call she got from Mr. Jama, who had spent four years in immigration detention in New Jersey awaiting deportation to the land he left at 18. 'He asked me if there was anything I could do. I told him in the American system, there was nothing more I could do.'" The Times adds, "Mr. Jama, whose deportation was based on a 1989 conviction for owning an unlicensed gun, is among the first Somalis to be repatriated against his will since the United States Supreme Court ruled 5 to 4 last year that the lack of a functioning central government in Somalia did not bar such deportations. About 4,000 Somalis nationwide are eligible for immediate deportation under the ruling, which turned on the syntax of a Congressional statute. … The case of Mr. Jama, who has a 9-year-old American daughter in Harlem, highlights issues the nation has wrestled with for decades, such as what to do with deportable immigrants who can neither be detained indefinitely nor safely repatriated, and what should limit the government's discretion to decide their fate."

TAX:

Snipes Says He Is Scapegoat In Tax Fraud Case. The AP (11/22) reports, "Wesley Snipes has told a newspaper columnist he is being unfairly targeted by federal prosecutors who indicted him on tax fraud charges. … 'It appears I'm to be the scapegoat, because there's more public interest in "celebrities gone bad" than "rich people being taken advantage of,"'' Snipes wrote last weekend in an e-mail to Orlando Sentinel columnist Scott Maxwell." The AP continues, "An Oct. 17 indictment charges Snipes with fraudulently claiming refunds totaling nearly $12 million in 1996 and 1997 on income taxes already paid. The star of the 'Blade' trilogy and other films was also charged with failure to file returns from 1999 through 2004. … According to the indictment, Snipes had his taxes prepared by accountants with a history of filing false returns to reap payments for their clients. The firm, American Rights Litigators, would receive 20 percent of refunds from clients, according to the indictment. … If convicted, Snipes, 44, faces up to 16 years in prison."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Open To Considering Tax Hike As Part Of Social Security Deal. The Washington Post (11/22, D1, Montgomery, 690K) reports, "With the elections over and Democrats poised to take control on Capitol Hill, the Bush administration is making a fresh push to persuade them to help rein in the rising costs of Social Security and government health-care programs by offering to open talks with 'no preconditions.'" Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr., "the president's point man on Social Security and other entitlement programs, said in an interview yesterday that he has had 'a number of...very, very general, very preliminary conversations' with lawmakers from both parties about the issue since Election Day, Nov. 7." The Post adds Paulson said "no preconditions" means "both sides get a chance to put their ideas on the table. In regard to Social Security, administration officials said that means…Bush will continue to advocate that younger workers be allowed to divert a portion of their Social Security taxes into private retirement accounts, a proposal Congress roundly rejected last year. It also means that the White House is willing to listen to other ideas, administration officials said, including personal savings accounts that do not involve diverting Social Security taxes, as well higher payroll taxes to help cover a projected explosion in Social Security costs after members of the baby boom generation begin to retire in 2008." Rob Portman, director of the Office of Management and Budget, said, "We're in a listening mode. … The president wants to listen. He wants to hear what the leaders on Capitol Hill think is the best way to go. He's not wed to any particular approach."

DOJ_NMG_0097038

The possibility that Bush may consider a tax increase was first raised on Monday by Lawrence B. Lindsey, president and CEO of the Lindsey Group and formerly President Bush's chief economic adviser from 2001 to 2002. In a Wall Street Journal op-ed (11/20, A16), Lindsey wrote about "rumors" in Washington "that the president may be willing to raise taxes as part of a 'deal' on entitlement reform."

The Wall Street Journal (11/22, A6, Calmes, 2.04M) reports this morning, "Were the president to drop private accounts and call their bluff, Democrats would be challenged to make good on their professed willingness to help ensure Social Security's solvency. … Except for the Iraq war, perhaps no other issue so tests whether Democrats' capture of Capitol Hill in this month's midterm elections will cause Mr. Bush to alter what has been a largely partisan and uncompromising governing style. At the same time, any compromises cut with the Democratic majority are sure to cost Mr. Bush the support of many Republicans, especially in the House."

Staff Shortage, Medicare Premium Hike Leave SSA Under Stress. The Washington Post (11/22, D4, Barr, 690K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column, "Staffing problems at the Social Security Administration could make it difficult for field offices to handle increased telephone calls and visits prompted by an upcoming increase in Medicare premiums, according to the Government Accountability Office." In a letter "sent last week to the Senate Finance Committee, the GAO warned that Social Security is coping with staff shortages and operating under a hiring freeze just as the agency's workload is expected to jump because of the premium increases. The GAO, the congressional auditing agency, noted that the premium change, though approved by Congress in 2003, may come as a surprise to some beneficiaries."

Democrats Not Expected To Block Gates Nomination. The AP (11/22, Flaherty) reports, "When Robert Gates testifies before a Senate panel in two weeks, Democrats will voice their opposition to administration war policies and gauge Gates' willingness to change them. But they probably won't stand in his way to becoming the next defense secretary." Democrats "have begun lining up behind Gates, indicating they are inclined to vote for him if he meets two general criteria: He agrees a new approach in Iraq is needed and demonstrates he will hold sufficient political clout at the White House. … The senators say they are not immediately opposing Gates largely because his confirmation would lead to the departure of Donald H. Rumsfeld, the Pentagon chief who led the US invasion in Iraq and staunchly defended the war even as public approval plummeted."

Rangel Says Draft Proposal Was Meant To Ignite Debate. USA Today (11/22, Kelley, 2.27M) reports, "Turning conscripts into battle-ready troops would take a year or more in the unlikely event the government revived the draft, military experts say. Rep. Charles Rangel, D-N.Y., said this week that he will reintroduce a bill he sponsored in 2003 that would reinstate the military draft. Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and other military leaders, however, oppose the plan and call a draft neither necessary nor practical. House Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi also said Monday that she opposes the plan." Rangel "doesn't expect Congress or President Bush to support reviving the draft, says Emile Milne, the congressman's spokesman." Instead, Rangel "wants to spark a 'discussion among the people who represent the American people here in Congress.'"

The Christian Science Monitor (11/22, Knickerbocker, 59K) asks, "Would reinstituting the military draft even things out, spreading the responsibility while influencing politicians to think twice before sending men and women into harm's way?" Rangel "thinks so. Challenging Iran and North Korea as well as increasing the US force level in Iraq to try to stem the heightened violence there can't be done without a draft, says Mr. Rangel, a Korean War combat vet." The Monitor ads "Rangel's bill is unlikely to go far in Congress, where opposition reflects public opinion. But his proposal does raise important questions about how the armed forces are put together today and how the US military operates."

DOJ_NMG_0097039

USDA Representative Defends "Hunger" Omission In Report. The Washington Post (11/22, A19, 690K) reports that after a letter to the USDA from Congress regarding omitting the word "hunger," Mark Nord, a USDA sociologist and the lead author of the report, "repeated this week that 'hunger' is not a scientifically quantifiable term." He said, "USDA has more money in food assistance than in farming and forestry programs combined," and "has denied that removing the word from the report was a political act."

Controversial HHS Official Prescribed Birth Control In Private Practice. The Washington Post (11/22, A4, Lee, 690K) reports, "Despite his work for a Christian pregnancy counseling group that opposes contraception, the physician who yesterday began overseeing federal family-planning programs has prescribed birth control for his patients, a Department of Health and Human Services spokeswoman said." Eric Keroack, "a nationally known advocate of abstinence until marriage, served for more than a decade as medical director for A Woman's Concern, a Massachusetts nonprofit group that discourages abortion and does not distribute information promoting birth control. But HHS spokeswoman Christina Pearson said yesterday that most of Keroack's professional time had been devoted to his private practice of 20 years, not the group."

Democrats Unlikely To Advance Liberal Interest Groups' Agenda. USA Today (11/22, Stone, 2.27M) reports advocates "for abortion rights, gun control and gay rights say they are thrilled by the Democratic takeover of Congress. Even so, they admit their issues aren't likely to be addressed early — or at all — during the legislative session that begins in January." Rep. Rahm Emanuel, "who headed the Democratic campaign committee and is part of the leadership team setting the agenda for the upcoming term, says his party was 'very clear' on its priorities: The Iraq war, ethics reform, health care, jobs and other economic concerns will come first." But that is "not likely to deter liberal bloggers and groups such as MoveOn.org, says University of California-Berkeley political scientist Bruce Cain. Those groups will 'keep the heat on,' Cain says. He predicts they'll have little success."

Dodd Faces Balancing Act Between Business, Democratic Base. The New York Times (11/22, Labaton, 1.16M) reports that as Sen. Christopher J. Dodd "prepares to take over the leadership of the Senate Banking Committee while also considering a run for the presidency, lobbyists and lawmakers are all asking the same question." Travis B. Plunkett, the legislative director of the Consumer Federation of America, said, "Does he become a populist champion on issues that broadly affect the middle class, or does he shrink from controversial issues that offend huge donors?" The Times adds it is a "question facing not only Mr. Dodd, but the Democratic Party more generally as it assumes control of Congress." Dodd has "shown through a 25-year record in the Senate that he is adept at going both ways. He has, at various times, broken with big corporate interests in support of a principle. At other times, he has broken ranks with his more liberal party peers to advance causes associated with corporate patrons." In a "recent interview, Mr. Dodd said that he had hoped to be seen as unpredictably independent and willing to listen to both corporate interests and consumers." Dodd said he "planned to broaden the agenda of the committee. He proposes to look at issues of national security, including the way the administration reviews foreign investment in vital American companies, and prosperity, by examining everything from affordable housing to the loss of manufacturing jobs in the United States." But Dodd said he "was satisfied with Sarbanes-Oxley, which he played a significant role in drafting. He said he had not yet reached the same conclusions as the Bush administration and some Democrats that the law, combined with excessive litigation, had driven companies to issue stock in overseas markets instead of on Wall Street."

Democrats Set Sights On Prime Capitol Real Estate. The New York Times (11/22, Hulse, 1.16M) reports, "Forget those pesky leadership fights. The folks who run Congress are now getting down to what really matters on Capitol Hill: dividing up the office space." In "something of a break with recent tradition, the incoming Democratic speaker, Nancy Pelosi of California, is planning to expropriate the second-floor suite of offices now occupied by the current speaker, J. Dennis Hastert — a handful of rooms providing a spectacular view of the Mall." That space "has been in Republican hands for 50 years or so, even when Democrats were in charge." While Democrats are "moving up, Republicans are downsizing, abandoning their preferred spots and planning to squeeze into the current, tighter digs of the Democrats." Vice President Dick Cheney "might also come out a loser in this literal floor fight. Democrats have an eye on an office on the House side that Republicans granted to him as a kind of second home in the Capitol, to complement his office on the other wing of the building, where, by virtue of the Constitution, he presides over the Senate (he has no formal role in the House)." Rep. Charles B. Rangel "is interested in reclaiming Mr. Cheney's House space for the Ways and Means Committee."

DOJ_NMG_0097040

Point Man On Financial Crimes To Leave Treasury. The AP (11/22) reports, "The chief of a federal agency that plays a key role in trying to catch terrorist financiers, drug lords and other criminals is stepping down at the end of this year." Robert Werner, director of the Treasury Department's Financial Crimes Enforcement Network, "will take a job with Merrill Lynch & Co. Inc., the department announced Tuesday."

Senate Panel To Review DC's Medicaid Program. The Washington Times (11/22, Mcelhatton, 88K) reports, "The Senate Finance Committee is seeking a review of the District's Medicaid program, citing a 'troubling' recent city audit of patient transport and reports of questionable billing. In addition, the D.C. Office of the Inspector General is conducting two audits of the city's Medicaid transportation program -- one examining the background of providers and the other focusing on the legitimacy of claims being submitted by transport companies." The Times adds, "The federal and local scrutiny of the District's Medicaid transportation program follows a report last month in The Washington Times that noted long-standing lapses and concerns about the program." Sens. Charles E. Grassley and Max Baucus of Montana "sent a letter Friday to D.C. Inspector General Charles Willoughby seeking a confidential briefing on efforts to probe city Medicaid costs."

IBM, Cray Win DARPA Supercomputer Contract. The Wall Street Journal (11/22, B2, Clark, 2.04M) reports, "A Pentagon research agency announced plans to spend nearly $500 million to develop next-generation supercomputers, funding ambitious design efforts at Cray Inc. and International Business Machines Corp. The Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency said it will award Cray $250 million and IBM $244 million under a new phase of a long-running development program, which hopes to create not only major advances in hardware but also new ways to program massive scientific machines." IBM and Cray officials said that DARPA's "unprecedented" grants reflect "a determination to ensure the U.S. remains in the forefront of the field."

Husband Of US Trade Representative Dies. The AP (11/22) reports, "Curtis Carroll, husband of U.S. Trade Representative Susan Schwab, has died, Schwab's office announced Tuesday. Carroll, a professional magician, died Monday of kidney and liver failure, Schwab spokesman Sean Spicer said." Deputy US Trade Representative John Veroneau "will represent Schwab on Wednesday at the signing ceremony for a free trade agreement with Colombia, Spicer said."

Spellings Is First Cabinet Secretary To Appear On "Jeopardy." The AP (11/22, Zuckerbrod) reports, "Education Secretary Margaret Spellings says she studied hard to prepare for Tuesday night's airing of 'Celebrity Jeopardy!'" Spellings is "the first Cabinet secretary ever to appear on" "Jeopardy!" By appearing, she won $25,000 for the charity ProLiteracy Worldwide which was picked by "Jeopardy!" in order to "comply with government ethics rules."

Retired Admiral Teaching At Naval Academy Profiled. The Washington Post (11/22, Weeks, 690K) reports that retired Adm. William J. Crowe, Jr., "with hearing aids and stooped shoulders, is passing along his sea of wisdom to a classful of intense and intrigued midshipmen at the U.S. Naval Academy." Asked about Iraq, "He does have some notions on how to avoid getting into another Iraq-like complication. ... Crowe believes it's the perfect moment to craft guidelines that might be used the next time around." Crowe, "who has been teaching in the academy's political science department since 1999, hopes to engender a sense of caution and reason in the next generation of commanders and help keep the United States from entering unjust -- and unjustified -- interventions." He "supported John Kerry in 2004."

DOJ_NMG_0097041

White House Communications Move To Internet Infrastructure. Government Computer News (11/22, Wakeman) reports the "completion of the transition of the White House's external communications system to an Internet protocol-based infrastructure will be done by General Dynamics Corp.'s IT business." Under a "$7 million contract from the White House Communications Agency, General Dynamics of Falls Church, Va., will use a Synchronous Optical Network backbone for connections between the White House and the outside world." General Dynamics "has been working with the White House Communications Agency for more than four years on various communications projects doing analysis, design and infrastructure upgrade work, said company spokesman Mark Meudt." The White House Communications Agency "provides the systems for the president, vice president, presidential emissaries, White House staffers and Secret Service. The systems include audiovisual, voice and data capabilities. The White House Communications Agency also supports the president when he travels."

Democratic House Aide Cleared In Leak Probe. The New York Times (11/22, Shane, 1.16M) reports, "A Democratic staff member [Larry Hanauer] of the House intelligence committee has been cleared of wrongdoing by a Republican-led leak investigation and reinstated in his position, committee officials said Tuesday." Hanauer was accused of being "a source for an article on Sept. 24 in The New York Times about a National Intelligence Estimate saying the Iraq war had become a cause célèbre for terrorists." Democrats called the investigation "payback for a decision by the committee's ranking Democrat, Representative Jane Harman of California, to release a report by an outside counsel into actions on the committee by former Representative Randy Cunningham, a California Republican now serving a prison term for taking bribes."

Attention Given To Pelosi's Attire Considered. The AP (11/22, Noveck) reports House Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi's "clothes — stylish, well-chosen and nicely cut, of the Armani variety" have "garnered attention since she became the most powerful woman in American politics earlier this month." The AP asks, "Why do we focus on Pelosi's clothes and not those of our president, or any male in Washington? Is it inherently sexist, detracting attention from her obvious accomplishments? Or is it merely a reflection of the obvious truth that, while clothes matter for both men and women, female attire is more noticeable, more expressive and more interesting?" Pelosi, "a 66-year-old grandmother, isn't the first powerful woman in politics to be put under the sartorial microscope. The choices of Hillary Clinton, perhaps the most visible woman in U.S. politics, have been deconstructed through time, from her changing hairstyles to her inaugural hat in 1993 to the constant dark pantsuits on the Senate campaign trail, often paired with a pink blouse. (Again, imagine her well-dressed husband being criticized for always choosing a dark suit.)" One "extensive analysis of Pelosi's clothing came from Pulitzer-prize winning fashion critic Robin Givhan of The Washington Post, who often writes about the attire of major Washington figures — including a much-noticed piece on Vice President Dick Cheney's casual outerwear at a Holocaust memorial service in Poland last year."

Paulson Criticized For Lack Of Political Savvy. In his Washington Post column (11/22, D1), Steven Pearlstein says Treasury Secretary Hank Paulson "gave a splendid speech this week about the need to re-engineer the financial regulatory structure to make it more efficient and enhance the competitiveness of U.S. markets in the face of stiff new competition from London and Hong Kong." Paulson's "approach is reasoned, nuanced and pragmatic. It is also refreshingly naive." Paulson "comes at these issues as someone who is willing to take the facts and logic wherever they lead, even if it means offending friendly interest groups or running some sacred cows off the road." What Paulson "hasn't had time to master is the black art of Washington policy-speak -- and that is where the naive comes in." Paulson has "brought a breath of fresh air to the stale partisan atmosphere of Washington. But if he wants to succeed as the honest broker, he'll need to crack the code on the Washington policy conversation and reassure Democrats and other skeptics that he's got something new to sell."

WPost Says Paulson Wants Right Balance On SarbOx. The Washington Post (11/22, A20, 690K) says in an editorial, "US and foreign companies alike sought listings on U.S. stock exchanges so that they could tap into the world's largest and most efficiently managed pool of savings. But this has recently ceased to be true: Fewer companies are seeking U.S. listings; some foreign ones are delisting, preferring to trade on a stock exchange elsewhere; and many U.S. companies are turning their backs on stock exchanges altogether as private-equity funds acquire them. Some interest groups have presented these trends as evidence that the post-Enron reform of corporate governance, through the Sarbanes-Oxley law, overreached. Mr. Paulson rightly refused to swallow that simplification." Under Sarbanes-Oxley, "auditors have insisted on an excessively burdensome implementation of now-infamous Section 404 of the law, which requires companies to check the management systems used to generate numbers on sales, inventory, costs and so on. What's needed is regulatory guidance to dissuade auditors from interpreting this requirement overzealously, particularly for smaller firms. Mr. Paulson has struck the right balance."

DOJ_NMG_0097042

Dorgan Defends Pessimistic View Of Trade Deficit. In a Wall Street Journal (11/21, 2.04M) letter to the editor, Sen. Byron Dorgan says, "Alan Murray's column ('Two Books, Two Different Democratic Tones,' Nov. 8) about my book 'Take This Job and Ship It' complains that it isn't upbeat and optimistic. Well, he's right about that! My book takes on the $800 billion-a-year, out-of-control trade deficits. It looks behind the economic numbers to understand what is happening to American workers who are being told to compete with workers in other parts of the world who will work for pennies an hour. My book pulls back the curtain on incompetent trade agreements that sell our country short by paving the way for outsourcing American jobs and running up crushing trade deficits. It's hard to find optimism in that kind of failure." Dorgan adds he believes "the current path is unsustainable. These trade deficits will have significant and dangerous consequences to our economy and our future. That doesn't mean we should retreat into a protectionist strategy. But we should recognize that we are engaged with smart, tough economic competitors, and it's long past the time for us to insist that the rules of trade be fair to our country, to our workers and to our businesses."

Liberal Economists To Unveil Plan To Shield US From Globalization. In his Washington Post column (11/22, A21), Harold Meyerson says that to counteract the problems caused by globalization, former Treasury Secretary Robert Rubin's Hamilton Project "has called for greater public investment in education, health care, research and development, and infrastructure; balancing the budget; and wage insurance for workers compelled to take lower-paying jobs in our Wal-Mart-ized economy." In response "to the Hamilton Project's creation, a group of some 50 liberal economists loosely affiliated with the Economic Policy Institute (EPI) began work of their own" that will "be unveiled in January." The "fundamental difference between the two projects -- that is, between the two primary schools of Democratic economics -- is that Rubin's largely believes the rules of the market to be immutable and sound (though it's precisely the rules of the market that are depressing American incomes), while EPI's, in the words of economist Mark Levinson, 'rejects the notion that what has happened to this economy is inevitable. Policy can turn this around.'" EPI's project "will call for a pay-or-play health insurance system (employers can cover their own employees in private plans or pay taxes into an expanded version of Medicare that will cover everyone else) and for a retirement system in which employers can offer their employees pensions or, with their employees, pay into a system administered by Social Security. It will suggest a series of policies to decouple globalization from downward pressure on wages -- adding some enforceable labor standards, for instance, to the rules of the World Trade Organization."

Bush Daughter's Purse Stolen In Argentina. The AP (11/22) reports US and Argentine media "reported that one of President Bush's 24-year-old twin daughters had her purse stolen while being guarded by the Secret Service during a visit here." ABC News, "citing unidentified law enforcement reports, reported on its Web site Tuesday that Barbara Bush's purse and cell phone were taken while she was dining in a Buenos Aires restaurant." La Nacion newspaper, citing anonymous government sources, said in its online edition early Wednesday that one of Bush's daughters had her purse taken Sunday afternoon in the popular tourist district of San Telmo."

The Washington Post (11/22, Argetsinger, Roberts, 690K) reports in its "Reliable Source" column, "ABC News reported yesterday that elder-by-seconds twin Barbara joined Panama-based sister Jenna on a trouble-scarred trip to Argentina. ABC, citing 'law enforcement reports' it obtained, said someone stole a purse and cellphone from Barbara at a Buenos Aires restaurant -- right under the noses of her Secret Service agents. Also, an agent accompanying them was mugged during his off-hours."

DOJ_NMG_0097043

Bush Called Uncivil For Use Of Term "Democrat Party." In her Washington Post column (11/22, A21), Ruth Marcus says, "If he wanted to, President Bush could change the tone in Washington with a single syllable: He could just say 'ic.' That is, he could stop referring to the opposition as the 'Democrat Party' and call the other side, as it prefers, the Democratic Party." The "derisive use of 'Democrat' in this way was a Bush staple during the recent campaign." But "even as he promised to work to change the tone in Washington after the elections, the president couldn't manage to change his language. In his day-after-the-elections news conference, Bush employed this needling locution five times."

OTHER NEWS:

White House Predicts Slower Economic Growth. The CBS Evening News (11/21, story 6, 0:20, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Now to the coming attractions for the economy. The White House predicted today that economic growth will slow next year to below 3% thanks to the slump in the housing market. And inflation will tick up a bit. Prices are expected to rise just over 2.5%."

Fox News' Special Report (11/21, Hume) reported "the new forecast matches with last year's growth figures." The Administration also said "the economy is still in very good shape." The Wall Street Journal (11/22, A2, Solomon, 2.04M) says "the new economic-growth forecast, on which the president's new budget will be based, is largely in line with private-sector estimates. Private forecasters are predicting GDP growth of 3.4% this year and 2.6% in 2007. On the inflation front, the private sector is less sanguine about 2006, estimating 3.5% CPI growth and 2.5% in 2007." The Financial Times (11/22, Guha) reports the White House also predicted "the US labour market will remain tight next year…raising hopes that ordinary Americans will start to feel more of the benefits of the country's economic expansion." The Washington Times (11/22, Dinan, 88K) and New York Times/AP (11/22), among other sources, run similar reports.

Nasdaq And S&P Reach 2006 Highs. USA Today (11/22, 2.27M) reports, "Stocks crept higher Tuesday as rising oil prices partly smothered euphoria over shares of Internet wunderkind Google cracking the $500 barrier. The Nasdaq composite and Standard & Poor's 500 indexes, which include Google among their components, both set 2006 highs: The Nasdaq was up 2.12 points to 2454.84 and the S&P was up 2.31 points to 1402.81. The Google-free Dow Jones industrial average rose 5.05 points to 12,321.59 that left it 21 points shy of its record close on Friday." NBC Nightly News (11/21, story 7, 0:10, Williams, 9.87M) noted only that "on Wall Street today, stocks finished with modest gains."

NYTimes Says Economy Not Raising Wages. The New York Times (11/22, 1.16M) editorializes, "Nearly every month for the past two and a half years, inflation has eaten up whatever wage gains most American workers have managed to eke out. In August, however, the cost of living started to moderate, thanks largely to falling energy prices. As a result, wages outpaced prices substantially in September. And in October, according to a government report last week, average hourly earnings were 2.8 percent higher than a year earlier, after adjusting for inflation -- the biggest annual increase since 1998. A real increase is something to cheer for a broad swath of working Americans." But "behind the headline numbers, the wage picture -- and what it says about the economy -- is still cloudy. The gains of September and October were due to declining inflation, not faster wage growth. And with most economists predicting a slower economy through the middle of next year, it's unlikely that American workers will get a sustained pay boost any time soon. … The coming holiday shopping season will be the true test of consumer resiliency. But the modesty of recent purchases -- in the face of the best real wage growth in eight years -- does not bode well."

Wilson, Schmidt Claim Victory In NM1, OH2. The New York Times/AP (11/22) reports, "More than a week after Representative Heather A. Wilson, Republican of New Mexico, claimed a razor-thin election victory, her Democratic challenger conceded Tuesday, saying that a recount would cost too much and that there was no guarantee it would reverse the result." In the 2nd CD of Ohio, Rep. Jean Schmidt, "a Republican, clinched re-election Tuesday. Additional ballot counts gave her an insurmountable edge of about 3,200 votes over her Democratic challenger, Victoria Wulsin." In New Mexico, Wilson, "a five-term congresswoman, won by 875 votes, with 105,921 votes to 105,046 votes for the Democrat, Patricia Madrid, the state attorney general."

DOJ_NMG_0097044

Giuliani Forms Federal Presidential Exploratory Committee. The New York Times (11/22, Chan, 1.16M) reports former New York Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani "has filed papers with the Federal Election Commission to create a presidential exploratory committee, joining a fellow Republican, Senator John McCain of Arizona." Giuliani's filing, "hand-delivered to the commission on Monday, says he is still 'testing the waters,' meaning that for now, he can raise and spend money on polls and travel but not declare himself a candidate or build a substantial war chest." Giuliani "created a political committee in New York State on Nov. 10 called the Rudy Giuliani Presidential Exploratory Committee. But he stopped short of filing federal papers, leading to speculation that he had doubts about even weighing a run."

McCain Stance On US Troop Levels In Iraq Said To Pose Political Risks. AFP (11/22, Collinson) reports, "As Americans wonder when the troops will come home from Iraq, Republican White House hopeful John McCain is laying his first big bet of the 2008 campaign: demanding more soldiers for the war." McCain's position "contrasts sharply with the call of victorious Democrats for a phased withdrawal from Iraq." McCain says that "more men must be poured in to flush out insurgent strongholds, crush militias and sectarian violence and to train Iraqi forces." McCain "may be tailoring his message to hawkish, pro-military conservative voters who will decide the Republican nominee in primary elections. 'I don't think it dooms him in his primary process. He has a hard right primary he has to go through. My guess is that's part of the calculation,'" Delaware Sen. Joe Biden (D), a potential '08 candidate, said Monday.

Romney Seen As Methodically Moving Toward Presidential Bid. The AP (11/22, Johnson) reports, "By almost any measure, Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney -- a would-be presidential candidate -- should be hanging his head right now. He was chairman of an association supposed to elect Republican governors, but they lost 20 of 36 races on Election Day, which saw widespread GOP losses. Then, in an issue critical to the GOP's conservative base, the Massachusetts legislature balked at his request to let state voters decide on an anti-gay marriage amendment, forcing him to petition the state's highest court." Meanwhile, Arizona Sen. John McCain (R) and ex-New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani (R) "jumped out and announced they were forming presidential exploratory committees. Yet true to the business training that earned him hundreds of millions of dollars, Romney has a plan and he's sticking to it." Romney "is proceeding on a methodical course of fundraising, staff-building and outreach. … 'I have not seen an individual approach this situation with a greater degree of structure or by compiling such a vast database for making it, both on the personal and political sides,' said Tom Rath, a veteran New Hampshire political operative who has advised former Republican candidates such as Bob Dole, George H.W. Bush, Lamar Alexander and George W. Bush."

Brownback Reaching Out Beyond Christian-Conservative Base. The Kansas City Star (11/22, Stearns, 271K) reports that Kansas Sen. Sam Brownback's (R) "post-Thanksgiving schedule included an HIV test and reporting to prison," providing "further evidence that, as Brownback nears the formal announcement of his long-simmering presidential exploration, he remains determined to stake out a unique position in what likely will be a crowded" GOP "primary field. Typically pigeonholed by political analysts as the candidate of the religious right, Brownback hopes to be more inclusive. Christian conservatives…are his natural base of support. But publicly highlighting issues such as the plight of prisoners and poverty in developing nations can help Brownback broaden his appeal, even as he asserts that his faith calls him to deal with such issues. It's an effort to show that compassionate conservatism isn't an empty motto." Brownback and Illinois Sen. Barack Obama (D) on Dec. 1 "will attend best-selling author Rick Warren's Saddleback Church in southern California for a Global AIDS Summit." The senators "will get HIV tests to 'destigmatize the test and the information.'" A week later, Brownback "is set to spend the night at the Louisiana State Penitentiary, in Angola, La." Brownback "hopes his visit will highlight the success of faith-based programs."

Religious Group Withdraws Wal-Mart Boycott. The Wall Street Journal (11/22, Hudson, 2.04M) reports, "A religious group that had rallied members to boycott Wal-Mart Stores Inc. this weekend backed off the pledge on Tuesday." The American Family Association and Operation Save America "had urged its followers to stay away from Wal-Mart on the Friday and Saturday following Thanksgiving to protest the retailer's recent ties with homosexual groups, including its decision this year to join a national chamber of commerce for gay and lesbian businesses," but "after Wal-Mart issued a statement on Tuesday outlining its policies on corporate donations and its stance against discrimination, the American Family Association declared itself 'pleased' and withdrew its call for a boycott." The association also "credited its decision to withdraw its boycott to Wal-Mart's announcement Tuesday that it will not 'make corporate contributions to support or oppose controversial issues unless they directly relate to their ability to serve their customers.'"

DOJ_NMG_0097045

US Teen Birthrate Falls To All-Time Low. USA Today (11/22, Rubin, 2.27M) reports the birthrate "among U.S. teens, which has been falling since its peak in 1991, dropped to an all-time low in 2005, according to preliminary data released Tuesday by the National Center for Health Statistics, part of the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention." But among Hispanic teens "the birthrate is twice as high as the overall teen birthrate." Overall, the "preliminary 2005 rate for females ages 15-19 was 40.4 births per 1,000, down from 41.1 in 2004 and 61.8 in 1991. The Hispanic rate for teens 15-19 was 81.5, down from 82.6 in 2004 and 104.6 in 1991." Demographer Stephanie Ventura, co-author of the report, says "abstinence and contraceptive use 'are still driving factors' behind the declining teen birthrate."

Assassination Threatens To Destabilize Lebanon; Complicates Debate Over Syria. The assassination Tuesday of a prominent Lebanese politician received prominent coverage on the front pages of the nation's dailies and the nightly network news broadcasts. The death of Pierre Gemayel was seen as likely to throw Lebanon in a state of chaos and Syria was largely seen as being responsible for the killing. Syria's suspected role in the assassination was also seen as likely to complicate calls for Washington to reach out Damascus for assistance in Iraq. The CBS Evening News (11/21, story 3, 0:40, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "The White House believes Syria and Iran are still causing trouble in Lebanon where today assassins killed a government official." CBS (Phillips) added, "Another political assassination in Lebanon has the country once again teetering on the brink of chaos. Just four months after the Israeli Lebanese conflict. This time the victim was one of Lebanon's leading Christian anti-Syrian cabinet ministers, Pierre Gemayel, the son of a former president. Gunmen rammed their car into his and sprayed it with bullets. There's been widespread international condemnation of the attack, including from President Bush, and widespread fear of reprisal political killings and even a slide into civil war."

ABC World News (11/21, story 2, 2:20, Gibson, 8.78M) said the Bush Administration "called the ambush in Beirut an act of terrorism and pointed a finger at the neighbor Syria." ABC (Wright) added, "The Lebanese government was already in meltdown -- the country still reeling after its month-long war with Israel. Tonight, the US is all but accusing Syria and the militant group Hezbollah of murder in an effort to topple the government." In an analysis segment, ABC World News (11/21, story 3, 1:45, Karl, 8.78M) reported, "There was little appetite in the Bush administration to deal with Syria on Iraq before today. And there is even less now. Officials see this as part of a pattern. There's been nine assassinations or attempted assassinations of anti-Syrian politicians in Lebanon over the past three years. With that kind of activity going on, the view from the Bush administration is, it would be folly to think that talking to Syria would help in Iraq."

The Washington Post (11/22, A1, Wright, 690K) notes Bush "blasted Syria and Iran yesterday after the assassination of Christian cabinet minister Pierre Gemayel for trying to destabilize Lebanon, reflecting tensions between Washington and its two Middle Eastern rivals that are increasingly playing out in Lebanon as well as Iraq." While the President "stopped short of blaming Syria for the killing, he warned that the United States remains 'fully committed' to supporting Lebanon's democracy despite attempts by Damascus, Tehran and their allies in Lebanon 'to foment instability and violence.'"

The New York Times (11/22, Knowlton, 1.16M) reports that the assassination was "widely condemned today as an act of terrorism that threatens to upend not only Lebanon's stability, but also tentative moves to engage Syria in talks on regional peace initiatives." Britain, France, Egypt, the European Union and the United States issued "powerful condemnations" of the killing. Undersecretary Burns described the killing as an act of terrorism and intimidation, saying, "We believe it's the responsibility of all countries to support the Siniora government and to oppose those who would try to divide Lebanon or return violence to political life in Lebanon." At the UN, Ambassador Bolton "spoke with visible anger about the killing." Asked by a reporter whether the Hariri tribunal "should now be delayed to avoid fanning instability," he said sharply: "How incredibly wrong that would be. Instability? They're killing people in Lebanon, they're assassinating political leaders. Not the time to seek justice?"

DOJ_NMG_0097046

NBC Nightly News (11/21, lead story, 3:15, Williams, 9.87M) said the killing "could make Lebanon, which is still recovering from that massive Israeli bombing, a very unstable place and give control there to enemies of the United States. And that is why this story, this assassination, was felt today around the world." NBC (Engel) added, "This assassination is likely to have a destabilizing effect throughout the Middle East. The White House is accusing Iran, Syria and Hezbollah of trying to topple and take over the Lebanese government. Already tonight there are angry protests and some calls for revenge in a country edging closer to civil war." NBC's Engel also said, "It is absolutely imperative that the American administration takes this very serious at a time when America's looking for friends and talking about engaging in diplomacy. There is a real possibility that this anti-American coalition of Iran, Syria and Hezbollah, will succeed and take over the government."

In a separate analysis segment, NBC Nightly News (11/21, story 2, 2:00, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "All of this may only complicate US dealings in the Middle East. And especially any possible US exit strategy from Iraq which many say has to involve dealings of some sort with Syria." NBC (Mitchell) added, "There's a lot of pressure on the Administration. The Baker-Hamilton Iraq Study Group and other leading Republicans, such as Chuck Hagel, all say that Iran and Syria aren't the solution to the problem, precisely because they are helping to fuel the insurgency. This is hard for this Administration, for George Bush and Dick Cheney to accept. They have made these states terror-sponsoring states on their official list and consider Iran to be on the axis of evil -- a very hard step for them to take."

The AP (11/22, Loven) reports briefly that Secretary Rice telephoned Lebanese Prime Minister Fouad Siniora "with condolences and to reiterate US support for democracy in Lebanon."

In a front page article, the New York Times (11/22, A1, Slackman, 1.16M) said the assassination "jolt[ed] a nation already paralyzed by political conflict that threatens to topple the government" and "inflamed tensions between the anti-Syria coalition trying to hold its government together and the Syrian-allied opposition, led by Hezbollah." Although Lebanese Prime Minister Fouad Siniora "vowed in a televised speech that his government would hold firm," the Times says "in truth, his government may already be on life support" after "six pro-Syria ministers aligned with Hezbollah resigned" last week "after a failed effort to gain greater control over the government." The killing "also is likely to complicate any American effort to enlist Syria's help to stabilize Iraq." The US "withdrew its ambassador from Damascus after [former Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik] Hariri was assassinated nearly two years ago," and "the suspicion that Syria is behind the efforts to destabilize Lebanon will make it nearly impossible for Washington to send a full ambassador back to Damascus without appearing to have abandoned the Siniora government," the Times writes.

The Wall Street Journal (11/22, A1, Higgins, Solomon, 2.04M) reports on its front page that Gemayel's killing "also complicates the policy debate about Iraq in Washington, where some foreign-policy experts have urged the Bush administration to reach out to Syria and Iran in an effort to curb Iraq's violence." Although Washington "stopped short of directly blaming Syria" for the killing, it said the act "underscored the need to accelerate the UN probe into the Hariri murder." For his part, President Bush condemned what he called "Syria's refusal to cease and desist from its continuing efforts to destabilize Lebanon's democratically elected government," adding that the US would "resist these efforts." At the UN, Ambassador Bolton "bristled at suggestions by some at the UN that the Hariri probe should be slowed."

The Washington Times (11/22, Behn, 88K) says the killing "was seen by analysts as part of a coordinated attempt to push the United States out of the Middle East. 'This is part of a broader effort on the part of Syrians and Iranians in their own isolation to prove they have leverage over events in the region and to minimize the role of the US in the region,' said former US ambassador to Morocco, Marc Ginsberg."

On its front page, the Washington Post (11/22, A1, Shadid, 690K) says the assassination "underlined the lack of red lines in the escalating struggle over Lebanon's political future that has followed this summer's war between Hezbollah and Israel. The struggle is crucial not only to the often zero-sum calculations of Lebanese politics but also to the regional ambitions of the United States, Iran, Syria and Israel." In a separate front page report titled "Assassination Increases Tensions With Syria, Iran," the Washington Post (11/22, A1, Wright, 690K) reports President Bush "blasted Syria and Iran yesterday after the assassination…for trying to destabilize Lebanon, reflecting tensions between Washington and its two Middle Eastern rivals that are increasingly playing out in Lebanon as well as Iraq." The Post notes that "for the past 21 months, the Bush administration has tried to steer the Mediterranean country toward democracy and away from the grips of long-standing Syrian and Iranian influence. As Iraq imploded, the Bush administration hoped that Lebanon might prove an alternative model for the flowering of freedom in the Middle East." However, the assassination yesterday "signals that the battle for Lebanon is far from over, said US officials and regional experts."

DOJ_NMG_0097047

The Financial Times (11/22, A1, Khalaf, Dinmore, Dombey) reports that "moves to bring Syria back into the diplomatic fold were dealt a blow on Tuesday by the killing" that "threatens to destabilize a government struggling for unity." The AP (11/22, Karam, Ghattas) reports that Syria and Iran "both condemned Gemayel's slaying, and Syria's Information Minister Mohsen Bilal denied Syria had any role." In an interview with Al-Jazeera, Bilal said, "Those who are accusing Syria in this sick way...do not have an iota of truth or credibility." The Los Angeles Times (11/22, Stack, 850K), USA Today (11/22, For, 2.27M) and Washington Times/AP (11/22, Ghattas) run similar reports.

More Commentary. In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (11/22, 2.04M) says, "Former Secretary of State James Baker has been saying that, when it comes to diplomacy, you don't 'restrict your conversations to your friends' -- shorthand for the view that the US should engage Syria and Iran to find solutions in Iraq and elsewhere in the Middle East. But yesterday's murder of Lebanese Minister Pierre Gemayel might remind even Mr. Baker and his Iraq Study Group what some of those non-friends are all about. … It's true that every Administration must deal with the world as it is. But when it comes to Syria, do the sages of the Iraq Study Group really want the Bush Administration to seek the benediction of a country that stirs such mayhem in Beirut?"

Two Kidnapped Gaza Red Cross Workers Released. The AP (11/22, El Deeb) reports, "Two Italian Red Cross workers kidnapped Tuesday afternoon were released shortly after midnight, Palestinian security officials said." Claudio Moroni, 36, and Gianmarco Onorato, 63, were "abducted in Deir el-Balah in central Gaza after their car was stopped by gunmen." Before their release, the Red Cross said "it was suspending its activities in the Gaza Strip, fearing for the safety of its workers." Iyad Nasr, spokesman for the Red Cross's Gaza office, said "the organization had ceased all field operations and would intervene only 'in matters of life and death,' and "workers have been ordered to stay in their offices because of fears for their safety." There was "no immediate word on the conditions of the released aid workers."

Study Says 39% Of Land Used By Israeli Settlers Owned By Palestinians. The Washington Post (11/22, A17, Wilson, 690K) reports, "An Israeli advocacy group has found that 39 percent of the land used by Jewish settlements in the West Bank is private Palestinian property, which the organization contends is a violation of international and Israeli law guaranteeing property rights in the occupied territories." In a report released Tuesday, the Settlement Watch project of Peace Now "also disclosed that much of the land that Israeli officials have said would remain part of the Jewish state under any final peace agreement is private Palestinian property." The report "draws on maps and data from the Civil Administration, the military authority Israel established to govern the West Bank following the 1967 Middle East war." Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's spokeswoman, Miri Eisin said, "the government would comment on the report's methods and findings once officials have had time to review it." Also, Israeli troops "pushed into the Gaza Strip early Tuesday and killed two Palestinians in fighting near the village of Zeitun."

Court Rules Israel Must Register Same-Sex Marriages Performed Abroad. The Los Angeles Times (11/22, Ellingwood, 850K) reports, "The Israeli Supreme Court touched off a fresh controversy over gay rights Tuesday when it ordered the government to register same-sex marriages performed abroad." The 6-1 decision "was praised by rights advocates as a political advance for gays and lesbians, who have won previous court decisions granting them broader rights in survivor benefits and inheritance," and "cheered by those who support legalizing civil marriages in Israel, where only religious ceremonies are allowed." The ruling "did not legalize same-sex weddings in Israel, where religious authorities by law hold a monopoly on authorizing marriages and divorces." Religious conservatives "criticized the decision as an erosion of Israel's status as a Jewish state and said it undermined moral teachings," and some "urged the Israeli parliament, or Knesset, to examine the possible effect on Israeli society."

US Seeks More Market Access In India For Agricultural Commodities. The Wall Street Journal (11/22, A4, Mohindru, 2.04M) reports, "The US is seeking greater market access in India for its agricultural commodities, such as wheat, to ensure balanced farm trade between the two countries, U.S. Agriculture Department Secretary Mike Johanns said." He "favored an approach where India's plant-health norms are protected and wheat trade occurs with the US," and said that "discussions on plant-health-related issues are going on so that India will be able to export its mangoes to the US by the next harvest in April."

DOJ_NMG_0097048

India, China Work To Build Economic Relations. The New York Times (11/22, Rai, 1.16M) reports, "India and China established a 10-point strategy on Tuesday to strengthen economic relations and ease mistrust, agreeing that there is room enough for both to grow." At a joint media briefing the two presidents said "there was enough space for the two countries, which account for a third of the world's population, to grow in a mutually beneficial manner 'while remaining sensitive to each other's concerns and aspirations, as befits good neighbors and partners.'" They also said they "would work to double their trade to $40 billion by 2010, which some see as a sign that centuries of Western dominance in global trade may be ending." The countries "signed 13 pacts covering joint scientific initiatives, tourism promotion and the opening of new consulates," but "there were no breakthroughs at the leadership level on the first day of talks."

Cnooc, PetroChina Sings Investment Deals In Vietnam. The Wall Street Journal (11/22, A10, Winning, 2.04M) reports, "China National Offshore Oil Corp. and PetroChina Co. have signed deals to ramp up investment in Vietnam as leaders in Beijing and Hanoi set aside a long-running maritime border dispute to forge closer energy ties, state media reported yesterday." Cnooc "signed an agreement with Vietnam Oil & Gas Corp., or PetroVietnam, on Friday to begin exploring for oil in the Gulf of Tonkin in the South China Sea on a 50-50 basis." The exploration period is "expected to last three to five years."

China's Military Buildup Designed To Compete With US Navy. The Washington Times (11/22, Gertz, 88K) reports, "China's military buildup includes new missiles and naval weapons designed to sink U.S. aircraft carriers and deny U.S. forces access to the Asia-Pacific region, a congressional commission official said yesterday." Daniel Blumenthal, a former Pentagon defense policy-maker and now a member of the U.S.-China Economic Security Review Commission, said "The Chinese have been quite successful ... in the area of sea denial, meaning that if we sent a carrier to or outside the [Taiwan] Strait as we did in 1996, it would be a lot riskier and a lot costlier to the United States." Beijing's military is also "experimenting with new attack concepts, including land-based attacks on ships 'through multiple entry concepts' in what Blumenthal called 'a very serious effort to try to basically sink a carrier or battle group.'"

China's Poor Getting Poorer. The Wall Street Journal (11/22, Batson, Oster, 2.04M) reports, "China's economic miracle has lifted hundreds of millions of people out of poverty, but the country is showing signs that its poorest citizens are falling further behind." Now Chinese government "worries about social stability and amid questions about the social costs of China's rapid growth, new figures suggest the poorest of the country's 1.3 billion people are getting even poorer." The widening of China's income gap "raises questions about the bargain its government made three decades ago when it agreed to accept a measure of social inequality as long as it improved the nation's welfare overall," and many observers place "part of the blame on the way China dismantled its social-welfare system as it phased out state control of the economy -- without building up much to replace it." The reason for the income decline at the bottom isn't clear," since the World Bank "hasn't completed its analysis and its conclusions haven't been published."

Goodlatte To Lead Congressional Ag Tour Of South America. The Washington Post's (11/22, A19) Al Kamen writes in his "In the Loop" column that outgoing House Agriculture Committee Chairman Bob Goodlatte is "leading a group of about 10 committee members, plus spouses, military aides and assorted staff" to South America "right after Thanksgiving." The delegation of "perhaps up to 40 folks in all" with make "stops in several countries" to "discuss agricultural trade -- specifically focusing on expanding US agricultural exports," according to committee spokeswoman Alise Kowalski. The Post reports that incoming Chairman Collin Peterson is also expected to travel with the group.

Populism Seen As Losing Appeal For Latin American Voters. The Wall Street Journal (11/22, A1, Lyons, 2.04M) reports, "The populist political tide that seemed to be sweeping through Latin America earlier this year is sputtering." Voters have been "choosing presidential candidates who tap into a more powerful force: economic stability." The "diminishing electoral appeal of candidates promising radical economic and political change is on display here in Ecuador, ahead of this Sunday's presidential election." The electoral failure of populists "so far has been good news for foreign investors and businesses."

DOJ_NMG_0097049

Maoist Rebels In Nepal Sign Peace Deal With Government. The New York Times (11/22, Pokharel, Sengupta, 1.16M) reports that "Maoist rebels in Nepal signed a peace deal with the government on Tuesday night, with a pledge to lock up their guns, at least for now, and let voters decide the future of the country." The accord "promises to bring the rebels, who control vast swaths of the destitute countryside, into the political mainstream," and Prime Minister Girija Prasad Koirala said, "This has given a message to the international community and terrorists all over the world that no conflict can be resolved by guns. It can be done by dialogue." The interim government, "which the rebels have agreed to join," will "organize elections next year for an assembly that will determine whether Nepal will remain a kingdom and if so, what kind." However, the rebels "have not laid down their arms entirely," but "have agreed to lock up their weapons but are holding on to the keys" The United Nations is "to monitor the safekeeping of weapons through a system of closed-circuit cameras."

The Washington Times/AP (11/22, Gurubacharya) reports, "Nepalese Prime Minister Girija Prasad Koirala and Maoist rebel leader Prachanda signed the accord at a Katmandu convention hall packed with cheering officials, dignitaries and foreign diplomats." Under the agreement, "the rebels are to join the interim parliament by Nov. 26 and will get 73 of the chamber's 330 seats. Mr. Koirala's Nepali Congress will remain the biggest party with 85 seats, and the Maoists will share second place with Communist Party of Nepal (United Marxist-Leninist)." The rebels' "large number will give them a significant role in a new interim government, which will be in place by Dec. 1," and will take a "major part in deciding how and when to elect a constituent assembly that is to rewrite the constitution and decide on the monarchy's fate."

Bangladeshi Villagers Get Internet Access. The Washington Post (11/22, A12, Sullivan, 690K) reports, "Villages in one of the world's poorest countries, long isolated by distance and deprivation, are getting their first Internet access, all connected over cell phones," and "millions of people who have no land-line telephones, and often lack electricity and running water, in recent months have gained access to services considered basic in richer countries: weather reports, e-mail, even a doctor's second opinion." Cell phones "have become a new bridge across the digital divide between the world's rich and poor, as innovators use the explosive growth of cellphone networks to connect people to the Internet." The Internet centers "are being set up by GrameenPhone, a cellphone provider partly owned by the Grameen Bank," and the centers "are building on a cellphone network created over the past decade by a Grameen Bank program that helped provide more than 250,000 cellphones in villages."

WSJournal Says Russia Likely Responsible For Ex-KGB Agent's Poisoning. In an op-ed column, "Russian Venom," in The Wall Street Journal (11/22, A14, 2.04M), Boris Volodarsky writes that it might be "too early to discuss how and why Mr. Litvinenko was poisoned," but what's "clear" is that "this was likely the work of the Russian secret service that had been after him for years." If the Russian president is involved "is open to doubt," and Russian foreign intelligence "denies any involvement in his poisoning." However, "it cannot deny," its "long history of using poison as a weapon."

HIV/AIDS Program Shows Improvement In Seven African Countries. The Washington Post (11/22, A14, Brown, 690K) reports, "Seven African countries are experiencing a decline in the prevalence of HIV infection among young, urban adults, finally reaping the benefit of AIDS prevention and treatment, the United Nations said yesterday in its annual report on the global epidemic." However, there are "troubling signs that the first African country to reverse the epidemic, Uganda, is experiencing a resurgence of infection, as is Thailand, another early success story." The report demonstrates that policymakers "need to safeguard early successes like Uganda."

NYTimes Urges IAEA To Deny Iran Nuclear Assistance. In an editorial, the New York Times (11/22, 1.16M) says the International Atomic Energy Agency has "always had a conflicted mandate" of promoting "the peaceful use of nuclear technology while also restraining the spread of nuclear weapons." The Times says "that dangerous duality is being played out again this week" as the agency debates "whether its staff should provide Iran with technical advice on how to safely complete construction of a heavy water nuclear reactor near the town of Arak." Denying the request "should be a no-brainer," the Times say, "especially at a time when Iran is defying a Security Council order that it stop enriching uranium, usable for nuclear reactor fuel or potentially a nuclear bomb." Anything less, it continues, "will only confirm Tehran's belief that the international community is not serious about containing its nuclear ambitions." The Times also urges the Bush administration, "which has agreed to talk with Iran if it suspends enrichment, needs to go further, offering Tehran explicit security guarantees in exchange for giving up technology that could feed a nuclear weapons program."

DOJ_NMG_0097050

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:

"Mining Firms Again Eyeing Navajo Land."
"Director Was A True Original."
"Filipinos' Hip-Hop Anthem."
"Assassination Leaves Lebanon At Brink."
"Getty Makes New Offer To Italy."
"Fury On The Airwaves Undid Bias Settlement."

USA Today:

"Nature Programs' Goal: No Child Left Inside."
"Every Year's Game Of Century."
"Fliers Urged To Ease Logjam."

New York Times:

"Lebanon Official Critical Of Syria Is Assassinated."
"Justice Courts For Small New York Towns To Be Overhauled."
"Study Questions Need To Operate On Disk Injuries."
"Perfect Killing Method, But Clear Targets Are Few."
"Robert Altman, Director With Daring, Dies at 81."
"An Ideologue For Hire Gets New Alliance."
"Erasing Divide, College Leaders Take To Blogging."

Washington Post:

"Fears of Civil Strife Rise In Lebanon."
"Report Finds DHS Lax On Contracting Procedures."
"Assassination Increases Tensions With Syria, Iran."
"Out Of India, En Masse And On The Way Up."
"Some Curbs On Sex Offenders Called Ineffective, Inhumane."
"Fenty's Choices Already Causing Anxiety About Insular Approach."

Washington Times:

"Anti-Syrian Lebanese Christian Official Slain."
"Military Has Alternative To Baker Report."
"Senate Seeks Medicaid Review."
"Teen Births Down; Unwed Moms Up."
"Gay Custody Case Stalls In Court."
"Save Turkey With Dry Run."

Detroit Free Press:

"Upturn Seen For Region's Slumping."
"Tears, Cheers For Te Michigan Man."
"Witness Alleges Police Intimidation."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:

"Packed Forum Debates Illegals."
"Women 92, Dies In Shootout With Cops."
"Good Deeds In A Fishbowl."
"Gwinnett Cracks Down On Homeless."
"Fired-Up Employees rally To Delta's Cause."

Houston Chronicle:

"2 Pit Bulls Kill Boy, 4 Near Home."
"Sizzle Meets Sweet In Crash Of Classics."
"Player's Case Spurs Call For Taser Study."
"Rest Easy: Studies Suggest back Surgery Not Only Option."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:

ABC: Safest Cars; Assassination In Lebanon; Assassination In Lebanon-Analysis; Syria & Iraq Re-Establish Ties; Iraq-Sectarian Violence; Muslims Removed From Airplane; Nursing Mother Ordered Off Airplane; Keeping Kids In School; Warren Jeffs Court Hearing; Robert Altman Obit; Bo Schembechler Obit; Ed Bradley Memorial; WWII Sunken Submarine Found.

CBS: US Troops-Inadequate Training; Military Raid-Iraq; Assassination In Lebanon; Deadly School Bus Accident; Robert Altman Obit; Housing Market's Effects On Economy; Retail Price Wars; ALCOA Cutting Jobs; Google Stock Price; Back Pain Treatment; Women Giving To The Poor; Ed Bradley Memorial.

NBC: Assassination In Lebanon; US Mideast Strategy; Muslims Removed From Airplane; Robert Altman Obit; Lost Luggage; Bush's Motorcade-Accident; Stock Market; Ed Bradley Memorial; Making Beautiful Music.

DOJ_NMG_0097051

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:

ABC: Holiday Travel-TSA Restrictions; Bush-Holiday Plans; Jordan-Bush, Maliki Meeting; Assassination In Lebanon; MA-Propane Storage Facility Fire; Google Stock Price.

CBS: Jordan-Bush, Maliki Meeting; US Troops-Difficulty Training Iraqi Troops; Indonesia Considering Sending Peacekeepers To Iraq; Holiday Travel-TSA Restrictions; Cost of Holiday Food; Robert Altman Obit; NPR: Jordan-Bush, Maliki Meeting; Bush-Troop Visit In Hawaii; Justice Department-Padilla Case; US Special Envoy-Sudan; France-Experimental Nuclear Fusion Reactor Agreement; Robert Altman Obit; Wall Street.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Participates in the pardoning of the National Thanksgiving Turkey, Rose Garden; President and Mrs. Bush depart The White House en route Camp David via Marine One, South Lawn.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

US Senate: No Scheduled Events.

US House: No Scheduled Events.

Other: US-COLOMBIA _ 10 a.m. US Trade Representative Susan Schwab participates in the Colombia Trade Promotion Authority signing ceremony. Location: Inter-American Development Bank.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 22, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Holiday Publishing Notice 3
US Asks 4th Circuit To Reinstate Padilla Terrorism Charge 3
Reno Joins Former DOJ Officials In Criticizing Anti-Terror Strategy 3
Gonzales Says Supermax Problems Are Being Addressed 4

Homeland Response:

Seattle Barber Shop Owner Flees To Somalia Ahead Of Sentencing 4
DNI Unveils First Comprehensive Terror Threat Information-Sharing Plan 4
DHS Investigating Removal Of Muslim Clerics From Flight 4
Consultants' Report Finds Fault With DHS Contracting Procedures 5
TSA, Airlines Making Major Push To Warn Travelers Of Restrictions 5
FBI Seen As Struggling With Muslim, Arab Outreach Efforts 6

War News:

Bush Visits Troops In Hawaii 6
Bush, Maliki To Meet In Jordan 6
Former President Bush Defends Son In UAE Speech 7
Baker Report Almost Ready; Pentagon Drafting Alternative 7
Lieberman Blasts Democrats Urging "Cut And Run" Iraq Policy 7
Congressman-Elect Generated Questionable Iraq Intelligence 8
Syria, Iraq Renew Diplomatic Relations 9
Bomb Fails To Kill Iraqi Speaker Inside Green Zone 9
Iraqi Government Hamstrung By Distrust 9
Marine Snipers Find Few Targets 10
Marines Issue Flame-Resistant Flight Suits To Ground Troops 10
Parents Stand By Haditha Suspect 10
US, Afghan Officials Say More Troops, Equipment Needed 10
Pakistan Arrests 39 Suspected Taliban In Quetta 11
US Accused Of "Shameful" Record Of Abandoning Allies 11
Army Turns To New Recruiting Slogan 11

DOJ:

GAO Finds Room For DOJ Improvement In Information Classification Practices 11

Corporate Scandals:

DOJ Drops Effort To Restore Lay Conviction 12

Criminal Law:

DOJ Decides Against Probe Of Porter Fundraising Allegation 12
Three Aryan Brotherhood Members Sentenced To Life 12
Three Gang Members Sentenced To Live For Targeting Blacks 13
Ohio Brokers Acquitted Of All Bribery Charges 13
Tennessee License Examiner Sentenced To Prison For Taking Bribes 13
Federal Agents, Philadelphia Police Arrest Suspect In 1989 Racial Murder 13
Judge Agrees To Freeze Hedge Fund Manager's Assets Over Alleged Fraud 13
Federal Agents, Florida Police Arrest Suspects In DOT Laptop Theft 14
Key Prosecution Witness Testifies Jeffs Coerced Underage Marriage 14
Curbs On Sex Offenders Seen As Ineffective, Inhumane 14
FBI Establishes Western Pennsylvania Corruption Hotline 15
FBI Investigating Former Louisiana Charity Grant Office 15
Baltimore Council Mulls Taping Of Police Interrogations 15
Maryland Man Sentenced To Life For Killing Stepdaughter 15
Greek Authorities Pursue Charges Against Getty Antiquities Curator 15
New York To Overhaul System Of Town, Village Courts 16

Civil Law:

Whistleblowers Help US Recover $1.3 Billion In Fraud Cases 16
DC Circuit Overturns Dismissal Of FOIA Suit Over Immigrant Convicts 17
Bankruptcy Attorneys Adjusting To Decline In Filings 17

Civil Rights:

Maryland Disputes DOJ Findings On Juvenile Center Conditions 17
Monitor Finds Mississippi Juvenile Centers Still Not Meeting Standards 18
Day Laborers Win New York Racial Bias Suit 18
Georgia Prosecutors Probe Police Shootings 18
Maryland Gay Custody Battle Stalls In Court 18
Breast-Feeding Mothers Rally To Protest Restrictions 19
US 22nd In Gender Gap Ranking 19

Antitrust:

Municipal Bond Dealers Brace For Expanded Probes 19
DOJ Says Windows Vista Complies With Microsoft Judgment 20

Oshkosh Truck Gets Antitrust Clearance To Purchase JLG 21
Suit Accuses Quiznos Of Antitrust Violations, Fraud 21
SCOTUS To Hear Landmark Patent Case 21
Speculation Swirls Over Future Mergers 22
Qantas Considers Takeover Approach From Texas Pacific, Macquarie 22
Union Ruling Clouds Suez-Gaz De France Agreement 22
Firm Exonerated Of Antitrust Allegations Wins Baldrige Award .. 23
EU Clears UCB Bid For Schwarz Pharma 23
Equities Exchange Said To Be Bigger Deal Than Talks Between Nasdaq-LSE 23
Columnist Says Airline Mergers Will Not Fix Industry Problems . 23

Environment/Indian Affairs:

Company Blames Farmers, "Act Of God" For Rice Contamination 24
WPost Says Government Flu Strategy Wanting 24
Mining Companies Eye Navajo Land 24
NRC Tests Find Contaminated Water Under Indian Point 24

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Gonzales Says FBI Will Add Southwest Colorado Agent 25
CBS To Air "Criminal Minds" Episode Written By FBI Profiler 25
Rhode Island Drug Sweep Nets Dozens Of Arrests 25
Philadelphia Inquirer Highlights DEA Internet Pharmacy Investigation 25
In Colombia, US Pulls Some Resources Out Of Anti-Drug Effort 26
Seneca Nation Tobacco Merchant Reaches Compliance Deal With ATF 26
NYTimes Criticizes Allen's Concealed Weapons Bill 26

Immigration:

Bush, Congress Said To Be Unwilling To Construct Border Fence 26
Governors Seek Additional Federal Money For Jailing Illegal Immigrants 27
US Wrestles With Fate Of Deportees Who Face Danger In Native Land 27

Tax:

Snipes Says He Is Scapegoat In Tax Fraud Case 27

Congress-Administration:

Bush Open To Considering Tax Hike As Part Of Social Security Deal 28
Democrats Not Expected To Block Gates Nomination 28
Rangel Says Draft Proposal Was Meant To Ignite Debate 28
USDA Representative Defends "Hunger" Omission In Report 29
Controversial HHS Official Prescribed Birth Control In Private Practice 29
Democrats Unlikely To Advance Liberal Interest Groups' Agenda 29
Dodd Faces Balancing Act Between Business, Democratic Base29
Democrats Set Sights On Prime Capitol Real Estate 29
Point Man On Financial Crimes To Leave Treasury 30
Senate Panel To Review DC's Medicaid Program 30
IBM, Cray Win DARPA Supercomputer Contract 30
Husband Of US Trade Representative Dies 30
Spellings Is First Cabinet Secretary To Appear On "Jeopardy." .. 30
Retired Admiral Teaching At Naval Academy Profiled 30
White House Communications Move To Internet Infrastructure .. 30
Democratic House Aide Cleared In Leak Probe 31
Attention Given To Pelosi's Attire Considered 31
Paulson Criticized For Lack Of Political Savvy 31
Dorgan Defends Pessimistic View Of Trade Deficit 31
Bush Daughter's Purse Stolen In Argentina 32
Bush Called Uncivil For Use Of Term "Democrat Party." 32

Other News:

White House Predicts Slower Economic Growth 32
Wilson, Schmidt Claim Victory In NM1, OH2 33
Giuliani Forms Federal Presidential Exploratory Committee 33
McCain Stance On US Troop Levels In Iraq Said To Pose Political Risks 33
Romney Seen As Methodically Moving Toward Presidential Bid 33
Brownback Reaching Out Beyond Christian-Conservative Base 33
Religious Group Withdraws Wal-Mart Boycott 34
US Teen Birthrate Falls To All-Time Low 34
Assassination Threatens To Destabilize Lebanon; Complicates Debate Over Syria 34
Two Kidnapped Gaza Red Cross Workers Released 36
Study Says 39% Of Land Used By Israeli Settlers Owned By Palestinians 36
Court Rules Israel Must Register Same-Sex Marriages Performed Abroad 36
US Seeks More Market Access In India For Agricultural Commodities 36
Cnooc, PetroChina Sings Investment Deals In Vietnam 37
China's Military Buildup Designed To Compete With US Navy... 37
Goodlatte To Lead Congressional Ag Tour Of South America ... 37
Populism Seen As Losing Appeal For Latin American Voters 37
Maoist Rebels In Nepal Sign Peace Deal With Government 37
Bangladeshi Villagers Get Internet Access 38
WSJournal Says Russia Likely Responsible For Ex-KGB Agent's Poisoning 38
HIV/AIDS Program Shows Improvement In Seven African Countries 38
NYTimes Urges IAEA To Deny Iran Nuclear Assistance 38

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages 38

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington 39

DOJ_NMG_0097054

TERRORISM NEWS:

Holiday Publishing Notice. In observance of Thanksgiving, the Attorney General's News Briefing will not be published on Thursday, November 23.

US Asks 4th Circuit To Reinstate Padilla Terrorism Charge. The AP (11/22, Anderson) reports, "Federal prosecutors have asked an appeals court to reinstate a key terrorism charge against an alleged Al Qaeda operative, Jose Padilla, contending a judge erred in finding that it duplicated other counts in the same indictment." The AP notes, "The pleading filed with the 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals late Monday argues that the charge dismissed by U.S. District Judge Marcia Cooke is a distinct offense in the case. Judge Cooke ruled in August that the first count of the indictment against Padilla and two others — charging a conspiracy to 'murder, kidnap, and maim persons in a foreign country' — was essentially the same as two other terrorism support counts. The dismissed charge is the only one in the case that carries a potential life prison sentence."

Reno Joins Former DOJ Officials In Criticizing Anti-Terror Strategy. The Washington Post (11/22, A6, Eggen) reports, "Former attorney general Janet Reno has taken the unusual step of openly criticizing the Bush administration's anti-terrorism strategy -- joining seven other former Justice Department officials in warning that the indefinite detention of U.S. terrorism suspects could become commonplace unless the courts intervene." The Post continues, "In a friend-of-the-court brief filed in the case of alleged enemy combatant Ali Saleh Kahlah al-Marri, the former prosecutors assert that criminal courts are well equipped to prosecute terrorism suspects while guaranteeing the constitutional rights of defendants arrested on U.S. soil. … Reno, reached at her Florida home yesterday, said she would let the brief 'speak for itself. I've been following this, and it reflects my concerns about the detention and treatment of people who have been determined to be enemy combatants in a manner that is not clear how it is being done.'" The Post adds, "In their brief, Reno and the other former Justice Department officials said: 'The government is essentially asserting the right to hold putative enemy combatants arrested in the United States indefinitely whenever it decides not to prosecute those people criminally -- perhaps because it would be too difficult to obtain a conviction, perhaps because a motion to suppress evidence would raise embarrassing facts about the government's conduct, or perhaps for other reasons.' … The filing in the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 4th Circuit is a highly unusual move for Reno. She has generally maintained a low profile since leaving the helm of the Justice Department in 2001 and has said little publicly about the policies of her successors, John D. Ashcroft and Alberto R. Gonzales. … The brief is also notable because its signatories include two U.S. attorneys from the Reagan years -- W. Thomas Dillard and Anton R. Valukas -- in addition to prosecutors from the Clinton and Carter administrations and Philip A. Lacovara, a counsel to the Watergate special prosecutor. … 'While we respect the right of other legal minds to be heard on these issues, we believe we are on firm legal footing in this case as both the magistrate judge and district court concluded,' Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said yesterday."

Bloomberg (11/22, St.onge) reports, "Reno and the others said the Bush administration is trying to set a dangerous precedent that would let the government indefinitely imprison any non-U.S. citizen considered an enemy. The former U.S. officials were joined by at least four human rights groups making similar arguments. … Al-Marri, 41, was the first defendant removed from the U.S. criminal justice system and deemed an illegal enemy combatant. He was studying in the U.S. and living in Illinois when he was arrested in late 2001. The Justice Department unsealed the indictment in December 2002, and he was declared an enemy combatant about six months later. A citizen of Qatar, al-Marri has been held at a U.S. Navy Prison in South Carolina since June 2003. … The Justice Department said it stands by its decision to try al-Marri as a suspected terrorist outside the criminal court system. … 'These are complex and difficult legal issues,' said Justice Department spokeswoman Kathleen Blomquist in an e-mailed statement today. 'While we respect the right of other legal minds to be heard on these issues, we believe we are on firm legal footing.'"

More Commentary. The Denver Post (11/22) editorializes, "U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales told The Denver Post editorial board Monday that the administration can hold Guantanamo Bay detainees indefinitely, without any judicial proceeding through the 'period of hostilities.' Which is to say, indefinitely. … The administration has categorized an untold number of detainees as 'unlawful enemy combatants,' saying they are members of a non-state terrorist group. It's a different class of detainee than POWs, typically uniformed combatants captured during battlefield-style warfare. The U.S. in previous wars has held enemy combatants. But the Military Commissions Act of 2006 broadened the definition of illegal enemy combatant to include those providing support to terrorists. As such, they have no right to a real day in court. 'We have no obligation to bring people to justice,' Gonzales said. … And even when military commission proceedings begin, Gonzales predicted slow going due to defendants' legal maneuverings. … 'At every opportunity they're going to bring challenges,' he said. But these opportunities have shrunk considerably." The Post adds, "In fact, Congress gave the president the authority to use military commissions in a bill that included one particularily controversial provision - denying the detainees a procedure known as habeas corpus, a right that obligates the government to justify imprisonment before a federal judge. … With the removal of habeas rights, the detainees have no way of challenging their status in federal court. That alone has spawned litigation that seems sure to make its way to the U.S. Supreme Court. … As for those who are in detention at the military prison in Guantanamo Bay, the denial of habeas corpus is unnecessary and un-American. While the U.S. Supreme Court almost certainly will get a crack at this questionable law, members of Congress shouldn't wait. They should review the military commissions act as an early order of business in 2007 and at the very least restore the right of habeas corpus to those imprisoned at Guantanamo. … It is a step that will bring the U.S. back into line with our own traditions and rights."

Gonzales Says Supermax Problems Are Being Addressed. The AP (11/22) reports, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales acknowledged the federal government has made mistakes at the ultra-high-security Supermax prison in Colorado, including inadequate monitoring of inmate mail and phone calls, but he said steps are being taken to address the problem. … 'Have mistakes been made? Have there been some problems there? No question about it, like there are at every facility,' Gonzales said Monday. 'But we've taken steps to address them.'" The AP continues, "Supermax, in the town of Florence about 80 miles south of Denver, houses some of the nation's most dangerous inmates, including Unabomber Ted Kaczynski, al-Qaida conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui and Oklahoma City bombing conspirator Terry Nichols. … Local and federal officials have criticized the prison in recent weeks over staffing levels, security measures and fencing." The AP adds, "A Justice Department report in September criticized the prison for not properly screening mail and other communications. Last month, a federal arbitrator found staff cuts had made the facility more dangerous. Both Colorado's senators, Republican Wayne Allard and Democrat Ken Salazar, and local officials have raised concerns about security and communications. … Gonzales said all inmate mail is now being read and a large portion of phone calls are monitored as they occur. The rest are recorded and reviewed by translators later, though a shortage of qualified Arabic translators has caused a delay."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Seattle Barber Shop Owner Flees To Somalia Ahead Of Sentencing. The Seattle Post-Intelligencer (11/22, Shukovsky, 124K) reports, "Ruben Shumpert, who federal agents allege made his Rainier Valley barber shop a kind of 'anti-American training ground for Muslims' where children were taught 'how to shoot and fight the Americans,' has telephoned the FBI to say he won't be going to prison anytime soon. Shumpert, who faces sentencing on federal counterfeiting and weapons charges, has fled to Somalia," noting in the call to the FBI agent that Somalia has no extradition treaty with the US. The Post-Intelligencer notes, "Shumpert -- an African American convert to Islam -- was among more than a dozen, mostly African immigrants from Islamic countries arrested by the FBI's Joint Terrorism Task Force two years ago on a mix of charges, including immigration fraud and bank fraud. Shumpert was never charged with any terrorism crimes, but court documents paint a picture of his barber shop…as a gathering place for adherents of radical Islam where he showed children videotapes of 'fighting, shooting and killing with images on Shumpert's computer screen of al-Qaida and the Taliban.'"

The AP (11/22, Johnson) reports, "Shumpert's lawyer, James Vonasch, said the government told him only that his client had left the country. … Vonasch also said that Shumpert claims to speak some Arabic, and that an FBI agent who worked the case got a call from him within the past two weeks. 'The agent implied it was an unpleasant conversation, but he didn't supply me with the details,' Vonasch said. Vonasch said Shumpert's wife and two young children are still in Seattle. The FBI questioned the wife about Shumpert's whereabouts, he said."

DNI Unveils First Comprehensive Terror Threat Information-Sharing Plan. The Wall Street Journal (11/22, A10, Christie, Block, 2.04M) reports, "More than five years after" 9/11, "U.S. intelligence officials have unveiled the first comprehensive plan to help federal, state and local officials share information about terrorist threats." The Journal notes, "A senior U.S. intelligence official said President Bush asked the DNI to create a framework to allow the Department of Homeland Security and the Federal Bureau of Investigation to better coordinate their threat assessments and warnings to state and local authorities. The White House has grown increasingly concerned about the poor quality of information sharing between the federal government and the states. State and local officials cautiously welcomed the plan," but "many warned the effort wouldn't work without federal money and muscle to provide better technology and to put an end to traditional interagency turf battles."

DHS Investigating Removal Of Muslim Clerics From Flight. The removal of 6 Muslim religious leaders from a US Airways flight in Minneapolis Monday night and subsequent calls for an investigation into the incident from civil rights groups have prompted widespread media attention. ABC World News (11/21, story 6, 2:35, Gibson, 8.78M) reported "the Department of Homeland Security's Office for Civil Rights has opened a review" of the incident. "Passengers thought the clerics were acting suspiciously. The clerics claim they were simply trying to pray. One thing for sure: Five years after 9/11, air travelers are still very nervous." Former National Security Advisor Richard Clarke was shown saying, "All too often airlines give in to a few passengers who feel uncomfortable. Rather than the airlines and the Transportation Security Agency telling those passengers who feel uncomfortable that it's okay, that these people are just different, not terrorists."

DOJ_NMG_0097056

NBC Nightly News (11/21, story 3, 2:45, Williams, 9.87M) reported the incident "raises an uncomfortable question in our post-9/11 age of suspicion and fear of terrorism, what is legitimate and what is intolerant?" Omar Shahin, Muslim Clergyman: "The way they took us off the plane, it's a humiliation, 100%." NBC (P. Williams) continued, "Investigators say US Airways told them that some of the men moved to empty seats after boarding and refused to follow crew instructions. But the clerics say they did nothing wrong."

The New York Times (11/22, Sander, 1.16M) reports, "The incident prompted the Council on American-Islamic Relations and officials for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People in Washington to call Tuesday for Congressional hearings on racial profiling and an investigation by the Justice Department and the Transportation Security Administration. Nihad Awad, executive director of the Islamic advocacy group, said this was hardly the first time Muslims had encountered problems with stereotyping by the airline."

In an article appearing on no fewer than 41 news websites, the AP (11/21, Lohn) reported the clerics "said Tuesday they were victims of discrimination and called for a boycott of the airline." Meanwhile, "Shahin expressed frustration that — despite extensive efforts by him and other Muslim leaders since even before the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks — so many Americans know so little about Islam, which requires prayer five times a day."

Fox Special Report (11/21, story 6, 3:10, Herridge) reported, "A Homeland Security official told FOX that it's standard practice to review allegations of racial profiling by the Muslim community, but based on statements by the TSA and federal law enforcement, a Homeland Security official said it appears the proper procedures were followed."

McClatchy Newspapers (11/22, Von Sternberg, Miller) reports, "Before passengers boarded, one became alarmed by an overheard discussion. 'They seemed angry,' he wrote in a police statement. 'Mentioned 'US' and 'killing Saddam.' Two men then swore slightly under their breath/mumbled. They spoke Arabic again. The gate called boarding for the flight. The men then chanted 'Allah, Allah, Allah.'"

The Washington Times (11/22, Hudson, 88K) reports, "Patrick Hogan, spokesman for the Minneapolis-St. Paul Metropolitan Airports Commission, said the men reportedly made anti-American statements relating to the Iraq war, asked to change seats once inside the cabin, and that one requested an extender to make his seat belt larger even though he did not appear to need it. 'There was some peculiar behavior,' Mr. Hagmann said."

Consultants' Report Finds Fault With DHS Contracting Procedures. The Washington Post (11/22, A1, O'Harrow, Higham, 690K) reports in a front page article, "Private consultants hired by the Department of Homeland Security have found widespread problems with its contracting operation, including nearly three dozen contract files that could not be located. Files that could be found often lacked basic documentation required under federal rules, such as evidence that the department negotiated the best prices for taxpayers, according to a copy of the consultants' report obtained by The Washington Post." The Post adds, "Last year, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, Deputy Secretary Michael P. Jackson and others at the agency acknowledged having trouble with contracting and promised to do better." However, "the confidential report adds weight to critics' contentions that contracting problems persist."

TSA, Airlines Making Major Push To Warn Travelers Of Restrictions. USA Today (11/22, 1A, Frank, 2.27M) reports on its front page that in "an unprecedented campaign to warn travelers about new restrictions on carry-on bags," the TSA "is staging events at 66 airports to alert passengers that they can carry only limited amounts of liquids, aerosols and gels on airplanes. Airports are warning of the restrictions with ads, billboards and workers who hand out plastic bags that travelers must use to pack carry-on liquids." TSA spokeswoman Ellen Howe said the agency "is very focused on keeping waits down."

USA Today (11/22, 3A, Frank, Copeland, 2.27M) also reports, "This Thanksgiving poses one of the biggest recent tests to the nation's aviation system — whether or not airport security lines will flow smoothly despite a record number of passengers and new security rules. Many travelers and officials are nervously optimistic." USA Today adds, "The weekend's significance is underscored by an awareness campaign by the TSA, airlines and airports to highlight new restrictions on the amount of liquids, aerosols and gels passengers can carry on airplane cabins. News stories, posters, ads and e-mails have inundated travelers in virtually every major city and smaller areas from Eau Claire, Wis., to Midland, Texas."

DOJ_NMG_0097057

FBI Seen As Struggling With Muslim, Arab Outreach Efforts. Under the headline "FBI Struggles To Win Trust Of Muslim, Arab Communities," McClatchy (11/22, Taylor) reports in an 1,845-word story taking a largely negative tone toward the FBI, after 9/11 "Arab and Muslim communities became the bureau's top targets," but now "the FBI has embarked on an aggressive national outreach program. The bureau's efforts, which include mosque visits and one-on-one meetings, have become so pervasive in certain cities that some young Muslim-Americans refer to the agency as the 'Friendly Brotherhood of Islam.' Yet across the country, many participants wonder what the interactions achieve when mistrust remains the biggest obstacle." McClatchy notes FBI Assistant Director John Miller said of the outreach efforts, "I would expect there to be friction. I'd also expect that we'd be able to talk about it."

WAR NEWS:

Bush Visits Troops In Hawaii. Fox News' Special Report (11/21, Hume) reported President Bush "headed back to Washington tonight after meeting with US troops in Hawaii. The President went through the chow line at Hickam Air Force Base and thanked the troops for their service. Later he received a briefing at the US Pacific Command headquarters."

The AP (11/22, Loven) reports President Bush "circled the globe on his Asian journey but never strayed far from the subject of Iraq. He dined with U.S. troops in Hawaii before heading home Tuesday, telling them their efforts 'will determine how your children and grandchildren live.'" Bush "found himself in front of cameras on Tuesday at Hickam Air Force Base condemning the assassination earlier in the day of an anti-Syrian Lebanese leader. Bush was briefed in Hawaii at the Oahu headquarters of the U.S. Pacific Command, whose territory spreads from the West Coast of the U.S. to the Indian Ocean. Before that he ate and chatted with the troops, at an open-sided mess hall."

Three Police Officers From Bush Motorcade In Hawaii Injured In Accident. NBC Nightly News (11/21, story 6, 0:40, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "There was a serious accident today involving at least three motorcycles in President Bush's motorcade in Hawaii during a brief stopover on the President's way back to Washington from his Asia trip. Three Honolulu police officers could be seen lying on the grass near their overturned vehicles after apparently hitting a stretch of wet pavement during a light rain. Two of the officers were taken away by ambulance. Tonight we're told one is listed in serious condition. The other is stable. No word on the third police officer."

The Washington Post (11/22, Argetsinger, Roberts, 690K) reports in its "Reliable Source" column that "yesterday morning, as POTUS headed to Hickam Air Force Base on Oahu, three local police officers accompanying the motorcade crashed their motorcycles on a rain-slicked street. Two officers were hospitalized, White House officials said -- one with broken bones, the other with a neck injury."

White House Aide Beaten, Robbed In Hawaii. The KITV-TV WH Staffer Beaten/Robbed in HI (11/22) reports, "The acting director of the White House Travel Office was robbed and beaten in Waikiki early on Tuesday morning outside a nightclub, according to Honolulu police." Pitts "left the bar alone," and "walked through International Marketplace, where he was confronted by three men beaten up and robbed." His "passport and international phone were also taken," and he was treated at Queen's Medical Center. Pitts had "accompanied President George W. Bush on a brief visit to Hawaii," but "did not return with the president to Washington."

The Washington Post (11/22, Argetsinger, Roberts, 690K) reports in its "Reliable Source" column that a White House aide "was badly beaten and robbed during the president's stopover in Hawaii on the way back from Asia. Gregg Pitts, acting director of the White House Travel Office, suffered a broken nose in the Monday night mugging on a Honolulu street and was left behind in a hospital yesterday while the rest of the presidential entourage continued back to D.C." T

Bush, Maliki To Meet In Jordan. The Los Angeles Times (11/22, Moore, 850K) reports, "President Bush will meet with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki next week in Jordan to discuss methods to speed up the handover of military responsibilities from US troops to Iraqi security forces, White House officials said Tuesday. The session, scheduled at the end of Bush's planned trip to a North Atlantic Treaty Organization summit in Latvia, will allow the two leaders to 'review the situation in Iraq more generally and talk about the way ahead,' said national security advisor Stephen Hadley, speaking to reporters on Air Force One as the president returned to Washington from Asia." Hadley "said Bush and Maliki would focus on the progress of a committee recently formed to speed the shifting of security responsibilities to Iraqi forces."

The Washington Post (11/22, A17, Baker, 690K) reports Hadley also said, "We're not looking for a big, bold announcement. … This is an opportunity for the president and Prime Minister Maliki to get together, to get a report from this commission they have adopted. This is obviously an important time for both Iraqis and Americans in developing a way ahead." The Washington Times/AP (11/22) runs a similar report.

DOJ_NMG_0097058

Former President Bush Defends Son In UAE Speech. The Los Angeles Times/AP (11/22, Krane) reports former President George H.W. Bush "took on Arab critics of his son Tuesday during a testy exchange at a leadership conference" in Abu Dhabi, capital of the United Arab Emirates, a US ally. Bush said, "My son is an honest man." The AP adds the UAE "used to be safe territory for former President Bush, who brought Arab leaders together in a coalition that drove Saddam Hussein's troops from Kuwait in 1991. But gratitude for the elder Bush, who served as president from 1989-93, was overshadowed at the conference by hostility toward his son, whose invasion of Iraq and support for Israel are deeply unpopular in the region." A woman in the audience "bluntly told Bush after his speech," "We do not respect your son. We do not respect what he's doing all over the world." The AP adds Bush, 82, "appeared stunned as others in the audience whooped and whistled in approval." A college student "told Bush his belief that US wars were aimed at opening markets for American companies and said globalization was contrived for America's benefit at the expense of the rest of the world. Bush was having none of it." Bush said, "I think that's weird and it's nuts. To suggest that everything we do is because we're hungry for money, I think that's crazy. I think you need to go back to school." The "hostile comments came during a question-and-answer session after Bush finished a folksy address on leadership by telling the audience how deeply hurt he feels when his presidential son is criticized." But Bush "also told the audience its derisive hoots were mild compared to the reaction he got in Germany in the 1980s, after persuading the country to deploy US nuclear missiles."

Baker Report Almost Ready; Pentagon Drafting Alternative. The Washington Times (11/22, Scarborough, 88K) reports, "The Pentagon is drafting its own new options for winning in Iraq, in part, to give President Bush counterproposals to fall back on in case the Iraq Study Group comes up with ideas he does not like, defense officials say." Meanwhile, "study group co-chairman Lee H. Hamilton, a former Democratic representative from Indiana, told The Washington Times yesterday that he and co-chairman James A. Baker III, secretary of state in the first Bush administration, have nearly completed a first draft report." Hamilton "said the two men hope to complete it this weekend, give it to the eight other Iraq Study Group members in time for a meeting next week to review it."

Kaplan Says Iraq Reinforcing "Realist Dictum." In an op-ed for the Washington Post (11/22, 690K), Robert Kaplan writes, "The debacle in Iraq has reinforced the realist dictum, disparaged by idealists in the 1990s, that the legacies of geography, history and culture really do set limits on what can be accomplished in any given place." But "the [1990s] experience in the Balkans reinforced an idealist dictum that is equally true: One should always work near the limits of what is possible rather than cynically give up on any place. In this decade idealists went too far; in the previous one, it was realists who did not go far enough."

Ignatius Says Iraqis Have To Follow Saudi Model. In his Washington Post (11/22, 690K) column, David Ignatius writes, "What are the lessons in Saudi Arabia's move back from the brink of potential disaster? The most important is that the Saudis decided to take charge of their own security rather than relying on an America that many in the kingdom resented. ... How does this apply to Iraq? Like the Saudis, the Iraqis will have to save themselves, working within the authentic political framework of their culture, religion and region. The more we try to substitute our will for theirs, with more American troops or exhortation, the more we enfeeble them. ... Only the United States can broker the regional conference that will allow a political transition in Iraq. That's our leverage now -- diplomatic clout, more than military power."

More Commentary. In her New York Times column (11/22), Maureen Dowd says, "It's hard to remember when America has been so stuck. We can't win and we can't leave. The good news is that the election finished what Katrina started. It dismantled the president's fake reality about Iraq, causing opinions to come gushing forth from all quarters about where to go from here. The bad news is that no one, and I mean no one, really knows where to go from here. The White House and the Pentagon are ready to shift to Plan B. But Plan B is their empty term for miraculous salvation." Dowd notes in a parenthetical comment, "Dick Cheney and his wormy aides, of course, are still babbling about total victory and completing the mission by raising the stakes and knocking off the mullahs in Tehran. His tombstone will probably say, 'Here lies Dick Cheney, still winning.'"

Lieberman Blasts Democrats Urging "Cut And Run" Iraq Policy. On Fox News' Hannity and Colmes (11/21) Sen. Joseph Lieberman, discussing Senate colleagues who campaigned against him, said, "Obviously, some of the things that happened were disappointing and I guess you don't forget them." Asked what could cause him to switch parties, Lieberman said, "I really do hope that I don't get to that point. … I guess if my party began to take positions in the Senate that were an accumulation that I felt was so wrong for our country, I might think about switching. But I'm not expecting that. … I know it's a 51-49 senate. But I have got to tell you every time there is a disagreement I am not going to threaten to pick up my vote and go to the other side of the Senate chamber." Lieberman went on to vow he will speak out against Democrats who are urging the US to "cut and run" from Iraq, saying, "They are now proposing that we begin a withdrawal of American troops from Iraq within the next four to six months. I think that would -- that's a road to disaster, that's basically the beginning of giving up on Iraq. And as bad as things are in Iraq today, they would be dramatically worse if we just pick up and leave. … We cannot let that happen. Iraq is now a central battlefield in the war on terrorism and we have got to have a success strategy there."

DOJ_NMG_0097059

Lieberman Hires Former Christian Coalition, McCain Aide As Spokesman. The New York Times (11/22, Leibovich, 1.16M) reports Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman "announced Tuesday that he had hired a new spokesman, which is not in itself that noteworthy, except that the said spokesman, Marshall Wittmann, is one of the great career vagabonds, ideological contortionists and political pontificators ever to inflict himself on a city full of them." Lieberman, "a longtime Democrat of Connecticut who was re-elected as an independent and calls himself an 'Independent Democrat,' has not ruled out becoming a Republican." Wittmann, meanwhile, is "a Trotskyite turned Zionist turned Reaganite turned bipartisan irritant turned pretty much everything in between — including chief lobbyist for the Christian Coalition, the only Jew who has ever held that position." Wittmann "suffered through a two-year dry patch from 2002 to 2004 when he was a spokesman for Senator John McCain, the Arizona Republican, a job that largely required him to suppress his inner quotemeister for his boss's even-more-impressive knack for drawing attention." Now Wittmann will "once again have to stifle his pundit proclivities to the greater good of Mr. Lieberman." Even though "he has a new boss, Mr. Wittmann still swears deep and abiding affection for Mr. McCain. And the feeling is apparently mutual: Mr. McCain said through an aide that Mr. Wittmann was 'a dear friend.'" All of which "raises the question of what happens if Mr. McCain runs for president and invites Mr. Wittmann to join his campaign." Wittmann said, "One thing I've learned in the press world is that I don't answer hypothetical questions."

Reed Calls For "Phased Redeployment," "Regional Dialogue." Sen. Jack Reed, on MSNBC's Hardball with Chris Matthews (11/21) said, "The President should be stepping up immediately. He can't wait…until next January until we take over or for the Iraq Study Group. He should immediately send over a high-ranking envoy to Baghdad…to start negotiating key elements -- when will they take out their militia, how will they divide oil revenues. … If that's left to next January, then we and he have wasted valuable time. He's wasted valuable time." Reed went on to say the US should "begin a phased redeployment within Iraq and…begin a regional dialogue."

Al Qaeda Portraying Democratic Win As "American Madrid." In a Washington Times op-ed (11/22), Walid Phares, senior fellow with the Foundation for the Defense of Democracies, says, "The latest audio by al Qaeda's Iraq commander -- posted 48 hours after the midterm elections -- sends a clear signal to the readers of the jihadi strategic mind: Al Qaeda and its advisers around the world want to provoke an 'American Madrid.' Portraying the United States as a bleeding bull in disarray, the war room projects its wish to see America's will crippled." The video "attempts to…convince the jihadists that the United States is now defeated in Iraq and beyond. While no reversal of the balance of power has taken place on the ground, the jihadi propaganda machine is linking the shift in domestic politics to a withdrawal from Iraq." It also attempts to "spread political chaos at home. Jihadists portray the Democratic takeover of Congress and the resignation of Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld (and maybe others) as signs of American weakening in the resolve to fight jihadism." The terminology "used in the videotape is a powerful indicator that al Qaeda's political network relies on Western-educated minds, familiar with political processes in the United States and serving as advisers to the jihadists." The Jihaidsts "aim at sapping American public morale during a time when reorganization is taking place in the U.S. government."

Congressman-Elect Generated Questionable Iraq Intelligence. The Los Angeles Times (11/22, Miller, 850K) profiles Democratic Rep.-elect Chris Carney, who, "of all the Democrats who rode a wave of public anger over Iraq to election victories this month," had the "most unlikely credentials as a war critic." Carney was "part of a controversial intelligence unit at the Pentagon that was responsible for some of the most alarming -- and, it turned out, unfounded -- prewar claims about Iraq." The Pentagon unit "was created and run by one of the Iraq war's principal architects, then-Undersecretary of Defense Douglas J. Feith." Carney "took part in briefings at the White House and the Pentagon that disparaged the CIA for underestimating the relationship between Baghdad and the terrorist network. Vice President Dick Cheney and other administration officials frequently touted the findings to bolster the case for war." Despite his background, Carney "campaigned as an antiwar Democrat and said he got a 'very warm reception' when he arrived at Capitol Hill this week to take part in orientation activities for incoming members." Carney "is not apologetic about his work at the Pentagon." Said Carney, "I certainly stand by the fact that I believe there was some sort of relationship." He added that on "a scale from zero to 10, with zero being no relationship and 10 perfect operational coordination," Carney said, "the Iraq-Al Qaeda link was 'somewhere in the 2.5 range.'" The Times adds that

DOJ_NMG_0097060

"appears to be a more qualified assessment than the so-called Policy Counterterrorism Evaluation Group presented to policymakers during a series of briefings in 2002."

Syria, Iraq Renew Diplomatic Relations. ABC World News (11/21, story 4, 0:15, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "In Iraq today, Syria and Iraq re-established diplomatic ties, after 24 years. The US and Iraq have said that Syria is going to have to do a lot more to stop weapons and insurgents flowing across its border into Iraq."

Fox News' Special Report (11/21, Hume) asked, "What impact will the suspicion of Syrian involvement have on the prospects of getting Damascus to help end the violence in Iraq?" Fox went on to report, "At the State Department, a top ranking official welcomed Iraq having neighborly relations with Syria and Iran, but asked when those countries will behave like a good neighbor towards Iraq?" Under-Secretary of State Nicholas Burns: "The Syrian government permits people, insurgent fighters to cross its border to go into Iraq to kill American soldiers and Iraqis. That ought to stop. The Iranian government we believe has given assistance, material and otherwise, to Shiite insurgent groups attacking Sunni Iraqis but also attacking American and British forces. That has to stop." Fox added, "All this regional jockeying comes as the Bush administration is re-evaluating its conduct of the war in Iraq and has thus far resisted calls for the U.S. to engage more directly with Damascus and Tehran."

The Financial Times (11/22, Biedermann) reports "the move comes as the US and other western powers are exploring the option of enlisting Syrian and Iranian help in stabilising Iraq." But "there are no signs yet that Damascus is preparing to change its policies on the ground in Iraq, where it has been accused of supporting the insurgency." Similarly, the Christian Science Monitor (11/22, Murphy, 59K) says the US "has repeatedly accused Iran and Syria of stirring up violence inside Iraq, but recently the notion of isolating them as punishment has lost favor in Washington. A growing number of…Bush's advisers are urging direct dialogue with both nations. They argue that engagement could convince Syria to do more to prevent foreign fighters from entering Iraq; Iran could exert more influence on Iraq's dominant Shiite political parties (and their militias) to compromise more."

Bomb Fails To Kill Iraqi Speaker Inside Green Zone. The New York Times (11/22, Wong, 1.16M) reports, "A bomb exploded in an armored car belonging to the speaker of Parliament, wounding the American security guard who was driving it out of a parking area in the government Green Zone and disrupting a meeting of lawmakers nearby, a parliamentary aide said. Though the speaker, Mahmoud al-Mashhadani, was not in the vehicle and was unscathed, the assassination attempt was one of the most serious breaches of security yet within the Green Zone, the heavily fortified government district on the west bank of the Tigris River." The bomb "was planted inside a decoy armored car that was part of the speaker's regular convoy and resembled the one he usually used, said the parliamentary aide, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to talk publicly about the attack."

The Washington Post (11/22, A17, Trejos, 690K) reports Lt. Col. Christopher C. Garver, a spokesman for US forces in Iraq, said "bomb-sniffing dogs then detected explosives in another vehicle." Bomb "specialists detonated that car, which set off a series of blasts that caused a fire but injured no one and caused no major damage to nearby structures." Garver "said he was not sure how the explosives made it so far into the Green Zone, which houses the Iraqi government, the US and British embassies and thousands of foreign troops and private contractors. Anyone trying to enter the zone must pass through several checkpoints -- first to get into the complex, then to enter individual buildings."

Joint US-Iraqi Raid Kills Nephew Of Iraqi Lawmaker. The CBS Evening News (11/21, story 2, 1:55, Couric, 7.66M) reported "a joint US-Iraqi force, just the type the Pentagon is trying to build, raided a neighborhood in Baghdad today, capturing seven suspected militiamen. But the raid had some unintended victims." CBS (Palmer) added, "It was dawn in the Shiite slum of Sadr City when calamity struck from the sky. An American air strike had accidentally killed a baby boy in his family home. 'His father was injured, so was his mother,' says the neighbor. 'Who will protect us?' US and Iraqi forces smashed through houses here looking for criminals they believe kidnapped an American soldier last month. The dead child's uncle is a member of Iraq's parliament. Now he says there's no way he's going back to help govern this broken country."

Iraqi Government Hamstrung By Distrust. The Los Angeles Times (11/22, Daragahi, 850K) reports Iraqis "elected their leaders in December, hoping that a government by the people would do something for the people. Eleven months later, officials acknowledge that their efforts have been mostly a failure," and "government involvement often creates a bigger problem than it solves." Despite US "pressure for results, Iraq's elected officials have been unable to overcome their mistrust of one another and improve security or tackle the major political and economic issues — from murderous cops to the sewage woes of Amil." Now, "fed up with ministers he says were foisted on him by political factions, Prime Minister Nouri Maliki has promised a Cabinet reshuffle. He is scheduled to convene the body this week to address the deepening political divisions and a threatened walkout by the Sunni Arab bloc." But "his resolve may not be enough to overcome the government's inherent frailties and limitations."

DOJ_NMG_0097061

Marine Snipers Find Few Targets. The New York Times (11/22, Chivers, 1.16M) reports on the operations of Marine snipers in Anbar province: "This was this sniper team's 30th mission in Anbar Province since early August. They had yet to fire a shot. More than three years after the insurgency erupted across much of Iraq, sniping — one of the methods that the military thought would be essential in its counterinsurgency operations — is proving less successful in many areas of Iraq than had been hoped, Marine officers, trainers and snipers say." Snipers "are seeing fewer clear targets than previously, and are shooting fewer insurgents than expected." Insurgents, after four years, have become "more savvy and harder to kill." Marines also attribute the decline in sniping to "rules and conditions placed on them by senior military leaders."

Marines Issue Flame-Resistant Flight Suits To Ground Troops. USA Today (11/22, Vanden Brook, 2.27M) reports, "Marine commanders are outfitting their troops with flame-resistant flight suits in Iraq to ward off burns from the No. 1 killer here: roadside bombs. It's another sign of how troops in the field have adapted to the deadly insurgency. Earlier in the war, troops added their own armor to vehicles and devised their own makeshift electronic jamming devices to foil the growing power and sophistication of the bombs they encountered. ... So far, the Marines have issued more than 12,000 fire-resistant suits, said Capt. Jeff Landis, spokesman for the Marine Corps Systems Command. ... The Army also has begun to issue fire-resistant flight suits to tank and truck drivers in Iraq, said Lt. Col. Carl Ey, an Army spokesman at the Pentagon. Next year, the Army plans to issue fire-resistant pullovers, boots and socks, records show."

Parents Stand By Haditha Suspect. The Washington Post (11/22, A3, White, 690K) reports on the family of Haditha murder suspect Lance Cpl. Justin Sharratt: "The Sharratts have remained silent until now because they did not know what to say. They have avoided learning details of their son's possible involvement in the shootings while they have struggled to understand what might have happened in a war zone thousands of miles away. They have privately fumed about politicians -- such as Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.) -- who have publicly stated that their son was part of a brutal, vengeful slaughter. And they are livid that no one in the Marine Corps has stepped forward to defend their son." The Post adds, "Military officials familiar with the investigation said there is some evidence that could show wrongdoing, including images, taken by an unmanned aircraft, that appear to show that a group of civilians shot near their car -- which had approached the Marine convoy after the bomb went off -- were executed. At least one Marine has told officials that he saw another Marine standing over the bodies and emptying his rifle's clip into them, according to two people closely familiar with the case."

US, Afghan Officials Say More Troops, Equipment Needed. The AP (11/22, Baldor) reports US and Afghan defense officials said, "More troops and sophisticated equipment are needed to bolster Afghanistan's security forces, but it is not clear whether more U.S. troops will be deployed there." Lt. Gen. Karl Eikenberry "told Pentagon reporters that U.S. officials will wait until after next week's NATO summit in Latvia to see how many troops other countries plan to provide before deciding if more U.S. forces must be sent to Afghanistan." Eikenberry said, "I think it will be best at this point to wait and see what NATO is able to provide. There's more meetings that are taking place on the military staff. And this is very high on their agenda." The AP adds US military leaders "have been pushing NATO members to meet their commitments and provide more troops in Afghanistan. For months, officials have said that NATO nations have provided only 85 percent of the support they promised." The Afghan minister of defense, Gen. Abdul Rahim Wardak, "who met Tuesday with Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, said his country needs more firepower, transport planes and armored vehicles. The Afghans have asked for additional helicopters and aircraft that can move troops and supplies through the mountainous regions."

Relatively Stable Afghan North, West Become "Time Bomb." The Financial Times (11/22, Morarjee) reports in a 1,600 word map-supported article, "On Nato maps, Afghanistan's southern provinces and eastern areas along the border with Pakistan are shaded a fiery red, reflecting the hot spots of a persistent insurgency. By contrast, the northern and western provinces are shown in green, dotted with yellow to indicate pockets of instability. But the colour-coding is deceptive. The government and its international backers can no longer take the relative peace of the north and west for granted. It is becoming clear that warlords and commanders from other ethnic groups are increasingly a menace." Reportedly "angry about being pushed aside" by the Karzai government, Northern Alliance warlords who "swept the Taliban from power" make the north a "ticking time bomb," as described by an unnamed diplomat. The FT continues, "Local militia commanders are rethinking their backing of the central government and Islamic militants are moving to mobilise support outside their southern strongholds by exploiting the factional fault-lines in the north and the west." Furthermore, "the bulk of the 2,700 troops in the north are German and are constrained by caveats that would not allow them to leave their bases to intervene in a big clash in the region. Italian, Spanish and Lithuanian troops in the west are similarly hidebound."

DOJ_NMG_0097062

Pakistan Arrests 39 Suspected Taliban In Quetta. The AP (11/22, Sattar) reports Pakistan police "arrested 39 Afghans suspected of being Taliban fighters in the southwestern Pakistani city of Quetta, an official said Tuesday, though an Islamist group insisted the detainees were only students." The arrests "late Monday and early Tuesday came in separate raids on rented houses in areas with large Afghan refugee populations, said Chaudhry Mohammed Yaqoob, chief of police in Baluchistan province, whose capital is Quetta." Police are "interrogating the suspects to learn if any senior Taliban figures were among them, Yaqoob said. Afghan officials have alleged Taliban leader Mullah Omar is in Quetta, but Pakistan has rejected the claim."

US Accused Of "Shameful" Record Of Abandoning Allies. In his Los Angeles Times (11/22, 850K) column, Max Boot writes about perceived Iraqi unwillingness to fight for the "American-backed government": "Would you stake your life on a regime whose existence depends on Washington's continuing support? Given our long, shameful record of leaving allies in the lurch, that has never seemed to be a smart bet. We have been betraying friends since our first overseas conflict, against the Barbary pirates who captured ships off the African coast and enslaved their crews." Boot lists Eastern Europe, Vietnam, Iran, and Iraq (in 1991) as other examples of US irresolution. He concludes, "If we do scuttle out of Iraq prematurely, Afghans and others whose support we seek will get the message again: Don't trust Uncle Sam. The least we can do is to assure those Iraqis who have worked closely with American forces — whether as janitors, translators, soldiers or bureaucrats — that, if we do leave, they and their families will receive asylum in the United States."

Army Turns To New Recruiting Slogan. The Washington Post (11/22, A19, Tyson, 690K) reports, "The Army, facing another tough recruiting season, launched a $200 million-a-year advertising campaign this month and unveiled a new slogan: 'Army Strong.' ... The television ads, launched nationwide for Veterans Day along with Internet placements and other outreach, omit all but the most fleeting images related to the all-volunteer Army's biggest endeavor ever: the war in Iraq. ... There are obvious reasons the Army might not want to underscore to potential recruits, and their parents, that signing up these days almost inevitably means deployment to combat zones in Afghanistan or Iraq, where the majority of the more than 2,850 killed and 21,000 wounded have been soldiers." The Post adds that "by far the most popular recent slogan, according to soldiers interviewed, was 'Be All You Can Be,' which lasted 20 years until a recruiting downturn saw it changed in 2001."

DOJ:

GAO Finds Room For DOJ Improvement In Information Classification Practices. Government Computer News (11/22, Hostetler) reports, "The Justice Department needs a standard classification system and needs to address its staffing shortage, according to a report issued by the Government Accountability Office." GCN continues, "DOJ and its bureaus, specifically the FBI, were under review to determine if the department implemented the National Archives and Records Administration's Information Security Oversight Office (ISOO) recommendations to correct problems in their document classification systems. … ISOO is responsible for oversight of national security classification programs for Executive Branch agencies. GAO conducted the study because of the important role information protection and sharing plays in preventing terrorist attacks, the report said." GCN adds, "DOJ ranks third in the number of documents classified in the executive branch, behind the Defense Department and the CIA. Within DOJ, the FBI handles 98 percent of that work. … In any DOJ entity, a document can be classified in one of five ways: Limited Office Use Only, For Office Use Only, Law Enforcement Sensitive, Propriety Information or DEA-sensitive (specific to DEA). Each of these designations have 'unique definitions and safeguard requirements,' but they do not have 'specific guidance on the types of information that merit each designation,' the report said. … Without specific guidelines, employees do not know if the information warrants a sensitive but classified distinction. The components of DOJ do not train their employees to make these decisions nor do they oversee the process by which employees label the information."

The Washington Times (11/22, Seper) reports, "The Justice Department's classification program, which determines what information could reasonably be expected to damage the country's national security if disclosed publicly, is at risk because of a lack of adequate staffing, according to a government report." The Times continues, "In a 50-page report yesterday, the Government Accountability Office said the department's classification-management program needs to assess its 'optimum' manpower requirements, develop a strategy to meet them, and then implement internal controls 'to ensure proper use of sensitive but unclassified designations.' … 'The September 11 attacks showed that agencies must balance the need to protect and share sensitive information to prevent future attacks,' the report says. 'Agencies classify this information or designate it sensitive but unclassified to protect and limit access to it.'" The Times adds, "But, according to the GAO, the department is at risk because it has not addressed the problem of insufficient staffing to effectively manage and oversee the program, noting it has one staff member to cover departmentwide training issues and three staffers to oversee 3,500 locations under the program. … 'According to the program manager, with these resources, the security office was reacting to classification issues that arose rather than being proactive to prevent them,' the GAO said. … Staffing increases for the Justice Department program were recommended by the National Archives' Information Security Oversight Office, which reviewed security procedures in July 2004 and April 2005. GAO was asked this year to see how well the department and the FBI had responded to the request. … The GAO said Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales should determine what staffing he needs to carry out the responsibilities of the department's classification-management program and devise a strategy to make those resources available and use them effectively."

DOJ_NMG_0097063

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

DOJ Drops Effort To Restore Lay Conviction. Bloomberg (11/22, Calkins) reports, "The U.S. government dropped an attempt to restore the convictions of Enron Corp. founder Kenneth Lay, who died six weeks after being found guilty of spearheading the fraud that destroyed the company." Bloomberg continues, "Lay died of a heart attack in July after being convicted in May of 10 fraud and conspiracy charges. U.S. District Judge Sim Lake threw out the verdicts under a legal principle that erases convictions of defendants who die before they can appeal." Bloomberg adds, "The government moved (Monday) to withdraw a Nov. 16 notice of an appeal of Lake's decision. Steven Tyrrell, chief of the Justice Department's fraud section, said in the document the government made the move after a bill to change the law was introduced in Congress. He didn't elaborate. … 'Now, from a criminal standpoint, Ken Lay is forever exonerated,' said Ed Tomko, a former federal prosecutor who defended another Enron executive against fraud charges." Bloomberg notes, "Tomko said efforts to change the law are 'largely meaningless' to Lay's criminal case, because lawmakers can't apply punishments retroactively. … 'It might mean something to the next case,' Tomko said. 'But the government is already chasing Ken Lay's money in a civil case.' … U.S. authorities last month filed a civil forfeiture case against Lay's estate, seeking $12.5 million for victims of Enron's collapse. The government asked for a jury trial to re-establish Lay's responsibility for the fraud. … Justice Department spokeswoman Jaclyn Lesch and Samuel Buffone, Lay's appellate lawyer, declined to comment on the government's decision not to appeal."

CRIMINAL LAW:

DOJ Decides Against Probe Of Porter Fundraising Allegation. The Las Vegas Review-Journal (11/21, Tetreault) reported, "The Justice Department has decided not to pursue an accusation that Rep. Jon Porter made fundraising calls from his congressional offices earlier this year, a practice that would be illegal if proved, officials confirmed Monday. The charge was leveled by a former Porter staffer who offered e-mails in support of his charge against the Nevada Republican." The Review-Journal added, "Bryan Sierra, a Justice Department spokesman, said, 'The FBI looked at it and the matter was declined.' … Porter said he took the news as vindication 'by the highest law enforcement in the land,' and that the accusation was suspect from the start. 'This was something raised two weeks before the election by a disgruntled ex-employee,' he said."

The AP (11/22) reports, "Nevada state Democratic Party chairman Tom Collins said Justice Department officials said late last week that the FBI probe was not moving forward. Collins said no reason was provided. … 'You have to look at who hires these guys in the Justice Department,' Collins said. 'This is just the typical Bush-Cheney cover-up stuff. Jon Porter has done nothing to clear his name.'"

Three Aryan Brotherhood Members Sentenced To Life. The AP (11/22, Flaccus) reports from Santa Ana, CA, "A federal judge sentenced three suspected leaders of the violent Aryan Brotherhood prison gang to life terms Tuesday, saying the sentences were the only just response to three decades of orchestrated murders and attempted murders in some of the nation's toughest penitentiaries." The AP continues, "Barry 'The Baron' Mills, 58, was sentenced to four consecutive life terms without possibility of parole, a sentence automatically imposed after a jury deadlocked earlier this year on the death penalty. Tyler 'The Hulk' Bingham, 59, also escaped the death penalty but received three consecutive life terms without possibility of parole. … A third defendant, Edgar 'The Snail' Hevle, was sentenced to three consecutive life terms and will likely die in prison. He had not been eligible for the death penalty." The AP adds, "Carter said the sentences were appropriate for crimes 'spanning well over 30 years of murder and organizational murder.' … 'It's almost inconceivable and the duration of time is almost inconceivable,' Carter said of the string of murders, attempted murders and other crimes before handing down the sentence. … The defendants have 10 days to file appeals with the 9th Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals."

DOJ_NMG_0097064

Three Gang Members Sentenced To Live For Targeting Blacks. The Washington Times (11/22, Seper) reports, "Three Los Angeles-area Hispanic gang members have been sentenced to life in prison in what federal prosecutors called hate-crime attacks that randomly targeted black non-gang members, including women and children." The Times continues, "Gilbert Saldana, 27, Alejandro Martinez, 28, and Fernando Cazares, 25, were sentenced Monday to consecutive life terms without the possibility of parole by U.S. District Judge Percy Anderson in Los Angeles for their roles in the slaying of two black men in 1999 and 2000." The Times adds, "Judge Anderson said the men, members of the Avenues gang, maintained a 'reign of terror' over the Highland Park area northeast of Los Angeles that had 'far-reaching consequences.' Under federal sentencing guidelines, the judge could have imposed lesser sentences but declined to do so. … Prosecutors said the men tried to drive blacks out of the neighborhood in a six-year conspiracy of violence and threats." The Times adds, "Law-enforcement authorities said the prosecution was one of the first prominent cases in which the Justice Department targeted street gang members with hate-crime laws normally used to prosecute white supremacist groups. … In October, Robert B. Loosle, special agent in charge of the criminal division at the FBI's Los Angeles office, told a House subcommittee that gangs and other criminal enterprises pose increasing concerns for the international law-enforcement and intelligence communities. … Calling gangs 'more violent, more organized and more widespread than ever before,' Mr. Loosle estimated that there are 30,000 gangs nationwide with 800,000 members affecting 2,500 communities."

Ohio Brokers Acquitted Of All Bribery Charges. The Columbus Dispatch (11/22, Niquette) reports, "After about three hours of deliberation," a federal jury in Akron yesterday "acquitted two Cleveland-area brokers accused of conspiring to bribe the former chief financial officer at the Ohio Bureau of Workers' Compensation with use of a Florida condominium. The…jury returned not-guilty verdicts on all charges against Michael W. Lewis and Daniel P. O'Neil after closing arguments in which their attorneys argued that the government's key witness was not credible. … The verdict is a setback for the state and federal task force investigating allegations of corruption at the bureau. The investigation has produced convictions for 10 public figures so far, including Gov. Bob Taft and coin dealer Thomas W. Noe, who was sentenced Monday to 18 years in state prison." The Dispatch notes, "Lewis and O'Neil were charged with two counts of conspiring to bribe the bureau's Terrence W. Gasper and one count each of lying to an FBI agent about Gasper's role in purchasing the Florida condo in 1998."

Tennessee License Examiner Sentenced To Prison For Taking Bribes. The Murfreesboro Post (11/22, Marchesoni) reports, "One former driver's license examiner in Rutherford County was sentenced Monday to 19 months in prison and two years of supervised probation after his release, a federal prosecutor said. Ex-examiner Bruce Conklin of Murfreesboro pleaded guilty in July to accepting more than $30,000 in bribes in connection with his job. … Conklin and five other people were charged in January in a six-count federal indictment as part of the 18-month Operation Crooked Highway probe. Driving school employees paid the examiners to obtain driver's licenses and one-year driving certificates of driving for immigrants at the school who didn't complete the required 36 hours of training or had questionable documents about citizenship." The Post notes, "The FBI, Internal Revenue Service, federal Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents and the Department of Safety investigated the case."

Federal Agents, Philadelphia Police Arrest Suspect In 1989 Racial Murder. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (11/22) reports, "Authorities have charged a white man with murder and ethnic intimidation in the shooting of a black man 17 years ago. Thomas Gibison, 35, was arrested without incident before dawn Nov. 7 at his home in Newark, Del., FBI spokeswoman Jerri Williams said Tuesday. Gibison is also charged with conspiracy and a firearms violation in the killing of 34-year-old Aaron Wood of Philadelphia on April 16, 1989." The AP notes, "He was arrested by a task force that included Philadelphia authorities, FBI agents and members of the federal bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives." The Philadelphia Inquirer (11/22, Arnold, 385K) adds, "Law enforcement officials said they could not disclose specific details related to the killing or the exact details of what led authorities to Gibison."

Judge Agrees To Freeze Hedge Fund Manager's Assets Over Alleged Fraud. The AP (11/22) reports, "The Securities and Exchange Commission said on Tuesday that a federal judge has agreed to freeze the assets of a New York hedge fund manager accused of bilking investors out of millions of dollars. Spiro Germenis, the hedge fund manager, has been accused of diverting money from Oracle Services Inc. and Oracle Evolution LLC for his own use. He has fled to Greece, according to the SEC. … 'We're aware that an investigation by the U.S. attorney's office and the FBI is ongoing in addition to the SEC action that was just filed,' said Zachary Margulis-Ohnuma, an attorney for Germenis's wife, Maria Germenis. He said that Mrs. Germenis was 'doing every thing she can to cooperate with the authorities.'"

DOJ_NMG_0097065

Federal Agents, Florida Police Arrest Suspects In DOT Laptop Theft. The Miami Herald (11/22, Lebowitz, 286K) reports, "Authorities investigating the July theft of a federal agent's laptop containing the sensitive personal information of 133,000 Floridians, believe they have broken up a ring of computer thieves who may be responsible for its disappearance. Two men are facing charges related to the theft of other laptops from vehicles near the Latin American Grill in Doral, where the agent's laptop was stolen from his parked sport-utility vehicle on July 27." The Herald notes Juan Esteban Calle and Carlos Andres Leon "were arrested during an extensive surveillance operation by DOT inspector general, the FBI and Miami-Dade police at Doral area restaurant parking lots -- including the same restaurant where the agent's laptop disappeared. With video cameras rolling, Calle used a lock-punching device similar to the one used in the DOT theft to open a passenger-side door and steal a decoy laptop with a tracking device attached."

The AP (11/22, Anderson) also reports on the arrest and adds, "The inspector general's statement said no evidence of credit fraud had occurred since the laptop went missing. … A second DOT inspector general's office laptop was also stolen during a hotel conference in Orlando in April. t contained sensitive information on about 9,500 individuals, all of whom were on the stolen Miami laptop as well. The Orlando investigation has made less headway and is continuing, the inspector general's office said."

Key Prosecution Witness Testifies Jeffs Coerced Underage Marriage. USA Today (11/22, 3A, Wagner, 2.27M) reports, "In tearful testimony, the lead prosecution witness against polygamist church leader Warren Jeffs said Tuesday that she was threatened with banishment if she did not marry her cousin at age 14. The woman, now 20 and married to a different man, described being coerced by Jeffs and other leaders of the religious sect during a preliminary hearing. 'This was the darkest time in my entire life.'" USA adds, "During cross-examination, defense attorney Tara Isaacson sought to portray the woman as a willing participant in the wedding and argued that Jeffs did not know the couple had sex. Isaacson introduced sweetheart notes the couple had traded and quoted from the girl's journal, in which she expressed enthusiasm about being singled out for marriage. The woman testified that the entry was written before she learned the identity of her partner." CNN Newsroom (11/21, Tuchman, 3:00 p.m.) noted Jeffs "was on the FBI 10 most wanted list for months," and reported, "He had a smile on his face for most of the morning," but when the woman took the stand, "his smile then disappeared. … She says that, the entire time at the wedding -- this is a quote – 'The entire time I was there, I was crying. I was so scared. I wanted to die.'" ABC World News (11/21, story 9, 0:15, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "A judge is deciding whether Jeffs will be tried as an accomplice to rape."

In a widely-distributed story, the AP (11/22, Dobner, Foy) reports, "Prosecutors completed their case Tuesday, and 5th District Judge James Shumate said the preliminary hearing would resume Dec. 14. Jeffs' defense team plans to call two witnesses, including the woman's current husband. On Tuesday, one of Jeffs' lawyers introduced photographs of a smiling, laughing couple and got the woman to acknowledge Jeffs never explicitly ordered her to have sex with her new husband." The AP adds, "Raised in the faith since birth, Jeffs' accuser said she felt a heavy responsibility to 'the entire community' in the days leading to the marriage ceremony. 'I was scared. 'I didn't have any place to go,' said the woman." The Salt Lake Tribune (11/22, Adams), identifying the woman as "Jane Doe IV," reports she testified about "her attempts to get…Jeffs to release her from the union. But Doe also admitted she never explicitly accused her husband of rape in those conversations with Jeffs. 'I said to Warren he was touching me and doing things I didn't like,' said Doe, now 20. 'I didn't tell anybody I was being raped.'"

The New York Times (11/22, Dougherty, 1.16M) notes, "The woman testified that she had told Warren Jeffs that she did not want to be married. … She said Mr. Jeffs had told her that her marriage to her cousin 'was a revelation from God' and ordered her to prepare for the wedding." However, Jeffs lawyer Walter Bugden Jr. "told the news media after the hearing that the state was conducting 'religious persecution' and predicted that Mr. Jeffs would be acquitted." Bugden added, "Officiating at a wedding ceremony does not make Mr. Jeffs an accomplice to rape." NPR's All Things Considered (11/21, Norris, Berkes) also reported on the hearing, including clips of the anguished testimony from the witness.

Curbs On Sex Offenders Seen As Ineffective, Inhumane. The Washington Post (11/22, A1, Whoriskey) reports, "As convicted sex offenders go, they seem to pose little danger. … One is 100 years old. Another can barely walk and is in the late stages of Alzheimer's disease. Another is dying of heart disease in a nursing home. .. .Yet under a new Georgia law, thousands of registered sex offenders, even the old and feeble, could be pushed from their homes and hospices." The Post continues, "As states around the country have sought in recent years to control the whereabouts of convicted sex offenders, Georgia's law stands out as one of the toughest, a testament to the daunting public fears regarding children's safety. … The roughly 10,000 sex offenders living in Georgia have been forbidden to live within 1,000 feet of a school, playground, church or school bus stop. Taken together, the prohibitions place nearly all the homes in some counties off-limits -- amounting, in a practical sense, to banishment." The Post adds, "Since the law's enactment in July, however, a federal judge, human rights advocates and even some of the sheriff's departments that are supposed to enforce the measure have suggested that the zeal for safety may have gone too far. … The residency law applies not only to sexual predators but to all people registered for sexual crimes, including men and women convicted of having underage consensual sex while in high school. … Advocates for the sex offenders say the law is unfair to people who have served their sentences and been deemed rehabilitated. Many police officers, prosecutors and children's advocates also question whether such measures are effective. Most predators are mobile, after all, and by upending their lives, the law may make them more likely to commit other offenses, critics say."

DOJ_NMG_0097066

FBI Establishes Western Pennsylvania Corruption Hotline. The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (11/22, Ward, 230K) reports, "In an effort to combat public corruption in Western Pennsylvania, the FBI has established a telephone hot line that people can call to file complaints of possible abuse by elected and appointed officials. Tips…can be made anonymously; they will be followed up on by investigators." The Post-Gazette notes, "Public corruption has been stated as one of the highest priorities of the U.S. Department of Justice."

FBI Investigating Former Louisiana Charity Grant Office. The New Orleans Times-Picayune (11/22, Russell) reports, "A state office that oversaw a series of controversial charities tied to African-American legislators is being scrutinized by the FBI, Gov. Kathleen Blanco's office confirmed Tuesday in announcing that it had complied with a subpoena for records from the department. … Critics commonly derided the grants -- and similar money doled out to rural districts -- as legislative 'slush funds' that governors could use as an incentive to get reluctant legislators to vote their way." The Times-Picayune adds, "It's unclear what the FBI is looking for. But earlier this year, James Bernazzani, the special agent in charge of the FBI's New Orleans field office, announced his intention to investigate two charities that were financed by the Office of Urban Affairs. Both of the groups -- Care Unlimited and Orleans Metropolitan Housing & Community Development -- have longtime ties to U.S. Rep. William Jefferson, D-New Orleans. … Bernazzani said little Tuesday, acknowledging only that 'during the course of an ongoing investigation, the FBI served subpoenas on select offices.'"

Baltimore Council Mulls Taping Of Police Interrogations. The Baltimore Sun (11/22, Jones) reports, "The Baltimore City Council is reviewing a bill that would require the videotaping of police interrogations of witnesses or suspects in violent crimes -- a measure opposed by police but endorsed by public defenders who represent suspected criminals." The Sun continues, "Councilman James B. Kraft, chairman of the council's public safety subcommittee, said he introduced the legislation because he believes it would decrease the number of allegations of improper behavior by police officers. Kraft said a video would protect officers against false charges, and witnesses against intimidation or illegal questioning." The Sun adds, "Representatives of the Police Department -- who say they generally record statements but do not use video -- said at a hearing Tuesday that they have doubts about using cameras, and one high-ranking detective called it "costly" and potentially harmful for prosecutors. … Col. Fred H. Bealefeld III, chief of detectives, said at the hearing that his department is studying a video system used in Chicago. Bealefeld said it cost that department millions of dollars to install and run the cameras in interrogation rooms. .. .But the Office of the Public Defender dismissed the cost issue and praised the proposal, saying it could be a significant development in criminal proceedings."

Maryland Man Sentenced To Life For Killing Stepdaughter. The Baltimore Sun (11/22, Mcmenamin) reports, "A 36-year-old convicted sex offender was sentenced Tuesday to life in prison without parole for stabbing, strangling and beating to death his 13-year-old stepdaughter before setting her body and their family's Essex rowhouse on fire to cover up the killing." The Sun continues, "Carl Preston Evans Jr., whose arrest in August 2005 highlighted problems with the state's sex offender registry, also received two consecutive 15-year prison terms, one for the at tempted murder of his infant daughter and one for arson. … Baltimore County Circuit Judge Kathleen G. Cox, who pronounced sentence, characterized the killing as 'a monstrous, monstrous crime,' and pointed out that nothing Evans said, either in court or to an investigator who prepared a pre-sentence report, has shed any light on the motive behind it." The Sun adds, "A Baltimore County jury convicted Evans in September of first-degree murder in the death of Breaunna Floyd, who was stabbed 24 times, strangled and beaten before being doused with gasoline and set on fire. … The jury also convicted Evans of arson for setting fire to the family's row home on Foxridge Lane in Essex in July 2005 and of attempted second-degree murder for leaving then-7-month-old Mosett Evans in the burning house."

Greek Authorities Pursue Charges Against Getty Antiquities Curator. The Los Angeles Times (11/22, Zirganos, Frammolino, Felch) reports, "Greek authorities have recommended that felony criminal charges be filed against former J. Paul Getty Museum antiquities curator Marion True for her role in the acquisition of a 2,500-year-old gold funerary wreath considered one of the museum's masterpieces." The Times continues, "The Police Headquarters of Athens announced today that the city's chief prosecutor had concluded an initial investigation with the recommendation that five unnamed people -- three foreigners and two Greek citizens — be charged with looting, selling and receiving the gold funeral adornment." The Times adds, "The press release did not name the individuals involved and said only that the object was purchased by a 'private American museum' in 1993 for $1.15 million. A senior Greek official familiar with the case said that the museum was the Getty and that True was among the five defendants. … Under the Greek system, the case will pass to an investigating magistrate who will conduct his own investigation, a process that is expected to take weeks or months." The Times notes, "The Greek announcement comes amid negotiations between the Getty and officials from the Hellenic Ministry of Culture over the return of the wreath and a statue of a female torso, or kore. .. Already this year, the Getty has returned two other objects requested by Greek officials: a 5th century BC marble relief and a 4th century BC inscribed tombstone. The tombstone, or stele, was purchased by J. Paul Getty himself in 1955."

DOJ_NMG_0097067

Getty Breaks Off Antiquities Talks With Italy. The New York Times (11/22, Eakin, Povoledo) reports, "In an abrupt change of course, the J. Paul Getty Museum in Los Angeles announced yesterday that it had broken off negotiations with the Italian government and made a 'unilateral' decision to cede only some of the antiquities that Italy says were looted from its soil." The Times continues, "In a six-page letter to the Italian culture minister, Francesco Rutelli, the Getty's director, Michael Brand, said the museum had decided to turn over 26 artifacts. Referring to other treasures sought by the Italians, he said that Italy had 'no valid legal claim' to a prized bronze sculpture in the Getty's collection, and that evidence regarding a limestone cult statue it wanted returned was 'inconclusive.' … Mr. Brand also wrote that the Getty would continue to study the cult statue, regarded by experts as possibly depicting Aphrodite, and would transfer title to Italy if new research lent weight to the country's claim that it had been illegally excavated on its territory." The Times adds, "The museum's move carries significant risks for the Getty. Unlike deals to return disputed art that Italy negotiated this year with the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York and the Museum of Fine Arts in Boston, the ceding of art by the Getty carries no guarantee of loans from Italy or other reciprocal benefits. … The Getty's decision follows nearly a year of tense negotiations over an Italian claim for 52 objects in the museum's collection. The claim rests largely on evidence that has emerged in the trial in Rome of Marion True, a former Getty curator, and Robert Hecht, an American art dealer, on charges of trading in illegally excavated antiquities."

New York To Overhaul System Of Town, Village Courts. The New York Times (11/22, Glaberson) reports, "New York's top judicial officials outlined a plan on Tuesday to begin reforming the state's 300-year-old system of town and village courts, which have been criticized for decades as outmoded, poorly supervised and unfair." The Times continues, "The plan, announced here by the state's chief judge, Judith S. Kaye, included changes that have been recommended for years by defense lawyers and legal experts. Among them were plans to increase training for the justices, to improve their supervision and to better monitor whether they are protecting basic legal principles like the constitutional right to a lawyer. … The courts — known as justice courts — are also to be required for the first time to keep a word-for-word record of their proceedings, like other courts in the state." The Times adds, "While the officials said that many town and village justices are diligent, Judge Kaye said a sweeping reform program was called for by what she called enduring concerns about the courts. The system has survived a century of calls for radical overhaul by governors and commissions, and an important legal challenge in the 1980s. … As outlined by a series of articles in The New York Times in September, the courts have survived in part because the justices — most of them not even lawyers — have longstanding and deep ties to the upstate political system, and because of the substantial cost of replacing them with more professional courts. … The plan announced on Tuesday is the most specific and ambitious effort in years to address significant parts of the system's troubled dealings."

CIVIL LAW:

Whistleblowers Help US Recover $1.3 Billion In Fraud Cases. The AP (11/22, Jordan) reports, "Whistle-blowers tipped off the government to $1.3 billion worth of fraud cases over the past year, largely at hospitals or other health care providers, the Justice Department said Tuesday." The AP continues, "In all, the department recovered $3.1 billion in settlements -- what prosecutors said was a record amount -- from individuals and companies during the 2006 fiscal year that ended Sept. 30. … 'Many of these cases were initiated by whistle-blowers,' said Assistant Attorney General Peter D. Keisler, who oversees the department's civil division. … He called the $1.3 billion identified by whistle-blowers a recovery level 'probably greater than most years, smaller than a couple.' In return, whistle-blowers were paid $190 million over the year for alerting the government to the fraud." The AP continues, "The single largest settlement, worth $920 million, came against Dallas-based Tenet

DOJ_NMG_0097068

Healthcare Corp., the nation's second-largest hospital chain. Following claims from six whistle-blowers, prosecutors accused Tenet of overbilling the government for $806 million in Medicare payments and paying $49 million in kickbacks to doctors who referred patients to the health care chain. … Tenet operates 66 hospitals in 12 states, mostly in the Southeast. Overall, fraud settlements with health care companies accounted for $2.2 billion -- more than two-thirds of the annual total." The AP adds, "Whistle-blowers have helped the government recover an estimated $18 billion since 1986, when Congress approved laws to strengthen their protections. … 'Today, individual citizens are making the same kind of important difference in exposing fraud by those who do business with the government,' said Sen. Charles Grassley, R-Iowa, who helped write the laws. … Until now, the government had never recovered $3 billion or more in fraud cases, and passed the $2 billion mark for the first time in 2003, Keisler said."

DC Circuit Overturns Dismissal Of FOIA Suit Over Immigrant Convicts. The Austin American-Statesman (11/22, Carr) reports, "A federal court of appeals ruled Tuesday that a lower court erred in dismissing a case that sought records under the Freedom of Information Act about illegal immigrant convicts who are not deported." The AAS continues, "The U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia ordered the trial court to settle factual disputes between Cox Newspapers, which owns the Austin American-Statesman, and the Justice Department over the privacy rights of illegal immigrants convicted of a crime. At the heart of the case is whether privacy rights outweigh the public's right to know that they have been released into the community. … 'We're gratified that the judges agreed with us that the trial court shouldn't have granted the government's motion for summary judgment,' said Andrew Alexander, chief of the Cox Washington bureau. Cox will confer with its lawyers to determine how to proceed, he said." The AAS adds, "The information is essential for assessing whether the government is properly enforcing deportation laws, Alexander said. … 'At its core, the case involves a bedrock American principle that citizens should have access to information that enables them to evaluate the performance of their government,' he said. … The Justice Department declined to comment other than to say it would review the five-page ruling. … The department's lawyers have argued that it has turned over some of the information requested by Cox under the Freedom of Information Act request filed three years ago, including the convicts' native countries, dates taken into custody and dates of release, the legal documents show. … But personally identifiable information such as full names, dates of birth, alien registration numbers and FBI numbers would invade the privacy of convicted illegal immigrants and serve no public interest, Justice Department lawyers wrote in legal briefs."

Bankruptcy Attorneys Adjusting To Decline In Filings. The California Recorder (11/22, Elinson) reports, "An improving economy isn't good news for everyone. With fewer businesses going broke, the pace of traditional work for bankruptcy lawyers has slowed considerably -- for now." The Recorder continues, "Industry experts say a big reason is because money is flowing more freely -- especially from hedge funds and private equity groups -- to keep businesses afloat that might have filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy in leaner times. … But bankruptcy lawyers are evolving, and some even say the rivers of money may run dry in the near future -- possibly during the next economic downturn. … 'There has never been liquidity like this before -- never close to it in my 32 years,' said Frederick Holden Jr., a partner in Orrick, Herrington & Sutcliffe's bankruptcy and debt restructuring practice group in San Francisco. 'I hope for everyone that it doesn't cause any problems, but it seems unlikely.'" The Recorder adds, "While not a universally held belief, Holden and several other bankruptcy lawyers told The Recorder they expect to see more Chapter 11s filed by late 2007. … It would certainly be better for business, because in the last two years filings have dropped dramatically. In the 2004 fiscal year, a total of 10,113 businesses filed for Chapter 11 in U.S. Bankruptcy Court. In 2005, 5,856 businesses filed, and in 2006, only 5,475 businesses filed, according to statistics released by the courts."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Maryland Disputes DOJ Findings On Juvenile Center Conditions. The Baltimore Sun (11/22, Garland) reports, "The Ehrlich administration has sent a sharply worded letter and nearly 500 pages of supporting documents to the U.S. Justice Department, challenging a finding that the state has run a Baltimore center for juvenile offenders in an unsafe and unconstitutional manner." The Sun continues, "A Justice Department report issued in August said youths held at the 144-bed center on North Gay Street "suffer significant harm and risk of harm" because there isn't enough staff on hand and treatment plans are inadequate. … The report noted youth-on-youth assault rates 47 percent higher than the national average for such facilities. … But state officials say the report was written nearly a year after federal officials inspected the Baltimore City Juvenile Justice Center in September and October 2005 and that the concerns they raised have been addressed. … 'We strongly disagree with the Justice Department's findings,' said Edward Hopkins, a spokesman for the Maryland Department of Juvenile Services. 'We believe their conclusions are wrong.'" The Sun adds, "The highly critical Justice Department report was regarded as an embarrassment for Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr., who had made juvenile justice reform a key issue when he campaigned for the office four years ago. The report lays the foundation for a possible lawsuit that could lead to a court order forcing the state to change the way it runs the juvenile center. … In a 16-page, footnoted letter dated Nov. 6, Maryland Juvenile Services Secretary Kenneth C. Montague Jr. called on federal officials to drop the matter. The letter was released yesterday after The Sun requested a copy. … Cynthia Magnuson, a spokeswoman for the Justice Department's Civil Rights Division, said the federal agency would have no comment on the details of the state's response. … 'We stand by our letter, and we remain willing to work with the state to reach a resolution,' Magnuson said."

DOJ_NMG_0097069

Monitor Finds Mississippi Juvenile Centers Still Not Meeting Standards. The Jackson (MS) Clarion-Ledger (11/22, Goodman) reports, "A court monitor for the state's two juvenile training facilities has once again reported that the state has failed to meet most of the conditions required under an agreement to bring the schools up to standard." The Clarion-Ledger continues, "In May 2005, Mississippi entered a four-year decree to end a Justice Department lawsuit over abuse allegations at the Oakley and Columbia training schools. … The fourth report from monitor Joyce Burrell, filed Wednesday, covers the period May 1 through Aug. 31. … It says that while some progress was made during that period, much more is required to come into compliance." The Clarion-Ledger adds, "Burrell noted improvements in student staffing ratios, and the improved cleanliness of floors, walls, ceilings, baseboards, youth rooms, bathrooms and common rooms. 'In the short term, staff are to be commended for pitching in many extra hours to do a thorough cleaning and some painting of the buildings,' she wrote. … But she also noted unresolved setbacks in education and staffing issues, including difficulty in retaining new hires long enough to get problems under control. The problem must be addressed, she said, so that the department's youth services can reach optimum staffing levels and cut down on overtime."

Day Laborers Win New York Racial Bias Suit. The AP (11/22, Fitzgerald) reports from White Plains, NY, "A suburban village discriminated against Hispanic day laborers when it closed a hiring site and stepped up police patrols on the streets where they looked for work, a federal judge ruled Monday. … 'Since August 2004, and continuing into this past summer, the defendants have engaged in a campaign designed to drive out the Latino day laborers who gather on the streets of Mamaroneck to seek work,' Judge Colleen McMahon wrote. 'The fact that the day laborers were Latinos, and not whites, was, at least in part, a motivating factor in defendants' actions.'" The AP continues, "McMahon did not specify a remedy for the village of Mamaroneck, about 25 miles north of New York City, giving the two sides 10 days to make suggestions. And in a footnote at the end of the decision, she suggested there was still time for a settlement. … Attorney Kevin Plunkett, who represented the village, said it was a stretch for the judge to determine that discrimination played a role in the crackdown. He said the quality of life for residents of Mamaroneck - not race - was the chief concern of village officials. … 'This group of people just happens to be Hispanic,' he said. 'What happens if 50 other people were assembled in the community? That has to be addressed.'" The AP notes, "The village had argued that it was only enforcing existing laws when it beefed up the police presence in the area around the park and set up traffic checkpoints that inconvenienced the contractors who came looking for temporary workers. … Six Hispanic immigrant workers - all identified as John Doe for fear of retaliation by police or immigration authorities - took the village to court in September, seeking an injunction against what they called selective law enforcement and ethnic discrimination. They said the village violated their right to equal protection when they cracked down on the laborers."

Georgia Prosecutors Probe Police Shootings. The AP (11/22, Weber) reports, "Prosecutors in a suburban county plan to review 14 shootings by police, including eight fatalities, amid concern about the high number of killings compared with the nation's two largest cities." The AP continues, "DeKalb County prosecutors will also investigate the death of another person in police custody who was not shot, and they expect to be asked to look into four more fatal shootings by police, Adora Andy, a DeKalb County district attorney's office spokeswoman, said Monday. … 'We will review the documents, and we will determine the appropriate course of action,' Andy said. … Prosecutors could pursue criminal charges against officers if warranted." The AP adds, "The review of shootings and in-custody deaths involves 15 incidents from Jan. 1 through Sept. 12, Andy said, adding that her office expects to get another request from the police department to review the shootings since then. … Monday's police materials omitted a fatal police shooting Sept. 2, and Andy said she expected to get that later. … Andy declined to say why Police Chief Nick Marinelli made the request. She also would not disclose what reports he has turned over. … Marinelli has defended the department's actions since an Associated Press investigation published Sept. 28 showed that the nine fatal shootings this year by DeKalb County police at that time was more than the six in New York City and equal to the Los Angeles number."

Maryland Gay Custody Battle Stalls In Court. The Washington Times (11/22, Miller) reports, "Two Baltimore County judges have delayed ruling in a child- custody case that has forced a 7-year-old girl to spend time with her adoptive mother's former lesbian partner, despite objections from a court-appointed child-welfare specialist." The Times continues, "A social worker for Baltimore County Circuit Court reported in August that the ex-partner's overnight visits with the girl 'probably caused acute underlying turmoil' for the child, according to court records. … 'At this time, she seems emotionally vulnerable and experiencing severe anxiety in response to the crisis that this dispute has precipitated,' social worker Cheryl Taylor says in the report. 'Overnight weekend visits seem to pose particular separation threats and anxiety for [the girl] at this time.'" The Times adds, "The report remains sealed, but excerpts of Miss Taylor's findings are cited elsewhere in the court record. … Miss Taylor notes that the girl told everybody involved in the case -- including her mother, her mother's former partner and the family pediatrician -- that she does not want the visits to continue. The social worker also has recommended that the child 'remain in long-term psychotherapy.' … Still, two successive judges presiding over the case have delayed ruling on the emergency request by the mother, identified as Janice M., to stop the court-ordered visitation. … Judge John O. Hennegan put off ruling on the mother's request in August. The case last month was transferred to Judge Michael J. Finifter, who scheduled a hearing for Jan. 28."

DOJ_NMG_0097070

Breast-Feeding Mothers Rally To Protest Restrictions. The Washington Post (11/22, D1, Kang) reports, "Karen Gral knows how difficult it is to travel with small children: standing in long lines with squirming toddlers, dealing with new security rules that prohibit liquids -- including some baby foods -- and lugging strollers, car seats and diaper bags through airports. … For her, the finish line is sitting on the airplane and breast-feeding her hungry and worn-out 16-month-old to sleep." The Post continues, "So when the Alexandria mother of two heard that a family was kicked off a Delta Air Lines flight last month because the mother refused to cover her baby with a blanket while breast-feeding, Gral decided to join 70 people at Reagan National Airport yesterday for a "nurse-in" in front of the Delta ticket counter. Similar protests were held at more than 30 airports around the country, including Baltimore-Washington International Thurgood Marshall Airport, where 62 people gathered in support of Arlington native Emily Gillette. … 'Breast-feeding is the most natural thing in the world. What was Emily supposed to do? Not feed her child? Not give her child comfort?' said Gral, while nursing her son, Garrett, who was wearing a white onesie that read, 'I'm a Breast Man.'" The Post adds, "Delta has said it regrets the incident with Gillette, which took place aboard one of its contract carriers, Freedom Airlines. … 'Delta Air Lines fully supports a mother's right to breast-feed on board our aircraft, and we were very disappointed in the decision to move Ms. Gillette from the flight,' said Gina Laughlin, a Delta spokeswoman. … Many showed up at National to push airlines to adopt more supportive policies for nursing mothers and to encourage federal legislation that protects breast-feeding in public and pumping milk in the workplace."

US 22nd In Gender Gap Ranking. The Financial Times (11/22, Daneshkhu) reports the US "lags at 22nd place behind developed and even a couple of developing countries in a study of inequality between men and women, mainly because it has few women in politics. This is in spite of the ascent of Nancy Pelosi who is set to become the first woman to head the US House of Representatives." Sweden is "the only country where men and women form equal numbers among all ministers and parliamentarians. Cherie Booth, a human rights barrister and wife of Tony Blair, UK prime minister, said there were more women in parliament in Iraq and Afghanistan – two countries not covered by the report – than in the UK." The study "of 115 countries published on Tuesday by the World Economic Forum, a Swiss-based think-tank, measures the gender gap based on economic, political, educational and health-based criteria in a benchmarking exercise aimed at improving women's position in society." The individual country rankings "show Sweden, Norway and Finland at the top of the league, having closed about 80 per cent of the gender gap, with Yemen, Saudi Arabia and Chad at the bottom, with a gender gap of about 50 per cent."

ANTITRUST:

Municipal Bond Dealers Brace For Expanded Probes. The Wall Street Journal (11/22, C5, Rosenberg) reports, "Municipal-bond dealers held their cards close to their vests as the market faces nationwide criminal and civil probes into possible abuses over their dealings in a wide range of muni-bond transactions." The Journal continues, "The U.S. Justice Department's Antitrust Division and the Securities and Exchange Commission are investigating questionable practices at a number of firms, with leading providers of guaranteed investment contracts, or GICs, having received federal subpoenas recently." The Journal adds, "The Bond Buyer, a leading muni-bond publication, reported yesterday that the practices may go beyond GICs and could include 'virtually every investment product or derivative' brokered or provided by various firms over the past six to 14 years. … Most executives at dealer firms, as well as portfolio managers, declined to comment on the situation. … 'In general, everybody's just looking at it and seeing what's going on here, doing a lot of work to get the material together that they're looking for,' said one senior executive at a Wall Street investment firm. Asked if most of the major firms have been subpoenaed, he said: 'I have no idea because I'm not talking to anybody about it.'" The Journal notes, "An executive at a smaller West Coast-based firm said he had seen no impact on the muni market since news of the investigations broke. However, activity in the market -- as in other areas of the financial markets -- has been muted this week ahead of the Thanksgiving Day holiday. … According to the Bond Buyer, 'dozens' of firms in the $2.2 trillion muni market have been asked for information by the Justice Department and SEC. The Bond Buyer said the parallel criminal and civil investigations 'go far beyond GICs and may cover thousands of investment products and derivatives entered into in connection with muni-bond transactions that could total hundreds of billions of dollars.' Yet, only a small amount of these transactions will be subject to criminal or civil allegations, the publication reported."

DOJ_NMG_0097071

Bloomberg (11/22, Preston, Selway) reports, "U.S. investigators have demanded that banks and brokers provide information on derivatives as part of an investigation into anti-competitive practices in the $2 trillion municipal bond market, according to a lawyer hired by one of the firms subpoenaed in the probe." Bloomberg continues, "The Justice Department is looking into whether bids were rigged on investment contracts sold to local governments. Investigators are also seeking information on interest-rate swaps and other financial products that governments buy to guard against swings in borrowing costs, said Mark Scott, the former director of tax-exempt bonds for the Internal Revenue Service who is now a partner with Vinson & Elkins in Washington. … 'It's pretty broad,' said Scott, who is representing a client subpoenaed by investigators whom he wouldn't identify. 'They are going to get truckloads of information.'" Bloomberg adds, "The investigation, which also includes the Securities and Exchange Commission, is the broadest criminal probe ever of the municipal bond industry and has resulted in more than a dozen subpoenas being issued last week to brokers, banks and insurance companies, including American International Group Inc. and General Electric Co. … Regulators are looking at whether brokers for U.S. local governments violated the law while arranging bids for guaranteed investment contracts, where a portion of the hundreds of billions of dollars raised in the tax-exempt bond market every year is placed until it is needed for projects."

DOJ Says Windows Vista Complies With Microsoft Judgment. Information Week (11/22, Gonsalves) reports, "U.S. prosecutors say Windows Vista and the latest version of Internet Explorer apparently comply with the requirements of the 2002 antitrust judgment against Microsoft." IW continues, "In a joint status report filed Tuesday with the U.S. District Court in Washington, D.C., prosecutors said Microsoft appeared to be complying with the judgment, which found Microsoft abused its Windows monopoly and set down rules for the software maker to follow to avoid future anti-competitive behavior. Prosecutors and Microsoft have been submitting joint reports on compliance to the court every six months." IW adds, "The Justice Department and a court-approved technical committee are monitoring the development of Vista to assure compliance with the court order. The monitoring includes extensive testing of Vista and Internet Explorer 7 betas. … The committee and Microsoft developed a bug-tracking system to help ensure that Vista ships without any 'known issues related to its treatment of middleware under the final judgments,' prosecutors said in the report. … 'Plaintiffs are pleased to report that this system has been a success,' prosecutors said. 'Microsoft addressed all outstanding middleware-related bug issues prior to Vista being released to manufacturing.'"

CNET News (11/22, Broache) reports, "According to the report, Microsoft and the technical committee have been offering a downloadable program that is designed to help Microsoft's competitors in the fields of Web browsers, e-mail and instant-messaging clients, and media players to make their programs "Vista-ready" before the new operating system ships. … The program serves as a single source for all the registry settings needed for applications 'to attain equal visibility on Windows XP and Vista systems,' the technical committee said. The program's goal is to reduce the chance that people will experience difficulties in changing default software to non-Microsoft products, for instance. It also aims to make it easy to locate third-party applications in the start menu, desktop, task pane and other commonly used surfaces, after installing them. … Microsoft said it had also contacted 30 competing software makers and had invited them to work alongside company engineers at its Redmond, Wash., campus lab for Vista Readiness." CNET adds, "Since the last status report filing in May, government attorneys said they received 25 complaints alleging antitrust concerns about competing middleware but said they concluded that none of those gripes had merit. … Although the matters were not raised by U.S. regulators, some possible antitrust repercussions of security and file-formatting features in Vista were recently flagged as concerns by European and Korean regulators. Microsoft said last month that it had implemented changes that address those complaints."

Jury Selected For Microsoft Antitrust Class Action Trial In Iowa. The Des Moines Register (11/22) reports, "Jury selection in the Microsoft anti-trust case in Polk County District Court was completed today with seven men and five women selected to hear the class action law suit." The Register continues, "The case is expected to take several months to try with witnesses that will include Microsoft founder Bill Gates and chief executive officer Steve Ballmer." The Register adds, "Plaintiffs' lawyers, led by Des Moines attorney Roxanne Conlin, are seeking damages of up to $329 million for Iowans who purchased Microsoft product between 1994 and this year. … The crux of their case is that anti-competitive actions by Microsoft resulted in overcharges and extra expenses to Iowa consumers. … The Iowa case is the last of several dozen state lawsuits against the giant computer software company. The state cases were filed after a federal anti-trust action against Microsoft was settled in 2000. … None of the other state cases has ever gone to a jury for a decision. All were either settled out of court or dismissed, officials for both sides have said. … The jury is expected to be seated late next week. The trial will begin with what is expected to be a lengthy list of jury instructions from Polk County District Court Judge Scott Rosenberg about how Iowa law applies to the situation and how the case will proceed."

Oshkosh Truck Gets Antitrust Clearance To Purchase JLG. The Milwaukee Business Journal (11/22) reports, "Oshkosh Truck Corp.'s proposed purchase of JLG Industries Inc. has cleared federal regulatory review with the passage of a required waiting period for the deal." The Journal continues, "The companies jointly announced Tuesday the expiration of the 30-day waiting period under the Hart-Scott-Rodino Antitrust Improvements Act of 1976 in connection with the proposed merger of a wholly-owned subsidiary of Oshkosh with JLG." The Journal adds, "The expiration of the Hart-Scott-Rodino waiting period satisfies one of the conditions to Oshkosh's acquisition of JLG. Consummation of the merger, which is expected to occur in early December, remains subject to other customary closing conditions, including approval of the merger by JLG's shareholders."

Suit Accuses Quiznos Of Antitrust Violations, Fraud. The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel (11/22, Gores) reports, "A lawsuit accuses Quiznos Sub of forcing Wisconsin franchisees of the sandwich chain to buy food and supplies at inflated costs and sell food at artificially low retail prices, making the restaurants unprofitable." The Sentinel continues, "The class-action lawsuit, filed in federal court in Green Bay on behalf of 28 Wisconsin franchisees of Denver-based The Quiznos Franchise Co. and its affiliates, seeks compensation for lost investments and asks for punitive damages and an end to what it calls an 'illegal business scheme.'" The Sentinel adds, "The lawsuit alleges the company has systematically defrauded its franchisees by building the brand at the expense of its operators in the field. … The suit contends Quiznos omits or misrepresents key facts about Quiznos business operations in an effort to induce people to buy a franchise. … But too many people who buy a franchise find that the cost of food and supplies in comparison to the selling price of items on the menu keeps franchisees from realizing a profit, Chris Bray, president of the Toasted Subs Franchisee Association, said Tuesday. That's because, the lawsuit alleges, Quiznos forces franchisees to work with Quiznos-mandated suppliers and pay them what the lawsuit describes as 'excessive prices for goods and services.'"

The AP (11/22) reports, "The lawsuit, which seeks millions of dollars in damages for lost investments, accuses Quiznos of fraud, violations of federal and state antitrust laws, racketeering, breach of contract and violations of Wisconsin's fair dealership law, attorney Justin Klein said Tuesday." The AP continues, "The first Quiznos, featuring toasted sandwiches, opened in Denver in 1981 and the company has grown to more than 4,500 restaurants, becoming the fastest-growing restaurant chain in the country, trailing only Subway as the nation's No. 2 sandwich shop -- not counting hamburgers. … 'Quiznos has been taking advantage of its franchisees for years through practices that we contend are illegal and in violation of the franchise agreement,' said Chris Bray, president of the Toasted Subs Franchisees Association Inc., a trade group that help organize the class-action suit. … Bray, who owns two Quiznos stores in Texas and has been a franchisee for nine years, said Quiznos 'has slowly, methodically and deliberatively modified the business model, year over year, to make it economically favorable to them, to the detriment of the franchisees. It is time to put a stop to this.'"

SCOTUS To Hear Landmark Patent Case. USA Today (11/22, Biskupic) reports, "Call it the case of the gas pedal, prescription drug and gift bow. … The variations and costs of those and many other items could be affected by a Supreme Court patent case that could be one of the most important intellectual-property disputes to ever come before the justices." USA continues, "With abortion, affirmative action and other high-profile issues before the court this term, a patent case normally would be a yawner. However, KSR International v. Teleflex, a dispute between competing makers of adjustable gas-pedal systems in vehicles, arises as the justices have shown increasing interest in U.S. law protecting inventions. … The case essentially tests how to determine when an invention is truly new and different, and should receive a patent that entitles its inventor to the exclusive right to make, use and sell the item. That standard can make a difference in how people and companies spend time and money on inventions. If it is too easy to get a patent for a small variation on a previous invention, there is more of a chance that competitors could infringe on it, so companies might acquire patents solely for defensive reasons. If it is too difficult to get a patent for a small but unique adaptation of an item, it could discourage research and development." USA adds, "The question in the oral arguments scheduled for Tuesday focuses on how to determine when an invention is 'obvious,' and therefore not worthy of protection. At issue is whether a standard used by the U.S. appeals court that hears patent cases allows patents for changes too small to matter. … The dispute is being watched closely by manufacturers, from the tiremaker Michelin to gift-packaging producer Hallmark."

DOJ_NMG_0097073

Speculation Swirls Over Future Mergers. The Wall Street Journal (11/22, C1, Zuckerman) reports, "Who's next? … That's the question on the lips of investors, traders and investment bankers on the heels of a deluge of mergers and acquisitions." The Journal continues, "Some say consumer-oriented stocks, health-care providers, gaming and tech companies could become acquisition targets in the months ahead. Some point to Sprint Nextel, Hilton Hotels, and home builders such as Lennar, Ryland Group and D.R. Horton as possible targets. Private-equity firms are circling home-service company ServiceMaster, say people familiar with the matter. … Others are focusing on companies with steady cash flows and a large percentage of shares owned by company executives, or companies run by older executives who may be willing to sell out." The Journal adds, "There has been so much deal activity this year that it looks like anyone could be fair game. Targets have included companies with stable cash flows but poor growth prospects, even in sectors that haven't seen many mergers in the past. … But investors shouldn't get carried away betting on possible takeovers. Not only are they tough to predict, these deals also are somewhat less lucrative than they once were. The average premium paid over market prices for shares of companies subject to an acquisition bid this year is 17%, down from 25% in 2000, according to Thomson Financial. .. Some analysts say the acquisitions are a sign that stock prices remain reasonably priced, despite the recent run-up in the market that has pushed stock indexes to new highs. Some short sellers -- investors who bet on stock-price declines -- have become cautious. They are reluctant to establish big positions against even stocks with weak outlooks, worried that any wager against a company will turn into a loser on word of a lucrative deal. This wariness is adding to the market's upward momentum. … Mostly, all the wheeling and dealing stems from lots of money sloshing around the global markets, as interest rates remain low. Investors are shoveling money at private-equity firms, which buy public companies or businesses with an eye toward reselling them later at a profit, and at high-yield but risky loans and junk bonds backing acquisitions. That suggests many deals are financial bets, not strategic business moves, perhaps reducing their chance for success."

Qantas Considers Takeover Approach From Texas Pacific, Macquarie. The Wall Street Journal (11/22, A11, Mcfarland) reports, "Qantas Airways said it is considering a takeover approach by Texas Pacific Group and Macquarie Bank Ltd., amid market speculation it will soon receive an offer valuing the Australian flag carrier at up to 11 billion Australian dollars (US$8.5 billion)." The Journal continues, "In a brief statement, Qantas didn't provide further details on the nature of the approach, but a senior dealer said the group is expected to offer up to A$5.50 a share. Qantas shares soared on the news, with its stock gaining as much as 20% to a morning high of A$5.25 in Australia. … 'The approach is confidential and incomplete and is being investigated by Qantas,' Cassandra Hamlin, the carrier's acting company secretary, said in a statement to the Australian Stock Exchange, indicating other options such as a regional merger with Singapore Airlines might be on the table. … Qantas also said in a statement it has 'undertaken over a period of years discussions with a range of individuals and companies, including airlines, on possible partnerships, joint ventures and acquisitions.'" The Journal adds, "SIA, which competes with Qantas for passengers on lucrative routes to Europe and North Asia, said it isn't in talks with Qantas. … Macquarie Bank said it has no comment on the Qantas statement, repeating a statement made to Dow … The private-equity sector has targeted Australian companies in recent months with multibillion dollar bids. To date, the largest bid has come from a consortium led by Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co and including Texas Pacific, Blackstone Group LP and Bain Capital LLC, for Coles Myer Ltd. The retailer recently rejected the A$18.2 billion bid as inadequate."

Union Ruling Clouds Suez-Gaz De France Agreement. The Wall Street Journal (11/22, A11, Gauthier-Villars) reports, "A Paris court ruling could upset the schedule for the planned €43.43 billion ($55.65 billion) merger of French utilities Suez SA and Gaz de France SA, and potentially thwart the deal altogether, handing a victory to French energy-sector workers and dealing a major blow to France's government." The Journal continues, "The unexpected ruling, which GdF tried but failed to get annulled last night via an appeal, said state-run GdF can't approve the merger until it gives unions more information about the deal's impact on jobs. This means a crucial GdF board meeting that had been called for today to determine the merger's final terms is likely to be called off." The Journal adds, "The ruling, which was upheld late last night by an appeals court, may cause the merger schedule to be pushed back at least until March -- missing the original year-end deadline -- because Suez and GdF will have to redraft merger terms to factor in 2006 earnings, according to lawyers involved in the deal.

DOJ_NMG_0097074

Pushing through the highly politicized merger in the middle of the French presidential elections, planned for April, could also be tricky because the opposition left-wing Socialist Party opposes the deal."

Firm Exonerated Of Antitrust Allegations Wins Baldrige Award. USA Today (11/22, Jones) reports, "A San Diego company that in 2002 was the target of Senate antitrust hearings on Tuesday was one of three companies awarded the 2006 Malcolm Baldrige National Quality Award, perhaps the most prestigious award given to business by the federal government." USA continues, "Premier purchases $27 billion a year of medical supplies and services for 1,500 hospitals. In 2002 the company was accused of accepting something akin to payola from large manufacturers that kept small companies and their cutting-edge products from being sold to hospitals." USA adds, "The accusations were untrue, CEO Richard Norling said in an interview Tuesday, but the scrutiny proved to be a learning experience for the company. He says Premier also learned as it went through the Baldrige process and made changes designed to allow small companies in the medical industry to better compete. … Norling said it 'feels incredibly good,' to come full circle from being a company under scrutiny. He said that Baldrige examiners were aware of the company's history and had asked him if there was anything that might turn up later to tarnish Baldrige's image if it were to go out on a limb and give Premier the award. … 'The Baldrige Award's judges determined that Premier … lived up to (the award's) very high standards,' Baldrige director Harry Hertz said in an e-mail. 'Premier has been a leader in setting ethical practice guidelines.'"

EU Clears UCB Bid For Schwarz Pharma. The AP (11/22) reports, "Belgian drugmaker UCB SA won EU approval Tuesday to take over Germany's Schwarz Pharma AG, clearing the last regulatory hurdle to the deal." The AP continues, "The acquisition, which Schwarz's board is recommending to shareholders, would create a new company with revenue of more than 3.3 billion euros ($4.23 billion) and yearly research and development spending of 770 million euros ($986.91 million)." The AP adds, "UCB said it received a green light from U.S. regulators on Nov. 10 and was now waiting for Schwarz shareholders to tender their shares by a Dec. 8 deadline. … The European Commission cleared the deal despite overlaps between the two because they both produce a small number of over-the-counter and prescription medicines in some European countries, from antihistamines, iron supplements, heart disease drugs and asthma treatments. … But their combined market shares were not high enough to see them disrupt the market, it said."

Equities Exchange Said To Be Bigger Deal Than Talks Between Nasdaq-LSE. In a Wall Street Journal (11/22) op-ed, Wall Street Journal Europe editorial writer Kyle Wingfield discusses Nasdaq's latest attempt to acquire the London Stock Exchange, saying that the "context for understanding the relative importance of a potential Nasdaq-LSE tie-up," or a New York Stock Exchange-Euronext one, for that matter, "arrived last week. That's when seven leading investment banks announced plans to jointly run their own equities exchange in Europe." The mergers among traditional exchanges "are like pennies dropped from a window compared to the piano that the investment banks have sent hurtling down." According to Wingfield, the genesis of the investment banks announcement began with the "European Union's directive on markets in financial instruments." Among other obligations, the directive "imposes stricter price-publishing requirements on trading firms both before and after trades. The result is that seven investment banks -- Citigroup, Credit Suisse, Deutsche Bank, Goldman Sachs, Merrill Lynch, Morgan Stanley and UBS -- figured that if they have to boost their price reporting, they might as well go a step further and have their own trading platform." Wingfield adds, "It is admittedly a bit hyperbolic to suggest that stock-exchange mergers are suddenly irrelevant," but "business as usual won't cut it. And that probably means more mergers -- maybe even a few that matter."

Columnist Says Airline Mergers Will Not Fix Industry Problems. In his column for the Wall Street Journal (11/22, A15), Holman Jenkins writes, "Last's week proposed merger of US Airways and Delta Air Lines is the leading edge of a consolidation wave that will finally fix the problems of the airline industry … and check out our selection of historic bridges for sale." Jenkins continues, "Life affords most other industries legal and structural ways to shield themselves from all-out price warfare -- through patents and branding, product differentiation, or various kinds of competitive 'friction.' Not so the airlines. The Internet has made pricing transparent. Lenders allow start-up or discount carriers to fly the latest, spiffiest models. The high-margin business traveler accounts for a smaller share of the market nowadays, and even he's become a lot less price-insensitive. And no industry is more discommoded by antitrust's primitive and ill-advised intolerance of cooperative behavior by competitors." Jenkins adds, "Don't expect consolidation to change this, even if the current murmurfest really does result in a flurry of deals to reduce the Big Six to two or three. There's a lesson in the special genius of US Airways CEO Doug Parker's proposed acquisition of Delta … what makes his deal appealing points to why other carriers are unlikely to rush into mergers of their own. Their costs in pain and anguish would be the same or greater, but with little prospect of being able to charge significantly higher fares, even in an industry where the number of competitors is reduced. … Alas, one thing that might help -- a relaxation of antitrust rules to allow airlines to enter and exit code-sharing agreements at will -- almost certainly won't transpire. Such a break with intellectual precedent would be the most direct way to turn a chronically unstable airline industry into one that is reasonably prosperous and provides the optimum of service in terms of frequency and destinations even in the grimmer parts of the business cycle." Jenkins concludes, "There was a time when Washington might have been willing to experiment with such a daring notion if only to get itself off the hook for the pension plans of failing carriers. Delta's then-President Fred Reid publicly ventured three years ago at an industry conference the hopeful possibility that the 'Department of Justice and the Department of Transportation ought to have an additional arrow in their quiver, to enable scheduling, pricing and yield management to be done in a centralized entity [by alliances of airlines] which was immune from antitrust laws.' … It will take at least another industry meltdown to put such a heterodox brainstorm back on the table. Ditto the equally adventurous idea of allowing foreign ownership of U.S. domestic carriers. Until then, investing in airline shares will be a game for speculators, not buy-and-holders."

DOJ_NMG_0097075

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Company Blames Farmers, "Act Of God" For Rice Contamination. The Washington Post (11/22, A5, Weiss) reports, "The company that created the experimental variety of genetically engineered rice found this summer to have contaminated the U.S. rice supply contends that rice farmers and an 'act of God' are to blame for the inadvertent release of the unapproved crop. … Those are among the assertions by Bayer CropScience of Research Triangle Park, N.C., in response to a class-action lawsuit filed by hundreds of farmers in Arkansas and Missouri." The Post continues, "The 30-page response offers the first clue to how the company plans to defend itself against the 15 class-action lawsuits filed by farmers, who allege that they stand to lose millions of dollars because of the contamination. … Lawyers for the farmers said they had expected the company to deny responsibility, but were offended by its attempt to blame farmers. The lawyers said their clients had no reason to suspect that the seeds they were planting in recent years were contaminated by Bayer's unapproved variety. … 'The farmers are innocent victims,' said Don Downing, a principal at Gray, Ritter & Graham PC, the St. Louis firm that filed the largest suit, in U.S. District Court in eastern Missouri." The Post adds, "Denying any culpability, the Bayer response variously blames the escape of its gene-altered variety of long-grain race, LL601, on 'unavoidable circumstances which could not have been prevented by anyone'; 'an act of God'; and farmers' 'own negligence, carelessness, and/or comparative fault.' … Bayer conducted field tests of LL601 from 1999 to 2001 in Louisiana, then dropped the project without seeking government approval to market it. This year, LL601 was found to be widespread in U.S. long-grain rice, prompting Europe to cut off imports and throwing the rice futures market into turmoil."

WPost Says Government Flu Strategy Wanting. The Washington Post (11/22, A20, 690K) reports says in an editorial, "The Department of Health and Human Services released a progress report on its preparations for a flu pandemic in the United States." But "a report released by the World Health Organization earlier this month said that strains of the H5N1 'bird flu' virus -- a likely candidate for mutation into a pandemic flu -- might be developing resistance to Tamiflu and other antivirals." The WHO report "was pessimistic about the effectiveness of the vaccines against strains of the virus they were not designed to fight. In other words, if a pandemic flu began spreading tomorrow, the government's most effective strategies for saving lives could be old-fashioned quarantine and public education, techniques akin to those used during the great flu pandemic of 1918. It is not surprising, then, that the federal government currently estimates that as many as 2 million people could die if a virulent and contagious strain of flu hit the United States." Added American assistance "to the understaffed WHO in Indonesia, Thailand and Vietnam could save many more American lives than 50 million courses of antivirals."

Mining Companies Eye Navajo Land. In Part 4 of "Blighted Homeland," a four-part series on uranium contamination on Navajo tribal land, the Los Angeles Times (11/22, Pasternak) reports, "Decades after the Cold War uranium boom ended, leaving a trail of poisonous waste across the Navajo Nation, the mining industry is back, seeking to tap the region's vast uranium deposits once again. Companies are staking claims, buying mineral rights and applying for permits on the edge of the tribal homeland. They make no secret of their desire to mine within the reservation as well. … Mining companies are extracting uranium in Texas, Wyoming and Nebraska, and are taking steps to mine in Colorado. But Navajo country, covering some 27,000 square miles in Arizona, New Mexico and Utah, is the biggest prize of all — 'the Saudi Arabia of uranium,' in the words of Mark Pelizza, a vice president of Uranium Resources Inc."

NRC Tests Find Contaminated Water Under Indian Point. The AP (11/21) reports, "Government tests indicate that amounts of radioactive material found in ground water under the Indian Point nuclear power plants were seven times higher than reported by the laboratory hired by the complex to test for leaks. Testing conducted for the Nuclear Regulatory Commission and the state Department of Environmental Conservation revealed that strontium 90 levels from the August samples ranged from 5 to 30 picocuries per liter. … Nonetheless, the NRC and state health officials have said for more than a year that the public is not in danger because the radioactive isotope is not reaching any sources of drinking water."

DOJ_NMG_0097076

Residents Concerned About Indian Point "String Of Problems." WRNN-TV New York (11/21, 7:06 p.m) reported, "From radioactive leaks, to control rod malfunctions, to emergency siren failures, Indian Point has suffered from a string of problems over the past few years, forcing to shut down for months at a time and earning the worst rating in the country. For some residents, their concern is a matter of security. On 9/11 one of the planes that struck the world trade center flew directly over the plant on its way to New York City."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Gonzales Says FBI Will Add Southwest Colorado Agent. The Durango Herald (11/21, Hanel) reported, "The Federal Bureau of Investigation will send a new special agent to the Four Corners in large part to deal with a combined murder rate on the two Ute Indian reservations that is 20 times the state average." Sen. Ken Salazar "said he secured the commitment from Attorney General Alberto Gonzales on Friday. The region currently has one FBI agent," and it "might get an additional federal prosecutor, as well, according to Salazar." The Herald added, "The new FBI agent will have to go through the typical federal application and hiring process, said Special Agent Renee Vonder Haar, the FBI's spokeswoman in Denver. She doesn't know how long it will take to hire a new agent."

CBS To Air "Criminal Minds" Episode Written By FBI Profiler. Under the headline "FBI Profiler Inspires Actor," USA Today (11/22, Keveney, 2.27M) reports, "Jim Clemente keeps a picture in his wallet of a boy he helped save as a member of the FBI's Behavioral Analysis Unit. It reminds him of why he does his job. It reminds the actors on CBS' Criminal Minds of the real people they portray. 'I saw that he carries this picture with him wherever he goes, and that the saving of these children is what his life is all about,' says Mandy Patinkin, who became friends with Clemente during research for his role as BAU profiler Jason Gideon." USA adds, "Now, in a rare occurrence for an agent still with the FBI, Clemente has written a Minds episode, tonight's 'Lessons Learned' (9 ET/PT), in which the agents interrogate a Guantanamo Bay detainee in the hope of stopping an imminent terrorist attack in the USA. Clemente, 47, says the collaboration works well, creating an accurate picture of the BAU for the public and alerting other law enforcement agencies to its services, particularly in cases in which time is of the essence. 'In one hour, they can reach 15 million people,' he says."

Rhode Island Drug Sweep Nets Dozens Of Arrests. The Providence Journal (11/22, Smith) reports, "In an investigation aimed at especially brazen drug dealing on street corners, the city police and federal drug agents have arrested 70 people on narcotics and weapons charges and are seeking to arrest another 27." The Journal continues, "Law enforcement authorities began rounding up the suspects last week, punctuating an investigation nicknamed Operation Crackdown that was announced yesterday. Some corners where the drug peddlers stood three, four or five deep, depending on the weather or the time of day, have been cleared, said police Sgt. Fabio Zuena." The Journal adds, "The operation incorporates a new approach in which seven suspects with minor criminal records were separated from the crop destined for arrest and will be offered what Police Chief Dean M. Esserman called 'a second chance' to straighten out their lives and avoid another arrest. … Those seven — four juveniles and three adults — will be called into a room for a dose of 'tough love' by their neighbors, community leaders and the police, Esserman said, and offered education, substance-abuse treatment and employment opportunities. … They will be told, he said: 'You may not return to that corner. We don't have to catch you. We've already caught you. We just have to have the [arrest] warrant signed the moment you return to that corner.' Then an array of social services will be pressed on them." The Journal notes, "Operation Crackdown was described as unusual in its duration and scope. Beginning in April and lasting through last month, investigators researched the drug-dealing hot spots throughout Providence and focused on an area of Upper South Providence with the Lockwood Plaza public-housing development as the epicenter. … They identified 104 people as investigation targets, including the seven who are avoiding immediate arrest, and made a number of undercover purchases of cocaine and handguns. Esserman and Mayor David N. Cicilline said that list makes it 'the largest narcotics and gun investigation' in Providence police history. Brian Crowell, assistant special agent in charge of the New England division of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency, said the 72 arrested are 'the most ever targeted in a single drug investigation in Rhode Island.'"

Philadelphia Inquirer Highlights DEA Internet Pharmacy Investigation. In a continuing report on a

DOJ_NMG_0097077

DEA international Internet pharmacy case, the Philadelphia Inquirer (11/22) reports Temple grad student Akhil Bansal and his dad in India "are making millions smuggling pills to Americans who buy them online. Today's installment begins as DEA agents race to Australia, hoping to head off a move that could ruin their big case. It is October 2004." Andrew Shackleton "lived in Australia, where he appeared to run a multimillion-dollar online pill ring. DEA believed that Shackleton used pill suppliers around the globe, including bit players such as Temple University graduate student Akhil Bansal." The DEA "hoped to extradite Shackleton and charge him under a U.S. law – 'operating a continuing criminal enterprise.' The law had been aimed for use against mobsters and drug kingpins. This would be among the first uses against Internet pill pushers."

On its Web site, the Philadelphia Inquirer (11/21) also has posted surveillance video it says shows drug shipments being unloaded from a vehicle.

In Colombia, US Pulls Some Resources Out Of Anti-Drug Effort. In Bogota, the Miami Herald (11/21, Dudley) reports, "After several years of trying to wean farmers from the drug trade in the conflictive southern province of Caquetá, the U.S. government is winding down its funding of alternative development programs in the region. The pullout comes amid a flurry of criticism of U.S.-backed efforts to eliminate illegal drug production in Colombia, and just before the U.S. Congress is expected to vote to continue aid for counter-drug programs in this nation of 41 million people." At first, Plan Colombia "seemed to be working in Caquetá. … But now both parts of the effort seem to be in retreat. According to politicians from the area and analysts of the military, the Colombian army is quietly withdrawing some troops from the province. … Meanwhile, the United States has stopped funding economic development programs in the Caquetá region."

Seneca Nation Tobacco Merchant Reaches Compliance Deal With ATF. The Buffalo (NY) News (11/22, Herbeck) reports, "A prominent Seneca Nation tobacco merchant who has tangled several times with the federal government has agreed to change his business practices and forfeit $1.25 million to the government." The News continues, "Scott B. Maybee, one of the largest Seneca tobacco merchants in the region, signed a recent federal court agreement promising that his cigarette companies will closely adhere to federal laws during all future sales. … The agreement is believed to be the first of its kind between a Native American mail-order tobacco business and the federal government, federal officials said Thursday." The News adds, "Maybee runs three Salamanca-based companies that employ about 200 people to do mail-order and Internet cigarette sales. His business was the subject of a lengthy investigation by the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms & Explosives. … In court papers, U.S. Attorney Terrance P. Flynn agreed that the government will not criminally prosecute Maybee for any activities uncovered during the investigation. … Maybee, in turn, will forfeit $1.25 million to the government, in six payments spread out over the next two years."

NYTimes Criticizes Allen's Concealed Weapons Bill. The New York Times (11/22, 1.16M) says in an editorial, "As a last little gift to America, Senator George Allen, who was narrowly defeated by James Webb this month, has introduced what may be his final piece of legislation: a bill that would allow the carrying of concealed weapons in national parks. The argument behind the bill is that national park regulations unfairly strip many Americans of a right they may enjoy outside the parks. The bill has passed to the Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources, where we hope it will die the miserable death it deserves." If Americans "want to feel safer in their national parks, the proper solution is to increase park funding, which has decayed steadily since the Bush administration took office." Make "no mistake. Senator Allen's bill would make no one safer. It can only endanger the public."

IMMIGRATION:

Bush, Congress Said To Be Unwilling To Construct Border Fence. CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (11/21) reported President Bush "signed the bill for a border fence before the election. Cynics called it an election year ploy. It turns out they may have something. They noted that Congress had approved only 700 miles of fencing covering just about 1/3 of the border with Mexico and had failed to fully fund it. Now, with the election behind us, many say it will simply never be built. … The building of this fence…is a construction project that is going nowhere fast." Bush "signed it into law, but no one wants to pay for it. Proof, say critics, that neither the President nor congress has any intention of building a fence or of cracking down on illegal immigration. … Incoming chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee Bennie Thompson has already made it clear that he doesn't want a physical fence along the border with Mexico. He believes in a virtual fence. That puts him on the same page with Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, who is also promoting technology as the answer to securing the border."

National Guard Draws Criticism From Border Patrol Union. Fox news' Special Report (11/21, Hume) reported, "President Bush's decision in May to send the National Guard to the U.S.-Mexican border to support efforts to curb illegal immigration was greeted with both fanfare and catcalls. Supporters said it would enhance national security. Critics claim it would be ineffective at best. So, how is that program working out?" Fox went on to report, "even if a member of the National Guard actually spots someone crossing over from Mexico into the United States, all he can really do is look, listen, and get on the radio. … Critics say when you are talking about billions of dollars, that's a problem." National Border Patrol Council's T. J. Bonner: "The projected cost of operation Jump-Start for the full duration is going to be $1.9 billion. … That's a tremendous amount of taxpayer funds. And to what end?" Fox added, "the President of the border patrol union says the money would be better spent directly on more border patrol agents rather than expensive backup." Bonner: "This is a big P.R. campaign. And it's a flop." Fox adds, "supporters insist since operation jump-start began, the number of crossings are down and arrests of illegals along some stretches of the border are down 40%. Indicating, they say, the program must be working."

DOJ_NMG_0097078

Governors Seek Additional Federal Money For Jailing Illegal Immigrants. The AP (11/22) reports, "Governors of nine states, including Arizona and California, are urging President Bush to include full reimbursement for states' costs of imprisoning illegal immigrants convicted of crimes when he submits his proposed federal budget next year." The AP continues, "Arizona Gov. Janet Napolitano's office said she and California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger were spearheading the effort to increase funding for the State Criminal Alien Assistance Program administered by the U.S. Justice Department." The AP adds, "Until the federal government secures the border, the SCAAP funding is needed and deserved by states that have 'to fill this gap by policing the regions and incarcerating criminal aliens at their own considerable expense,' said the letter, which was dated Monday and released Tuesday. … Other state governors who signed the letter were Bill Richardson of N.M.; Thomas Vilsack, Iowa; Christine Gregoire, Wash.; Phil Bredesen, Tenn.; Jon Corzine, N.J.; Ted Kulongoski, Ore.; Brad Henry, Okla.; and Kathleen Sebelius, Kan. Gov. Anibal Acevedo Vila of Puerto Rico also signed the letter." The AP notes, "The letter is the latest in a series of steps taken publicly and behind the scenes by governors to press for increased SCAAP funding. … In July, Gregoire sent an invoice for nearly $50 million to the Justice Department for unreimbursed costs of housing criminal illegal immigrants in state prisons. … Napolitano has sent similar invoices since late 2004."

US Wrestles With Fate Of Deportees Who Face Danger In Native Land. The New York Times (11/22, Bernstein) reports, "On the evening of Nov. 2, a young corporate lawyer in New Jersey received a frantic call from a charity client, a 46-year-old Harlem grocery clerk with a history of petty crime. He was in custody on an airplane in Newark on his way to Mogadishu, the capital of his native Somalia, a country so dangerous that to the lawyer's knowledge, no one had been deported there in years." The Times continues, "The courts were closed, and a federal judge who heard an emergency motion the next day ruled that the clerk, Mohamad Rasheed Jama, was already outside United States jurisdiction. … So, after a stop in Nairobi, where he was handed over to Kenyans, Mr. Jama stepped off an airplane in Mogadishu — and into the hands of Islamist militants, who soon accused him of being an American spy and began demanding money. … 'They were extremely angry,' said his lawyer, Emily B. Goldberg, relating the last frightened call she got from Mr. Jama, who had spent four years in immigration detention in New Jersey awaiting deportation to the land he left at 18. 'He asked me if there was anything I could do. I told him in the American system, there was nothing more I could do.'" The Times adds, "Mr. Jama, whose deportation was based on a 1989 conviction for owning an unlicensed gun, is among the first Somalis to be repatriated against his will since the United States Supreme Court ruled 5 to 4 last year that the lack of a functioning central government in Somalia did not bar such deportations. About 4,000 Somalis nationwide are eligible for immediate deportation under the ruling, which turned on the syntax of a Congressional statute. … The case of Mr. Jama, who has a 9-year-old American daughter in Harlem, highlights issues the nation has wrestled with for decades, such as what to do with deportable immigrants who can neither be detained indefinitely nor safely repatriated, and what should limit the government's discretion to decide their fate."

TAX:

Snipes Says He Is Scapegoat In Tax Fraud Case. The AP (11/22) reports, "Wesley Snipes has told a newspaper columnist he is being unfairly targeted by federal prosecutors who indicted him on tax fraud charges. … 'It appears I'm to be the scapegoat, because there's more public interest in "celebrities gone bad" than "rich people being taken advantage of,"'' Snipes wrote last weekend in an e-mail to Orlando Sentinel columnist Scott Maxwell." The AP continues, "An Oct. 17 indictment charges Snipes with fraudulently claiming refunds totaling nearly $12 million in 1996 and 1997 on income taxes already paid. The star of the 'Blade' trilogy and other films was also charged with failure to file returns from 1999 through 2004. … According to the indictment, Snipes had his taxes prepared by accountants with a history of filing false returns to reap payments for their clients. The firm, American Rights Litigators, would receive 20 percent of refunds from clients, according to the indictment. … If convicted, Snipes, 44, faces up to 16 years in prison."

DOJ_NMG_0097079

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Open To Considering Tax Hike As Part Of Social Security Deal. The Washington Post (11/22, D1, Montgomery, 690K) reports, "With the elections over and Democrats poised to take control on Capitol Hill, the Bush administration is making a fresh push to persuade them to help rein in the rising costs of Social Security and government health-care programs by offering to open talks with 'no preconditions.'" Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr., "the president's point man on Social Security and other entitlement programs, said in an interview yesterday that he has had 'a number of...very, very general, very preliminary conversations' with lawmakers from both parties about the issue since Election Day, Nov. 7." The Post adds Paulson said "no preconditions" means "both sides get a chance to put their ideas on the table. In regard to Social Security, administration officials said that means…Bush will continue to advocate that younger workers be allowed to divert a portion of their Social Security taxes into private retirement accounts, a proposal Congress roundly rejected last year. It also means that the White House is willing to listen to other ideas, administration officials said, including personal savings accounts that do not involve diverting Social Security taxes, as well higher payroll taxes to help cover a projected explosion in Social Security costs after members of the baby boom generation begin to retire in 2008." Rob Portman, director of the Office of Management and Budget, said, "We're in a listening mode. … The president wants to listen. He wants to hear what the leaders on Capitol Hill think is the best way to go. He's not wed to any particular approach."

The possibility that Bush may consider a tax increase was first raised on Monday by Lawrence B. Lindsey, president and CEO of the Lindsey Group and formerly President Bush's chief economic adviser from 2001 to 2002. In a Wall Street Journal op-ed (11/20, A16), Lindsey wrote about "rumors" in Washington "that the president may be willing to raise taxes as part of a 'deal' on entitlement reform."

The Wall Street Journal (11/22, A6, Calmes, 2.04M) reports this morning, "Were the president to drop private accounts and call their bluff, Democrats would be challenged to make good on their professed willingness to help ensure Social Security's solvency. … Except for the Iraq war, perhaps no other issue so tests whether Democrats' capture of Capitol Hill in this month's midterm elections will cause Mr. Bush to alter what has been a largely partisan and uncompromising governing style. At the same time, any compromises cut with the Democratic majority are sure to cost Mr. Bush the support of many Republicans, especially in the House."

Staff Shortage, Medicare Premium Hike Leave SSA Under Stress. The Washington Post (11/22, D4, Barr, 690K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column, "Staffing problems at the Social Security Administration could make it difficult for field offices to handle increased telephone calls and visits prompted by an upcoming increase in Medicare premiums, according to the Government Accountability Office." In a letter "sent last week to the Senate Finance Committee, the GAO warned that Social Security is coping with staff shortages and operating under a hiring freeze just as the agency's workload is expected to jump because of the premium increases. The GAO, the congressional auditing agency, noted that the premium change, though approved by Congress in 2003, may come as a surprise to some beneficiaries."

Democrats Not Expected To Block Gates Nomination. The AP (11/22, Flaherty) reports, "When Robert Gates testifies before a Senate panel in two weeks, Democrats will voice their opposition to administration war policies and gauge Gates' willingness to change them. But they probably won't stand in his way to becoming the next defense secretary." Democrats "have begun lining up behind Gates, indicating they are inclined to vote for him if he meets two general criteria: He agrees a new approach in Iraq is needed and demonstrates he will hold sufficient political clout at the White House. … The senators say they are not immediately opposing Gates largely because his confirmation would lead to the departure of Donald H. Rumsfeld, the Pentagon chief who led the US invasion in Iraq and staunchly defended the war even as public approval plummeted."

Rangel Says Draft Proposal Was Meant To Ignite Debate. USA Today (11/22, Kelley, 2.27M) reports, "Turning conscripts into battle-ready troops would take a year or more in the unlikely event the government revived the draft, military experts say. Rep. Charles Rangel, D-N.Y., said this week that he will reintroduce a bill he sponsored in 2003 that would reinstate the military draft. Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and other military leaders, however, oppose the plan and call a draft neither necessary nor practical. House Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi also said Monday that she opposes the plan." Rangel "doesn't expect Congress or President Bush to support reviving the draft, says Emile Milne, the congressman's spokesman." Instead, Rangel "wants to spark a 'discussion among the people who represent the American people here in Congress.'"

The Christian Science Monitor (11/22, Knickerbocker, 59K) asks, "Would reinstituting the military draft even things out, spreading the responsibility while influencing politicians to think twice before sending men and women into harm's way?" Rangel "thinks so. Challenging Iran and North Korea as well as increasing the US force level in Iraq to try to stem the heightened violence there can't be done without a draft, says Mr. Rangel, a Korean War combat vet." The Monitor ads "Rangel's bill is unlikely to go far in Congress, where opposition reflects public opinion. But his proposal does raise important questions about how the armed forces are put together today and how the US military operates."

DOJ_NMG_0097080

USDA Representative Defends "Hunger" Omission In Report. The Washington Post (11/22, A19, 690K) reports that after a letter to the USDA from Congress regarding omitting the word "hunger," Mark Nord, a USDA sociologist and the lead author of the report, "repeated this week that 'hunger' is not a scientifically quantifiable term." He said, "USDA has more money in food assistance than in farming and forestry programs combined," and "has denied that removing the word from the report was a political act."

Controversial HHS Official Prescribed Birth Control In Private Practice. The Washington Post (11/22, A4, Lee, 690K) reports, "Despite his work for a Christian pregnancy counseling group that opposes contraception, the physician who yesterday began overseeing federal family-planning programs has prescribed birth control for his patients, a Department of Health and Human Services spokeswoman said." Eric Keroack, "a nationally known advocate of abstinence until marriage, served for more than a decade as medical director for A Woman's Concern, a Massachusetts nonprofit group that discourages abortion and does not distribute information promoting birth control. But HHS spokeswoman Christina Pearson said yesterday that most of Keroack's professional time had been devoted to his private practice of 20 years, not the group."

Democrats Unlikely To Advance Liberal Interest Groups' Agenda. USA Today (11/22, Stone, 2.27M) reports advocates "for abortion rights, gun control and gay rights say they are thrilled by the Democratic takeover of Congress. Even so, they admit their issues aren't likely to be addressed early — or at all — during the legislative session that begins in January." Rep. Rahm Emanuel, "who headed the Democratic campaign committee and is part of the leadership team setting the agenda for the upcoming term, says his party was 'very clear' on its priorities: The Iraq war, ethics reform, health care, jobs and other economic concerns will come first." But that is "not likely to deter liberal bloggers and groups such as MoveOn.org, says University of California-Berkeley political scientist Bruce Cain. Those groups will 'keep the heat on,' Cain says. He predicts they'll have little success."

Dodd Faces Balancing Act Between Business, Democratic Base. The New York Times (11/22, Labaton, 1.16M) reports that as Sen. Christopher J. Dodd "prepares to take over the leadership of the Senate Banking Committee while also considering a run for the presidency, lobbyists and lawmakers are all asking the same question." Travis B. Plunkett, the legislative director of the Consumer Federation of America, said, "Does he become a populist champion on issues that broadly affect the middle class, or does he shrink from controversial issues that offend huge donors?" The Times adds it is a "question facing not only Mr. Dodd, but the Democratic Party more generally as it assumes control of Congress." Dodd has "shown through a 25-year record in the Senate that he is adept at going both ways. He has, at various times, broken with big corporate interests in support of a principle. At other times, he has broken ranks with his more liberal party peers to advance causes associated with corporate patrons." In a "recent interview, Mr. Dodd said that he had hoped to be seen as unpredictably independent and willing to listen to both corporate interests and consumers." Dodd said he "planned to broaden the agenda of the committee. He proposes to look at issues of national security, including the way the administration reviews foreign investment in vital American companies, and prosperity, by examining everything from affordable housing to the loss of manufacturing jobs in the United States." But Dodd said he "was satisfied with Sarbanes-Oxley, which he played a significant role in drafting. He said he had not yet reached the same conclusions as the Bush administration and some Democrats that the law, combined with excessive litigation, had driven companies to issue stock in overseas markets instead of on Wall Street."

Democrats Set Sights On Prime Capitol Real Estate. The New York Times (11/22, Hulse, 1.16M) reports, "Forget those pesky leadership fights. The folks who run Congress are now getting down to what really matters on Capitol Hill: dividing up the office space." In "something of a break with recent tradition, the incoming Democratic speaker, Nancy Pelosi of California, is planning to expropriate the second-floor suite of offices now occupied by the current speaker, J. Dennis Hastert — a handful of rooms providing a spectacular view of the Mall." That space "has been in Republican hands for 50 years or so, even when Democrats were in charge." While Democrats are "moving up, Republicans are downsizing, abandoning their preferred spots and planning to squeeze into the current, tighter digs of the Democrats." Vice President Dick Cheney "might also come out a loser in this literal floor fight. Democrats have an eye on an office on the House side that Republicans granted to him as a kind of second home in the Capitol, to complement his office on the other wing of the building, where, by virtue of the Constitution, he presides over the Senate (he has no formal role in the House)." Rep. Charles B. Rangel "is interested in reclaiming Mr. Cheney's House space for the Ways and Means Committee."

DOJ_NMG_0097081

Point Man On Financial Crimes To Leave Treasury. The AP (11/22) reports, "The chief of a federal agency that plays a key role in trying to catch terrorist financiers, drug lords and other criminals is stepping down at the end of this year." Robert Werner, director of the Treasury Department's Financial Crimes Enforcement Network, "will take a job with Merrill Lynch & Co. Inc., the department announced Tuesday."

Senate Panel To Review DC's Medicaid Program. The Washington Times (11/22, Mcelhatton, 88K) reports, "The Senate Finance Committee is seeking a review of the District's Medicaid program, citing a 'troubling' recent city audit of patient transport and reports of questionable billing. In addition, the D.C. Office of the Inspector General is conducting two audits of the city's Medicaid transportation program -- one examining the background of providers and the other focusing on the legitimacy of claims being submitted by transport companies." The Times adds, "The federal and local scrutiny of the District's Medicaid transportation program follows a report last month in The Washington Times that noted long-standing lapses and concerns about the program." Sens. Charles E. Grassley and Max Baucus of Montana "sent a letter Friday to D.C. Inspector General Charles Willoughby seeking a confidential briefing on efforts to probe city Medicaid costs."

IBM, Cray Win DARPA Supercomputer Contract. The Wall Street Journal (11/22, B2, Clark, 2.04M) reports, "A Pentagon research agency announced plans to spend nearly $500 million to develop next-generation supercomputers, funding ambitious design efforts at Cray Inc. and International Business Machines Corp. The Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency said it will award Cray $250 million and IBM $244 million under a new phase of a long-running development program, which hopes to create not only major advances in hardware but also new ways to program massive scientific machines." IBM and Cray officials said that DARPA's "unprecedented" grants reflect "a determination to ensure the U.S. remains in the forefront of the field."

Husband Of US Trade Representative Dies. The AP (11/22) reports, "Curtis Carroll, husband of U.S. Trade Representative Susan Schwab, has died, Schwab's office announced Tuesday. Carroll, a professional magician, died Monday of kidney and liver failure, Schwab spokesman Sean Spicer said." Deputy US Trade Representative John Veroneau "will represent Schwab on Wednesday at the signing ceremony for a free trade agreement with Colombia, Spicer said."

Spellings Is First Cabinet Secretary To Appear On "Jeopardy." The AP (11/22, Zuckerbrod) reports, "Education Secretary Margaret Spellings says she studied hard to prepare for Tuesday night's airing of 'Celebrity Jeopardy!'" Spellings is "the first Cabinet secretary ever to appear on" "Jeopardy!" By appearing, she won $25,000 for the charity ProLiteracy Worldwide which was picked by "Jeopardy!" in order to "comply with government ethics rules."

Retired Admiral Teaching At Naval Academy Profiled. The Washington Post (11/22, Weeks, 690K) reports that retired Adm. William J. Crowe, Jr., "with hearing aids and stooped shoulders, is passing along his sea of wisdom to a classful of intense and intrigued midshipmen at the U.S. Naval Academy." Asked about Iraq, "He does have some notions on how to avoid getting into another Iraq-like complication. ... Crowe believes it's the perfect moment to craft guidelines that might be used the next time around." Crowe, "who has been teaching in the academy's political science department since 1999, hopes to engender a sense of caution and reason in the next generation of commanders and help keep the United States from entering unjust -- and unjustified -- interventions." He "supported John Kerry in 2004."

White House Communications Move To Internet Infrastructure. Government Computer News (11/22, Wakeman) reports the "completion of the transition of the White House's external communications system to an Internet protocol-based infrastructure will be done by General Dynamics Corp.'s IT business." Under a "$7 million contract from the White House Communications Agency, General Dynamics of Falls Church, Va., will use a Synchronous Optical Network backbone for connections between the White House and the outside world." General Dynamics "has been working with the White House Communications Agency for more than four years on various communications projects doing analysis, design and infrastructure upgrade work, said company spokesman Mark Meudt." The White House Communications Agency "provides the systems for the president, vice president, presidential emissaries, White House staffers and Secret Service. The systems include audiovisual, voice and data capabilities. The White House Communications Agency also supports the president when he travels."

DOJ_NMG_0097082

Democratic House Aide Cleared In Leak Probe. The New York Times (11/22, Shane, 1.16M) reports, "A Democratic staff member [Larry Hanauer] of the House intelligence committee has been cleared of wrongdoing by a Republican-led leak investigation and reinstated in his position, committee officials said Tuesday." Hanauer was accused of being "a source for an article on Sept. 24 in The New York Times about a National Intelligence Estimate saying the Iraq war had become a cause célèbre for terrorists." Democrats called the investigation "payback for a decision by the committee's ranking Democrat, Representative Jane Harman of California, to release a report by an outside counsel into actions on the committee by former Representative Randy Cunningham, a California Republican now serving a prison term for taking bribes."

Attention Given To Pelosi's Attire Considered. The AP (11/22, Noveck) reports House Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi's "clothes — stylish, well-chosen and nicely cut, of the Armani variety" have "garnered attention since she became the most powerful woman in American politics earlier this month." The AP asks, "Why do we focus on Pelosi's clothes and not those of our president, or any male in Washington? Is it inherently sexist, detracting attention from her obvious accomplishments? Or is it merely a reflection of the obvious truth that, while clothes matter for both men and women, female attire is more noticeable, more expressive and more interesting?" Pelosi, "a 66-year-old grandmother, isn't the first powerful woman in politics to be put under the sartorial microscope. The choices of Hillary Clinton, perhaps the most visible woman in U.S. politics, have been deconstructed through time, from her changing hairstyles to her inaugural hat in 1993 to the constant dark pantsuits on the Senate campaign trail, often paired with a pink blouse. (Again, imagine her well-dressed husband being criticized for always choosing a dark suit.)" One "extensive analysis of Pelosi's clothing came from Pulitzer-prize winning fashion critic Robin Givhan of The Washington Post, who often writes about the attire of major Washington figures — including a much-noticed piece on Vice President Dick Cheney's casual outerwear at a Holocaust memorial service in Poland last year."

Paulson Criticized For Lack Of Political Savvy. In his Washington Post column (11/22, D1), Steven Pearlstein says Treasury Secretary Hank Paulson "gave a splendid speech this week about the need to re-engineer the financial regulatory structure to make it more efficient and enhance the competitiveness of U.S. markets in the face of stiff new competition from London and Hong Kong." Paulson's "approach is reasoned, nuanced and pragmatic. It is also refreshingly naive." Paulson "comes at these issues as someone who is willing to take the facts and logic wherever they lead, even if it means offending friendly interest groups or running some sacred cows off the road." What Paulson "hasn't had time to master is the black art of Washington policy-speak -- and that is where the naive comes in." Paulson has "brought a breath of fresh air to the stale partisan atmosphere of Washington. But if he wants to succeed as the honest broker, he'll need to crack the code on the Washington policy conversation and reassure Democrats and other skeptics that he's got something new to sell."

WPost Says Paulson Wants Right Balance On SarbOx. The Washington Post (11/22, A20, 690K) says in an editorial, "US and foreign companies alike sought listings on U.S. stock exchanges so that they could tap into the world's largest and most efficiently managed pool of savings. But this has recently ceased to be true: Fewer companies are seeking U.S. listings; some foreign ones are delisting, preferring to trade on a stock exchange elsewhere; and many U.S. companies are turning their backs on stock exchanges altogether as private-equity funds acquire them. Some interest groups have presented these trends as evidence that the post-Enron reform of corporate governance, through the Sarbanes-Oxley law, overreached. Mr. Paulson rightly refused to swallow that simplification." Under Sarbanes-Oxley, "auditors have insisted on an excessively burdensome implementation of now-infamous Section 404 of the law, which requires companies to check the management systems used to generate numbers on sales, inventory, costs and so on. What's needed is regulatory guidance to dissuade auditors from interpreting this requirement overzealously, particularly for smaller firms. Mr. Paulson has struck the right balance."

Dorgan Defends Pessimistic View Of Trade Deficit. In a Wall Street Journal (11/21, 2.04M) letter to the editor, Sen. Byron Dorgan says, "Alan Murray's column ('Two Books, Two Different Democratic Tones,' Nov. 8) about my book 'Take This Job and Ship It' complains that it isn't upbeat and optimistic. Well, he's right about that! My book takes on the $800 billion-a-year, out-of-control trade deficits. It looks behind the economic numbers to understand what is happening to American workers who are being told to compete with workers in other parts of the world who will work for pennies an hour. My book pulls back the curtain on incompetent trade agreements that sell our country short by paving the way for outsourcing American jobs and running up crushing trade deficits. It's hard to find optimism in that kind of failure." Dorgan adds he believes "the current path is unsustainable. These trade deficits will have significant and dangerous consequences to our economy and our future. That doesn't mean we should retreat into a protectionist strategy. But we should recognize that we are engaged with smart, tough economic competitors, and it's long past the time for us to insist that the rules of trade be fair to our country, to our workers and to our businesses."

DOJ_NMG_0097083

Liberal Economists To Unveil Plan To Shield US From Globalization. In his Washington Post column (11/22, A21), Harold Meyerson says that to counteract the problems caused by globalization, former Treasury Secretary Robert Rubin's Hamilton Project "has called for greater public investment in education, health care, research and development, and infrastructure; balancing the budget; and wage insurance for workers compelled to take lower-paying jobs in our Wal-Mart-ized economy." In response "to the Hamilton Project's creation, a group of some 50 liberal economists loosely affiliated with the Economic Policy Institute (EPI) began work of their own" that will "be unveiled in January." The "fundamental difference between the two projects -- that is, between the two primary schools of Democratic economics -- is that Rubin's largely believes the rules of the market to be immutable and sound (though it's precisely the rules of the market that are depressing American incomes), while EPI's, in the words of economist Mark Levinson, 'rejects the notion that what has happened to this economy is inevitable. Policy can turn this around.'" EPI's project "will call for a pay-or-play health insurance system (employers can cover their own employees in private plans or pay taxes into an expanded version of Medicare that will cover everyone else) and for a retirement system in which employers can offer their employees pensions or, with their employees, pay into a system administered by Social Security. It will suggest a series of policies to decouple globalization from downward pressure on wages -- adding some enforceable labor standards, for instance, to the rules of the World Trade Organization."

Bush Daughter's Purse Stolen In Argentina. The AP (11/22) reports US and Argentine media "reported that one of President Bush's 24-year-old twin daughters had her purse stolen while being guarded by the Secret Service during a visit here." ABC News, "citing unidentified law enforcement reports, reported on its Web site Tuesday that Barbara Bush's purse and cell phone were taken while she was dining in a Buenos Aires restaurant." La Nacion newspaper, citing anonymous government sources, said in its online edition early Wednesday that one of Bush's daughters had her purse taken Sunday afternoon in the popular tourist district of San Telmo."

The Washington Post (11/22, Argetsinger, Roberts, 690K) reports in its "Reliable Source" column, "ABC News reported yesterday that elder-by-seconds twin Barbara joined Panama-based sister Jenna on a trouble-scarred trip to Argentina. ABC, citing 'law enforcement reports' it obtained, said someone stole a purse and cellphone from Barbara at a Buenos Aires restaurant -- right under the noses of her Secret Service agents. Also, an agent accompanying them was mugged during his off-hours."

Bush Called Uncivil For Use Of Term "Democrat Party." In her Washington Post column (11/22, A21), Ruth Marcus says, "If he wanted to, President Bush could change the tone in Washington with a single syllable: He could just say 'ic.' That is, he could stop referring to the opposition as the 'Democrat Party' and call the other side, as it prefers, the Democratic Party." The "derisive use of 'Democrat' in this way was a Bush staple during the recent campaign." But "even as he promised to work to change the tone in Washington after the elections, the president couldn't manage to change his language. In his day-after-the-elections news conference, Bush employed this needling locution five times."

OTHER NEWS:

White House Predicts Slower Economic Growth. The CBS Evening News (11/21, story 6, 0:20, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Now to the coming attractions for the economy. The White House predicted today that economic growth will slow next year to below 3% thanks to the slump in the housing market. And inflation will tick up a bit. Prices are expected to rise just over 2.5%."

Fox News' Special Report (11/21, Hume) reported "the new forecast matches with last year's growth figures." The Administration also said "the economy is still in very good shape." The Wall Street Journal (11/22, A2, Solomon, 2.04M) says "the new economic-growth forecast, on which the president's new budget will be based, is largely in line with private-sector estimates. Private forecasters are predicting GDP growth of 3.4% this year and 2.6% in 2007. On the inflation front, the private sector is less sanguine about 2006, estimating 3.5% CPI growth and 2.5% in 2007." The Financial Times (11/22, Guha) reports the White House also predicted "the US labour market will remain tight next year…raising hopes that ordinary Americans will start to feel more of the benefits of the country's economic expansion." The Washington Times (11/22, Dinan, 88K) and New York Times/AP (11/22), among other sources, run similar reports.

Nasdaq And S&P Reach 2006 Highs. USA Today (11/22, 2.27M) reports, "Stocks crept higher Tuesday as rising oil prices partly smothered euphoria over shares of Internet wunderkind Google cracking the $500 barrier. The Nasdaq composite and Standard & Poor's 500 indexes, which include Google among their components, both set 2006 highs: The Nasdaq was up 2.12 points to 2454.84 and the S&P was up 2.31 points to 1402.81. The Google-free Dow Jones industrial average rose 5.05 points to 12,321.59 that left it 21 points shy of its record close on Friday." NBC

DOJ_NMG_0097084

Nightly News (11/21, story 7, 0:10, Williams, 9.87M) noted only that "on Wall Street today, stocks finished with modest gains."

NYTimes Says Economy Not Raising Wages. The New York Times (11/22, 1.16M) editorializes, "Nearly every month for the past two and a half years, inflation has eaten up whatever wage gains most American workers have managed to eke out. In August, however, the cost of living started to moderate, thanks largely to falling energy prices. As a result, wages outpaced prices substantially in September. And in October, according to a government report last week, average hourly earnings were 2.8 percent higher than a year earlier, after adjusting for inflation -- the biggest annual increase since 1998. A real increase is something to cheer for a broad swath of working Americans." But "behind the headline numbers, the wage picture -- and what it says about the economy -- is still cloudy. The gains of September and October were due to declining inflation, not faster wage growth. And with most economists predicting a slower economy through the middle of next year, it's unlikely that American workers will get a sustained pay boost any time soon. … The coming holiday shopping season will be the true test of consumer resiliency. But the modesty of recent purchases -- in the face of the best real wage growth in eight years -- does not bode well."

Wilson, Schmidt Claim Victory In NM1, OH2. The New York Times/AP (11/22) reports, "More than a week after Representative Heather A. Wilson, Republican of New Mexico, claimed a razor-thin election victory, her Democratic challenger conceded Tuesday, saying that a recount would cost too much and that there was no guarantee it would reverse the result." In the 2nd CD of Ohio, Rep. Jean Schmidt, "a Republican, clinched re-election Tuesday. Additional ballot counts gave her an insurmountable edge of about 3,200 votes over her Democratic challenger, Victoria Wulsin." In New Mexico, Wilson, "a five-term congresswoman, won by 875 votes, with 105,921 votes to 105,046 votes for the Democrat, Patricia Madrid, the state attorney general."

Giuliani Forms Federal Presidential Exploratory Committee. The New York Times (11/22, Chan, 1.16M) reports former New York Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani "has filed papers with the Federal Election Commission to create a presidential exploratory committee, joining a fellow Republican, Senator John McCain of Arizona." Giuliani's filing, "hand-delivered to the commission on Monday, says he is still 'testing the waters,' meaning that for now, he can raise and spend money on polls and travel but not declare himself a candidate or build a substantial war chest." Giuliani "created a political committee in New York State on Nov. 10 called the Rudy Giuliani Presidential Exploratory Committee. But he stopped short of filing federal papers, leading to speculation that he had doubts about even weighing a run."

McCain Stance On US Troop Levels In Iraq Said To Pose Political Risks. AFP (11/22, Collinson) reports, "As Americans wonder when the troops will come home from Iraq, Republican White House hopeful John McCain is laying his first big bet of the 2008 campaign: demanding more soldiers for the war." McCain's position "contrasts sharply with the call of victorious Democrats for a phased withdrawal from Iraq." McCain says that "more men must be poured in to flush out insurgent strongholds, crush militias and sectarian violence and to train Iraqi forces." McCain "may be tailoring his message to hawkish, pro-military conservative voters who will decide the Republican nominee in primary elections. 'I don't think it dooms him in his primary process. He has a hard right primary he has to go through. My guess is that's part of the calculation,'" Delaware Sen. Joe Biden (D), a potential '08 candidate, said Monday.

Romney Seen As Methodically Moving Toward Presidential Bid. The AP (11/22, Johnson) reports, "By almost any measure, Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney -- a would-be presidential candidate -- should be hanging his head right now. He was chairman of an association supposed to elect Republican governors, but they lost 20 of 36 races on Election Day, which saw widespread GOP losses. Then, in an issue critical to the GOP's conservative base, the Massachusetts legislature balked at his request to let state voters decide on an anti-gay marriage amendment, forcing him to petition the state's highest court." Meanwhile, Arizona Sen. John McCain (R) and ex-New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani (R) "jumped out and announced they were forming presidential exploratory committees. Yet true to the business training that earned him hundreds of millions of dollars, Romney has a plan and he's sticking to it." Romney "is proceeding on a methodical course of fundraising, staff-building and outreach. … 'I have not seen an individual approach this situation with a greater degree of structure or by compiling such a vast database for making it, both on the personal and political sides,' said Tom Rath, a veteran New Hampshire political operative who has advised former Republican candidates such as Bob Dole, George H.W. Bush, Lamar Alexander and George W. Bush."

Brownback Reaching Out Beyond Christian-Conservative Base. The Kansas City Star (11/22, Stearns, 271K) reports that Kansas Sen. Sam Brownback's (R) "post-Thanksgiving schedule included an HIV test and reporting to prison," providing "further evidence that, as Brownback nears the formal announcement of his long-simmering presidential exploration, he remains determined to stake out a unique position in what likely will be a crowded" GOP "primary field. Typically pigeonholed by political analysts as the candidate of the religious right, Brownback hopes to be more inclusive. Christian conservatives…are his natural base of support. But publicly highlighting issues such as the plight of prisoners and poverty in developing nations can help Brownback broaden his appeal, even as he asserts that his faith calls him to deal with such issues. It's an effort to show that compassionate conservatism isn't an empty motto." Brownback and Illinois Sen. Barack Obama (D) on Dec. 1 "will attend best-selling author Rick Warren's Saddleback Church in southern California for a Global AIDS Summit." The senators "will get HIV tests to 'destigmatize the test and the information.'" A week later, Brownback "is set to spend the night at the Louisiana State Penitentiary, in Angola, La." Brownback "hopes his visit will highlight the success of faith-based programs."

DOJ_NMG_0097085

Religious Group Withdraws Wal-Mart Boycott. The Wall Street Journal (11/22, Hudson, 2.04M) reports, "A religious group that had rallied members to boycott Wal-Mart Stores Inc. this weekend backed off the pledge on Tuesday." The American Family Association and Operation Save America "had urged its followers to stay away from Wal-Mart on the Friday and Saturday following Thanksgiving to protest the retailer's recent ties with homosexual groups, including its decision this year to join a national chamber of commerce for gay and lesbian businesses," but "after Wal-Mart issued a statement on Tuesday outlining its policies on corporate donations and its stance against discrimination, the American Family Association declared itself 'pleased' and withdrew its call for a boycott." The association also "credited its decision to withdraw its boycott to Wal-Mart's announcement Tuesday that it will not 'make corporate contributions to support or oppose controversial issues unless they directly relate to their ability to serve their customers.'"

US Teen Birthrate Falls To All-Time Low. USA Today (11/22, Rubin, 2.27M) reports the birthrate "among U.S. teens, which has been falling since its peak in 1991, dropped to an all-time low in 2005, according to preliminary data released Tuesday by the National Center for Health Statistics, part of the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention." But among Hispanic teens "the birthrate is twice as high as the overall teen birthrate." Overall, the "preliminary 2005 rate for females ages 15-19 was 40.4 births per 1,000, down from 41.1 in 2004 and 61.8 in 1991. The Hispanic rate for teens 15-19 was 81.5, down from 82.6 in 2004 and 104.6 in 1991." Demographer Stephanie Ventura, co-author of the report, says "abstinence and contraceptive use 'are still driving factors' behind the declining teen birthrate."

Assassination Threatens To Destabilize Lebanon; Complicates Debate Over Syria. The assassination Tuesday of a prominent Lebanese politician received prominent coverage on the front pages of the nation's dailies and the nightly network news broadcasts. The death of Pierre Gemayel was seen as likely to throw Lebanon in a state of chaos and Syria was largely seen as being responsible for the killing. Syria's suspected role in the assassination was also seen as likely to complicate calls for Washington to reach out Damascus for assistance in Iraq. The CBS Evening News (11/21, story 3, 0:40, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "The White House believes Syria and Iran are still causing trouble in Lebanon where today assassins killed a government official." CBS (Phillips) added, "Another political assassination in Lebanon has the country once again teetering on the brink of chaos. Just four months after the Israeli Lebanese conflict. This time the victim was one of Lebanon's leading Christian anti-Syrian cabinet ministers, Pierre Gemayel, the son of a former president. Gunmen rammed their car into his and sprayed it with bullets. There's been widespread international condemnation of the attack, including from President Bush, and widespread fear of reprisal political killings and even a slide into civil war."

ABC World News (11/21, story 2, 2:20, Gibson, 8.78M) said the Bush Administration "called the ambush in Beirut an act of terrorism and pointed a finger at the neighbor Syria." ABC (Wright) added, "The Lebanese government was already in meltdown -- the country still reeling after its month-long war with Israel. Tonight, the US is all but accusing Syria and the militant group Hezbollah of murder in an effort to topple the government." In an analysis segment, ABC World News (11/21, story 3, 1:45, Karl, 8.78M) reported, "There was little appetite in the Bush administration to deal with Syria on Iraq before today. And there is even less now. Officials see this as part of a pattern. There's been nine assassinations or attempted assassinations of anti-Syrian politicians in Lebanon over the past three years. With that kind of activity going on, the view from the Bush administration is, it would be folly to think that talking to Syria would help in Iraq."

The Washington Post (11/22, A1, Wright, 690K) notes Bush "blasted Syria and Iran yesterday after the assassination of Christian cabinet minister Pierre Gemayel for trying to destabilize Lebanon, reflecting tensions between Washington and its two Middle Eastern rivals that are increasingly playing out in Lebanon as well as Iraq." While the President "stopped short of blaming Syria for the killing, he warned that the United States remains 'fully committed' to supporting Lebanon's democracy despite attempts by Damascus, Tehran and their allies in Lebanon 'to foment instability and violence.'"

The New York Times (11/22, Knowlton, 1.16M) reports that the assassination was "widely condemned today as an act of terrorism that threatens to upend not only Lebanon's stability, but also tentative moves to engage Syria in talks on regional peace initiatives." Britain, France, Egypt, the European Union and the United States issued "powerful condemnations" of the killing. Undersecretary Burns described the killing as an act of terrorism and intimidation, saying, "We believe it's the responsibility of all countries to support the Siniora government and to oppose those who would try to divide Lebanon or return violence to political life in Lebanon." At the UN, Ambassador Bolton "spoke with visible anger about the killing." Asked by a reporter whether the Hariri tribunal "should now be delayed to avoid fanning instability," he said sharply: "How incredibly wrong that would be. Instability? They're killing people in Lebanon, they're assassinating political leaders. Not the time to seek justice?"

DOJ_NMG_0097086

NBC Nightly News (11/21, lead story, 3:15, Williams, 9.87M) said the killing "could make Lebanon, which is still recovering from that massive Israeli bombing, a very unstable place and give control there to enemies of the United States. And that is why this story, this assassination, was felt today around the world." NBC (Engel) added, "This assassination is likely to have a destabilizing effect throughout the Middle East. The White House is accusing Iran, Syria and Hezbollah of trying to topple and take over the Lebanese government. Already tonight there are angry protests and some calls for revenge in a country edging closer to civil war." NBC's Engel also said, "It is absolutely imperative that the American administration takes this very serious at a time when America's looking for friends and talking about engaging in diplomacy. There is a real possibility that this anti-American coalition of Iran, Syria and Hezbollah, will succeed and take over the government."

In a separate analysis segment, NBC Nightly News (11/21, story 2, 2:00, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "All of this may only complicate US dealings in the Middle East. And especially any possible US exit strategy from Iraq which many say has to involve dealings of some sort with Syria." NBC (Mitchell) added, "There's a lot of pressure on the Administration. The Baker-Hamilton Iraq Study Group and other leading Republicans, such as Chuck Hagel, all say that Iran and Syria aren't the solution to the problem, precisely because they are helping to fuel the insurgency. This is hard for this Administration, for George Bush and Dick Cheney to accept. They have made these states terror-sponsoring states on their official list and consider Iran to be on the axis of evil -- a very hard step for them to take."

The AP (11/22, Loven) reports briefly that Secretary Rice telephoned Lebanese Prime Minister Fouad Siniora "with condolences and to reiterate US support for democracy in Lebanon."

In a front page article, the New York Times (11/22, A1, Slackman, 1.16M) said the assassination "jolt[ed] a nation already paralyzed by political conflict that threatens to topple the government" and "inflamed tensions between the anti-Syria coalition trying to hold its government together and the Syrian-allied opposition, led by Hezbollah." Although Lebanese Prime Minister Fouad Siniora "vowed in a televised speech that his government would hold firm," the Times says "in truth, his government may already be on life support" after "six pro-Syria ministers aligned with Hezbollah resigned" last week "after a failed effort to gain greater control over the government." The killing "also is likely to complicate any American effort to enlist Syria's help to stabilize Iraq." The US "withdrew its ambassador from Damascus after [former Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik] Hariri was assassinated nearly two years ago," and "the suspicion that Syria is behind the efforts to destabilize Lebanon will make it nearly impossible for Washington to send a full ambassador back to Damascus without appearing to have abandoned the Siniora government," the Times writes.

The Wall Street Journal (11/22, A1, Higgins, Solomon, 2.04M) reports on its front page that Gemayel's killing "also complicates the policy debate about Iraq in Washington, where some foreign-policy experts have urged the Bush administration to reach out to Syria and Iran in an effort to curb Iraq's violence." Although Washington "stopped short of directly blaming Syria" for the killing, it said the act "underscored the need to accelerate the UN probe into the Hariri murder." For his part, President Bush condemned what he called "Syria's refusal to cease and desist from its continuing efforts to destabilize Lebanon's democratically elected government," adding that the US would "resist these efforts." At the UN, Ambassador Bolton "bristled at suggestions by some at the UN that the Hariri probe should be slowed."

The Washington Times (11/22, Behn, 88K) says the killing "was seen by analysts as part of a coordinated attempt to push the United States out of the Middle East. 'This is part of a broader effort on the part of Syrians and Iranians in their own isolation to prove they have leverage over events in the region and to minimize the role of the US in the region,' said former US ambassador to Morocco, Marc Ginsberg."

On its front page, the Washington Post (11/22, A1, Shadid, 690K) says the assassination "underlined the lack of red lines in the escalating struggle over Lebanon's political future that has followed this summer's war between Hezbollah and Israel. The struggle is crucial not only to the often zero-sum calculations of Lebanese politics but also to the regional ambitions of the United States, Iran, Syria and Israel." In a separate front page report titled "Assassination Increases Tensions With Syria, Iran," the Washington Post (11/22, A1, Wright, 690K) reports President Bush "blasted Syria and Iran yesterday after the assassination…for trying to destabilize Lebanon, reflecting tensions between Washington and its two Middle Eastern rivals that are increasingly playing out in Lebanon as well as Iraq." The Post notes that "for the past 21 months, the Bush administration has tried to steer the Mediterranean country toward democracy and away from the grips of long-standing Syrian and Iranian influence. As Iraq imploded, the Bush administration hoped that Lebanon might prove an alternative model for the flowering of freedom in the Middle East." However, the assassination yesterday "signals that the battle for Lebanon is far from over, said US officials and regional experts."

DOJ_NMG_0097087

The Financial Times (11/22, A1, Khalaf, Dinmore, Dombey) reports that "moves to bring Syria back into the diplomatic fold were dealt a blow on Tuesday by the killing" that "threatens to destabilize a government struggling for unity." The AP (11/22, Karam, Ghattas) reports that Syria and Iran "both condemned Gemayel's slaying, and Syria's Information Minister Mohsen Bilal denied Syria had any role." In an interview with Al-Jazeera, Bilal said, "Those who are accusing Syria in this sick way...do not have an iota of truth or credibility." The Los Angeles Times (11/22, Stack, 850K), USA Today (11/22, For, 2.27M) and Washington Times/AP (11/22, Ghattas) run similar reports.

More Commentary. In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (11/22, 2.04M) says, "Former Secretary of State James Baker has been saying that, when it comes to diplomacy, you don't 'restrict your conversations to your friends' -- shorthand for the view that the US should engage Syria and Iran to find solutions in Iraq and elsewhere in the Middle East. But yesterday's murder of Lebanese Minister Pierre Gemayel might remind even Mr. Baker and his Iraq Study Group what some of those non-friends are all about. … It's true that every Administration must deal with the world as it is. But when it comes to Syria, do the sages of the Iraq Study Group really want the Bush Administration to seek the benediction of a country that stirs such mayhem in Beirut?"

Two Kidnapped Gaza Red Cross Workers Released. The AP (11/22, El Deeb) reports, "Two Italian Red Cross workers kidnapped Tuesday afternoon were released shortly after midnight, Palestinian security officials said." Claudio Moroni, 36, and Gianmarco Onorato, 63, were "abducted in Deir el-Balah in central Gaza after their car was stopped by gunmen." Before their release, the Red Cross said "it was suspending its activities in the Gaza Strip, fearing for the safety of its workers." Iyad Nasr, spokesman for the Red Cross's Gaza office, said "the organization had ceased all field operations and would intervene only 'in matters of life and death,' and "workers have been ordered to stay in their offices because of fears for their safety." There was "no immediate word on the conditions of the released aid workers."

Study Says 39% Of Land Used By Israeli Settlers Owned By Palestinians. The Washington Post (11/22, A17, Wilson, 690K) reports, "An Israeli advocacy group has found that 39 percent of the land used by Jewish settlements in the West Bank is private Palestinian property, which the organization contends is a violation of international and Israeli law guaranteeing property rights in the occupied territories." In a report released Tuesday, the Settlement Watch project of Peace Now "also disclosed that much of the land that Israeli officials have said would remain part of the Jewish state under any final peace agreement is private Palestinian property." The report "draws on maps and data from the Civil Administration, the military authority Israel established to govern the West Bank following the 1967 Middle East war." Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's spokeswoman, Miri Eisin said, "the government would comment on the report's methods and findings once officials have had time to review it." Also, Israeli troops "pushed into the Gaza Strip early Tuesday and killed two Palestinians in fighting near the village of Zeitun."

Court Rules Israel Must Register Same-Sex Marriages Performed Abroad. The Los Angeles Times (11/22, Ellingwood, 850K) reports, "The Israeli Supreme Court touched off a fresh controversy over gay rights Tuesday when it ordered the government to register same-sex marriages performed abroad." The 6-1 decision "was praised by rights advocates as a political advance for gays and lesbians, who have won previous court decisions granting them broader rights in survivor benefits and inheritance," and "cheered by those who support legalizing civil marriages in Israel, where only religious ceremonies are allowed." The ruling "did not legalize same-sex weddings in Israel, where religious authorities by law hold a monopoly on authorizing marriages and divorces." Religious conservatives "criticized the decision as an erosion of Israel's status as a Jewish state and said it undermined moral teachings," and some "urged the Israeli parliament, or Knesset, to examine the possible effect on Israeli society."

US Seeks More Market Access In India For Agricultural Commodities. The Wall Street Journal (11/22, A4, Mohindru, 2.04M) reports, "The US is seeking greater market access in India for its agricultural commodities, such as wheat, to ensure balanced farm trade between the two countries, U.S. Agriculture Department Secretary Mike Johanns said." He "favored an approach where India's plant-health norms are protected and wheat trade occurs with the US," and said that "discussions on plant-health-related issues are going on so that India will be able to export its mangoes to the US by the next harvest in April."

India, China Work To Build Economic Relations. The New York Times (11/22, Rai, 1.16M) reports, "India and China established a 10-point strategy on Tuesday to strengthen economic relations and ease mistrust, agreeing that there is room enough for both to grow." At a joint media briefing the two presidents said "there was enough space for the two countries, which account for a third of the world's population, to grow in a mutually beneficial manner 'while remaining sensitive to each other's concerns and aspirations, as befits good neighbors and partners.'" They also said they "would work to double their trade to $40 billion by 2010, which some see as a sign that centuries of Western dominance in global trade may be ending." The countries "signed 13 pacts covering joint scientific initiatives, tourism promotion and the opening of new consulates," but "there were no breakthroughs at the leadership level on the first day of talks."

DOJ_NMG_0097088

Cnooc, PetroChina Sings Investment Deals In Vietnam. The Wall Street Journal (11/22, A10, Winning, 2.04M) reports, "China National Offshore Oil Corp. and PetroChina Co. have signed deals to ramp up investment in Vietnam as leaders in Beijing and Hanoi set aside a long-running maritime border dispute to forge closer energy ties, state media reported yesterday." Cnooc "signed an agreement with Vietnam Oil & Gas Corp., or PetroVietnam, on Friday to begin exploring for oil in the Gulf of Tonkin in the South China Sea on a 50-50 basis." The exploration period is "expected to last three to five years."

China's Military Buildup Designed To Compete With US Navy. The Washington Times (11/22, Gertz, 88K) reports, "China's military buildup includes new missiles and naval weapons designed to sink U.S. aircraft carriers and deny U.S. forces access to the Asia-Pacific region, a congressional commission official said yesterday." Daniel Blumenthal, a former Pentagon defense policy-maker and now a member of the U.S.-China Economic Security Review Commission, said "The Chinese have been quite successful ... in the area of sea denial, meaning that if we sent a carrier to or outside the [Taiwan] Strait as we did in 1996, it would be a lot riskier and a lot costlier to the United States." Beijing's military is also "experimenting with new attack concepts, including land-based attacks on ships 'through multiple entry concepts' in what Blumenthal called 'a very serious effort to try to basically sink a carrier or battle group.'"

China's Poor Getting Poorer. The Wall Street Journal (11/22, Batson, Oster, 2.04M) reports, "China's economic miracle has lifted hundreds of millions of people out of poverty, but the country is showing signs that its poorest citizens are falling further behind." Now Chinese government "worries about social stability and amid questions about the social costs of China's rapid growth, new figures suggest the poorest of the country's 1.3 billion people are getting even poorer." The widening of China's income gap "raises questions about the bargain its government made three decades ago when it agreed to accept a measure of social inequality as long as it improved the nation's welfare overall," and many observers place "part of the blame on the way China dismantled its social-welfare system as it phased out state control of the economy -- without building up much to replace it." The reason for the income decline at the bottom isn't clear," since the World Bank "hasn't completed its analysis and its conclusions haven't been published."

Goodlatte To Lead Congressional Ag Tour Of South America. The Washington Post's (11/22, A19) Al Kamen writes in his "In the Loop" column that outgoing House Agriculture Committee Chairman Bob Goodlatte is "leading a group of about 10 committee members, plus spouses, military aides and assorted staff" to South America "right after Thanksgiving." The delegation of "perhaps up to 40 folks in all" with make "stops in several countries" to "discuss agricultural trade -- specifically focusing on expanding US agricultural exports," according to committee spokeswoman Alise Kowalski. The Post reports that incoming Chairman Collin Peterson is also expected to travel with the group.

Populism Seen As Losing Appeal For Latin American Voters. The Wall Street Journal (11/22, A1, Lyons, 2.04M) reports, "The populist political tide that seemed to be sweeping through Latin America earlier this year is sputtering." Voters have been "choosing presidential candidates who tap into a more powerful force: economic stability." The "diminishing electoral appeal of candidates promising radical economic and political change is on display here in Ecuador, ahead of this Sunday's presidential election." The electoral failure of populists "so far has been good news for foreign investors and businesses."

Maoist Rebels In Nepal Sign Peace Deal With Government. The New York Times (11/22, Pokharel, Sengupta, 1.16M) reports that "Maoist rebels in Nepal signed a peace deal with the government on Tuesday night, with a pledge to lock up their guns, at least for now, and let voters decide the future of the country." The accord "promises to bring the rebels, who control vast swaths of the destitute countryside, into the political mainstream," and Prime Minister Girija Prasad Koirala said, "This has given a message to the international community and terrorists all over the world that no conflict can be resolved by guns. It can be done by dialogue." The interim government, "which the rebels have agreed to join," will "organize elections next year for an assembly that will determine whether Nepal will remain a kingdom and if so, what kind." However, the rebels "have not laid down their arms entirely," but "have agreed to lock up their weapons but are holding on to the keys" The United Nations is "to monitor the safekeeping of weapons through a system of closed-circuit cameras."

DOJ_NMG_0097089

The Washington Times/AP (11/22, Gurubacharya) reports, "Nepalese Prime Minister Girija Prasad Koirala and Maoist rebel leader Prachanda signed the accord at a Katmandu convention hall packed with cheering officials, dignitaries and foreign diplomats." Under the agreement, "the rebels are to join the interim parliament by Nov. 26 and will get 73 of the chamber's 330 seats. Mr. Koirala's Nepali Congress will remain the biggest party with 85 seats, and the Maoists will share second place with Communist Party of Nepal (United Marxist-Leninist)." The rebels' "large number will give them a significant role in a new interim government, which will be in place by Dec. 1," and will take a "major part in deciding how and when to elect a constituent assembly that is to rewrite the constitution and decide on the monarchy's fate."

Bangladeshi Villagers Get Internet Access. The Washington Post (11/22, A12, Sullivan, 690K) reports, "Villages in one of the world's poorest countries, long isolated by distance and deprivation, are getting their first Internet access, all connected over cell phones," and "millions of people who have no land-line telephones, and often lack electricity and running water, in recent months have gained access to services considered basic in richer countries: weather reports, e-mail, even a doctor's second opinion." Cell phones "have become a new bridge across the digital divide between the world's rich and poor, as innovators use the explosive growth of cellphone networks to connect people to the Internet." The Internet centers "are being set up by GrameenPhone, a cellphone provider partly owned by the Grameen Bank," and the centers "are building on a cellphone network created over the past decade by a Grameen Bank program that helped provide more than 250,000 cellphones in villages."

WSJournal Says Russia Likely Responsible For Ex-KGB Agent's Poisoning. In an op-ed column, "Russian Venom," in The Wall Street Journal (11/22, A14, 2.04M), Boris Volodarsky writes that it might be "too early to discuss how and why Mr. Litvinenko was poisoned," but what's "clear" is that "this was likely the work of the Russian secret service that had been after him for years." If the Russian president is involved "is open to doubt," and Russian foreign intelligence "denies any involvement in his poisoning." However, "it cannot deny," its "long history of using poison as a weapon."

HIV/AIDS Program Shows Improvement In Seven African Countries. The Washington Post (11/22, A14, Brown, 690K) reports, "Seven African countries are experiencing a decline in the prevalence of HIV infection among young, urban adults, finally reaping the benefit of AIDS prevention and treatment, the United Nations said yesterday in its annual report on the global epidemic." However, there are "troubling signs that the first African country to reverse the epidemic, Uganda, is experiencing a resurgence of infection, as is Thailand, another early success story." The report demonstrates that policymakers "need to safeguard early successes like Uganda."

NYTimes Urges IAEA To Deny Iran Nuclear Assistance. In an editorial, the New York Times (11/22, 1.16M) says the International Atomic Energy Agency has "always had a conflicted mandate" of promoting "the peaceful use of nuclear technology while also restraining the spread of nuclear weapons." The Times says "that dangerous duality is being played out again this week" as the agency debates "whether its staff should provide Iran with technical advice on how to safely complete construction of a heavy water nuclear reactor near the town of Arak." Denying the request "should be a no-brainer," the Times say, "especially at a time when Iran is defying a Security Council order that it stop enriching uranium, usable for nuclear reactor fuel or potentially a nuclear bomb." Anything less, it continues, "will only confirm Tehran's belief that the international community is not serious about containing its nuclear ambitions." The Times also urges the Bush administration, "which has agreed to talk with Iran if it suspends enrichment, needs to go further, offering Tehran explicit security guarantees in exchange for giving up technology that could feed a nuclear weapons program."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"Mining Firms Again Eyeing Navajo Land."
"Director Was A True Original."
"Filipinos' Hip-Hop Anthem."
"Assassination Leaves Lebanon At Brink."
"Getty Makes New Offer To Italy."
"Fury On The Airwaves Undid Bias Settlement."

USA Today:
"Nature Programs' Goal: No Child Left Inside."
"Every Year's Game Of Century."
